I'd honestly been worried about how that would turn out, but thanks to Figaro, I'd had no trouble going offline, getting a decent night's rest, and making it to college.

The first day wasn't the entrance ceremony or the start of classes or anything like that. It was simply a guidance session about the college.

Things here were going to be different than in high school or anything we'd experienced before, so this was obviously necessary. We looked through the materials they gave us, listened to their explanations, made preparations for next week's lessons, and got a description of our schedule going forward, but there was nothing particularly strange about any of it.

I'd expected there to be a few days of group lodging to help us familiarize ourselves with our fellow students, but apparently, they didn't do those anymore.

Cool, that means I'll have more time for Dendro now, I instantly thought, before realizing that that probably wasn't something a model student would think.

Still, we were given some time to introduce and present ourselves to the fellow students with whom we would be learning until we split into different departments two years later.

Since I came from a distant countryside, I obviously didn't know anyone here, but the introductions were enough for me to memorize the names and faces of about 70% of the freshmen.

Also, I and four others revealed that we had Infinite Dendrogram as our hobby, so, come break time, we gathered up and had a talk about it.

As expected of college students my age, the rest either hadn't been able to play much because of exams or, like me, had started after their exams were finished.

I felt that five players was a very small number, but it made sense, considering that we were the unfortunate generation of college students whose exam prep had coincided with Dendro's release.

Anyway, I was excited about the prospect of questing with my new college friends, but alas, all four of them belonged to Tenchi.

There're seven countries to choose from! Can such a coincidence even happen?! I thought, thoroughly surprised. The four seemed to share my sentiment, so it looked like it did, indeed, happen.

Naturally, going on quests with people on the other side of the continent was a difficult task. While most RPGs had teleports to fix such issues, in Dendro, teleportation was limited to Embryo unique skills, a way of leaving created dungeons, or just some weird accidents. Because of that, we had to postpone our questing to... whenever we had the chance.

Interesting thing to note: though all four of the other players were from Tenchi, they all served different lords, making them rivals, rather than allies. Their country was much like Sengoku Period Japan, so it would be apt to say they were like subordinates to Oda, Takeda, Chosokabe, and Shimazu.

If given the choice, I'd probably side with Uesugi, I thought.

So, with the guidance and orientations over, we freshmen were next confronted by countless canopy tents built on the college grounds — the club invitation zone.

The participants from all clubs were many, and they were full of zeal to gather as many new freshmen as possible. Many of us newbies were fully into it, while to some, this was just a bit too much.

I was one of the latter.

Struggling through the wave of people trying to invite me to their clubs, I made my way to the cafeteria to take a breather.

"Well, it sure looks like the culture gap between high school and college life is bigger than I expected," I muttered to myself.

Though not in the same way as the one I'd experienced with the foreign culture in Dendro, it was still pretty overwhelming.

Exhausted in both mind and body, I drank some tea while listlessly staring at the bulletin board, which, of course, had posters inviting students to clubs.

"Clubs, eh...?" I murmured.

Many people considered college students improper unless they joined a club and made the most of their youth forming bonds with fellow club members. However, doing so would definitely have a negative impact on my Dendro time.

I was fully aware that a college student had no business prioritizing an MMO over communication and bonds made in college, but I really wanted to preserve as much of my online time as possible.

“If only there was a Dendro club or something...”

If there was, I would get the collegian social experience and not lose any online time because of it.

However, while a club for all games could probably exist, a college would never, ever have a club focused entirely on one game. Ever. At least, that was what I assumed until I looked at one corner of the board.

“...There is?”

Sure enough, a poster there said “Club Infinite Dendrogram” in English, which was as much of a description as it was a title. I questioned why they hadn’t gone with a Japanese name, but I could only assume it had something to do with the abbreviation. “CID” was quite convenient.

Anyway, I wasn’t about to ignore this blessing of a discovery.

A Dendro club was a two-for-one deal for me. It would allow me to live the collegian social life and come to know new fellow players.

Well, things could get awkward if there were people from Dryfe, but that would be interesting in its own right.

I followed the map provided, and made my way to the CID room. It was my first time at this part of the college, so I felt a bit lost every now and then, but I eventually arrived at my destination.

The door had a somewhat fancy-looking wooden plate on it, saying “Club Infinite Dendrogram.”

Slightly tense, I reached out and knocked.

“Come innn,” called someone inside.

“All right, then,” I said as I opened the door.

At that moment, a certain, danger-sensitive part of my brain belatedly reacted to the voice coming from inside and urged me to stop. But alas, I’d already opened the door, and now saw what waited beyond it.

“A freshman, I assume? Hey theeere! Welcome to Club Infinite Dendr —”

That was the moment I closed the door.

I had every reason to do so.

After all, the face I'd seen there was one I'd involuntarily etched onto my brain. It was a visage I'd seen just yesterday... the one belonging to Tsukuyo Fuso.

I might've been mistaken, but I had no intention of opening the door and confirming it. It wasn't far-fetched to believe that the aberration, just like Shu, played as herself. Hell, considering the nature of her cult, it would be the obvious thing for her to keep her real face.

No, screw the reasons why she looked like she did, the person herself was a far bigger problem.

"Damn it! I should've been more cautious!"

I'd completely neglected the possibility of her being in the same college as me! I'd been told that cults often used clubs to gather new members, so why hadn't I connected the dots?! Shit! I'd gone out of the frying pan and into the fire! My college life was in danger of collapsing on the first day!

I hurriedly turned around and got ready to sprint...

"Why are you running?"

...but before I could dash, the door opened, and a slender hand reached out and grabbed me by the nape of my neck. I struggled to move regardless, but I couldn't make an inch of progress.

It seemed mechanically impossible, but once I glanced back, I saw the she-monster holding on to the frame of the door with her other hand.

Well, I... guess that's enough to render me completely immobile with one hand... LIKE HELL! What's up with this upper body strength?! What are you, my sister?!

"Wow, don't know why, but you seem really scared," she said, probably oblivious to the true cause of my panic. "Come on, there's nothing here to be afraid of. Let's go in and have some tea."

The aberration dragged me into the room with unwomanly — borderline inhuman — strength, making me feel like a hamster being swallowed whole by a snake. Then she pushed me onto the bed they most likely used to play Dendro on.

"You're here to join the club, aren't you? Why are you running?"

Was that even a question? I was basically encountering an eldritch abomination right after having a nightmare about one. Of course I'd run.

“Oh dear, what a bad expression. Why are you so...?” she said before looking at my student card. “Umm, your name is...”

“Ah?!” I gasped as I realized she’d taken the card case out of my pocket without me even realizing it. She was strong as hell and had sticky fingers!

“Okay, so your name is ‘Reiji Mukudori’... Oh?” She slightly tilted her head to the side, clearly noticing something.

Oh, crap.

“That look in your eyes, your voice, and... ‘Reiji Mukudori’? Ray Starling?”

Shit! This is what I get for just translating my last name into English! I should’ve made it less obvious!

“Oh, I see. So that’s what this is about,” she said and cracked a grin.

To me, that expression was the very epitome of horror.

“Well, well... you can’t run away here, can you?”

Oh no. This is really bad.

She was about to force me into joining her cult, and I had no means of escape. How do I handle this...?!

“Okay,” she said as she started slowly moving her hands. “Let’s begin with my thanks for yesterday.”

And then...

“Hello.” The clubroom’s door opened, and a third party entered the room.

A part of me thought it was King of Assassins, but it was actually someone I’d never met before.

It was a girl with long hair in a braid, slightly slanted eyes, and glasses, all of which came together to make her look like the diligent type.

“Vice President Tsukikage asked me to bring him the relevant papers to the club invitation tent, and...”

She stopped mid-sentence and noticed the situation in the room. The aberration — all smiles — was holding me down on the bed, while I — scared beyond words — fruitlessly struggled to escape. The sight made the girl heave a sigh.

"President, could you refrain from pushing boys down on college grounds?" she asked, speaking in such a normal tone that it almost didn't seem to fit the scenario. That made a flicker of hope light up within me.

This girl might actually be... I thought as I anticipated what she'd say next.

"More importantly, he doesn't seem to want whatever you're doing. Sexual misconduct against men is as valid as the reverse. Let him go ASAP."

She is. My God, she's actually normal.

She wasn't an eldritch being, nor was she some weird super secretary.

"Oh, come onnn, I just caught him, you know?" said the aberration.

I'm not some pocket monster for you to catch, damn it!

"I was about to invite him to the club... and make him one of us, of cooourse," the aberration purred.

"Don't you think you're being a little too forceful?" asked the normal girl. "Let him go."

"Nooo, I wanna make him miiine!"

I'd very much prefer it if you didn't!

"President, if you don't listen to me, I will leave the club."

"Eh?"

"That would leave only you and the vice president, and two people aren't enough to keep a club active, correct? Do you want that?"

The normal girl's words made the aberration falter. "That... would be a problem..."

"Then please refrain from approaching him improperly and inviting him so forcefully. I'll say it again. Let him go."

At this moment, in my eyes, she seemed somewhat divine.

"But..." muttered the aberration.

"'But' what?" demanded the normal girl.

"Okaaay..."

And thus, although reluctantly, the woman finally let me go.

Freedom! I thought as I jumped out of bed and distanced myself from the eldritch creature so much that my back was against the wall.

"He's so scared," said the normal girl. "Did you do more than just make unwanted sexual advances?"

"Nooo, I didn't do much. I just kidnap— invited him over in Dendro."

In response, the normal girl just looked at her in silence.

The aberration was clearly far too guilty to plead “I didn’t do much.”

The normal girl then sighed and said, “President, I have something to say to you. Please sit where you stand. Properly. On your knees.”

“Umm... but this is the floor.”

“No worries there. I’m sure your legs can handle it just fine.”

“That’s not the problem here...” The aberration was actually being overpowered.

Just what is this girl...? I wondered, astonished.

“You should run away right now,” the normal girl told me. “You can’t let yourself be caught by a person like... this...”

“Like whaaat...?” the aberration complained.

I felt like I’d been pulled into a boat when I was seconds away from drowning.

“Thank you,” I said, expressing my sincere gratitude. Then I left that wicked lair. Once outside, I took a moment to listen to their conversation.

“President,” said the normal girl, “I know that Infinite Dendrogram gives us great freedom, but you shouldn’t bring that mentality over to reality. You might’ve been able to kidnap him with no repercussions in the game, but here, unwanted sexual advances are a breach of public order and morals. Do you want to become a criminal?”

“Ehh? But you’ve got it all wronnng. He came here himself this time. And secondly, when you’re online, you also...”

“I separate my game life and real life, thank you very much.” The normal girl was thoroughly scolding her for this.

Anyway, thanks to her intervention, I’d escaped the aberration’s venomous fangs.

Oh, I forgot to ask for her name, I thought as I walked away.

◇

Thanks to the normal girl, I’d been able to escape the eldritch monstrosity. That was the second time the woman had held me in her grasp, and the second time someone had saved me from her.

Still, I couldn’t ignore the fact that she was in the same college as me. That could become a huge problem going forward. Though I’d avoided whatever she had planned for me this time, the aberration was now a part of my real life, and I definitely wasn't excited about that.

For some reason, she was obsessed with me, and that made me feel really unsafe.

I sighed, realizing that this might lead me to involve Shu... or perhaps even my sister.

No, that's not an option. Things would only escalate further, I thought as I pictured The Lunar Society's IRL building, completely reduced to rubble. If someone unrelated to the conflict got hurt, it would leave a bad taste in my mouth.

Anyway, after getting out of the lion's den, I made my way to the college library, since one of the fellow students I'd met today had told me something intriguing about it. He'd said he'd been there before, and told me that he'd seen several Dendro-related books.

Curious as to what they were like, I came to the library to check them out and read them, and it didn't take long for me to find where they were.

Though the publishers sold them as strategy guides, they had titles you'd expect to see on adventure novels or travel magazines. Exploration Records of the Maxim Brigade, Twenty Thousand Metels Under the Sea, and Vagrants in Tenchi were good examples.

Basically, Infinite Dendrogram was so vast that getting the required information for a proper strategy guide was no small task.

Not even the walkthrough wiki had all the info on all the maps, spawns, or dungeons, and some of it could even become obsolete as time went by. Like everything relating to Noz Forest.

Because of this, most of the so-called "Dendro strategy guides" were focused on describing the editors' personal experiences, rather than presenting data. I found that interesting in its own right, so I didn't hesitate to pick those three up.

With this, I'd have something I could use to keep myself occupied during breaks between lectures or other times I couldn't go online. Many of the books were about countries other than Altar, so I was looking forward to reading them.

Now, all I had to do was check them out, and...

"Ah," I exclaimed as I realized that my student card was still in the aberration's hands.

What now? I wasn't too keen on exposing myself to the danger of going there again, so... hm?

Without saying a word, I reached into my pocket and found the very same case I'd thought was still in her hands.

"That's even scarier than going back there," I muttered.

The eldritch creature had probably returned it, but just like with the time she'd stolen it, I hadn't felt it happen at all.

Monstrous strength, inhuman slyness... It wouldn't surprise me if I learned I'd actually labeled her correctly with the term "eldritch aberration." Anyway, with my student card on me, there was nothing stopping me from checking out the books.

With the three books in hand, I walked to the borrowing counter, where the nearby "New Releases" corner caught my eye. One of the books there was the Dendro-related A Gourmand's Tour of Caldina.

I reached to take it, too, but...

"Ah!"

"I'm sorry."

...my hand touched the hand of a girl who reached for it at the same time I did.

I apologized, hastily took my hand back and looked at her.

"Oh, you're the one from before..." she said.

"Ah, thank you for helping me back there!" I replied upon realizing that it was the normal girl from the club room.

My expression of gratitude made her look somewhat troubled. "No need for that... I'm just glad the club didn't end up having someone with a criminal record. Oh, where are my manners? My name is Kozue Fujibayashi. I'm a second-year in Liberal Arts I."

"I'm Reiji Mukudori. Starting today, I'm a first-year in Liberal Arts III."

I'd finally gotten her name and found out that she was an upperclassman.

Following our introductions, Fujibayashi said, "I want to make up for what happened back there," and invited me to a café on school grounds.

"But there's nothing for you to feel guilty about," I replied.

"Well, the president would never apologize for what she did, so, as someone who knows her, I feel I have to do it in her stead."

She really is diligent, I thought.

“I’m really sorry about what the president did. She doesn’t usually have this many screws loose.”

I wasn’t sure if I could believe that. From what I’d seen of the aberration yesterday and today, it seemed to me that she was always like this. Actually, I wasn’t capable of picturing her without any screws loose. That creature caused trouble wherever she went.

“This is actually the first time something like this has happened since I joined,” Fujibayashi continued.

I was inclined to believe the aberration had just been hiding her true self. Honestly, I’d probably prefer a literal wolf in sheep’s clothing over her.

“Oh, by ‘joined’ I only mean the club,” she added. “I’m not interested in her family’s cult in any way whatsoever.”

“I can tell.” I nodded. A cult adherent would never force their spiritual leader to kneel on the floor.

“How long have you been in that club?” I asked.

“A short while ago, the fourth-years and apprentices graduated or went professional. The club lost some members and they desperately needed more, so the president and vice president went around inviting people. That was when I decided to join... Oh, and in case you’re curious, both of them are third-year medical science students.”

...The eldritch being is a soon-to-be doctor? I thought, baffled.

“Also, I’m sure you’re aware of this by now, but those two are as crazy as their cult, so they didn’t have much luck getting new people. As far as I know, not a single freshman has joined today, either.”

Well, “as crazy as their cult” is pretty damn apt, I thought.

“Their lack of success is only obvious, I’d say,” she added. “In this college, The Lunar Society adherents are staggeringly rare, after all.”

“Really?” I raised an eyebrow.

“The cult is centered around escapism, so there aren’t many people here who would find it attractive.”

That made sense. I was told that The Lunar Society’s first teaching was “Escape the shackles of flesh and betake yourself to the true world of souls,” which basically meant “Escape this cruel reality” with fancy presentation. The cult’s believers picked Dendro as the “true world” they so revered, and they now lived on the other side at the expense of their real life.

Naturally, those who made it into this prestigious college wouldn’t be intrigued by a cult that thought this world was fake and tried to escape it.

When I think about it like that, the aberration’s and the KoA’s presence in this school seems really bizarre, I thought.

“And why did you join the club?” I asked Fujibayashi.

“For the info,” she answered.

“Info?” I tilted my head as she pointed at the books I’d borrowed.

“As you know from such books or the wiki, unlike walkthroughs and guides for other games, the ones for Infinite Dendrogram lack thoroughness and detail.”

“That’s true.”

“Well, and it just so happens that the president has vast amounts of detailed game info collected by her 1,000 followers.”

Well, I certainly can’t doubt the reliability and scope of data gathered by 1,000 no-lifers who see the world as real.

“Members of CID have free access to the info, so I joined because I wanted it,” she said.

“I see.”

“Of course, I ended up being the only one who joined. Everyone else was too scared off by the strong negative of ‘getting involved with The Lunar Society.’”

“I can understand why...”

I imagine people who simply wanted to enjoy a game weren’t too excited about the risk of having their real lives jeopardized by a cult.

“What did you think of that negative?” I asked.

“Nothing much. I was already involved with them beforehand,” she answered.

“Hm?”

“The president is a student at my family’s home.”

She then went on to explain what she meant.

According to Fujibayashi, her family were practitioners of the Way of Tea, and the aberration had been learning under them ever since she was young. They’d known each other for a long time, so joining the club hadn’t bothered Fujibayashi that much.

The fact that she’d been able to force the aberration to kneel made more sense than ever now.

"By the way, you were kidnapped in Infinite Dendrogram, weren't you?" she asked.

"Yes." I nodded. "They took me when I was sleeping there."

"...Again, I'm really sorry."

"Hey, it's not your fault."

80% of it had been the aberration's fault, while the rest had been the King of Assassins'.

"Today is the first day of college, so I assume you escaped by using the suicide function?" she asked.

"No, thankfully, I didn't have to resort to that. An acquaintance saved me."

Although, even if Figaro hadn't been there, instead of using the function, I'd have probably faced the head lunatic and KoA all by myself, completely ready to die.

"'Saved'?" she repeated, looking startled. "Crazy as they are, the president and vice president are really powerful. Just who in the world could save you from them?"

"Figaro. You might know him. He's the top of the kingdom's duel rankings."

"Figaro...?" The aura about Fujibayashi underwent a slight change as the eyes behind her glasses became a tiny bit sharper. For some reason, I felt a sense of contempt, or fear, behind her gaze. "You had the duel champion come and help you? Just who are you?"

"I met him soon after I started. I later found out that he was friends with my brother, too."

"Brother... Figaro... Superiors... Brothers... Mukudori..." she muttered, placing her hand over her mouth and pondering. "...The Starling brothers." Then, seemingly having come to some conclusion, she looked into my eyes. "Sorry if I'm wrong, but... are you Ray Starling of the Starling brothers?"

"Ah, yes. That would be me," I confessed.

Man, my real and avatar names were a bit too much alike. People were figuring out who I was way too quickly. Thanks to Franklin's broadcast, quite a number of people knew my avatar's name, which no doubt made figuring it out even easier.

"KoD's younger brother and the Over Gladiator's student? That Ray Starling?" Fujibayashi asked to confirm.

“I wouldn’t call myself his student,” I said. “We do spar every now and then, though.”

Also, this probably wasn’t a nice thing to think, but Figaro just wasn’t cut out for teaching. Honestly, even Xunyu was better at that.

...Although I didn’t know how to feel about being taught by a ten-year-old girl.

Oh, and Riser — the sixth in the duel rankings — was pretty good, too.

“I see,” Fujibayashi said before placing her hand over her mouth again and pondering for ten or so seconds. “Mukudori,” she said at last, seemingly having thought of something. “Would you go on a quest with me this weekend?”

It was an invitation to a Dendro activity.

“Sure. Gladly.” I accepted without hesitation, feeling that this was a start of a good relationship.

◇

“So yeah, that’s how it is,” I said.

“Right-o,” Shu confirmed. “Got it.”

I’d called Shu to tell him that I’d made plans to go on a quest with a new acquaintance, and that I’d take a while to return to Gideon. I’d also told him to pass it on to Rook and Marie, so everything should be settled now.

Mind you, it was a bit of a waste of time and effort to ask someone else to pass on my messages, so it was probably high time our party exchanged contact info.

“By the way, what happened to the fox that took you?” Shu asked.

The word “fox” momentarily confused me, but it didn’t take me long to figure out who he was referring to. There was only one person who fit the bill.

“Oh, you mean the aberr... Tsukuyo Fuso?”

While I saw her as an eldritch aberration, apparently Shu saw her as a fox.

“There’s a bit of a problem regarding her,” I sighed.

“And that would be?”

“She’s an upperclassman at college.”

“...That’s... just... grizzly...”

I don't know if you're surprised or shocked, but please don't bring your bear puns into real life.

"You all right, bro?" he asked, clearly worried.

"That new acquaintance I told you about helped me out, so yeah, I am, if only barely." I couldn't bear to think how things would've turned out if Fujibayashi hadn't been there.

"I see. Should I contact our sis? Just in case?"

"...Don't. I feel like whatever she'd do would leave a bad taste in my mouth."

She was a woman who seemed to be living in a different setting than the rest of us. I'd recently started reading Marie's manga, and I could honestly say that my sister would fit in there just fine.

Did I just think that she'd fit in a battle manga about superpowered professional killers?! I realized. What the hell?

"You still can't handle our sister, huh?" Shu asked.

Well, he certainly wasn't wrong about that. I didn't hate her or anything, but remembering what she'd done when I was young still made me shiver.

Ten years ago, up until that one Un-kra tournament, I'd been really attached to Shu. Looking back at it now, it had probably been a reaction in response to my fear of my sister.

"Hmm..." Shu pondered about something. "By the way, what did you feel when looking at Tsukuyo Fuso?"

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"You found her really scary, didn't you?"

The question made my heart skip a beat. "...How do you know that?"

"Yeah, I thought as much... Then let me give you a little trick to make the fear go away."

A trick? Dude, this really doesn't seem like something that can be taken care of by just that.

"The reason why you're so afraid of the fox is very simple," he said before making a pause to emphasize the words that followed. "She's just like our sister."

Ah.

"I don't mean her face, of course. It's the general feel about her. She's weirdly friendly, cheerful, childish, and mischievous, and yet she sometimes has the aura of a murderous animal aiming for her prey. She and our sis are extremely alike.”

“Guh...”

H-He’s completely right. That’s it. I finally know the cause of the vague, unknown fear within me.

It also made me realize why my mind hadn’t been able to connect the dots. Going down memory lane to find the reason why I was so afraid of the aberration would have meant digging through my traumatic memories with my sister.

“Just keep in mind that she and our sis aren’t the same, and she shouldn’t scare you anymore.”

“...Yeah.”

“That fox didn’t jump from building to building while holding little baby you.”

“...Yeah.”

“She didn’t escape a sinking passenger ship by breaking its hull.”

“...Yeah.”

“She didn’t jump out of an aircraft without a parachute and survive with just a few scratches.”

“...”

Just what the hell is my sister’s body made of?

Although I guess I couldn’t ignore that, with the third incident, she’d fallen on a soft, freshly-tilled grape field, and there’d been other people who’d survived such falls with minor injuries.

“So yeah, there’s no reason for you to be so afraid of the fox,” Shu concluded.

“Thanks,” I said. “That helps a lot.”

I really meant that. That exchange made me feel completely refreshed.

After the call, I went to have dinner and take a bath. Following that, I went on the Dendro news site, MMO Journal Planter, and checked if anything had happened in the kingdom while I was offline.

I saw headlines such as: “Shindo 3/Mercalli III-IV Earthquakes Happening All Over the Kingdom,” “That Big PK Joined That New PK Clan, Sol Crisis,” and “Gideon’s Next Big Thing! KoD-Approved Popcorn!”

“...”

I didn’t care much about the PK news, and I was too scared to read the one about my very own brother, so I went straight for the one about earthquakes.

According to the article, over the past month or so, weak earthquakes had been happening here and there across the kingdom. The hypocenters were scattered all over the country, and people still couldn't figure out what was causing it. Also, the places that suffered the earthquakes had a high chance of revealing new dungeons, UBMs, or hordes of strong monsters, making many believe that they were all related somehow.

I scrolled through the discussion board and saw people present theories such as: "Large monsters are wandering around the underground," "The environment control AI is preparing something big," "Someone's just practicing their earth magic," and "It's just Franklin being a terrorist again."

I was leaning towards the last one.

Once done checking the news, I equipped my Infinite Dendrogram gear.

I would now go on a quest with Fujibayashi.

Thankfully, tomorrow was Saturday and there was no college, so unless the quest was absurdly long, we shouldn't have any problems. Hell, and if we didn't find a quest that was right for us, we could just raid the Tomb Labyrinth.

"All right, time to go online," I said as I logged in to Infinite Dendrogram after a whole day away from it.

Chapter Five: The Impossible Quest

Paladin, Ray Starling

Fujibayashi and I had decided to meet in the capital, rather than Gideon, so I chose to log in at the place where I'd last logged out instead of my save point at the city of duels.

Sure, I had my worries about appearing right next to the aberration's lair, AKA The Lunar Society's headquarters, but thankfully, no one was waiting to ambush me.

Hold on, I thought. The King of Assassins could be hiding in my shadow again.

Just to be sure, I coated one of my Grudge-Soaked Greaves in Purifying Silverlight and kicked the ground beneath.

Nothing happened, which could only mean that my shadow was mine and mine alone, making me sure I was safe.

"It appears you had no trouble making it to college." Nemesis popped out of the crest and spoke to me. "But that seems to have led to even greater trouble."

She could only be referring to the fact that the aberration and I were in the same college.

"Well, I'm glad you were able to escape her clutches, but this makes it two times I couldn't help you in any way."

"Hm?" I raised an eyebrow. Nemesis seemed uncharacteristically down. It was as though she were deriding herself for something.

"While you were on the other side, I was thinking things through," she said in a slightly dejected tone, probably as a reply to my thoughts. "I was of no help to you during yesterday's battle. Even when attacking the King of Assassins, you could've used any other weapon, and the result would've been the same. My powerlessness back then made me consider whether I have really grown since our battle against Gardranda."

"But you did," I said.

And don't think otherwise.

"I knew you would say that," she sighed. "But you can't ignore that I haven't even evolved since then."

"But there's still stuff you've learned to do, right?"

"...Oh, you mean that? But it's a technique we didn't even have a chance to use against the High Priestess and King of Assassins."

"We'll use it eventually, properly paired with what I've learned. So yeah, don't be so down. And don't mind the skills and stats so much. I know better than anyone else that you're growing and working hard for it," I concluded with a light tap of her shoulder.

"I must say, you speak very passionately sometimes," she said and cracked a wry smile. "You sound like an overly-enthusiastic teacher."

Though probably not in the way I'd intended, my words seemed to have lifted her spirits.

"So," Nemesis spoke up again. "We're cooperating with one of your acquaintances from the other side, yes? If you exclude Brother Bear, this is going to be a first."

"That's true."

We arrived at the rendezvous point, the familiar fountain, and I became aware of a problem.

"While Fujibayashi seems to know me, I know neither her avatar's name nor what she looks like."

For reasons unknown, she'd insisted on telling me when we were online. I hadn't pushed it, but it was still going to be a problem when trying to find each other.

Things would be really easy if she, like the aberration, played as herself, but I certainly didn't expect Fujibayashi to take that route.

So how do we meet up? I wondered. I don't feel good about just standing here and waiting for her.

My voice was the same as in real life, so maybe I could just wait for the time to come and start shouting "I'm Ray! Right here!" or something?

No, things would be pretty embarrassing for me if she was late. Worst case scenario, I could even attract the aberration.

"Don't I have any good way to help us meet up?" I thought aloud.

Wait... Meet up... Fountain... Shu...

"Ah!" I exclaimed as I was struck with an idea.

"...You're really going to do it?" asked Nemesis.

“What choice do I have in this situation?”

A few minutes later, I was sitting on the edge of the fountain while holding a sign saying “Welcome, KF.”

“This should be enough for her to realize it’s me,” I said.

The letters “KF,” of course, stood for “Kozue Fujibayashi.” Things had come to this because I hadn’t been given her avatar’s name.

“...Is it just me, or are you attracting more stares than usual?” asked Nemesis.

“Well, of course. People with signs stand out, you know?”

And as many people as possible have to see it, just in case one of them is Fujibayashi.

“Doesn’t it bother you?” she asked.

“I get weird stares all the time these days. I’m more or less used to it by now.”

It was probably because of Franklin’s Game. My battle against the RSK had been streamed to both Gideon and the capital, so I’d become strangely famous.

I swear, nothing good comes from whatever that lab coat bastard does, I thought.

“I’m inclined to believe that most of the stares are because of your current appearance,” commented Nemesis.

“Hm?”

What do you mean?

“Anyway, I must say, you’re becoming more and more like Brother Bear.”

“Prepawsterous.”

“It’s spreading?!” she exclaimed with obvious shock in her tone.

Whoa there, I’m just joking. No need to shiver that much.

“Nh?” I added.

We — or, Nemesis insisted, I — had been attracting stares from many people here, but one person in particular had a relatively strange presence.

Since entering Dendro, I’d become quite sensitive to this sort of thing.

The peculiar stare was coming from someone mixed into a crowd. Specifically, from a huge person in appropriately large full armor.

None of that was an exaggeration. The person looked at least three meters tall, and his armor was so complete that I couldn’t see a hint of his skin.

However, his face was directed towards me, so I could only assume that he was looking at me.

As though realizing that I'd noticed him, the armored giant turned around and walked down the alley.

"What was that about?" I asked.

"A fan, perhaps?" suggested Nemesis.

While it was true that I'd had a few fans approach me since Franklin's Game, somehow, I didn't feel that was the case here. I couldn't see his eyes, but I felt that the armored person was... observing me. Also, I couldn't help but feel as if I'd seen that armor before...

"Well, he might've just been taken aback by the sign," said Nemesis.

That wasn't unlikely. I, too, had been shocked when I'd seen Shu wait for me here while holding his sign and wearing a bear costume.

I look way more normal than he did, though, I thought.

"Eh?!" Nemesis exclaimed, as though questioning if I was being serious.

Of course I do, I thought in response. My gear's history might be dark, but it's all perfectly normal compared to a goddamn bear suit.

Nemesis didn't argue. She just closed her eyes, sighed and muttered, "He's too far gone." I had no idea what she meant by that.

Twenty minutes had passed since I'd brought the sign.

"Are you Mukudori?" someone asked in a familiar voice, prompting me to turn towards them.

Though the voice was one I'd heard in reality not so long ago, the appearance was completely new to me.

"Yes, I'm Mukudori," I said. "Are you Fujibayashi?"

"Yes." She nodded. "Looks like we met up without a problem."

Her avatar looked decidedly plain and normal. Though there was little of her real-life self in her appearance, her height was about the same. The equipment she had equipped looked high-quality, but none of it really stood out, especially when compared to animal costumes and the like.

If I had to point out anything special about her appearance, it would be her glasses. She wore a pair in real life, too.

While the gear of the eccentric Superiors and duel rankers I'd been sparring against often weirded me out or put me on edge, she had an appearance that gave me peace of mind.

"I'm glad we were able to meet up, but I must ask, what's with the gea — I mean, sign?" she asked.

"My brother did this to me before," I answered. "Is it that weird?"

"...It surprised me, but that's the extent of it."

What's with that pause before her answer? I wondered.

"Anyway... You really are Ray Starling."

"Well, yeah."

"Being with someone famous makes me a bit tense."

I was silent.

Like Nemesis had mentioned, I'd recently had some people approach me as fans, so this wasn't completely new to me. Still, having a real-life acquaintance call me "famous" made me somewhat bashful.

"So, let's go to the guild," she said. "There are two of us, and we're both battle jobs, so I feel like a kill quest would suit us far better than a gathering quest. I'll leave the choice to you, though."

"All right," I said. "Oh, by the way, what's your job? I'm a Paladin."

"My current main job is Shield Giant."

I didn't know what kind of job that was, and once I asked, she said, "It's a high-rank job that focuses on shield skills, and it allows smooth usage of all shields regardless of size as long as you have the required STR."

It was probably a defensive job, but I couldn't help but note that the term "Giant" didn't fit Fujibayashi's slender frame at all.

Oh, there's something I must ask before we form a party, I thought. "What's your avatar's name?"

It couldn't be just "Kozue Fujibayashi," after all. She wasn't like that aberration or her super secretary.

"Well..." she said, before taking a moment to think. "Call me 'B3.'"

"Okay... Hm?" I complied, but then I realized that she'd said something off. She'd told me to call her "B3," strongly implying that it wasn't actually her avatar name.

"That's not my avatar's name, but 'B3' is how my close friends call me," she explained as she sent me a party invitation. "And my name is a little, uh... long too, so it's convenient."

The name I saw next to the invitation was indeed long, and it could easily be abbreviated to just "B3."

I accepted the invitation, and we became part of the same party.

Interesting note: she was level 485, making it very clear that she was experienced.

"I was maxed out just a while ago, but now I'm experimenting with various job combinations," she told me.

Oh, yeah. Shu had once told me that jobs could be reset and exchanged for other jobs.

I was still on my first, so that feature didn't really matter to me.

"Now that we're in the same party, let us introduce ourselves again," she said. "I'm B3. Nice to meet you."

"Ah, all right," I replied. "I'm Ray Starling. Let's get along."

"Greetings!" Nemesis joined in. "I'm Ray's Embryo, Nemesis. It's a pleasure, B3."

"Same here." With the partying up and introductions done, we headed out to the guild to pick up a quest.

◇

It was my first time at the capital's guild since Rook, Marie, and I had taken the quest to make a delivery to Gideon. Not even a month had passed since that time, so the interior hadn't changed a bit.

B3 and I sat down at a table and looked at the quests in the large magical catalog.

Unlike last time, when there had been many escort quests from people heading to Gideon or other countries, there were now lots of escort quests to some village in the north, and I couldn't imagine why. Ten minutes of quest-searching later, we still hadn't found the right one.

"...Nh?" I raised an eyebrow as I noticed that there was some trouble going on at the counter. It was caused by a young boy, desperately asking for something from the guild employee.

"Please, get someone to search for my dad! He's been gone for half a year now!" the boy pleaded.

"I'm sorry, but we cannot accept your request because it breaches one of the adventurers' guild's special rules," the employee replied, looking thoroughly troubled.

The adventurers around them seemed quite perplexed, as well.

Apparently, the boy was making a request, but for some reason, the guild wasn't taking it.

"A missing persons quest, huh?" I muttered.

"The adventurer's guild handles those, but they're not too popular," said B3. "They often take a long time, and they require a highly particular set of skills."

I see, I thought. Depending on your perspective, killing monsters or just gathering stuff is way easier and simpler than searching for someone.

Sure, search quests had an advantage in that they weren't life-threatening, but that wasn't that big of a deal for us Masters. Then again, the first quest I'd ever taken on had been a life-threatening search quest... though it probably didn't count as a search quest, since I'd already known where Milianne was.

"But there are skills that help search for people, right?" I asked.

"Yes." B3 nodded. "There are some of them among both job skills and unique Embryo skills. However..." she said before pausing and looking at the boy and the employee at the counter. "The worker mentioned a special rule, and if it's regarding search quests, that might be..."

Suddenly, one of the nearby tian adventurers, unable to bear it, placed his hand on the boy's shoulder and spoke to him.

"Kid, the man's been lost for nearly half a year, right? Sorry to break it to you, but your dad's probably—"

"He can't be dead!" the boy shouted defiantly as he escaped the man's hand.

For reasons unknown, I'd felt as though his shout was more than just wishful thinking... as if he was absolutely certain of what he was saying.

"I mean... my dad is..." he said before following it up with words that left me completely astonished. "He's my stepdad! And he's a Master!"

"Wh...!" I gasped.

A tian boy had just asserted that his dad was a Master.

"He's a Master, so he can never die," he repeated himself. "But he's been gone for half a year now... so I want someone to find him..."

The boy turned teary and spoke the reasons why he was making the request.

"My little brother or sister... Dad and Mom's child should be born soon. I want him to be there to meet him or her, and... and..."

He suddenly stopped speaking. He hung his head and started sobbing.

Seeing him like that made my heart ache, but at the same time, I was curious about several things.

"B3, I have some questions," I said.

"Yes, players and NPCs can get married," she answered before I could even ask. "As for children between players and NPCs, they're only possible in theory."

That was exactly what I wanted to know about.

"If they're old enough in real life for it — 18 or above in Japan — players can marry NPCs or other players... and partake in intercourse... become intimate, so to speak."

Well, I guess jobs like "Pimp" and "Harlot" are there for a reason, I thought. I guess it's only obvious for Dendro to have that kind of intimacy.

On a tangentially-related note, back when Rook had asked if Pimp was "a monster-taming kind of job," he had only been referring to the job as it was in Dendro. He'd been fully aware of what the word meant in real life.

"I knew about it. It's common knowledge," he'd explained to me later.

Are Pimps really common knowledge for people his age? I thought, and then suddenly realized I'd gotten sidetracked pretty badly, so I shifted my attention back to B3.

Probably because I'd appeared really contemplative, she looked like she'd been overthinking some things, too.

"Sorry, I guess you're too young to talk about this," she said with her hand over her mouth. Her tone was apologetic.

"Oh. No, no, I'm old enough for this..." I cleared up the misunderstanding, and my own words made me realize that I was already allowed to become intimate with people. I didn't really see myself ever using that feature, though.

"I see. I'll continue, then. While players can have intercourse, a certain problem makes it nearly impossible for it to ever result in children."

"And that problem would be...?"

"Take a look at this," she said as she reached into her inventory and took out a knife and a handkerchief, neither of which seemed special in any way. Then, not saying a word, B3 thrust the tip of the knife into the palm of her free hand.

"Huh?!" I exclaimed as the shock forced me to stand up.

"Hyah! Hyah!" she shouted, doing it again and again.

The knife didn't pierce her hand. No matter how many times she tried, it just couldn't break her skin.

Eventually, the speed of her attacks became such that it had me worried, but even then, B3's hand remained unharmed.

Normally, the palm would've been covered in holes all over at this point, but no, there wasn't even a hint of a scratch on it.

Soon enough, I began feeling like she was just showing me some trick, and that was about the time when she stopped.

"I'm sorry," she said. "I tried to release some blood to make my explanation easier, but my END is so high that this knife just couldn't do it."

"Ohh..." I expressed my understanding.

That reminded me that B3's job was "Shield Giant," and that she was a long-time player who'd once reached the maximum level available to non-Superior Jobs. It was only natural for her to have a high defense stat, and honestly, it wouldn't have surprised me if that palm of hers was tougher than my armor.

"We'll have to continue without an example," she said. "You have seen what happens when players get the death penalty, right?"

"Well... yeah," I nodded. I've seen it plenty of times in the past month.

"Have you noticed how their scattered blood and other bodily fluids vanish along with the body?"

"...I have."

The first thing that came to mind was Lei-Lei's battle that Marie had shown me on her crystal. The melted, liquid flesh and the shreds of skin of the Masters she'd killed had all became particles of light and vanished at the same time.

"This exact same phenomenon happens when you log out," B3 said.

"The exact same?" I raised an eyebrow.

"For example, if I had gotten some of my blood on this handkerchief and logged out, the blood would disappear at the same time as I vanished."

"I see," I said, fully understanding what she was getting at. "So you can't make children because bodily fluids disappear the moment you log out."

"That's exactly it."

It made perfect sense now. After all, we Masters simply had to log out every once in a while.

"However, some theorize that it might be possible if the Master stays online long enough for the zygote to properly develop."

Well, that was certainly a reasonable theory. I could totally understand why someone would think that a zygote wouldn't vanish if it was recognized as a separate organism, rather than just an egg with some genes sticking to it.

"But that's..."

...difficult, to say the least, I finished silently.

Yesterday, when I'd been kidnapped by The Lunar Society for just about a third of one real-life day, I'd become quite hungry and really needed to pee.

Being online long enough for a zygote to develop into its own organism — which could be anywhere from several days to a few weeks — seemed downright impossible.

"Then what about that boy's sibling?" I asked.

"In my opinion, the most likely case is that his mother cheated on the stepfather Master with another tian," B3 answered. "The second most likely case is that the stepfather is actually a tian merely pretending to be a Master, and the child is really his. The third and least likely scenario is that the aforementioned theory was proven right. Though, note that the second one would mean severe punishment for the stepfather, since the law in every country strictly forbids tians to pretend to be Masters."

"Then I hope it's the third one," I said. The other two would definitely leave a bad taste in my mouth.

"It doesn't look like there will be a good ending to this regardless, though," said B3.

"Why not? If it happens to be the third one, someone would only have to find the stepfather Master and... ah."

"You see the problem?" she said.

Sure, someone would only have to find him. However, it was likely that the search would go beyond Dendro.

"I didn't get to tell you about the special rule regarding search quests," she added. "The guild refuses to accept them when the one being searched for is a Master who hasn't been online for a long time. You understand why, don't you?"

Of course I do.

For tians, searching for offline Masters was downright impossible, and even Masters would find it extremely difficult. They might even have to hire a detective, and even then, the chances of success would be low.

After all, Dendro had players all over the world, not to mention that the only info you started out with was regarding them as they'd been here, not back on the other side.

"Finding Masters that haven't come online for a while is completely impossible," B3 concluded. "In fact, when they've been away from Infinite Dendrogram for so long, it's highly likely that they've quit, so even if you did miraculously find them, convincing them to return would no doubt be difficult."

She was completely right about that.

The tians and Masters around the boy knew that, too, and I could easily tell they were avoiding any involvement.

They were right to do so.

For tians, going to the world where Masters returned to — reality — was downright impossible, and though it wasn't so for Masters, they would still have a low chance of succeeding, not to mention that they had no obligation to dedicate their real-life time to a search because of something in Dendro. I could totally understand that, but...

"B3," I spoke up.

"Yes?"

"Sorry, but can we postpone today's quest for a later date?"

"Why?"

"I'm gonna accept that boy's search quest."

Despite it all, I just couldn't turn a blind eye to the downcast, crying little kid.

"I just explained that that quest is impossible," she objected.

"It probably is," I agreed. "But ignoring it would leave a bad taste in my mouth."

"..." B3 fell silent as she placed her hand on her mouth and thought about something.

That reaction was only natural. I was fully aware I was being unreasonable, and I didn't want to involve someone as logical as her into something so unsound.

"You should—"

"Then I'll join you," she cut me off with words I really didn't expect.

"Really...? Are you sure?"

"I said that I would ultimately let you choose the quest we would take, didn't I?"

That she had. However, I'd assumed that had only applied when we were talking about normal quests.

"Also, if you don't mind me borrowing your words..." she said in a gentle tone as she looked directly into my eyes. "Going my own way from here would leave a bad taste in my mouth."

"Thank you," I said gratefully.

Then I stood up, walked up to the dejected boy at the counter, and placed my hand on his shoulder.

"We'll accept your request," I gently said.

"...Eh?" he exclaimed, thoroughly surprised.

There was hope in his eyes. It was as though they were asking "Really?"

I nodded, and asserted, "We will search for your dad."

Thus, B3 and I began our first adventure together.

We would brave an impossible quest — the search for a Master.

Our goal... was a happy ending.

Let the quest begin.

◇

We'd accepted the request of the boy named Louie who was searching for his dad. However, it didn't even count as a quest. Not only did the guild not process it because of its special rules, but it also didn't appear in my log as an event quest. I didn't know whether that was some sort of accident, or whether the control AI that calculated quest difficulty just didn't recognize this as a quest.

Still, even without a difficulty rating, I could tell that a quest to find a person in real life would be, in a way, harder than any other quest in Infinite Dendrogram.

We were now at a diner adjoined to the adventurers' guild, where we had Louie tell us about his dad.

We asked for his name, job, and anything else that could help lead us to his real-life self. None of what we'd learned was much help, but at the very least, we'd gotten his avatar's name: Ichiro Shijima. If, as the name implied, he was really Japanese, our search would become somewhat easier.

The difficulty would drop again if that was actually a modified version of his real name, since it would limit our search to names such as "Ichiro Ishijima" or "Ichiro Ushijima," among others.

And, if we were to be greedy...

"It would really help if that's his real name..." I muttered.

"I don't think that's possible," said B3. "This isn't the president or the vice president we're talking about."

"Yeah, we can't expect everyone to be like the aberration or the KoA," I agreed.

"Indeed, the only people who would play with their real names are people such as myself, Lady Tsukuyo, and our Society's adherents."

"True..." I said, before realizing who I was talking to and replying with a sarcastic tone. "Ah ha ha... And why might you be here, King of Secretaries... nay, King of Assassins?"

Before we'd realized it, the KoA who was our upperclassman in college, Eishiro Tsukikage, was sitting at one corner of our table with a tea cup in hand, all smiles. He reminded me of Marie.

They're similar in more than just jobs, I thought. Now that I think about it, the aberration did a similar thing yesterday.

"I've been sitting here since halfway through the questioning, but since no one noticed me, I took the liberty of asserting my presence," he said.

"And why did you sit here?" I demanded.

"Lady Tsukuyo is still prohibited from logging in, so she had me deliver a message to you."

"Which would be?"

"It's a proposition. 'Now, I'll fix your arm up if you only join CID.'"

"Hm..."

That... was actually worth considering.

You would never see me become a part of The Lunar Society, but I wasn't too averse to joining the aberration's college club. I now knew why I was so afraid of her, not to mention that CID had B3, who would keep her in check. The conditions were definitely attractive, but...

"I'll give my answer after the weekend," I said at last.

"Very well."

Yesterday's memories were just too fresh in my mind to let me accept the offer so nonchalantly.

With his business done, I expected Tsukikage to leave, but he showed no intention to stand up from his chair. I glanced at him and noticed that he was looking at Louie.

"What is it?" I asked.

"Would you like The Lunar Society to help search for this boy's father?" he proposed.

I didn't know what kind of whim or plot had caused him to make this offer. Sure, having the cult's many adherents helping us would greatly increase the scope of our information network and make the search many times easier, but...

"Why?" I asked, not seeing the reason for this proposition.

The aberration wasn't here, and she probably didn't know that I'd accepted Louie's request, so it was highly unlikely that she was related to this offer. This would mean that it came from Tsukikage himself, but I couldn't see any reason why he would suggest it.

The aberration would obviously do this to make me owe her something, but somehow, I didn't see that being the case with Tsukikage.

Thus, my question.

"That's a secret," he replied.

The cloak and dagger in his words made accepting his proposition seem all the more dangerous.

"We'll ask for your help if we figure there's nothing we can do by ourselves," I said.

"Very well." He nodded. "We will be ready to assist you."

For now, I decided to keep his offer as an alternative.

Tsukikage stood up from his chair. Then, seemingly struck with an idea, he turned to say something more.

"Oh, by the way... Take this as simple advice, rather than a proposition, but I suggest you take your search for real-life information to young Louie's mother — Mr. Shijima's wife. Just as there are things only parents and children talk about, there are also private talks between spouses. Not to mention that you might find clues in their family home. You should only rely on real-life detectives, your brother, or your friends after you've exhausted such sources."

"...Thanks."

"With that settled, I bid you goodbye. May we meet again."

Following his long, oddly specific advice, Tsukikage sunk into his own shadow.

The sight greatly surprised Louie, but Fujibayashi — fully used to it, apparently — didn't even flinch.

Additionally, Tsukikage left behind a pouch with a little paper saying "Payment for my tea."

...Guy's a damn weirdo, but he sure is principled, I thought.

Anyway, his advice was completely sound. If we wanted to find a person in real life, we couldn't miss a single clue we could find here.

"Where do you live, Louie?" I asked the boy.

"In Torne village. It's in the north, about half a day away from here by carriage." That was closer than Gideon, but still pretty far.

"Did you come alone?" I asked.

"No." He shook his head. "I took a stagecoach that was passing through the village. I used the allowance I got from Dad to pay for it. I also thought of using the money to pay for the guild request, but..."

He then showed me the inside of his wallet, and it was doubtful if there was even enough for a carriage back to the village. In fact, it probably wasn't even enough to pay for the guild request, but in my eyes, that was a sign of just how desperate Louie was.

"I hope we find his father," Nemesis said telepathically.

Yeah, same here, I thought in response.

"All right, let's go to Torne, then," I said. "As for how we get there..."

Silver could fly us there in no time, but I could only let one other person ride with me, at most, so...

"You have a horse, don't you, Ray?" B3 asked, cutting short my train of thought.

"Ah, yeah, I do."

"Excellent. I don't have a horse, but I do have a carriage. Can we get your horse to pull it?"

"Sure." A carriage would let us all travel there at the same time.

With our destination and means of transportation all set, we began making our way towards Torne.

I'll admit, I'm kinda curious as to why B3 has a carriage, but no horse, I thought.

◆◆◆

???

After Ray's group left the diner, a girl sitting at a table some distance away from them, close to the exit, stood up from her chair.

She was just another Master who'd merely happened to be there at that time. However, since she'd seen something that she, as a member of a certain clan, just couldn't ignore, she left the diner right after confirming that Ray's group wasn't there anymore.

She quickly made her way for a certain establishment in the capital. These were the headquarters of her clan, and they had a Japanese aesthetic, though not in the same way as The Lunar Society's HQ.

It was obvious from its outward design. The building looked like the house of Japanese martial arts practitioners, and it had a dojo affixed to it. Another thing that stood out was the sign that had the clan's name on it, for it was written very skillfully.

"Big sis! I have something to report! It's urgent!" the girl from the diner shouted as she ran into the dojo and called for someone inside.

"Damn, you're loud," said a woman in a husky tone.

She surpassed 180cm in height, had a body covered in well-trained muscles, eyes that gleamed, and dangerously sharp fangs.

All that, combined with the wolfish ears on her head and the tail behind her, made her appear very much like a carnivorous predator. And because of such appearances, as well as her demeanor, those close to her often referred to her as "big sis" or just "sis" despite no blood relation.

The muscular woman stood in the middle of the dojo, spear in hand. Around her, there were a number of freshly downed Masters, all of whom looked nearly dead. They, too, were Masters belonging to the same clan as the girl who'd just left the diner and arrived here.

From the dire sight before her, the girl assumed that she'd arrived right as they finished training, and she couldn't be more glad that she was off-duty today.

"And? What is it, Tomika?" asked the muscular woman, making the girl snap out of it. “Weren’t you out to get a quest today?”

“Th-This is serious, sis!” the girl named Tomika shouted.

“Just tell me what’s so serious,” the muscular woman said. “Did my darling finally go online or something?”

The “darling” she spoke of was none other than the clan’s owner. Due to certain real-life circumstances, he hadn’t been able to log in for a while now.

Sadly for those in the clan, his absence had caused the muscular woman’s training to become more intense with every passing day. After all, it was well-known in and out of the clan that she was absolutely head over heels for the young leader.

“The Lunar Society might be planning something...”

“The lunatic cultists? I’m all ears.” Suddenly, the woman began emitting a menacing, pressurizing aura.

It was caused by not only her avatar’s stats, but also by the intensity of her emotion. Everyone present — even the downed clan members — felt it clearly.

“Th-The KoA was in the guild’s diner and, uh...”

“Oh? That hanger-on? By himself?” the muscular woman cut Tomika off and asked.

“Yeah. And he was happily talking with a certain party, and before disappearing, he left them a pouch with something written on it.”

Tsukikage never neglected to have a smile on his face, so it was hard to deny that he’d looked happy, and Tomika had been too far away from them to know that the pouch was nothing more than the payment for his tea.

As a result, the impression she’d gotten from their exchange was exactly as she’d described it.

“Hmm... You sure that wasn’t just a party of cultists?” asked the muscular woman.

“Well... he was talking to that BBB and Ray Starling, the guy who became famous after Franklin’s Game.”

“Ohh...?” The woman, intrigued, cracked a grin. The expression made her look like an actual predator. “The rumored ‘Unbreakable,’ eh? And B3? I was wondering what she’s been up to after disbanding her clan, but I never expected her to be dealing with the cultists. Guess this means the rumors are fake.”

B3 was, in fact, “dealing with the cultists,” but only as a member of a real-life club led by them, and definitely not in the way that the woman imagined it.

“And? What are they planning to do?” the woman asked.

“I don’t know that much... But before they left the diner, I overheard that they were going to Torne...” Tomika confessed.

“Torne? Well, Windstar Festival should start soon. Maybe that has something to do with it.” The woman repeatedly flicked her spear’s handle with her thumb as she tried to figure out the plot between Ray’s group and The Lunar Society — which didn’t actually exist. Though unable to find an answer, she was finally able to make a certain decision.

“All right,” she said. “I don’t know what they’re planning, but we’ll crush them anyway.”

Words to play by: I don’t know, therefore I PK.

“Let this be a little preliminary match before our actual revenge battle. We’ll screw up whatever the lunatics are planning.”

“But sis, our leader still isn’t...”

“Ha! The only reason why we got messed up by The Lunar Society is because we didn’t have my darling with us to take care of them. I don’t wanna involve him in the revenge match when it’s all our own fault.”

The woman then momentarily fell silent and took a deep breath.

“WAKE UP ALREADY, DAMN IT!” she howled so loudly that the whole dojo shook.

Her voice made all the members spread out on the floor jump up and stand straight.

“We... the K&R, are going on a hunt! Go and prepare!” the Nobushi Princess, Rosa, cried.

Hearing the order of their sub-leader, the members of K&R — the third clan in the kingdom’s rankings and the country’s strongest PK clan — began preparing for an attack.

Thus, because of a minor misunderstanding and a major lack of forethought, Ray’s search quest was about to be gatecrashed by the kingdom’s strongest PK clan.

Chapter Six: Along the Way

Paladin, Ray Starling

Riding our carriage as it left tracks on the dirt path below, we gradually made our way towards Torne Village.

Well, calling it "our carriage" wasn't exactly appropriate, considering the fact that it belonged B3 alone. Still, it was being drawn by my Silver, so that term wasn't entirely wrong.

B3 and I were in the coachman's seat, while Louie sat inside the actual carriage.

The vehicle was very well-designed. Its base was high enough for me to pass under it by simply bending forward, and it had tires akin to those on old off-road cars, letting it easily handle uneven terrain. It was also imbued with various magics, giving it functions such as air conditioning, impact reduction, interior space expansion, and a defensive barrier.

All in all, the carriage was the Dendro equivalent of an armored vehicle that VIPs would use. That made me all the more curious as to why B3 had only the carriage. After all, what good was a horse-drawn vehicle without a horse to pull it?

"So, why do you have just the carriage?" I let my curiosity take over and asked directly.

In response, B3 placed her hand over her mouth again and took a moment to think before matter-of-factly saying, "This carriage was the common property of my clan."

"You were the leader of a clan?"

"Yes. It's disbanded now, though," she said as she cast down her eyes, looking somewhat lonely. "It had many members who had busy real lives, you see. There were people with children or work to attend to, people in middle management, job-hunting students, police officers, college professors... they were all so busy, they made a college student's life seem easy."

She spoke with her eyes fixed upon the scenery directly ahead, but I felt as though what she was actually seeing were visions of the good old days.

"Despite their harsh schedules, we were able to get together and kill monsters, clear quests... go on hunts, have parties, and do lots of other fun stuff." The look on her face bore not a hint of dishonesty. She really had enjoyed her time with her clan.

...Wait, why are "kill monsters" and "go on hunts" separate? I wondered.

"Maybe she means scavenger hunts?" Nemesis suggested telepathically. "They would be different here than in your world, after all."

Well... that makes sense.

"But a short while ago, we were dealt a really hard blow. Many of us, myself included, lost gear and other items," she said before closing her eyes in a regretful manner and cracking a wry smile. "Because of that and the changes in our lives that came with spring, we decided that we'd had enough fun and decided to disband the clan."

"I see..."

Apparently, no matter how realistic it was, Infinite Dendrogram wasn't safe from normal MMO-like happenings such as the ending of clans.

"With the disbanding, the clan's shared items were distributed among the players that would continue playing," she said. "I can still remember the members offering this carriage to me while saying 'This slick ride should be yours, boss.' I appreciated their sentiment and gladly accepted it, but... eheheh." She giggled as she remembered something—

...Wait, "boss?"

"I accepted the carriage, but didn't have any monsters for it," she continued. "It slipped my mind because I always had clan members with tamed creatures that could pull it. Because of that, I haven't been able to use it once ever since the clan disbanded..."

Suddenly, as I held the reins, she turned to look at me with eyes that looked both slightly lonely and happy.

"It's nice that we got to use it today."

"Yeah." I nodded. "Thanks again, B3."

About three hours had passed since we left the capital. We were currently on a road called the "Fadl Mountain Pass."

Honestly, I felt that "Mountain Pass" was a bit of a misnomer, considering we were passing only hills, rather than mountains.

Anyway, according to Louie, we were about halfway there by now. We'd left before noon, so, at this rate, we ought to reach Torne Village before sundown.

That aside, I couldn't help but notice that this road was unusually active. Just like us, there were quite a lot of people heading northward, on foot and by carriage alike.

Many even had children with them, making it highly unlikely that they were going on hunting or trading trips.

"Is there something I don't know about?" I asked.

"The Windstar Festival is happening soon," said Louie as he stuck his face out through the carriage's window.

"Windstar Festival?" According to him, the Windstar Festival was an event held by a group of villages situated in the north of the capital, with Torne being the focus.

The festival was a long-running tradition by now, and it was renowned for the many pinwheel-like decorations all over the villages and the fireworks lighting up the night sky, attracting many tourists from both the local villages and the capital, who, in turn, attracted merchants aiming to profit from them.

"Well, that definitely sounds like a festival," I commented.

"It is!" Louie said excitedly. "Until last year, we would go there with Dad every year, and it was very fun! But now..."

He suddenly became downcast again. That was only natural, considering that the dad he so adored might not be there for the festival.

"We'll find your dad, so don't you worry," I said.

"Okay. Please find him, mister."

Chatting more about this and that, we continued following the road north. Eventually, we went up a gently-sloping hill.

"Ah..." Louie gasped, apparently realizing something.

"What is it?" I asked.

"This place..." he said as he looked around with nostalgia in his eyes. "This is where Mom and I met Dad."

◇◇◇

Four years ago, Fadl Mountain Pass

It had happened four years ago, in Infinite Dendrogram time.

Louie and his mother, Farica, were at the Fadl Mountain Pass, riding a stagecoach to the village of Torne. The aged Needleworker of the village had passed away, and Farica — bearing the same job herself — had been dispatched there by the Needleworker guild as the replacement.

It wasn't unusual for job guilds to transfer their members to the surrounding towns and villages, but such agreements were never forced, and Farica had volunteered for this role.

Her primary reasons for this were monetary. A year ago, she'd lost her husband, Louie's biological father, to an accident, and the money he'd left behind was beginning to run dry.

Though she herself had a career as a Needleworker, it wasn't quite enough for a single mother with a child as young as Louie, especially with the recent increase of skilled Needleworkers... the Masters.

Because of them, supply had started to outpace demand, and tian-made clothes, which were generally lower quality than those made by Masters, had gotten harder to sell. The drop in available work had made it difficult for Farica to get by, and though her situation wasn't dire, it was definitely getting there, so she'd chosen to take the transfer to Torne.

Since it was a guild assignment, she would receive both the payment for her work and financial aid from the guild, not to mention that distancing herself from the oversupplied cities would greatly increase the demand for her products. Spurred by the wish to have her son grow up healthy, away from the ails of poverty, she'd resolved to take him and move to the village of Torne, and that was no mistake.

Their small household would receive the money to get by, her son would grow up properly, and Torne would have a Needleworker. Everyone involved would benefit from this.

Indeed, Farica's decision wasn't a mistake... but alas, Lady Luck, capricious as ever, didn't favor her on the day of the move. The stagecoach she was on was attacked by over a hundred monsters.

From just over several hundred of metels away, they were charging straight towards the stagecoach, leaving a thick cloud of dust behind them.

It was a horde of "Violent Fanged Boars." True to their name, they were a brutal, carnivorous type of monster known to vehemently chase the smell of blood.

Though they were native to the area, it was rare for them to hunt in such great numbers. However, this was a world in which the spontaneous appearance of UBMs could greatly alter monster habitats, sometimes forcing them to form large groups. Thus, the boars' attack on the stagecoach was merely an unfortunate turn of events — one that greatly endangered those without the power to stand up to them.

The coachman hastily tried to turn the vehicle around and escape the boars, but the menacing horde scared the horses into rearing up, panicking, and making the carriage fall on its side.

Passengers and baggage alike dropped out of vehicle, and though nobody died from that, it didn't change the fact that the situation was nothing short of hopeless.

"Hurry! Stand up and run!" roared one the tian adventurers tasked with defending the stagecoach.

Faced with this threat, they had completely abandoned their roles.

Some tried to be the rear guard, protecting the passengers as they ran, but the experienced adventurers suggested against it, telling them that it was suicide.

Not many could fault them for that. Even if those adventurers had battle jobs, that number of boars was just too great for only a few sub-level 100 tians.

Escaping along with the passengers while avoiding encounters with monsters was the sound thing to do... the right thing to do.

Alas, doing the right thing was never easy, and this time, it came at the cost of sacrificing two lives — a boy and his mother.

After the carriage fell, Farica was still inside, and her leg was caught under the baggage, while Louie was crying at her side. He begged for someone to help her, but everyone else had already ran away.

It was only natural. The situation was dire, and every second counted. Anyone who tried to save them could easily end up as sustenance for the boars, and even if they were successful, Farica's bleeding and all the blood that had gotten on Louie would definitely attract the monsters. There was no viable escape plan that included the pair.

Their deaths were definitely unavoidable and perhaps even necessary, so the rest of the people ran while closing their ears to the boy's tearful pleas.

The cruel inevitability would soon spell the death of the mother and child, and the two had no means of overturning this harsh fate.

However, they did.

"Gringham!" someone roared just as a Boar was about to charge into the carriage's exposed base and break it open.

That word — no, that call...

"GROAAAAAHHHHHHH!"

...was answered by a giant beast that forced its fangs deep into the Boar's neck and shattered its upper spine, instantly ending its life.

It was a lion, bearing a mane as thick as wool and a size rivaling that of an elephant. It pulverized the carnivorous boars, asserting its position as the true apex predator on the scene.

"Are you all right, boy?" asked one of the two people that jumped off the lion's back.

The one who spoke was a bald warrior. He had the facial features of a person from Tenchi and a well-trained body covered in light armor.

The other was a girl with green hair. She glared at the Boar horde with a somewhat vague expression on her face.

The bald warrior ran over to Louie, who was too scared to stand at this point, and extended his left hand towards him. There was a blue crest on the back of the hand.

"That's my mount, Gringham," he said. "He'll keep the monsters away, so you just run, and..."

"M-My mom! My mom is still in the carriage!" Louie shouted, making the bald warrior turn to the vehicle, where he saw Farica, her leg crushed by the baggage.

He hurried to her aid and said, "I'll help you!"

"Don't mind me! Just save my son, please!" she protested, urging the bald warrior to focus entirely on Louie. That would be the reasonable thing to do. After all, her damaged leg not only rendered her incapable of running, but also made her attract the violent boars. "Only a miracle can save me now... So please, help my son..."

"I don't think so," the bald warrior retorted. "You will be saved if I kill all the monsters."

"But that's—!"

"If that would be a miracle... If a miracle alone can save you, then I shall become a miracle-worker!" He stood up, then looked at the boar horde fighting his trusty lion mount.

"Juno!" he called the green-haired girl's name, prompting her to become green and red particles of light that gathered in the man's hands, taking the shape of a spear in his right and an elliptical shield in his left. "Come, monsters! This is the shield of miracles!"

The man tightened his grip on his weaponry, ran up to his mount and jumped on its back.

He faced the numerous boars and roared, "I am a Myth Rider, Ichiro Shijima! Face me now!" before charging the overwhelming odds.

The result of this battle was obvious.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

"Dad was... awesome. He and Gringham killed all those monsters and saved me and Mom," Louie finished.

"And that's how you met him?" I asked.

"Yeah. He also protected us all the way to Torne and even brought someone who could use healing magic to fix mom's leg."

Louie then continued to tell us that Mr. Shijima, concerned with their well-being, had regularly visited them in the village. Eventually, he and Farica had fallen in love, gotten married, and made a child.

I silently processed the story.

One thing that I couldn't help but note was the fact that Mr. Shijima was a Maiden's Master. If the words Hugo had told me were to be believed, it meant that he, too, didn't consider Infinite Dendrogram to be just a game.

The fact that such a person hadn't visited his family for half a year of this world's time made me picture scenarios I really didn't want to consider. When we found him in real life and discovered that he'd simply quit, I would like to, at the very least, convince him to come here and give Louie and his wife a proper goodbye.

However, if the reason why he'd disappeared was one that rendered him incapable of ever meeting them again, then—

"...What?" I asked suddenly as my thoughts were cut short by a low, distant sound, much like the howling of the wind.

The noise was repeated again and again, and seemed to come from several locations. Upon hearing one that came from relatively close, I realized that it was the sound of a conch trumpet.

Soon enough, the entire area's soundscape was dominated by the sound, and I had no idea if it was a warning, a message, or something else.

"B3, what is th—?" I tried to ask, but cut my words short upon noticing the drastic change in her expression.

If I had to summarize her face in just a word, I'd have probably used "fierce."

However, once I blinked in surprise, B3's expression was back to normal.

Did I just imagine that? I wondered as she looked into my eyes and began talking.

"Be alert, Ray. This conch is their signal."

"'Their'?" I asked, but before she could answer, a voice blared throughout the entire area.

"This is a message to all Masters passing through or hunting in Fadl Mountain Pass," the voice said loudly. It was obviously passing through a voice-amplifying item, and it reminded me of a female announcer in Japanese baseball stadiums. "In ten minutes, the PK clan K&R will begin hunting in this area. Those who do not wish to fight must leave Fadl Mountain Pass within this time."

"Huh?!" I exclaimed as the sudden PK announcement left me confused.

I wasn't the only one. There were other Masters nearby, and they seemed as puzzled as myself.

Meanwhile, B3, despite acting weird at first, seemed completely calm now.

I silently thought things through.

"Mister, what's going on?" Louie asked in a worried tone.

The announcement had stated that "Those who do not wish to fight must leave Fadl Mountain Pass within this time."

Since we had Louie to look out for, I really didn't want to get involved in any battles, so I considered making Silver hurry and using the given time to leave.

"I repeat. In ten minutes, the PK clan K&R will begin hunting in this area. Those who do not wish to fight must leave Fadl Mountain Pass within this time. Circle of Detect Life — Human."

Following that repeat and the skill activation, I felt something pass through my body, which was enough to make me gasp.

"They're just like always..." said B3. "Don't worry, this isn't dangerous by itself." Since she was clearly familiar with the magic used, she explained the spell's nature. "This is just a life search skill that had its range and precision enhanced by the announcement they used as a Chant. It's what they usually do."

Oh, so the announcement was a Chant, I thought.

The Chant skill used MP-imbued words to enhance magic effects, and since the user was free to set the words used, with the exception of a few special spells, even that announcement had been a proper Chant.

That aside... "life search"? I wondered.

"The search they made allows them to know the location and level of all the creatures in the area that fit the designated type," B3 continued. "They put the skill name in the announcement as a way of saying, 'There's no use in hiding. Either run or fight.' Oh, and just so you know, most K&R members are from Tenchi, and this is an Onmyoji job skill."

"K&R..." I murmured.

That name was familiar. Marie had mentioned it after the capital blockade incident, and I'd seen it myself on the bulletin board for clan rankings, where it was no. 3.

"They're third in the kingdom's clan rankings," B3 confirmed. "And if you consider just PK clans... With Mad Castle disbanding and Goblin Street moving to another country, they're the undisputed top."

The kingdom's strongest player killers... That certainly seemed like a force to be reckoned with.

"Also, though it pains me to say it, their leader was the top PK even when the other clans were active. In fact, you can even include that hitman, the Superior Killer, and he'd still be the best in the kingdom."

A PK stronger than Marie... the Superior Killer... the one who killed King of Plagues?

"Is he a Superior?" I asked.

"Not yet, as far as I'm aware, but he's well-known and very powerful," she said before making a short pause. "Kashimiya is third in the kingdom's duel rankings, after all."

◇

The third in the kingdom’s duel rankings was a person I’d heard of before.

Following one of our usual sparrings, Juliet, the fourth in the rankings, and I had gone off together to have some lunch.

Spurred by curiosity, I’d said, “I’ve yet to see the third and fifth in the duel rankings. What are they like?”

Through Figaro, I’d come to know the eighth, Chelsea the Vagrant Golden Sea, and almost everyone above her. By now, mock battles against these skilled players were a part of my daily life. However, I’d never even met the third and fifth. I’d even talked, though I hadn’t sparred, with the second one, Tom Cat, so I was starting to find this quite strange.

Speaking of him, Tom Cat was a weirdo who walked around with a cat on his head. Then again, most of the top rankers were weird in their own ways, so he might’ve not been all that special.

“So you seek tales of the ‘Guillotine’ and the ‘Bone-Eater’...” said Juliet.

“‘Guillotine’? ‘Bone-Eater’?” I asked.

“Indeed. The latter was conferred the name because of her Embryo’s ultimate skill, while the former was crowned as such because he beheaded all the rank-bearers below himself... including yours truly,” she said before placing her hand on her neck.

“Even you?” I muttered in disbelief.

Juliet was fourth in the rankings and bore the dark knight grouping’s Superior Job, Fallen Knight. In addition, her Embryo, Hræsvelgr, could become wings that greatly increased her mobility and gave her magic attacks, making her into a character perhaps as versatile as Xunyu. And yet, she’d still lost her head against the third.

“The Guillotine is strong,” she continued. “Though compatibility walls him away from the throne of the second, Monster Cat Mansion, he is undoubtedly a match for him. In fact, I expect that even the Endless Chain would find it a challenge to seize victory before the Guillotine’s blade reached him.”

“He can defeat Figaro in close combat?” I couldn’t even picture that. Just what kind of a monster was he?

"You might wish to know that you would never see him spar," Juliet added.

"Why?" I asked.

"He is a crest hunter... a player killer. On days without a ranked battle he must partake in, he indulges in headhunting 'outside.'"

"...Well, that sure sounds unpleasant," I said.

◇

I recalled having thought, Man, I sure wouldn't like to encounter a ranked PK, but that had turned out to be a jinx.

"Can't a man catch a break?" I complained. Tsukuyo Fuso yesterday, the strongest player killers today... What the hell's up with my luck?

"K&R is unique among PK clans because their hunting is limited by rules put there by their leader," said B3.

"Rules, eh?"

Well, considering they had the decency to announce it and give us time to escape, they were probably a better chance encounter than Marie.

"The rules include the necessity for announcements, giving time for people to escape, warning signs next to the roads leading to the area, and a ban on any attacks against tians."

"Well, that's pretty considerate of them... Definitely not praiseworthy, though." They were basically occupying an entire area, after all. It wasn't like that counted as a crime, considering they didn't hurt tians, but still.

"So we just happened to get caught up in their hunt, huh?" I asked.

"No." B3 shook her head. "I'm inclined to believe this is no coincidence."

"Hm?"

She opened her map window and pointed at a certain location.

"When the conch signal began, we were right here."

It was the exact center of the Fadl Mountain Pass.

"Wait, so..."

"Yes, and if it's no accident, it means they began their hunt exactly when it was hardest for us to escape. Ten minutes aren't quite enough for us to leave this area from here."

I've been singled out? Again? I thought, confused.

"It's not guaranteed it's because of you, is it?" asked Nemesis telepathically.

Well, yeah, but Louie was a tian, so he simply couldn't be a PK's target, while B3 was a normal player, so it was unlikely she had anything to do with this. I told her, That leaves only me. I stood out because of what happened in Gideon, so I could easily have gotten into their sights. Damn you, Franklin.

"Whatever the case, escape is unlikely, so it's best we ready ourselves for battle," said B3.

"All right, let's do this," I replied with no hesitation.

"You sure are quick to prepare."

"I'm used to it by now." This certainly wasn't the first time I'd been caught up in some sudden trouble, after all.

"Then let me tell you about the way K&R fights," B3 said.

"You know that?"

"To a certain extent, yes."

First the conch, then life search, now this... B3 seemed to be quite knowledgeable about K&R's methods. Well, she'd said that she'd joined CID because of the info they had, so it was no surprise that she was well-versed.

"Following the search, K&R's members split up into three roles," she said as she raised three fingers. "Group fighters — the ones that target the non-veteran players and wipe them out by overwhelming them; squad fighters — the ones that form single parties and go for the high-rank, max-level veterans; and solo fighters — their two Superior Jobs. One is the leader, Kashimiya, while the other is the sub-leader, Rosa. All the roles act simultaneously."

"Two Superior Jobs, eh?" And one of them was said to be stronger than any of the rankers I'd sparred against. I hadn't had many victories against any of them, and this was despite them letting me use a Lifesaving Brooch as a handicap. However, if I were to use the technique that got me some of those wins, I could maybe...

"If they're targeting us, they will attack right after the ten minutes are up," said B3. "And they will likely use their Superior Jobs, rather than groups or squads."

"So we'll have to fight two Superior Jobs?" I asked.

“Probably just one. Search-and-kill is more effective when they split up, and their fighting styles have little compatibility, so they’ll target different Masters and... Hm?”

Well, having to fight just one instead of two definitely gave me hope.

Oh, B3 seems to have realized something, I thought.

“...Odd,” she said with her hand placed over her mouth.

“What’s odd?” I asked.

“Now that I think about it, the very fact that we’re being targeted is strange.”

“They’re player killers, aren’t they?”

“Yes, and that’s exactly why it’s odd. Right now, we’re escorting Louie — an NPC. A tian,” she explained before looking inside the carriage. “K&R doesn’t target tians or Masters who are escorting them. That’s one of the rules put in place by Kashimiya. So, if they’re really targeting us, they either don’t know about Louie... or Kashimiya isn’t with them this time. I’ve heard rumors that he hasn’t been seen online for almost two months of game time, which makes it highly plausible.”

“So, if they’re targeting us despite knowing about Louie... they’re doing so because the leader isn’t here to enforce the rules?” I asked slowly.

“I believe that the rule has simply slipped Rosa’s mind. The woman is quite a meathead, you see, though not in the same way as the Over Gladiator... Basically, she’s not the sharpest tool in the shed.”

Coming from B3, that’s quite an evaluation, I thought.

Also, I couldn’t help but feel that her knowledge of K&R amounted to more than just what she’d learned through CID. It seemed kinda personal.

“That aside, if we’re really fighting just the Nobushi Princess, a job from the ambush-focused nobushi grouping, it means our opponent would have a limited set of moves. We could perhaps even counter her, and... Ray.”

“Yes?”

She looked directly into my eyes and asked “Do you want to try and defeat the sub-leader of the kingdom’s strongest PK clan?”

◆◆◆

Royal Capital, Altea

K&R’s headquarters, the martial arts building, was currently mostly devoid of people, as most of the members had gone out to hunt. One Master that had stayed behind was currently stressed out of her mind.

“Oh no no nooo... What have I done? Nooo...”

Her name was Tomika, and she was the exact same girl that had witnessed the conversation at the adventurer’s guild and reported it to Rosa.

Today, she was free from both training and hunting, so, after seeing off all the members who had gone to Fadl Mountain Pass, she’d stayed and looked after the headquarters. That was when she’d realized that she’d neglected to do something very important.

“I forgot to tell her they had a tian child with them... Oh noooo...”

Tomika had tried to fix this mistake by contacting the hunting party, but she didn’t know any communication magic, nor did she have any items that enabled it. She’d also considered using real-life emails, but unfortunately, all the members she could contact like that were off-duty, just like her, and thus weren’t participating in today’s hunt.

Sadly, there was nothing she could do.

“Oh noo... They’ll be maad... The leader will be mad at Sis, who will then be mad at meee...” she whined with both her hands on her head. “Something even worse might happen... Oh noo...”

K&R’s leader was a gentle sort. Gentle enough to become upset at PK that was senseless or involved tians. Not to mention that, in his absence, Rosa had become even more irrational and inconsiderate than usual.

That had caused her to participate in the well-funded newbie hunt despite it breaking K&R’s rules, and it had inspired her to reduce the time the clan gave to let people evacuate, among other things.

Tomika knew full well what the implications of the current hunt were, and imagining the worst-case scenario made her stressed beyond belief.

“Why would anyone be mad?” someone asked.

“S-Sis was all fired up about this... she might involve the tian in her fight... and if he dies, the leader... Sis... the entire clan would... aaahhhhhh!”

It was hard to tell what kind of future she pictured, but her tears made it clear that it wasn’t pretty.

“Hmm,” hummed the person behind her. “I don’t really understand, but it all seems complicated. Let me just try to contact Rosa, and... Oh dear, she’s not answering. Looks like she’s already hunting. Her communication device must be in her inventory by now."

The person had tried to talk to Rosa, but hadn't had any luck. It was only natural. During a hunt, the Nobushi Princess Rosa was a solo "search, ambush, and destroy" operative, so it was imperative for her to put away any magic devices that could give away her position. To avoid the effects of some search spells, she also didn't wear the likes of Telepathy Cuffs or exchange any info with the other members of the hunt.

This time, Rosa's meticulous preparation had worked against them, and the person concluded that contacting her — or anyone else — was now impossible.

"This leaves us no choice," he said. "We'll go there directly. Tomika, could you prepare the car?"

"Uohh... Okaayy... Huh?"

"So, where did they go?"

"Fadl Mountain Pass..." Tomika replied in a stupor as she finally realized who was there with her. "Umm... How long have you been online, leader?"

"For only three minutes. Come on, we have to hurry."

That person was none other than the leader of K&R — Kashimiya the Guillotine. At his side, there was an odachi — a blade so large it didn't suit his frame. It was connected to him by a chain hook bearing the semblance of a rabbit's skull.

Chapter Seven: Cross Hunting

Fadl Mountain Pass

“Ten minutes have passed. K&R shall now commence hunting in the Fadl Mountain Pass,” the same voice as before resounded throughout the area, declaring the end of the waiting time.

As the limit was reached, the Masters that had been unable to escape or were simply up to the challenge became on high alert, and justly so, as the first attacks began just as the time ran out.

First came a deluge of arrows.

From what seemed like out of nowhere, hundreds... no, thousands of arrows rained down upon the Masters. They were caused by the Heavy Bow Samurai skill, Early Summer Arrow Rain.

It released 100 arrows for every use, and when used simultaneously by the 30-strong K&R group fighters, it created a storm of 3,000 arrows. Each one of those arrows did less than 100 damage by itself, but those numbers easily made up for that, making this tactic quickly whittle away the life of most targets.

The Masters subjected to this lethal rain were less than a tenth of all those in the Fadl Mountain Pass, but that tenth included Ray and his group, who had yet to escape the area.

As the owner of Nemesis, Ray was capable of using a single Counter Absorption to withstand 200,000 points of damage from a single attack, but he was painfully ineffective against rapid fire from a distance he couldn’t hope to reach. Whenever Marie switched to such tactics in their mock battles, Ray always ended up completely crushed.

He might’ve been able to burn the arrows with Purgatorial Flames, but alas, he didn’t have the left hand for that.

Silver’s Wind Hoof had the potential to block them, as well, but Ray had neither the MP stock for it, nor enough time to activate it, leaving Ray completely powerless to defend against this arrow storm.

“Thousand Shutter!” B3 shouted the name of a skill as she jumped off the carriage, taking it upon herself to protect it.

Out of her inventory, she'd taken out a shield so large it covered her whole body, and once she held it up, a giant, blueish barrier of light appeared and shielded the whole carriage. The countless arrows falling towards them all hit the barrier, and not a single one passed through.

This was a Shield Giant skill, and it blocked any and all attacks that didn't deal more than 1,000 damage, meaning that the arrows — with their focus on quantity at the cost of quality — couldn't hope to pass this wall.

Following this act of defense, B3 took out a shield even larger than before from her inventory, probably one meant to be used by giants, and, right as the arrow storm ended, went on the offensive.

"Anti Gravity! Flying Shield!" she roared as she activated one of her Embryo's unique skills and paired it with another job skill, which involved throwing the shield.

She launched it in the direction where the arrows came from, combining her intuition, calculations, and experience to fine-tune her throw. The result? Pure success. The shield landed in the middle of the gathering of K&R's group fighters.

With that alone, the few that weren't wearing Lifesaving Brooches got the death penalty, and the ensuing confusion prevented the survivors from firing their next wave of arrows.

Ray hurriedly made Silver move, using this opportunity to try and take them out of the area.

Even as his left, prosthetic arm was fixed into holding the reins, he held sword-form Nemesis in his right, ready for whatever might come.

B3 jumped up on the roof of the carriage and held up her shield, making it clear she was on high alert as well.

Both of them were armed and ready, but even so, they failed to notice someone jump out from behind the tree and to the forward-right of the moving carriage. That "someone" was none other than the Nobushi Princess, Rosa.

She didn't miss the minor opening in their alertness.

"A Kill Supreme!"

And she used her Superior Job's unique skill on Ray.

◇◇◇

Five Minutes Earlier, Paladin, Ray Starling

"K&R's sub-leader is name Rosa. Rosa's job is Nobushi Princess, and it's the Superior Job from the nobushi grouping," B3 told me.

She'd started giving me info right after asking me whether I'd like to defeat K&R's sub-leader.

"Though Nobushi is a job branching out from Samurai, Nobushi and Samurai focus on very different things," she continued.

"As far as I know, Samurai are close to the Fighters or Gladiators we have here," I said. "So, what do Nobushi focus on?"

"Ambushes and first hits. The damage they deal with the first attack they use on an opponent on that day is ludicrous. Nobushi Princess's unique job skill can easily go into the hundreds of thousands."

Ambushes, eh...? I thought. I guess it's a reference to Sengoku Era peasants who preyed upon deserters.

Anyway, six digits of damage was no joke. That amount was matched only by the likes of Shu's punches or stabs from Xunyu's Yinglong's Fang.

Through all my sparring, I'd found that Counter Absorption could only take 200,000 points of damage before breaking, so unless the damage done was closer to 100,000 than it was to 1,000,000, not even we could survive it. Hell, it would come as a surprise attack, so I probably wouldn't even be able to activate it in time.

"There's no need to try and bear or dodge Rosa's first attack," said B3.

"Huh?" I raised an eyebrow.

"It's best to just let it hit you."

...B3, you've completely lost me.

"Nobushi ambushes were greatly feared for quite a while after the game began. And for a reason. The jobs are a great source of single-attack damage, after all. They were especially popular among PKs who liked to ambush, and many players ended up being OHKO'd by Nobushis. But eventually, things started to change."

B3 raised up her upper clothing and showed me the thing she was wearing underneath. It was an accessory that I knew very well. In fact, I was wearing one right now.

"What caused the change were these Lifesaving Brooches. When a certain portion of players began wearing these, Nobushi lost their advantage."

“I see...”

Since Nobushi were only strongest on their first hit, the existence of an item that negated fatal damage was their bane. Lifesaving Brooches canceled out their sole advantage, effectively turning the immense power of their first hit into no problem.

“It’s not unusual for certain MMO strategies to become obsolete as the environment changes,” B3 added. “I can also name the Guardian-Jaguarman strategy as another example. That one declined when the King of Beasts appeared.”

Basically, the game’s meta shifted. This was common in many multiplayer gaming scenes, and you could even see it in trading card games and the like.

“Mind you, the Nobushi Princess, with her Superior Job stats, still uses this strategy,” B3 said. “‘Breaks the Brooch? Good enough for me,’ and all that.”

B3 spoke as though she’d actually heard her say those words.

“Still, that doesn’t change the fact that our Brooches can negate her first — and strongest — attack. And, as you can imagine, when she does her ambushes, she’s almost completely on the offensive, meaning that...”

◇

Meaning that... for us, it was a great opportunity.

“Gh!” The Nobushi Princess’s attack pierced my chest, and all the damage done was negated by my Lifesaving Brooch. Her attack was many times more powerful than my remaining HP, and it came as no surprise that the Brooch inside my armor instantly shattered. But that was no loss, for the moment I felt the impact on my chest, I was already making my move, fully certain of how I had to retaliate.

I had to aim for the exact moment her attack hit, and give it back twofold.

“Vengeance...”

It was the technique I’d pictured when I’d prepared for death while facing Franklin’s DGP.

“...is...”

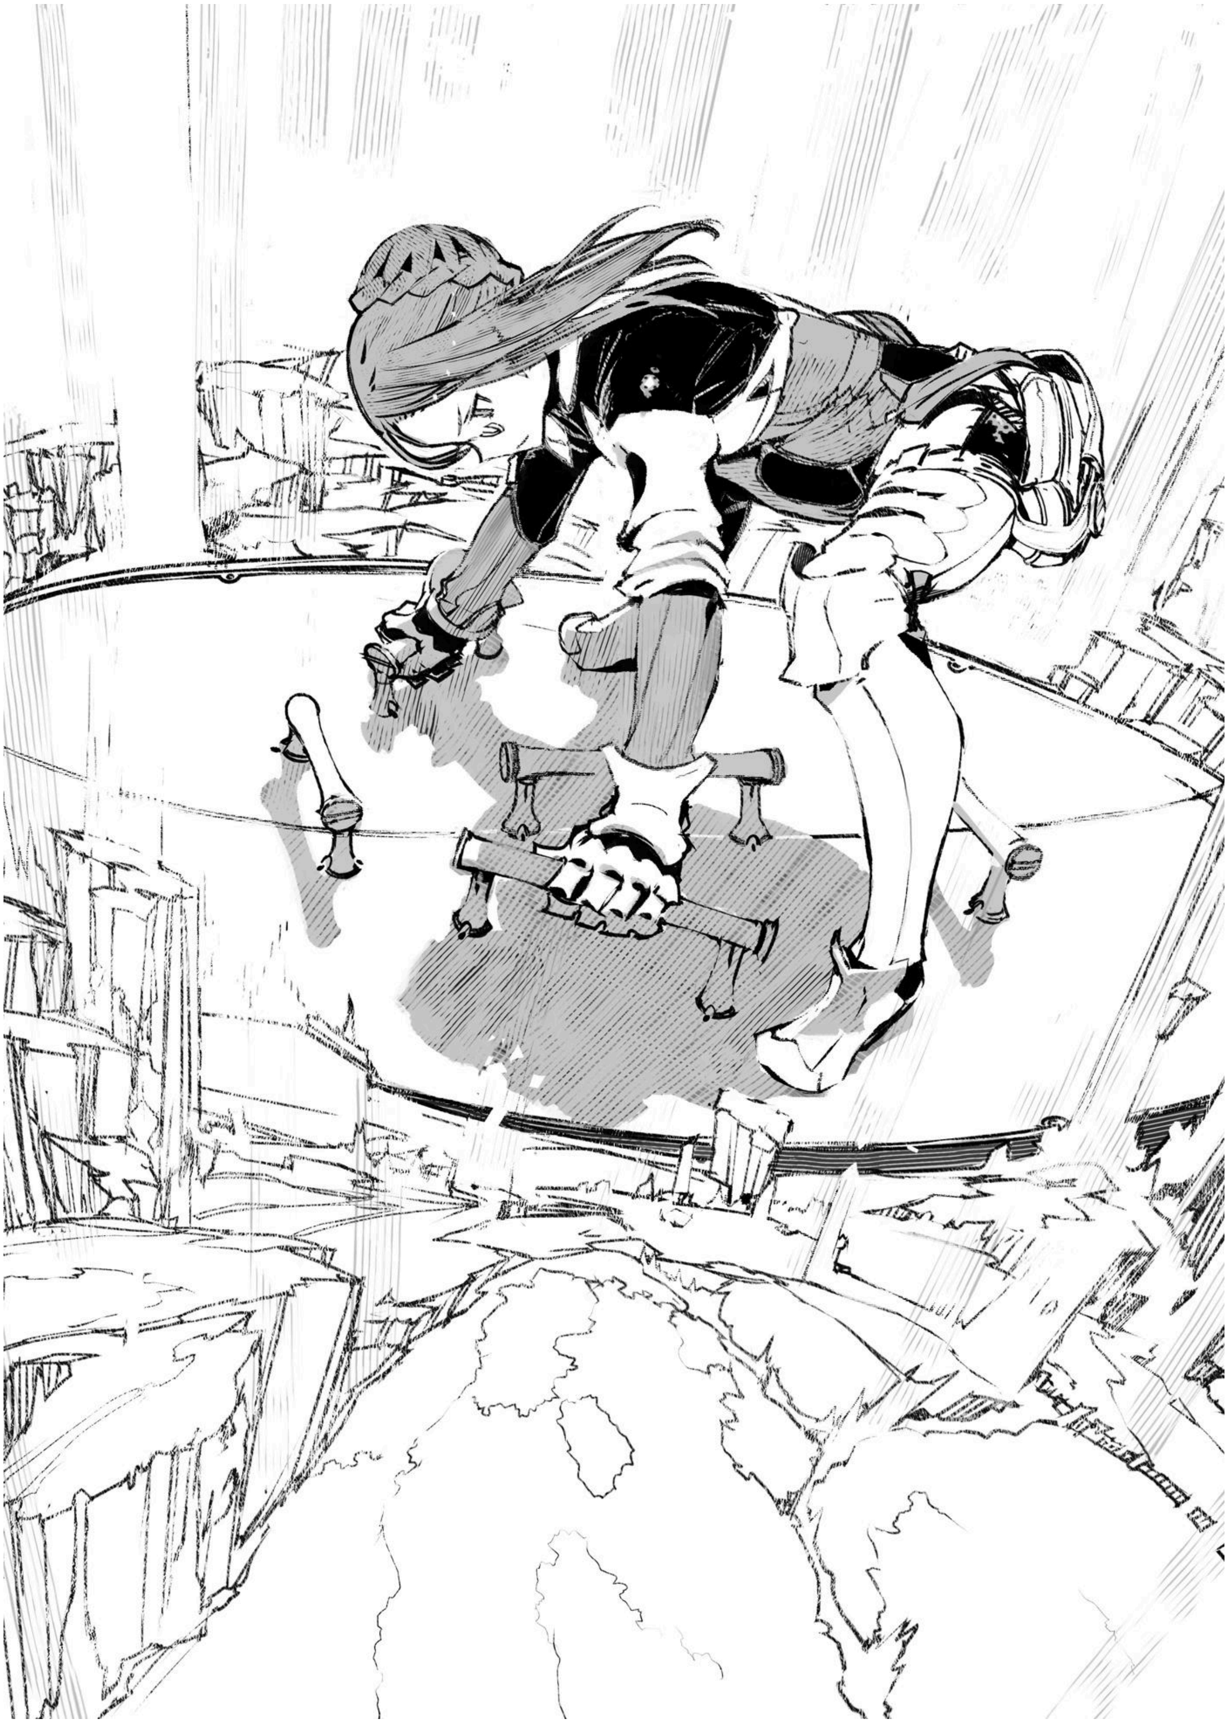
It was the move I’d mastered while sparring against the duel rankers.

“...Mine!”

And now, without a flaw to name, I used it on Rosa.

“Wha?!” she gasped in surprise as my counterattack forced her to drop down from the carriage. Her body skipped on the ground three times before she stopped, leaving her spread out and vulnerable.

“—las! Stronghold Pressure!” B3, not missing the opportunity, jumped off the carriage and crushed Rosa with her second giant shield.



Suddenly, I heard the sound of something wet being crushed.

"..." I had no words.

"Oh, dear," said Nemesis. "I'm actually scared of seeing what's going on under the shield."

B3 had mercilessly pulverized a downed enemy, but I didn't think it was relentless of her. After all, Rosa had been perfectly fine even after taking my Vengeance, which had dealt double the six-digit damage she'd done to me. That wasn't an amount that could be taken care of with just a Dragonscale Ward — which reduced incoming damage by 90% — so it was clear she'd also had a Lifesaving Brooch.

Unlike in my mock battles, my opponents could also use Brooches, so the result of my counterattack was pretty obvious. Still, B3's follow-up ought to be more than enough to finish her off.

As proof, the blood spreading out from beneath the shield was slowly becoming particles of light, making it clear that Rosa had received the death penalty.

"Well done, Ray," said B3.

"You, too," I replied. "And hey, you were right. She actually did go for me."

When we'd talked about how we'd deal with her, B3 had said that Rosa would most likely attack me first. I'd assumed she'd go for B3, considering she was a higher level, but she'd suggested otherwise, saying that, because I held the reins, taking care of me would reduce our mobility. That seemed like a good reason by itself, but I felt like B3 had had another basis for this assumption.

"Yes, I expected as much," B3 said. "She and I have fought before, and I used the same ultimate skill I used just now as a counter, in a manner similar to yours. I assumed she wouldn't attack me to avoid repeating the same mistake."

Oh, so you've fought her before, I thought. That explains why you know so much.

"But man, to think we won against an SJ so easily..." I said.

"Player battles aren't all about differences in levels and stats," B3 replied. "Preventing your opponent from using their powers, while using your own cards in the best manner possible, is far more important."

The battle just now had been the perfect example of that. We'd used my Brooch to negate her primary power, and then used the resulting opening to launch a combination of my counterattack and B3's ultimate skill.

"I must say, your counter was quite a feat," B3 commented. "Not everyone can land a hit while taking a hit."

"Well, I've had tons of practice. The duel rankers helped me out a lot with that."

They'd helped me learn to launch a counter while receiving my opponent's attack. That wasn't a Dendro skill, but a technique I'd learned myself. Though I hadn't gotten to use it against DGP, I'd kept the idea in my mind, polished it in the many mock battles I'd had during the past in-game month, and become good enough at it to use it in a real battle.

All the sparring had given me many chances to test it, and Bishmal, the seventh in the rankings, had been especially passionate about helping me. After all, he had always, without fail, started every battle by charging towards me with his ultimate skill. He had obviously been taking that simple approach to help me learn.

I mean... that couldn't have been his actual fighting style... right? I pondered.

Anyway, because of that, he was the only ranker against whom I'd won more than I'd lost. The other rankers had been able to counter this technique after the first time I'd used it on them, but still, without it, we wouldn't have won this battle.

I said, "The counter not only had excellent timing, but—"

"A Kill Supreme!" B3's words were cut short by the activation of a skill. For a moment, I was completely lost as to what was happening.

Before I realized it, a spear had pierced B3's chest and launched her into the carriage's door.

Suddenly, it came to me that I'd heard the skill name and had seen the spear before. This attack could only have been done by one person. "Yeah, you're wearing a Brooch, too. No surprise there, B3." It was the Nobushi Princess, Rosa — the one we'd killed just a few moments ago.

"Well, I'm quite sure it's broken now," she continued.

"Why are you alive?" asked B3, still standing despite the impact and the damage from the spear. However, the shattered Brooch falling out of her clothes made it clear that she wasn't as good as she appeared.

"Ray's attack broke your Brooch," B3 continued. "So my ultimate skill should've killed you, right?"

"Well, normally, yeah," Rosa replied. "Your skill is as much of a big deal as ever, and the Unbreakable's counter was something else. Sadly for you, though..."

She cracked a grin and showed us the thing hanging on her wrist. Though it was wrapped around her arm like a bracelet, upon taking a better look at it, I realized it was a small, dried up doll.

"I killed a UBM recently and got this thing here. It's why I survived. You can guess what it does, can't you?"

"Considering there was blood and particles of light, I assume it 'Creates a substitute and replaces you with it right before you experience fatal damage.'"

"Not bad, you data nerd. You more or less got it."

So basically, Rosa had two accessories that let her avoid lethal damage.

...How is that allowed?

"Non-Brooch items that negate fatal damage are rare and precious," said B3. "You sure are lucky."

"Ha ha!" Rosa chuckled. "Good girls get good things, you know?"

"Is that a joke?" B3 snapped. "Because I'm not laughing."

Though they were talking like friends, I could sense an air of bloodlust gathering between them. It was reminiscent of what I felt when watching Figaro and Tsukuyo Fuso.

However, B3, being an endurance-type, showed no intention of attacking just yet. If she made one wrong move, Rosa would quickly take advantage of any openings in her defenses.

"Anyway, now none of us can do anything against fatal damage," Rosa spoke up again. "I also used my first attacks against you both, and B3's pretty little ultimate skill can't be used again until the cooldown's up. I'm not wrong there, am I? Your ultimate's cooldown ain't as long as mine's, but it still takes some time, doesn't it?"

B3 said nothing.

"Also," Rosa said before pausing and looking at me. "I now know about the Unbreakable's counter. You just used a skill that works as long as the sword touches the enemy, didn't you? The posture or the power you give it doesn't matter at all, right?"

"Ah!" I gasped. She already knew the workings of the counter I'd just used.

Indeed, Vengeance is Mine worked as long as the blade touched my enemy, delivering double the damage I'd received from them to that particular part of the body. Sure, I'd had to force the sword inside when fighting large monsters with cores in their bodies, but that wasn't necessary with human-sized opponents.

Regardless of how awkward my posture was or how little power I put into it, Vengeance activated as long as the blade was connected to their body, meaning that I could use it even when I was being hit and couldn't position myself properly.

That was exactly why the counterattack I'd used against Rosa had worked so well, and apparently, that alone had been enough for her to figure out how it worked.

"Guess you could call it an 'Impact Counter' or something," Rosa commented.

She'd actually given it a name. Well, it wasn't weird or anything, so I was fine with it.

"I've heard you've been sparring against the rankers. I can just imagine Bishmal charging at you, and you using him as a practice dummy for this trick."

"You seem quite knowledgeable about the rankers," said Nemesis.

"Well, that's because I am one." Rosa cracked a grin. "I'm the fifth, you know?"

...So it wasn't just the third. Both the third and the fifth were among K&R's player killers.

"There's not much to it," she added. "My darling plays along with my hobbies, so I play along with his. I kinda like duels, too. Even if I can't use my ambushes." She formed a smile.

"Yeah," I said. "To ambush someone in a duel, you'd have to be like Xun...yu...?"

Hold on, I thought. She just said that she couldn't use her ambush attacks — the nobushi grouping's forte — in a duel. In that case... how did she rise up all the way to fifth?

As if to answer that question...

"All right, then. I can't use my job's ultimate skill, so I'll take you on in a fair fight." Rosa reached into her inventory and took something out.

It was the skull of a dragon, probably a land-based one, and it was even larger than her body. She placed the skull on the tip of her spear and casually spun it before saying a certain set of words.

“Remnants of Warrior Dreams — Gashadokuro!”

The skull she had pulled out instantly became powder, which was then absorbed by her spear.

The sight reminded me that the fifth in the duel rankings was called “the Bone-Eater.” However, it didn’t end with just eating.

“Khaaaaghhh!” Rosa roared as her spear unleashed a light and a white aura, which soon engulfed her whole body.

At that moment, when the light and the aura made it impossible for Rosa to see...

“Stronghold Pressure!”

...B3 crushed her with the giant shield.

It was a repeat of the attack from before, but the results were drastically different this time.

“Not gonna work now!” Rosa shouted as she stopped B3’s attack with little effort.

She was now clad in a white exoskeleton. Her form was abnormal, like a forced merging of humanoid and draconic bones, and the presence she emanated was completely unlike before. It felt as though I were looking a hardened warrior and a mighty beast inhabiting a single body.

“Hh!” B3 gasped as she let go of the giant shield and jumped backwards.

“Hhaagh!” Rosa exclaimed as she pulverized the shield with just her exoskeleton’s right arm. Indeed — the stout, bulwark-like shield crumbled in but a single hit.

“Such beastly strength... It reminds me of Brother Bear,” commented Nemesis, and I was inclined to agree. Of course, Rosa was still nowhere near Shu, but her power was incomparable to what it had been before. It was, without a doubt, her Embryo’s ultimate skill, and it was an enhancement transformation type, just like Riser’s — the sixth in the rankings.

We were now faced with a player who had a real ace up her sleeve.

“She’s strong,” I muttered. The power and presence were enough for me to see that she was indeed a duel ranker.

And yet, despite that, I still believed... “...that winning is possible,” Nemesis finished my thought. “Correct?”

“Yeah,” I replied as I tightened my grip on my greatsword and resolved to battle the mighty foe before me. “But man, this sure is a bothersome ultimate skill.”

I’d spent a lot of the past month sparring against the rankers. Needless to say, they were all significantly stronger than me, and — barring one exception — I had repeatedly lost against all of them. However, I knew full well which one of them gave me the hardest time.

Ignoring Superiors like Figaro and Xunyu, the most difficult opponent for me was the sixth, Masked Riser.

You’d expect it to be the fourth, Juliet, who had a Superior Job, but no, I had more trouble with the high-rank Master in sixth. His Embryo’s ultimate skill was the type that transformed him and greatly enhanced his abilities.

Compared to ultimates that launched single, powerful attacks, prolonged status enhancements were far harder to counter for me.

It was made worse by the fact that, with my current stats, even the most basic attack post-transformation was lethal for me, and that alone was enough to make me wary of such opponents.

“Rhhaagh!” Rosa, now clad in her exoskeleton, roared as she attacked, as though flaunting the fact that she was exactly that type of fighter. The power of her attacks and the proficiency behind them made it clear she was on the same tier as the famed rankers.

“Goddamn, she’s trouble,” I grumbled.

However, though Rosa was on the same tier as Riser and had an ultimate skill similar to his, there was one way in which they greatly differed.

From what I could see, the Nobushi Princess was now an endurance type.

B3 and I had already taken advantage of several openings in her defenses and landed many hits on her, but it didn’t look like any of them had had an effect. In fact, I wasn’t sure if we’d done even a single point of damage.

“Ha,” Nemesis chuckled. “Most of the rankers were speed-focused, so we’re not used to this.”

Indeed, the duelists I’d sparred against had prioritized speed over toughness, and Rosa’s ambush had made me assume she was the same.

"Wait, maybe she..." Maybe her battle style changed when she used her ultimate skill? I wondered.

I was assuming this because she'd activated it by using the skull of a monster, and because, when Marie had shown me the clips on her crystal, Rosa's fighting style had been different than it was now.

Back then, instead of being completely covered by an exoskeleton, she'd only worn a bony set of arm and leg bracers. This made it safe to assume that the skill could create exoskeletons meant for different styles depending on what skulls she used, which would make it not only powerful, but versatile, as well.

"Aahahahahahah!" Rosa laughed out loud. "Come on, come on, COME ON!"

She charged towards B3 while masterfully using her bone-made, mace-like right arm and the spear — likely her Embryo — fixed in her left arm. Her power was great, and her attacks damaged B3's shield by merely grazing it.

Rosa now excelled at both defense and offense, leaving us overwhelmed despite it being a 2v1 battle.

"However," I said as I noticed something, "she's not fast."

She was nowhere near the speed of the duel rankers I'd fought against. In fact, she was even slower than me, which was crazy, considering she'd been much faster while ambushing us.

Most would assume she'd become slower because of the weight added by her transformation, but that was only half-right. She had certainly slowed down because of an increase in weight, but it certainly wasn't caused by the transformation.

No. The extra weight didn't even come from herself.

"I knew it would be like this, but I'm still surprised you can move while being so close," mumbled B3. "I mean, the weight can be as high as 500 times greater than normal."

It was one of B3's Embryo skills.

Cracks were appearing around Rosa's feet, and her legs were sinking about ten centimeters into the ground. While the "Anti-Gravity" skill B3 had used had seemed to make things lighter, this one appeared to have the opposite effect.

However, despite being exposed to 500 times greater gravity and reaching the point where she started breaking the ground she treaded, the Nobushi Princess could still run towards B3 and attack her.

The skill slowed her down enough for B3 to be able to deflect Rosa's attacks with the curved surface of her shield. Still, it was clear that a proper, direct hit would break it, just like the other one.

I also noticed that B3 was defending against Rosa's attacks in a way that gradually distanced them from the carriage. Louie was still inside, hidden from the battle and protected by the vehicle's defensive barrier. However, it was obvious it wouldn't be much protection against Rosa as she was now, so B3 was making sure to lead her as far away from the carriage as possible.

Before the time limit hit, B3 and I had talked about the likelihood of K&R stopping their attack if we'd told them we had Louie, a tian, with us.

The clan had a set of rules, and no one there wanted to get on the wanted list, so if they knew about Louie, it was possible they would let us go.

However, B3 had said that: "If they don't stop, the situation will shift from bad to worse."

K&R had started the attack exactly when we were in the middle of the area, when it was hardest for us to escape. If they had some sort of reason they simply had to defeat us, telling them about Louie would most likely turn him into a hostage.

And now that we had the Nobushi Princess herself — the strongest among them — coming after us, it was clear they were intent on killing us.

Having to protect Louie made this an uphill battle in more ways than one, and it wouldn't be hard for Rosa to make short work of us if she knew of his existence.

According to B3, "We can't know how well the clan is protecting Kashimiya's rules without him there, so it's best to act while expecting the worst."

And because of that, we were now fighting while hiding Louie's existence and trying our best not to let any damage come to him.

Side note: I had asked about the life search skill and whether it worked on Louie, and B3 had said that it functioned based on levels, so a tian child would remain undetected. After all, normal tian children didn't have jobs and thus, levels, making them immune to the search.

This was supported by the fact that Rosa hadn't mentioned Louie even once, which meant she either didn't know he was here... or was merely pretending she didn't.

"Glad to see this skill again, B3!" shouted Rosa. "It's like I'm in the training arc of some manga! Though, you do know it's not enough, RIGHT?!"

"Gh...!" B3 exclaimed.

Their battle was turning more heated than ever.

The Nobushi Princess was obviously referring to the ultimate skill B3 had already used. If B3 had used it while Rosa's movement was as limited as it was now, she could easily have achieved victory. I recalled one of the PKs from Marie's crystal ball having used a similar combo.

"Tell me this, B3!" Rosa continued. "Why aren't you switching to your main job?! You making light of me or something?!"

"Oh no, this is the best I can do right now," B3 replied.

"Quit your acting and go all out, damn it!" And Rosa continued vehemently attacking B3, who did her best to defend against her.

I was left on the sidelines of all this, since Rosa didn't show any intention of hurting me. In fact, she didn't even give me as much as a glance. This woman was focused solely on B3.

"Hmph, looks like you became too famous," said Nemesis.

"...Yep."

The tricks I had up my sleeve, such as the powerful Counter Absorption-Vengeance combo, were already well-known by many.

This was all because the broadcast of my battle against the RSK had been voiced, and my voice had been heard as clearly as Franklin's. Because of that, it was now common knowledge that I had a skill that absorbed damage, and that I could return it back to my attackers. Anyone who was aware of that wouldn't willingly attack a counter-user like me.

Rosa seemed to know that my and Nemesis's Vengeance was about the only thing here that could break through her endurance and deal damage to her, so she was purposely ignoring me and targeting only B3.

I silently thought things through. With Louie being in the carriage nearby, I couldn't use Hellish Miasma. Sure, I could give him an Elixir, but the miasma could ride the wind and affect more than just us, so in the end, it really wasn't an option.

That left me with only one option: the usual Counter Absorption-

Vengeance combo.

However, to make it work, I had to get Rosa to hit me, and the only way I could make that happen was by slipping in between her and B3 while she was attacking.

That wouldn't be easy, considering I had to do it without her noticing me. She wasn't looking at me right now, but she would surely see me if I were to get close to them.

I looked around and examined my options.

"Ray! This is bad!" Nemesis exclaimed, making me hastily look back at the battle.

B3's situation was dire. Not in terms of who had the upper hand, but because of her position.

I didn't see how, but they had switched places, and the carriage was now right behind B3.

"HAHAAH! Let's go, B3!" roared Rosa.

Despite being affected by supergravity, she charged towards B3 with immense ferocity, shattering the ground beneath her. The force and vigor she emanated made her seem inhuman, much like the Pure-Dragon whose bones were used as material for the exoskeleton.

"Gh...!" B3 grunted in anger, not doing anything to avoid Rosa's incoming attack.

It wasn't because she couldn't — she simply didn't. After all, the carriage right behind her contained Louie.

This was one of the ways Rosa could make short work of us. If Rosa targeted Louie, we had no choice but to defend him, even if we had to abandon our ability to defend ourselves.

It didn't look like the Nobushi Princess had intended this, but that didn't change the fact that our situation was now more dire than ever.

If B3 averted a single attack in a way that made it go straight to the carriage, it would jeopardize Louie's life. Thus, she had no choice but to take the attack head-on.

"Fatal Defender!" She shouted a skill, making her shield momentarily shine, then break when hit by Rosa's attack.

The impact blew B3 away, making her crash into the carriage.

Rosa didn't miss this opportunity and attacked her again.

"HA! That skill raises your defense in exchange for destroying your shield, doesn’t it?! Pretty desperate, aren’t you?!”

“Shut up. Fatal Defender!”

B3 was able to take the following attacks by using the same skill again, but if every use of it really cost a shield, her situation was really bad.

I had to find a way to help.

“I have to go... there,” I said as I made my move, going as fast as I could while avoiding being noticed by Rosa.

I was heading for the side of the carriage opposite to the one they were at.

During that time, B3 lost a total of five shields, and was slowly starting to receive damage, which caused her to slow down while trying to prepare the sixth.

The Nobushi Princess wasn’t lenient enough to miss that opening.

“YOU’RE DONE, B3!” she roared as she swung both her arms.

The bone mace on her right and the spear in her left were closing in on B3, carrying enough power to finish her off.

However, right before they landed, I jumped out from under the carriage.

“?!” B3 gasped.

When Rosa was focused on her battle with B3 and attacked in the direction of the carriage, I’d slipped under the carriage from its opposite side.

The vehicle had been designed to handle uneven roads, and its base was high enough for me to go under by just bending forward. The area under the carriage was a blind spot for Rosa, since she was already pretty tall and her sizable exoskeleton raised her visual point even higher.

Of course, the carriage was also still taller than her, and that had allowed it to function as a wall that had prevented her from seeing me get to the other side and hide under it. From there, I had been capable of slipping in between B3 and Rosa, which had given me the perfect opportunity.

“Counter Absorption!” Nemesis howled and activated the skill.

“Shi—! Screw it, I’ll break through!” Rosa reacted, hesitating for a moment before attacking with even more ferocity.

She intended to shatter my barrier, me, and B3 all at once.

“RHAAAGH!” she roared as the bone mace on her right arm crashed into the barrier, making it crack. “RUOOAGH!” she roared again as she launched an attack from the spear in her left.

The barrier of light was no longer there to protect us, and the spear was quickly closing in to pulverize B3 and me both.

“Counter Absorption!” Nemesis triggered the skill again, putting up the second barrier of light.

A high-speed Counter Absorption activation. It was something she’d had to learn if we wanted to stand a chance against all the high-speed fighters in the duel rankings. The second barrier not only neutralized the attack that would’ve surely killed me, but also gave me a chance to launch a counterattack.

“Vengeance...”

This counter would carry the damage of two powerful attacks. Rosa’s exoskeleton prevented me from unleashing it on her body, and I doubted that it was enough to shatter the tough, large bones covering her now. However, I already knew where I had to aim for my counter to be effective.

“...is Mine!”

My blade was touching the tip of the spear she was extending towards me — the main body of her Embryo, Gashadokuro.

The moment I finished activating the skill, Gashadokuro was exposed to double the amount of damage I’d accumulated with my two Counter Absorptions.

It exceeded the Embryo’s endurance as a weapon, and a moment later, it shattered into pieces.

Chapter Eight: The Bad Dog and the Owner

Paladin, Ray Starling

Our counterattack landed right on Rosa's Gashadokuro, breaking it into too many pieces to count.

With the Embryo's destruction, the exoskeleton forged by its ultimate skill also crumbled away. However, that was where the damage ended.

"This woman sure is tenacious," commented Nemesis.

"Can't argue with that," I agreed.

Indeed, the Nobushi Princess herself was completely unharmed.

There had been a small window of time between the moment Vengeance connected and the moment the damage left over from Gashadokuro's destruction reached her. She had used this opening to discard her Embryo, remove the exoskeleton, and distance herself from us, likely to avoid B3's gravity skill.

That escape had been nothing short of spectacular, but it meant little against the fact that the tables had turned.

Sure, I only had one more Counter Absorption use in stock, but B3 already had a new shield at the ready, and she still upheld the gravity skill. Without her exoskeleton, Rosa would be unable to resist its effects.

"Hhaah... Hhaah," she panted. "You're pretty good, Unbreakable."

Not even losing Gashadokuro could wipe that ferocious grin from her face. A broken Embryo wasn't lost forever, but they still took quite a while to regenerate.

"Heh heh heh," Rosa chuckled. "So I used up my ambushes and lost Gashadokuro... So what? The fight's just getting started!"

Despite her dire situation, her fighting spirit was completely unbent, and I found it highly reminiscent of the duel rankers I knew.

She was fixated on continuing this battle, and though we had the upper hand, that was still pretty bad for us.

If this went on for too long, other K&R members might come to her aid and turn the tides against us again. The battle so far had left us drained, meaning that something like that would further endanger not only us, but Louie as well.

If B3 hadn't been there to protect the carriage, the boy could've already been a goner, and prolonging this fight would only up the chances of it happening again.

...Hold on a second, I thought. Rosa's not in a state to immediately hurt him, so maybe it's safe to tell her about him now?

I glanced over at B3, who replied with a light nod.

"Hey, Nobushi Princess!" I called out to her aloud.

"That's 'Rosa' or 'Bone-Eater' to you, Unbreakable!" she roared in response. "I don't like being called a 'princess'!"

"That so?! All right then, Rosa, listen to this! We're in the middle of escorting a tian child to Torne! I hear you at K&R don't hurt tians! What the hell will happen to him if we're gone?!"

I readied myself just in case she tried to take Louie as a hostage.

"Don't you worry!" she replied with a chuckle. "I'll take him to Torne right after I'm done with you two!"

Well, that's... considerate, I thought.

The woman had no intention of harming the tian boy. Cool. Great. It would've been better if she'd also said that she'd back down, but she hadn't, so we had no choice but to fight her, win, and escape the area before the other K&R members got here.

"All right, I lost my ambush and my follow-up, but I'm not letting go of this fight yet! I'll turn this around!" Rosa reached into her inventory and took out some spare weaponry: a set of equippable claws and fangs.

I responded by brandishing Nemesis, while B3 readied her new shield for another skill.

It would all be decided by the next exchange of blows.

I prepared to charge...

"Please stop, all three of you. There's no need for this."

A strange person came between us and Rosa.

It appeared as though he'd teleported here, but no, his spontaneous entry had been due to nothing but pure speed.

He wasn't using stealth skills such as Marie's Art of Hiding or those on Shu’s Kim-un-Kamuy, nor had he activated some Xunyu-like teleportation. My experience from fighting the speedster rankers made me absolutely certain of this. Also, unless my eyes were deceiving me... he was actually faster than both Figaro and Xunyu.

“Please don’t move,” he said. “Just a few more steps and you’ll be in my range.”

The first word that came to mind upon seeing him was “fluffy,” for he was wearing a coat that seemed to be made from pure, unprocessed wool.

“Anyone who enters my range will lose their head.”

The second word was “katana,” because, at his sides, he had two odachi unbefitting his small frame, both of which were linked to him with chain hooks bearing the semblance of rabbit skulls. Eerily enough, all the rings in the chain looked like shark heads, while the rabbit eye sockets had faint red lights burning inside.

“You too, Rosa,” he continued. “Don’t move, please. The hunt is over, so put your weapons away.”

At that point, I finally realized that this small-framed person was an actual child. He looked even younger than Xunyu, and he was delivering his warnings with a soprano unique to young boys.

“D-Darling?!” exclaimed Rosa. “You can go online?!”

...Did she just call him “darling”? I asked myself, as if denying reality. Again, did this tall, muscular beast of a woman just call this short, young boy “darling”?

That question weighed heavy upon my mind, and yet, it was still blown away by the words I heard next.

“And so you show yourself,” said B3. “The Guillotine... The Unsheath, Kashimiya.”

“Eh?” I voiced my shock. Her words made me doubt what I was hearing.

That was the Guillotine? The one and only Kashimiya?

...Well, I already knew Xunyu, so it wasn’t too weird that he was a child, but I still had my share of comments and questions.

Why was he wearing wool while bearing the Japanese name for cashmere goats? Where had he appeared from? Could he even unsheath those odachi? His arms certainly didn’t seem long enough for them.

Shu had once told me that weapon-focused Superior Jobs from the “The One” series required great mastery over the relevant techniques, so I also found it odd that The Unsheath had ended up in the hands of a child.

However, my prolonged exposure to skilled fighters made me certain of one thing: despite appearances, Kashimiya was probably on the same tier as Figaro and Xunyu.

That aside, I had to focus on what he'd just said.

"The hunt is over?" I asked. "Does that mean K&R's withdrawing?"

"Yes." The boy nodded. "The other groups have already left."

Honestly, I couldn't be more thankful for that. Being ganked by the members of the kingdom's strongest PK clan wasn't my idea of a good time.

"Darling! Sorry, but I can't have that!" Rosa protested. "This is the start of our revenge!"

Apparently, there was some sort of disagreement between her and Kashimiya, but she'd just said one word I couldn't ignore.

"Revenge?" I raised an eyebrow.

Whatever does she mean? Why is it just the "start," too? I don't recall ever getting on K&R's bad side. Is this about B3? She said she'd fought them before, so... maybe?

"They're teaming up with the damn cultists from The Lunar Society!" Rosa continued. "We'll crush them and their plans! It'll be the signal before we attack the lunatics at their HQ!"

Her words instantly made it all clear, and there was only one way B3 and I could respond to that.

"We're not teaming up with them," we said, completely in-sync.

"...What?" Rosa became puzzled.

"Their leaders are acquaintances from college, but we don't really cooperate in-game," B3 explained.

"Hell, they kidnapped me just yesterday and I barely escaped," I added. "Also, Figaro just destroyed their base, so I'm not sure if you even have to do anything to it."

"...?" Rosa tilted her head in confusion. "Wait, but Tomika said you were having a nice chat with that hanger-on KoA and that you got something from him..."

"We're college acquaintances. Chats between us are nothing special."

"Yeah, and all he gave us was the payment for his tea."

"..." It looked like she finally understood.

Seriously, though... us? Scheming alongside the aberration? What kind of sick joke was that? By whose design would you ever come to that conclusion?

"Rosa," said Kashimiya, causing the confused woman to freeze solid. "If it's really as they say, it means you started a self-centered hunt based on nothing but a terrible misunderstanding. You not only inconvenienced them, but also went against the clan's principles."

Well, I won't lie. This was a real bother, I thought.

"In fact, I don't think I can allow this revenge of yours," he added.

"Eh? But the cultists started it..." Rosa argued.

"Oh? And who, exactly, accepted a suspicious beginner hunt job for nothing but profit?" His words were razor-sharp and almost murderous in tone.

Over yesterday and today, I'd been exposed to bloodlust from Figaro, Tsukuyo Fuso, B3, and Rosa, but Kashimiya's was unlike any of them. It was keen. Honed to perfection. And it made me feel like my head could fall at any moment.

Okay, how the hell is an elementary schooler capable of such strong murderous intent? I thought.

"On my way here, I heard all about the blockade incident that happened while I was away."

"I-I had to take it to pay for our HQ expansion..." Rosa argued. "And we still protected the rules of the hunt."

"That might be fair for bandit clans like Goblin Street, villain role-players like Mad Castle, or hitmen like the Superior Killer, but K&R is a hunting clan. Tell me, did we establish rules so we could hunt beginners that are less than rabbits to us?"

"Ghh..." Rosa groaned and fell silent.

So, Rosa had decided to join the newbie hunt without the leader's permission?

Now that's a bad move, I reflected.

"Do you think that was a good thing to do?" Kashimiya pressed her again.

"N-No! I don't!" Rosa meekly replied.

She was no longer the ferocious wolf she had been in the battle. Now, she was more like a cat outside its territory... or a naughty dog with a strict owner.

Honestly, the difference in physique and apparent age between them made the scene all kinds of confusing. Rosa was significantly larger than the average adult, and she looked at least 20 years older than Kashimiya.

Just what kind of relationship did they have? Was Rosa actually a child, too? Were they siblings or something? Or was it the other way around and Kashimiya was actually an adult?

Overwhelmed by curiosity, I silently asked B3 to tell me more about them.

"Kashimiya started out in Tenchi, as a solo player killer," she said. "But instead of PKing indiscriminately, he simply did it because he wanted serious duels where the loser got the penalty. 'Consensual PK,' so to speak. Players with this stance aren't uncommon in Tenchi, and it's one of the reasons why he also participated in actual duels."

I see, I thought. And he continued dueling even after moving here, eventually becoming third in the rankings.

"Rosa, on the other hand, led a bandit-like PK clan. One day, they all fought against Kashimiya and suffered a staggering defeat. They tried attacking him many times after that, and, well..." B3 fell silent and heaved a long, tired sigh, as if she just couldn't find the words for this. "Apparently, Rosa eventually fell in love with Kashimiya..."

"B3," I interjected. "Kashimiya is..."

"...about as old as his avatar."

"And Rosa is..."

"...about as old as her avatar."

That's a crime!

"And just so you're aware, most of the clan's members feel the same way as her."

It's a goddamn fan club! An actual hive of little boy enthusiasts!

"Anyway, Kashimiya eventually had to move out of Tenchi, and Rosa and her clan followed and asked him to become their leader."

"...And?"

"Kashimiya accepted in exchange for having the clan adopt a set of rules, which brings us to the present."

Oh, so Kashimiya was mad at Rosa for breaking those rules.

"This is partially my fault for being away for so long," Kashimiya continued. "I went on a short homestay in America, had to visit my grandmother in Hokkaido, and then had to do the homework that had piled up. I'm really sorry that focusing on that made me unable to visit the clan."

Hey, no one can fault you for that, I thought. Real life's important, too.

"But still, PKing beginners for money is a very bad thing to do. If you're defeated by The Lunar Society because you did it, you're only getting what you deserve."

"B-But darling, the offer was just too delicious to pass up..."

"No matter how tasty, there are some things you shouldn't eat! That's what it means to be a moral person!"

"I-I'm sorry!"

I was actually watching an elementary school boy scold a woman in her twenties and teach her about morality.

"Rosa is a... simple person who doesn't think things through and rarely considers the after-effects of her actions," commented B3. "Kashimiya, on the other hand, is a bit... no, a lot more developed as a person than his age would have you expect, so scenes like this aren't too uncommon."

Well, I could definitely see what she'd meant when she'd called Rosa "not the sharpest tool in the shed."

"Not only that, but..." Kashimiya said as he looked Louie, who was fearfully peeking out of the carriage. "You also involved a tian child in your grudge match."

He then placed his hand on his head, as if to lighten a headache, and heaved a long sigh.

For someone so young, he sure doesn't seem to have it easy.

"Th-That's 'cause Tomika didn't say anything about him..." Rosa argued.

"I'M SOOOO SORRYYYYY!" cried someone hiding a short distance away from us.

I looked and saw a girl Master — likely another K&R member — secretly observing what was happening here.

"Tomika! You little..."

"Please leave it for later," Kashimiya cut Rosa's words short. "More importantly, about the moment Mister Unbreakable told you about the tian child..."

"Twitch..." Rosa said.

"'I'll take him to Torne right after I'm done with you two'? That's not how it goes, is it? We have a rule against attacking Masters protecting tians, don't we?"

"Twitch, twitch!"

...Is she vocalizing that sound effect on purpose?

"Rosa, please apologize."

"I-I'm sorry, darling!"

"No. Not to me."

Rosa reluctantly turned towards us...

"S-Sawree." It was one of the most awkward apologies I'd ever heard.

Her poor delivery aside, no one had died in this encounter, so I was entirely willing to forgive her as long as she didn't try to attack us again.

However, B3 seemed to have other ideas.

"No, that doesn't seem sincere," she said.

"...B3?" I raised an eyebrow and turned to her.

She adjusted her glasses, reached into her inventory, took out some paper, and began writing something. "I am willing to forgive the attack itself with just that sloppy apology, but it doesn't make up for the actual damage done. We both lost our Lifesaving Brooches, and I had to sacrifice a number of shields."

"Ah."

She had a point there. Somebody had to pay for all the shields Rosa had broken, and there was no better person for that than Rosa herself.

"With that in mind, this is the Contract for our damages. Please send the set amount of money to my account before the deadline provided." Contracts were a type of item used for setting and enforcing contracts, and B3 gave it to Rosa to sign.

"Tch, all right, all right," the woman grumbled. "...Wait, what's with this amount?! It's clearly above the market price! Hell, it's almost double!"

"Oh? Is that too much for you?" asked B3. "Didn't you make a killing from the newbie hunt?"

"You're damn right it's too much! This isn't just more than my share from the newbie hunt! It's more than my entire savings!"

"...'My share?'" Kashimiya overheard, repeated Rosa's words and emanated another wave of bloodlust.

"Ah!" Rosa gasped, realizing her mistake. She closed her mouth with her hand.

I looked to B3, who was adjusting her glasses as if proud of a job well done.

You made her walk into that one, didn't you? I thought.

"Rosa, you said it was to expand our HQ, didn't you?" Kashimiya asked in a menacing manner. "Did you actually pocket some of the money?"

"Well, I... That's..."

"Please pay for their equipment, okay?"

"...Okay."

And thus, Rosa reluctantly signed the Contract. When she did so, I noticed that B3 lightly, yet triumphantly, pumped the hand she was hiding behind her back.

Then she came close to my ear and whispered, "I'll give you half of the extra money we get."

Well, then, I thought. For someone so gentle, B3 sure bargains hard.

Anyway, the contract was sealed, and we were set to receive both the damages and reparations.

And from what I was hearing, K&R also planned to pay compensation to the victims of their newbie hunt.

Rather than using Rosa's money or the clan's funds, Kashimiya would take managerial responsibility and pay them money from his own savings.

There was a thing or two to be said about having an elementary schooler pay for your failure, but Rosa seemed to be fully aware of this. She was on her knees and palms, looking thoroughly dejected.

"The beginner hunt didn't fit K&R's policy at all," said Kashimiya. "Hunting beginners before they can grow is definitely not good PK."

"'Good PK'? What?" I raised an eyebrow.

"That would be PK where you hunt people you told you would PK, and they accepted the challenge."

Well, that's certainly "good," but I'm not even sure if that counts as "PK" anymore.

"But even if you tell them, you only give ten minutes to escape, right?" I asked. "Unless you're close to the edges, that's not enough to leave the area."

"Rosa..." he said with an ice-cold tone thick with murderous intent. Apparently, he'd found some problem with what I said.

The likely culprit, Rosa, was still on her knees and palms, but she was now several meters away from us.

What an impressive backwards crawl. She truly was the Nobushi

Princess.

“The time we give depends on the size of the area, but it’s never less than an hour, right?” Kashimiya asked icily.

“W-Well... the hunt doesn’t go as well when we give that much time...” Rosa meekly argued.

“It’s supposed to be like that. The rule is there so we don’t hunt just anybody.”

So, while he was away, Rosa had gone and changed the rules he’d set. It seemed like a generic scenario about a malicious substitute leader misusing his power, but in this case, all of it was simply because Rosa wasn’t the smartest individual.

I could only hope she wasn’t so prone to messing up in real life.

“I’ll ask more about what happened over the last two months from the other members,” said Kashimiya. “While I do that, you’ll stand in the hallway with buckets in each hand.”

“EEHH?!” Rosa exclaimed.

That was a very... elementary school-like punishment to give, but it was made far worse by the fact that the receiver was a woman in her twenties.

“Why not just, you know... do away with her?” asked B3. I couldn’t tell whether she was suggesting he kill her or just kick her out of the clan.

“No, this is partially my own fault, so I won’t fire her,” he replied. “And if you mean giving her the death penalty... the problem with that is that she enjoys being cut...”

I see. I see. She enjoys it. All right, then.

“However, if there are many incidents like this one, I’m thinking of abandoning the leader’s seat and leaving the cla—”

“I’m sorry! I’m really sorry! I’ll never do stuff like this again! So please, don’t leave, darling!”

“NOOOOO! NOT THE CLAN! ANYTHING BUT THAT!”

Rosa and the hiding K&R Master both went into panic mode and implored him to reconsider.

Yep, this really is an idol fan club, I thought. I wonder if anyone reacted this way when Shu left show biz.

“That thought made me picture Brother Bear say ‘I’m going back to being a normal boy!’ before taking off his costume and revealing his muscles,” Nemesis said telepathically.

“PFFT!”

The comment made me burst out laughing, but thankfully, the K&R clan drama kept everyone from noticing.

Anyway, everything was settled, and we were about to resume heading to Torne. K&R made preparations to return to their HQ in the capital.

“Sorry for all the trouble today,” said Kashimiya. “I’ll make it up to you when I get the chance. Feel free to call me whenever you need me.”

“Oh. Okay,” I replied. “I guess I’ll hold you to that.”

In all honesty, I hadn’t the slightest idea of what I’d have him do.

“Then this is goodbye. Tomika, please ready the car.”

“Okay! Oboroguruma!” The other K&R member on the scene, who was apparently named Tomika, raised her left hand and made an armored vehicle-like object pop out of her crest.

From the name “Oboroguruma,” I could only assume that it was her Embryo, and that Kashimiya had ridden it all the way from the capital to here.

Tomika sat in the driver’s seat, while Kashimiya went to the back. Only Rosa was left.

“Unbreakable and B3... sorry about what I did today,” she said, giving another awkward apology while facing away from us.

“No need for that,” said B3. “I just want the reparations.”

“Gnh, all right, all right! I’ll send the money over to you before next week!”

Rosa spun around and walked towards Oboroguruma. Then, as though remembering something, she looked back and said her goodbyes.

“See ya later, B3! We were enemies today, but if you ever find the time, let’s go PKing again!”

The words she used were nothing to some, and a real bombshell to others.

As though thoroughly oblivious to what she’d just said, Rosa sat down in Oboroguruma with a carefree expression on her face.

Chapter Nine: To the Windy Village

Paladin, Ray Starling

After the folks from K&R left, we resumed our journey towards Torne.

The sun had already set, and Silver was now pulling the carriage over a dark road lit up by magic lights installed into the vehicle.

There was traffic here and there. Groups of Masters who'd survived the hunt and tians who hadn't been targeted to begin with were heading in the same direction as us.

Apparently, the party behind us had lost two of their people, and I couldn't help but feel a bit guilty about that.

But then again, the only ones at fault here were K&R, or just Rosa, to be specific.

The chaos had left Louie all drained, and he was now fast asleep inside the carriage. Hell, even if this whole thing hadn't happened, Louie was a child who'd woken up early in the morning to travel to the capital and back, so it was only natural for him to be exhausted.

Honestly, I was pretty tired, as well.

Well, I haven't gotten a proper breather on this side ever since the kidnapping, I reminded myself.

"I hope we get to Torne soon," Nemesis said aloud. She was sitting to my right on the coachman's seat. "We might finally get some rest there."

I couldn't help but agree with her.

"Though, I must say," she continued, switching to telepathy, "B3 is strangely silent."

I threw a glance over to B3, who was sitting to my left.

"..."

Continued silence. She hadn't said a single word ever since our exchange with K&R. It was probably because of Rosa's words as she left. Specifically, "Let's go PKing again."

I'd heard Kashimiya tell her off for saying that, but that didn't undo the very fact that she'd said it, effectively revealing two truths about B3.

First was the fact that B3 was acquainted with K&R, and that they weren't necessarily enemies, while the second was that B3, too, was a PKer.

The fact that she'd been hiding this could only mean that she hadn't wanted me to find out. Well, the curtain had fallen and now I knew. And as for what that made me think...

"...It bothers you, doesn't it?" B3 asked, suddenly breaking her long silence. "You're probably aware of this by now, but I'm a PKer. In fact, I'm about as infamous as K&R."

I listened, not saying a word.

"I haven't been active lately, but before I stopped, I gave the death penalty to at least a thousand players."

"That is quite awe-inspiring," Nemesis commented.

As a first-hand witness of B3's battle against K&R, I couldn't help but believe her. She was extremely adept at analyzing her opponents.

"I probably should've told you right at the start, but I chose to hide it because I thought you might avoid me," she admitted. "I didn't want to lose a new junior friend like that... Sorry."

B3 looked into my eyes and bowed her head repentantly.

It was clear as day that she was earnestly apologizing for keeping secrets from me, but honestly...

"Umm... I really don't think much of it, though," I said. The fact that she was a PKer didn't bother me in the slightest.

"...Eh?" She looked up with a confused look on her face.

"I wouldn't avoid you just because you're a PKer," I repeated myself. "Sure, I'd be pretty annoyed if you came at me like K&R did just now, but that's about it."

As long as someone didn't act like a certain bastard in a lab coat and go around doing acts of terror that endangered tians, I really didn't care if they were a PKer or not. Hell, a certain PKer hitman who was responsible for my only death penalty was now a member of my party. PKer or not — it barely mattered to me at this point.

B3 silently stared at me, as if to assess whether I was telling the truth or not, then sighed in relief before forming a faint smile. "I can't tell whether you're just excessively tolerant, softhearted... or just naïve."

"Ha ha," I chuckled. "Well, I can't really deny any of those. But even so, I feel that you're someone I can trust."

There were Masters who didn't hesitate to commit genocide upon tians. The King of Plagues that Marie had defeated, the King of Crimes that Shu had told me about, and Franklin — who I'd faced myself — were all among them.

However, I could easily tell that B3 was nothing like those three.

My strongest argument for this was the fact that she'd sacrificed her shields to protect Louie from Rosa, but even if I hadn't seen that, I already knew that she was kind and considerate at heart.

"Hell, I wouldn't have cared about you being a PKer even if you'd revealed it to me right at the start," I continued. "Like when we were talking at the college café."

"...No," B3 said as she looked away from me. "I definitely couldn't have told you then."

"Why not?"

"...If I'd told you that I was the infamous PKer X, you would have researched me on the Internet before going online, right?"

"No, I wouldn't ha— Well, maybe?" I couldn't entirely rule out the possibility.

"That would have been... well... embarrassing."

"Hm? Embarrassing? How?"

"When I'm PKing, I become an entirely different person... and it's definitely not someone I'd like my real life acquaintances to see..." Her cheeks turned rosy, and she covered them with her hands.

The gap between her current expression and her usual, calm and collected self made her seem a bit... cute.

"Ah! I just felt a violent, inexplicable surge of danger!" Nemesis exclaimed.

Nemesis? What's wrong? I asked.

"Oh, uh... but B3," she said, ignoring my question. "You didn't seem to change all that much in our battle against K&R. That was PKing, wasn't it?"

"Back then... I wasn't turned on in that way."

"'Turned on'?" Our voices as one, Nemesis and I repeated the term.

Did she have some sort of switch at the back of her head or something? Did it make her turn into a PKer when on? Was it like a literal "kill-switch?" I considered asking more about this...

“Hh... Nnh, hm...?”

...but that was when I heard sounds coming from the carriage. Louie had woken up.

“You’re awake?” I asked. “We should be there soon.”

“Yeah,” he replied. “I can hear it.”

“‘Hear?’” I strained my ears and opened my mind. Upon doing so, I could hear lots of faint sounds coming from the other side of the hill before us.

Before long, Silver went up and brought us high enough to see beyond it.

“It’s beautiful,” said Nemesis, clearly overwhelmed by the sight.

The road to Torne now had guardrail-like fences on its sides, and both of them had been turned into an attraction.

The tops of the fences were decorated by countless pinwheel toys, spinning in the nightly wind. The paint on those toys had to contain something, because they were emitting a faint, yet vivid, shine. Brightening the dark like guiding lights, they spun and turned as though inviting us over to the village.

The sight was truly wondrous, and it made me understand why this festival attracted so many people.

“It starts tomorrow, but they already put up the windstars,” said Louie.

“‘Windstars’?” I raised an eyebrow. Not pinwheels, not windmills, but “windstars?”

Upon closer inspection, I noticed they all had a total of five blades, and when looking from the front, they did indeed have the likeness of a generic star symbol.

“They’re based on an old story from here,” Louie explained. “Long ago, a star that fell from the sky when the wind was very strong sealed the evil monster ‘Blacksky’ deep in the earth.”

Was that the local belief or something?

Thinking of “beliefs” made my mind trail off towards the aberration, but I couldn’t let myself forget that there were faiths other than hers.

“Ah! You can’t take the windstars off the fences!” Louie shouted, and I instantly turned to see Nemesis frozen solid while reaching towards the fence on her side.

“...Nemesis,” I said.

"I-I just... I watched them spin, and I just couldn't help it..."

What are you, a cat? What kind of reason is that?

"If you want a windstar, you can have this one," said Louie as he reached into his inventory, took out a windstar, and handed it over to Nemesis.

"Are you sure?" she asked.

"Yeah! I brought it with me for good luck, but we have more back at the village!"

"I see... Thank you." Nemesis held the windstar in hand, looking at it with a gleeful smile on her face.

"This is the first time I've seen you make an expression that fits your appearance," I said. "If I don't count the times when you eat sweets, anyway."

"Mrgh! How rude! I'm a lady, so I have to use my indulgent expressions sparingly!"

Is that really a lady-like thing? I pondered. It sounds warrior-like, to be honest. And hey, you already sound like a warrior sometimes... Oh, well.

Anyway, despite the minor hindrance along the way, we'd made it to the outskirts of Torne.

We'd take Louie home, and then, come tomorrow, we'd start our search for information which could lead us to Shijima's real-life self.

That would be the real start of this quest.

◇◇◇

K&R's Headquarters

In the leader's room deep inside K&R's HQ, Kashimiya sat on a floor cushion while examining a pile of documents held together by a string.

It had been created by a member using skills from the shoshi job grouping — a set of scrivener-like jobs from Tenchi. That gave it the format of an old Japanese picture book.

Kashimiya flipped through the pages until one part of it made him furrow his brow.

"What're you reading, darling?" asked Rosa, standing at his side with water buckets in both her hands and on her head.

True to his word, Kashimiya had given her the punishment he'd said he would. The bucket on her head was an extra, added because Rosa had revealed that B3 was a PKer.

At first, Rosa had been taking her punishment in the hallway, but since she always cheated without him around, Kashimiya had made her do it in his room. Then again, Rosa could've intended this.

"This is the report for today's pseudo-hunt," Kashimiya answered.

"Ghuh," she flinched.

Indeed, Kashimiya was reading the report describing Rosa's hunt, which had been sparked by a misunderstanding and fueled by a personal grudge.

Besides the Masters who participated in the hunts, K&R also had members who recorded the situation and presented reports to Kashimiya and Rosa.

Kashimiya had to pay reparations to the newbies and process two months worth of information, but he first wanted to take care of the most immediate problem.

"Look, I'm sorry, okay?" Rosa said meekly. "Can you let it go?"

"This time, we lost a few group fighters and an entire set of squad fighters," Kashimiya said, completely ignoring her words.

"...What?"

The death penalties among the group fighters had obviously been caused by B3's Flying Shield. The group fighters were full of low-level members, so it wasn't strange for them to have been utterly crushed by someone in B3's tier, but the same couldn't be said about the squad fighters. They were parties of level 500 high-ranks, meaning that they could easily stand their ground against other parties of such caliber and likely defeat them, as well.

Though this had been primarily a personal assault on Ray and B3, it had also been a K&R hunt, so, while the group fighters and Rosa had focused on the two, the four sets of squad fighters had been hunting as normal.

The fact that one of them had been completely annihilated before Kashimiya had told them to withdraw — within only a few minutes after the hunt began — was somewhat strange.

"The search didn't show any Superior Jobs, though," said Rosa.

Circle of Detect Life was a skill that checked levels, so they would've instantly known if there had been anyone above level 500. With the exception of Rosa, the highest level in that hunting ground had been 500.

"Yes, the report says the same thing." Kashimiya nodded.

“Then...”

“Apparently, they were outnumbered. Not every battle’s outcome is decided by the power of one, after all.”

Rose was speechless. Are you sure you, of all people, can say that, darling?

Kashimiya was the very embodiment of the power of one he’d just mentioned. He was literally a match for a thousand. Unleash a regiment on him, and all their heads would fall.

“Anyway, the enemies were acting strange,” he said as he examined the document again. The fighters who’d been wiped out had attacked a party with particularly high levels among those caught in the search.

At first, both parties had been equal and it had seemed like either side’s game, but then, about a minute after the battle had begun, a few nearby parties had gathered at the location. They had all begun cooperating flawlessly, and the K&R squad fighter set had been quickly destroyed. According to the report, they’d killed two of the enemies before the last of them fell.

“They got there too fast, and they cooperated too well for it to be improvised,” said Kashimiya. “This can only mean that...”

“...a single group split into parties and moved separately for some reason, right?” asked Rosa.

“Yes. I think so,” he said, approving of her theory.

Though Rosa was a tactless, dumb dog with no forethought to speak of, her extensive experience as a leader of PK groups made her more knowledgeable on some fronts than Kashimiya.

Battle tactics was one of those fronts, and because of this, Kashimiya and Rosa had clean-cut roles in the clan — him as the general manager, and her as the hunt strategist.

In fact, the clan’s group fighters had been her idea. She’d figured that the inexperienced members would be most effective when they banded up and unleashed focused waves of long-range attacks. She definitely deserved credit for that strategy.

“Isn’t that strange, though?” asked Kashimiya. “If they’re heading to Torne at this time, they must be Windstar Festival tourists, right? It would be normal for them to go all together, so why did they split up?”

“I don’t think they’re tourists,” Rosa said. “They’re fellow PKers.”

“How can you tell?”

“They’re using the same plays as I did back in Tenchi and B3 did before her clan split up. A load of people in one group really stands out, and it’s easy to tell when they’re about to do something, so you split up into parties, surround your prey, and take care of them before they can even realize what happened.”

Rosa then laughed, adding, “This move is sometimes used when hunting actual animals.”

Her laugh made her lose her balance, causing the bucket on her head to flip and spill its contents all over her.

“Ugh, I’m all wet now...” she complained. “Anyway, they were probably following some target of theirs. We got anything else on them, darling?”

“The party they first attacked had a person with this mark on them,” he said, showing it to her.

It was a symbol best described as a red circle and black circle stacked together, and from certain perspectives, it appeared to represent a solar eclipse.

Rosa was familiar with that mark. “It’s Sol Crisis,” she said.

“‘Sol Crisis’?”

“Oh yeah, you don’t know about them. It’s a PK clan that blew up after the newbie hunt we did. They’re basically trying to fill the hole left by Mad Castle and GS, and their playstyle is closer to GS’s.”

Basically, this meant that one of K&R’s squads had lost against a rising PK group. Rosa wanted to go on a revenge match against them, but she wasn’t certain what Kashimiya would say to that. PKers were probably fair game to him, but the recent events might be too fresh in his mind for him to allow it.

“I see,” the boy sighed with a somewhat gloomy expression on his face. “Things sure have changed over the last two months...”

It had been a turbulent time, indeed. Full of various happenings, twists, shifts, and turns. The fact that he hadn’t been able to participate in any of it had made Kashimiya feel a bit lonely, as if everyone had moved on without him while he was offline.

His gloomy expression had a strong effect on Rosa, but she was somehow able to hide it.

“B-By the way,” she said, changing the subject to help her calm down.

“There’s a weird rumor about Sol Crisis!”

“Oh?”

“They say there’s one PKer among them that stands out... though it’s more about the gear he wears than the actual person.”

“What gear?”

“It’s a set of armor, used by a certain PKer...” she said before momentarily falling silent and picturing a certain person. “People say they saw someone in Sol Crisis wear Barbaroy Bad Burn’s Legendary full armor MVP reward, Gunhammer Plate, Magnum Colossus.”

Conjunction Episode: The News

Torne Village, Paladin, Ray Starling

We passed the windstar-decorated road and arrived at Torne.

Being a village, it was obviously a far smaller place than Altea or Gideon. There were only about 400 or so houses spread out over a wide area, and the few windmills standing tall here and there made me feel like I was inside a painting of the 15-16th century Netherlands.

Torne and its surroundings looked crowded and lively, most likely due to tomorrow's Windstar Festival. I could even see some people setting up tents to sleep in. They probably hadn't been able to get a place at any local inn.

"I don't think we'll be any luckier in that regard," I muttered.

"We can sleep in the carriage," said B3. "Its interior space expansion makes it a bit like a camping car."

Well, then. All that was left for us was to take Louie to his mom and call it a day.

...Alas, that wasn't as simple as it seemed.

"Louie, are you crazy?! You're not supposed to do that!" Farica scolded Louie as he cried, sobbing loudly.

A child, all by himself, had taken a stagecoach to the capital, passing the monster-filled Fadl Mountain Pass in the process.

It was fair to scold him for that. In fact, a scolding simply had to happen.

"Just how sad do you think I and your dads would be if something happened to you?" she demanded.

Dads. Plural. She was obviously referring to both the MIA Shijima and Louie's late biological father.

With both of them gone, Farica was looking after Louie all by her lonesome, and I could barely even imagine the anxiety this incident had given her.

However, I knew enough to conclude that she'd been overdoing it.

Apparently, she'd been waiting for Louie in front of their home ever since she'd found out he'd left for the capital.

Farica had spoken to the merchants she was acquainted with and many other people who were heading for the capital, and after figuring there was nothing more she could do, she had carried a chair over to the front of the house and just sat there until we arrived.

An environment with jobs and stats might make tians stronger than the average real-life person, but that still seemed like a bit much to a woman in the later stages of pregnancy. I could understand being worried about her son, but she shouldn't compromise her health for that.

"B-But I wanted to find Dad...!" Louie cried.

"You know what he's like," said Farica. "How many times do I have to tell you that you don't have to worry about him?"

"But we have to find him! When he found out about the baby, he was so happy he cried! Don't you remember?"

"Louie..."

"He wants to see the baby! I'm sure of it!" Though his words came through tears — or perhaps because of that — his words were full of certainty.

Farica looked like she wanted to say something, but instead, she just gently wiped his tears and embraced him.

I stood silent. This was a talk between mother and child, and it felt like we didn't belong here at all.

I considered leaving and letting them have their moment, but since she had been waiting outside, I couldn't find the right time to do it.

Well, we also had a few things to ask her, so it might be best to wait it out.

"Anyway, Louie... Who are these people?" Farica asked finally.

"These are the Masters who said they would search for Dad!" he replied. "Mister Ray, Miss B, and Nemesis!"

"And why don't I get a 'Miss,' if I may ask?" Nemesis grumbled.

Because you don't look that much older than him.

"Nemesis... are you a Maiden?" Farica asked.

"Indeed I am."

"I see. Just like Juno..." Farica suddenly became pensive.

Well, Ichiro Shijima, her missing husband, was a Maiden's Master, so seeing another Maiden might very well mean something to her.

"They're here to talk to you about Dad to help them search for him," Louie added.

"Search for him...? But..." Farica said and momentarily fell silent. "Very well."

"Excuse me," B3 broke her silence and joined the exchange. "May I have a moment?"

"Yes?"

"We're here to gather information that could help us search for Ichiro Shijima in real li— I mean, 'on the other side.' To that end, we wanted to question you about him and examine any items he's left behind, but..." She paused and adjusted her glasses. "I believe it's best to leave it for tomorrow. You seem quite tired today, and we wouldn't like to stress you or your baby any further."

I couldn't agree more. It was already late, anyway, so all that business was best postponed to when Farica was in a better state.

"Thank you," she said. "I appreciate... that... phew..."

While talking, Farica lost her posture and almost collapsed, but I ran up and kept her steady. The wait for Louie must've been more burdening than I'd thought. She seemed extremely tired and looked somewhat anemic.

B3 took Farica and, led by Louie, carried her over to her room and had her lie down. I wasn't involved in this because we decided that a stranger like me had no place in a woman's room. Instead, I took care of the chair out front and checked my inventory for any items that could help Farica feel better.

Since I had a tendency to get all sorts of debuffs on me, and because I had quite a fat wallet, I was now loaded with debuff-removing items. I even had a dozen Elixirs, which had a market price of 100,000 lir each.

Well, actually, half of them had come from my daily gacha rolls, but hey, they were a better hit than a Permit.

"Can a pregnant woman really drink items meant for combat use?" asked Nemesis.

"...Oh. I don't really know."

Though this world's medicines came with descriptions of their effects, they never had warnings or anything like that. I'd yet to see any potion say things like "Ages X and up" or "Not for use by pregnant women."

"I guess I'll just give her some food, instead," I said. "I'll go ask if I can use the kitchen."

I already had some ingredients on me, so that wouldn't be a problem. Most of those had also come from the gacha, and though they were cheaper than the money I'd thrown in, at least they were useful.

Farica didn't feel too good about us doing any more for her than we already had, but Louie approved of me using the kitchen, so that was exactly what I did.

The kitchen here had an oven, a gas burner, and lots of other expensive-looking cooking equipment, all of which had probably been provided for them by Shijima. It didn't seem like I'd have much trouble making food in here.

I concluded that Farica needed something light, and decided to make some minestrone soup.

Might as well make something for Louie and ourselves, while I'm at it, I thought as I heard someone enter the kitchen. Upon turning around, I saw B3.

"I'll help," she said, already wearing an apron. She looked pretty good in that.

From how confident she seemed, I was guessing she knew her way around the kitchen. B3 might be unexpectedly good at homemaking.

"Ngh! I just felt another inexplicable surge of danger..." said Nemesis. "Oh! Ray, let me hel—"

"Not happening. You'll eat most of it all during tasting," I rejected her. "Don't think I've forgotten how you ate half of the cookie dough when we were baking with Riser and Bishmal."

"Nhogh... You don't trust me at all when it comes to food."

I have every reason not to.

"Ray," B3 spoke up. "I'm more curious about how you ended up baking cookies with those two."

"Well, this and that happened and it led to that."

Basically, we had all been helping out at a certain arena charity event. One thing that had really surprised me back then was the fact that Bishmal's cookies had been baked to perfection. In all honesty, as rude as that was, I'd expected him to completely burn his.

"Hmm... Well, I have some store-bought bread on me," I said. "Guess I'll make some minestrone soup and green salad."

"Then I'll make some Hamburg steaks with cheese," said B3. "I'm quite good at those."

We quickly started cooking, and in about an hour, we had a full course of standard Western food. Neither I nor B3 had the jobs for it, but Cooking was a sense skill, meaning that we could cook as well as we did in real life.

But then, I couldn't neglect to mention that there were people like Marie, who couldn't cook even if they had the Cooking skill.

"First you bring my son back, and now you make food for us," said Farica, seemingly humbled. "I don't know what to say..."

"Don't worry about that," replied B3. "We did this because we wanted to."

"It looks so good!" Louie said with a mix of excitement and surprise in his tone.

By the way, since it had me curious, I'd asked about the medicine, and apparently, there was a type of magic medicine which didn't give any side effects to pregnant women, which seemed really convenient.

"Wow! You're Masters, but you can cook!" Louie enthused.

...What does that have to do with anything?

"Could Shijima cook?" I asked.

"Not at all. He said that he'd never done it on the other side, either."

"...Hmm."

Could that work as a hint leading to his true identity?

Well, that and other similar questions were best postponed for tomorrow.

We all said our thanks for the food and began eating.

Likely due to Shijima's influence, this family expressed thanks before their meals in the Japanese way. That, combined with the fact that they were using chopsticks, made it safe to be completely sure that Shijima was Japanese.

Anyway, as for the taste of the results of our labor... the minestrone I'd made wasn't bad at all. Shu could probably make a way better one, but my work right here fully deserved a passing mark.

B3's Hamburg steak, however, was really good. If you just made it two times better, you'd have something that could rival Shu's cooking.

...Man, that brother of mine can do everything except art.

"Nh?" I noticed something.

Nemesis, sitting at my side, wasn’t eating all that much. Was she holding back because we didn’t have a lot of food today?

“Nemesis, you’re not eating. What’s wrong?” I asked, not holding it in.

In response, she lightly hung her head and said, “I’m not hungry.”

A moment later, my spoon fell out of my hand.

"This can't be real..."

Nemesis? This Nemesis? Not hungry?! In what world could this happen?! Was this the portent of some cataclysm?!

"It vexes me that you're more surprised by this than by Marie's or B3's identities," she said.

"Well... You know..."

You're Nemesis.

"I have no idea what you mean by that. And for your information, it's not just lack of appetite. My body feels heavy, and I'm being attacked by drowsiness..."

"Are you sick? Do you have a fever?" I asked as I pushed my forehead against hers, which didn't seem all that hot at first. Hmm, I'd say it's standard... Perhaps even a bit below the average?

"Ah! R-Ray...?!"

Oh, wait, it's a bit hot. You have a cold, don't you?

"Embryos don't get colds, you fool!" she shouted. "Anyway, my face feels warm, so I'll just go to sleep! You take responsibility and eat my food!" Having said that, Nemesis returned to the crest.

Embryos don't get colds? But I'm quite sure I've heard of Guardians catching Epidemics, I thought. We have a pregnant lady here, so we can't be too careful.

B3 was staring at me, not saying a word.

Was something wrong?

"Have you ever been called a 'natural womanizer'?" she asked.

"No," I replied. "Though, in high school, I've been called an 'all-nizer.'"

And I still had no idea why. By what design could anyone ever call a person an "all-nizer"? What did that even mean?

"Is it because he 'womanizes' all? Indiscriminately?" B3 muttered something I couldn't hear or understand.

Anyway, I began digging through my two portions of dinner.

Once I was done with that, we washed the tableware and excused ourselves from Farica's home.

She'd offered to let us stay, but we didn't want to bother her more than necessary and decided to sleep in the carriage, like we'd originally planned. However, we did ask to park it on their grounds, and she gladly agreed.

Speaking of which, for a family with such a modest house, they had a strangely large amount of land. I'd asked why, and apparently, Shijima had prepared it for his Aries Leo mount, Gringham. From what Louie told me, Gringham was a lion as large as an elephant, so having this amount of land made perfect sense.

Anyway, with Farica's permission and more than enough space to park, we settled the carriage and prepared to call it a day.

Of course, we had the option of logging out and taking naps, but that came with the risk of oversleeping. Also, for some reason, sleeping in Dendro made me feel as though I'd gotten more sleep. It probably had something to do with the fact that three hours in real life were nine hours here.

Mind you, if you slept here and logged out, you could still be greeted by a feeling of drowsiness, making you aware that all the rest you'd gotten here was just an illusion. Strange how that real-life feeling wasn't there as long as you were online.

All that aside, this carriage we would be staying in had an actual shower room.

There was a knob on a door, placed where nothing could possibly be behind it. But when you opened it, there was — oh me, oh my — a fully-functional shower room.

Space expansion was impressive, albeit trippy, stuff. Just what would happen to all this if the carriage broke?

I took a quick shower and prepared to go to bed.

Honestly, instead of showering, I could have simply logged out and logged in again, as that would have made all the dirt on me vanish — or, rather, fall off my disappearing body. However, over this past month, I'd realized that it felt better to sleep after cleansing your body in warm water. I'd bathed in real life before I'd met up with B3, so there was no problem in that regard, either.

As for where we would sleep, well... toppling... no, flipping the seats upside down caused beds to appear.

This carriage couldn't surprise me anymore.

Hell, despite having the appearance of a slightly luxurious carriage, it had more space inside than a large camping car. That, too, was the mysterious space expansion.

“How much did this thing cost, anyway?” I asked.

“Who knows?” B3 shrugged.

...Excuse me?

“It was a random drop from our PKing,” she continued. “Apparently, it’s a prototype of a new magic carriage model created by a Legendarian fairy workshop. I don’t even know how it ended up in the hands of the person my clan PK’d.”

“...”

“I was curious myself, and after a bit of research, I found out that the market price for models from the previous generation of such carriages is 100,000,000 lir.”

“...”

That would destroy my bank account. Were we inside the Dendro equivalent of a Benz Roadster? Or was this more like one of those pure gold Lamborghinis bought with Arabian oil money? No, this was probably more expensive.

“One of my clan members said it costs about as much as a tank,” B3 added.

“Ohh...” Well, that did seem like a better comparison.

Whatever the case, the carriage was a stupidly great luxury, and I had to help make sure it didn’t get damaged.

Today’s incident was a close call, I thought.

“I’ll turn off the lights, then,” said B3. “Good night, Ray.”

“You too,” I replied. “Good night.”

Thus we fell asleep.

The hectic day had left me completely drained, and I slept soundly, with no dreams to disturb me.

◇

The next day, I opened my eyes to see Nemesis staring directly at me.

“Morning, Nemesis,” I greeted her.

“You too, Ray,” she replied. “Anyway, I’ll get right to the point.”

She raised both her index fingers.

“I have good news and bad... or more like ‘mildly troubling’ news. Which do you want to hear first?”

“...Well, this is sudden.”

Good news and bad news, eh? Well, the bad news probably had to be dealt with first, but I didn’t want to start the day like that.

“Good news first, please,” I said.

“Very well,” Nemesis replied as she raised two more fingers on her right hand, for a total of three raised fingers.

Then she made the revelation.

“I’ve evolved to my third form.”

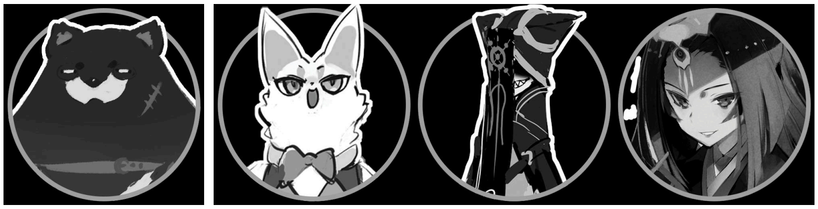
“…What?”

To be continued...

Afterword



Cat: “Hello, I’m Cheshire and I didn’t get any scenes again.”

Bear: “I’m Shu, and I used my old skills to show off my beary beautiful voice. Anyway...”

Cat, Bear: “It didn’t come out at the end of the year! Sorry!”

Cat: “As you’re surely aware by now, this volume came out on February 1st (in Japan).”

Bear: “And that means that the previous volume’s announcement for this volume is now nothing but a lie. Appawling.”

Fox: “Seriously. That was my first announcement, and now it’s all ruined.”

Bear: “...And so the fox appears!”

Fox: “You make it sound like I’m a ghost or some other monster.”

Bear: “You might as well be.”

Fox: “How harsh. Oh, I’m sure you already know me from this volume, but I’m the Fox, Tsukuyo Fuso. I hope we get along.”

Cat: “‘The Normality-Consuming Nightmare, Tsukuyo Fuso.’”

Bear: “‘The Crawling Cultist of Chaos, Tsukuyo Fuso.’”

Fox: “You’re both so hard on me. You treat me like I’m some sort of yokai or eldritch creature.”

Bear: “You deserve that beary much.”

Fox: “How mean. You shouldn’t mistreat me just because I’m a yokai in real life.”

Cat, Bear: “You are?!”

Fox: “I’m joking. Why did you believe me?”

Bear: (Because it seems likely.)

Cat: “Anyway, back on track. Here’s the usual comment from the author.”

Thank you for the purchase, dear readers. I’m the author, Sakon Kaido.

Time flew by, and we are now at the 6th volume of Dendro.

After the release of the 5th, we were blessed with the pleasant news that Infinite Dendrogram had received 3rd place in Takarajimasha’s Kono Light Novel ga Sugoi! 2018 Bunko rankings, and 2nd in their new entries rankings.

This couldn’t have happened without the support from you — the readers. And you’re also the reason why volume 6 could be released and introduce you to the story’s second part.

It involves new characters, such as Tsukuyo Fuso, the kingdom’s final Superior; B3, the upperclassman Ray can rely on both in-game and out; and many others. Please look forward to the old and new cast’s new adventures in Infinite Dendrogram, and enjoy them for all they’re worth!

With that in mind, volume 7 will cover everything until the end of this quest, revealing things such as the whereabouts of Louie’s dad, what happens during Windstar Festival, and the nature of Nemesis’s third form.

The wind-clad, star-spangled volume 7. Little will give me more joy than your excitement for its release!

Bear: “Is it just me, or is the aufur a bit more hyped than usual?”

Cat: “He’s probably happy that his work reached volume 6.”

Fox: “Probably. And while you’re distracted by him, I’ll just announce another new thing!”

Cat: “?!”

Fox: “If all went well, volume 2 of the manga adaptation of Infinite Dendrogram should already be out! According to the author: ‘It’s so good! It’s much like reading Kami Imai’s own manga!’ More importantly, it’s the volume where I make my debut and show off my powers! Oh, and Rosa — who didn’t get an illustration in this book — also makes an appearance! And to top it all off, the end of the volume has an extra short story written by the author! It’s a real must-buy for any fan! OH, AND VOLUME 7 OF THE LIGHT NOVEL IS SET TO COME OUT IN JUNE 2018! (In Japan!)”

Cat: “Aggressive direct marketing! Is this the fabled Kansai entrepreneurship?! ...Wait, you even took the volume 7 announcement!"

Bear: "From the volume's beginning to the end, the unbearable fox was with us all the way through."

Fox: "I might've been defeated by Figaro in Dendro and by B in real life... BUT I STILL HAVE MY LATENT POTENTIAL!"

Cat: "Potential for what?! You just stole my announcement for the second time in a row! And stop speaking in caps lock!"

Bear: "...Give up, Cheshire. I can't bear to say this, but you probably won't be getting a chance to do an announcement until you show up in the main story."

Cat: "BNYAAGH!"

Fox: "Anyway, darlings, see you in volume 7."

Xun: "...I'm misSing out on a lOT of stuff, arEn't I?"

Bonus Short Stories

KoD-Approved Popcorn — The Ultimate Snack

Paladin, Ray Starling

On a Dendro day much like any other, Shu called me over to help him with something.

That big brother of mine was a man who could take care of just about anything by himself, so having him rely on me was definitely unusual.

Nemesis and I made for the location he'd given me. It led us to a place that seemed like a restaurant that had gone out of business. Obviously, it wasn't open, and it might not have been for a while.

"Is this truly the place?" asked Nemesis.

"Well, it's where Shu told us to come. He also told us to use the back entrance."

We walked around the building, found an unlocked door, and took the liberty of letting ourselves in.

It led us straight into the kitchen, where we found a person in a bear suit.

"...One milligram too much, eh?" he muttered. "No, wait, it's half of that."

My brother, the one and only, was using a scale to measure the weight of a shady-looking, white, powdered substance placed on specialized medicine paper.

"..." We watched him, not saying a word.

I'm afraid to ask what he's doing, I thought nervously.

"Oh, you're here. Beary good. Gimme a sec. I'm at an important part of mixing."

Mixing... what, exactly?

"I'll cut to the chase and just ask..." I said. "What are you doing?"

"Mixing some flavoring. Can't ya tell?"

Ah, so it's just flavoring, I thought in relief. He should've said so from the start. For a second there, I thought he was making something he shouldn't be.

"Just one lick of this one makes you lose your bearings. It blows your consciousness off to a whole new world of euphoria and—"

"You're not helping your case here!"

Am I behind the times?! Is "flavoring" the slang for some new illegal drug or something?!

"Recently, this and that happened and I ended up buying a whole lot of corn," Shu said. "So I decided to use that to begin a popcorn cart."

"Nothing you start can surprise me anymore, to be honest," I sighed. "And this flavoring is for the popcorn?"

"In this fantasy world, the bear minimum of salt and caramel ain't enough to have a chance against the other carts and stalls. If I wanna rise above the competition, I've gotta develop my own original flavor."

"And what, exactly, is our part in this, Brother Bear?" asked Nemesis.

"Popcorn quality check. It's hard fur me alone to tell the right measurements, you see."

Ah, so he's, once again, dense to the limits. If his description of the flavoring is anything to go by, then...

"So you merely need us to be your taste testers?" she asked. "I am fully willing."

"...Nemesis, this is Shu's cooking we're talking about."

"I know. You've already told me just how much of a master cook he is. However, this isn't some gourmet dish — it's mere popcorn. Surely it won't be anything ridiculous."

"Glad to hear it. Fur real," said Shu as he presented her with popcorn sprinkled with his flavoring. "Here's the prototype."

"Thank you," she said as she took a piece, put it in her mouth, and...

"HwAh?! HaUghaH! WaaAahHh...! Kfgh."

...released some of the strangest sounds I'd ever heard before passing out.

"...Bro, this is a no-no," I said.

"Yeah," he sighed. "It's still too good."

Shu's cooking was so delicious that it defied all reason, and the quality could even be felt through a single piece of popcorn.

The taste was so good that it flared up the local nerves and caused them to send out ridiculous amounts of signals. Unable to handle all the information coming in, the brain opted to shut off the consciousness, like a circuit breaker interrupting excessive current. Sometimes people passed out due to great pain, and this phenomenon was basically the opposite of that.

Needless to say, to be viable on the market, this popcorn would have to taste significantly worse than it did now. Otherwise, the streets of Gideon would be the picture of a very weird kind of hell, with unconscious people spread out all across the pavement.

"I can't taste test it myself 'cause I can bear it just fine, ya know?" Shu said, and I knew full well what he was implying.

I looked at Nemesis, who was on the floor, still twitching from the popcorn's effect. "Make it at least five tiers worse than what she had, and I'll test it for you."

But alas, the popcorn he brought me ten minutes later was still too good, and I, too, ended up losing consciousness and crashing right next to Nemesis.

Eventually, Shu created flavoring that was safe for consumption by normal people, and his "KoD-Approved Popcorn" became the talk of Gideon... but that was a story for another time.

KoD-Approved Popcorn — The Commercial Jingle

Duel City, Gideon

It was a standard day in Gideon.

In a certain area of the city, there was a restaurant that had gone out of business. From it, you could hear the methodical sound of nails being hammered into wood.

The one handling the tool was the current tenant of the building. Clad in a bear suit, he was none other than the King of Destruction, Shu Starling.

Contrary to what his rough-sounding job name and ludicrous STR would have you expect, he was working the wood with a relatively soft touch. Neither hammering nor planing posed any problems for him.

He was holding a few unused nails in his mouth. It was an action characteristic of skilled carpenters, but sadly, his attire completely voided the impression, making him look less like an artisan and more like a guy in a suit with nails poking into it.

Shu was in the middle of building a cart for his popcorn business.

Many would argue that he could've simply bought one, but he probably had some fixations and preferences which had compelled him to make it by himself.

"Beaar beaar bear-beaar beaaar..." he sang as he worked. "Bear's popcorn, beary good, yum. The beaary beest."

However, it was questionable whether the arrangement of sounds escaping his mouth was truly a "song." The vocals were there, sure, and — in contrast to the impression given off by his costume — they were absolutely beautiful. But alas, that was the extent of it. The phenomenal singing voice was wasted on lyrics and melody which were beyond bad.

"...No, it's unbearable," he lamented and despaired. "That jingle ain't an option."

Though Shu was no doubt a weirdo, even he could tell that he'd created a horrid song.

"This always happens whenever I try my paw at making an original..."

He processed blueprints with excellent proficiency and could build whatever was pictured without a flaw to name. The cart he was making was a prime example.

He was also a genius when it came to stimulating taste buds. The meals he made were "stunning" in more ways than one.

Talented as he was, however, Shu couldn't do art to save his life.

Anything he made with the intention of enchanting the eye or the ear always came out bizarre, like something humanity was too young to understand. (Then again, the exact same could be said for his hyper-delicious cooking.)

"I could probably make it work if I just had a bearable melody..." he sighed. "Shame I couldn't find those musicians anywhere."

People were saying that someone had been playing wonderful music during the events of Franklin's Game. Shu had wanted to ask them for help with his jingle, but sadly, he'd had no luck finding them.

"Hmm, should I just go to someone at the musician's guild? But as far as I know, the one at Gideon is pretty small..."

Turning pensive, he muttered and pondered as to what he should do next.

"Hey-ya, Shu," said a voice behind him. "What's with the nails in your suit? And what’re you mumbling about?”

He turned around to see a woman he knew very well. It was Lei-Lei — a fellow Superior of the kingdom and someone he was acquainted with in reality.

“I knocked, but you weren’t responding.”

“Beary sorry about that,” Shu replied as he realized that he wasn’t even working on the cart anymore. The jingle matter seemed to have been troubling him more than he’d thought.

“Something on your mind?” she asked.

“Well...”

He went ahead and unreservedly told her of his problem.

“Then I’ll make the song for you!” Lei-Lei responded excitedly.

“Whoa, seriously? You’re a lifesafur!”

She was a musician in real life. Composing ear-catching melodies was her element.

“You’ll pay for it in royalties. 8% from all your popcorn sales.”

“...Oh, you’re charging for it.”

Costs aside, Shu’d decided to give this job to Lei-Lei, resulting in the creation of the commercial jingle for his KoD-Approved Popcorn.

◆

After it reached the ears of the public, the jingle became known in Gideon for its strange mix of bizarrely good vocals, wonderful melody, and weird lyrics.

“The bear’s popcorn! Oh gosh, oh boy!
Eating them is so much joy!
Let your taste buds be destroyed!”

Xunyu’s Drawings

Paladin, Ray Starling

Nemesis and I were paying a visit to the knight offices in Gideon. As we passed by the waiting room, we noticed someone with a familiar appearance, but an unfamiliar height.

“Is that Xunyu I see?” asked Nemesis.

Blue daoshi clothing, a hat with a Fu covering the face... There was no mistaking it — that was indeed Xunyu. Our first meeting before the Clash of the Superiors hadn't been pleasant, but we'd put it behind us and gone on to become friendly enough to occasionally spar in the arenas.

"She's... kinda different, though," I replied.

Today, Xunyu was exceedingly small. She would normally look down on us from a height of over four meters, but now, she barely came up to my chest.

This was because she'd removed her Superior Embryo, Tenaga Ashinaga, and thus was reduced to the size of her avatar. She hadn't neglected to take off her long sleeves, either.

So, if you ignored the weird hat, the voice-changing Fu, loose trouser cuffs, blue skin, and sharp teeth, Xunyu looked like a normal girl.

"...No, she's still a far cry from 'normal,'" I muttered.

"HuHh? Well, if it aiN't Ray," she said, noticing our presence.

She held a writing brush in her hand and used it to draw something on a piece of paper on the waiting room's table.

Her low height made her seem like a little girl drawing pictures to pass the time, but I could never say that out loud. If I did, she'd probably tear my heart out again the next time we sparred.

"Morning, Xunyu. What are you doing?"

"Nh? Oh, uh, I carriED the ambassador here frOm the capital, and now she's in the middLE of some talk. Figured I'd make sOme Fus while I wait. My stocks aRe running low."

I ignored the term "carried" and looked at the paper. Now that she'd mentioned it, it looked about the same size as the Fus she used in battle.

"You have to make them on your own?" I asked.

"In Huang He, there're craftiNG jobs that make and sell 'em on the mARket," she answered. "You can't gEt 'em like that here, though, and honestLY, I prefer to make my own, since the Fu's quality depends on the mAker's level and skill."

Xunyu's job was Master Jiangshi. It was a cross between the daoshi and jiangshi groupings, and from what I'd heard, it was among the strongest known Fu-using jobs.

"Do you make all your Fus yourself?" I asked in disbelief as I remembered the countless Fus she'd used in her battle against Figaro.

“Nope, I just make oNE to be the base and usEd my Clerk job’s Auto Clerking skill to copY and paste it. It’s based on DEX, though, sO I mess up 30% of all I copy.”

Dexterity? Now that’s a stat I don’t see used often, I thought.

I’d heard that it influenced the power of guns, bows, and skills related to them, but one of the only two gun users I knew fired bullet creatures, while the other was a man I could actually picture saying “DEX? Whuzzat? Prebear to die!”

“I’ll be prINting 30,000, so that’s 9,000 doWn the drain,” Xunyu added.

It made me wonder about the cost of the materials for one Fu. The fact that Shu’d used over 3,000,000,000 lir’s worth of ammo when fighting Franklin gave me the impression that Superior battles weren’t cheap.

“You must be glad to have a weapon that doesn’t drain your wallet, hm?” asked Nemesis.

“...” I didn’t say a word back.

I was on the verge of thinking “What if your eating habits become as expensive?” but I was able to bury the sentiment before it reached her.

That evening, I calculated the grand total amount I’d spent on Nemesis’ food since she was born, and the result wasn’t pretty, to say the least.

Basically, if you somehow converted it to real money, you could probably buy a Porsche.

That realization made me more wary of her gluttonous nature, even though I was aware that it wouldn’t change a thing.

Brother Bear’s Fashion Collection

Certain day of a certain month

“This stays in here... This goes to the inventory...”

On a day like any other, the King of Destruction, Shu Starling, was sorting his possessions.

But he wasn’t merely managing the contents of the inventory he always had with him. Baldr, the man’s Superior Embryo, was a battleship. Like most similar constructs, it had a living space, complete with a closet to store clothes in, and that was exactly what he was organizing. All of that was there thanks to Baldr having Type Castle qualities.

Though not without their uses, such features were actually a cause of concern for Shu, as it seemed like a waste of Embryo Resources. There was also the flaw that anything stored within Baldr's battleship form could only be removed when it was in the same form.

So the fact that Shu was sorting his closet could only mean that Baldr was currently a battleship, standing tall in all its glory. And that could pose a bit of a problem.

"Dude, why the hEll're you parking this thing rigHT next to town? The guards're goin' nUts."

Along with those words, someone entered the room. It was Xunyu, a fellow Superior. She'd left the capital and arrived at Gideon to find the familiar battleship standing right next to its walls.

Not wasting a moment, she'd instantly jumped inside and walked right to Shu, making short work of any defenses along the way.

"Oh, I just wanted to sort the stuff inside Baldr," Shu said, not in the least surprised by her arrival. "Before, I had to be beary careful about where I brought this thing out, but now that Franklin's Game has revealed my identity, I feel safe to do it bearever."

"Well, the people sure dON't feel safe. There's a tiME, place, and occasion for things, mAn."

Not even Shu knew how to feel about having an elementary schoolgirl tell him off about TPO.

"What're ya organiziNG, anyway? That stUff?" she pointed at all the costumes lined up in the closet.

If her Identification wasn't malfunctioning, almost each and every one of them was an MVP special reward.

"These are the suits I bearly use," he said. "Having them all with me at all times is too much fur my inventory, so I just throw them in here."

"..." Xunyu silently stared at the costumes as a certain thought came to her mind.

These UBMs were probably ready to die and get turned into special rewards, but I don't think any of them were ready to become... this.

A famous tokusatsu studio had had a place where they stored the costumes of the kaiju defeated by the heroes. They had come to call it the "kaiju warehouse," and Baldr's closet was very much like it, in both nature and function.

"So, uh, yoU don't have tigers?" she asked as she noticed that, despite its great variety, the closet certainly didn't contain all the costumes one could have.

"I did meet a tiger UBM once, but it was taken by Figgy. It's the blue coat he usually bears. He even used it in your match."

"Oh, okay..."

Despite having "Yinglong" — "Responding Dragon" — as one of her nicknames, Xunyu found the dragon's nemesis, the tiger, far more adorable, so this made her somewhat disappointed.

She even had a giant plush tiger in her room in real life. Her parents had bought it for her, and she was very fond of it.

"Anyway, you're bOThering people, so just hide this thing alREady," she told him.

"Beary well, then. I already have all the suits I need, anyway."

Following this exchange, Baldr was summoned back into Shu's crest.

Though this whole incident wasn't seen as a crime worthy of a punishment, the fact remained that Baldr's presence had greatly troubled the people.

Because of this, Liliana let him off with just a stern, reasonable warning, much like the one she'd given him after he'd set the whole of Noz Forest ablaze.

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 7 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 6
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2018 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2018 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2018 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2018 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: May 2018

Premium Ebook

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki

Infinite Dendrogram

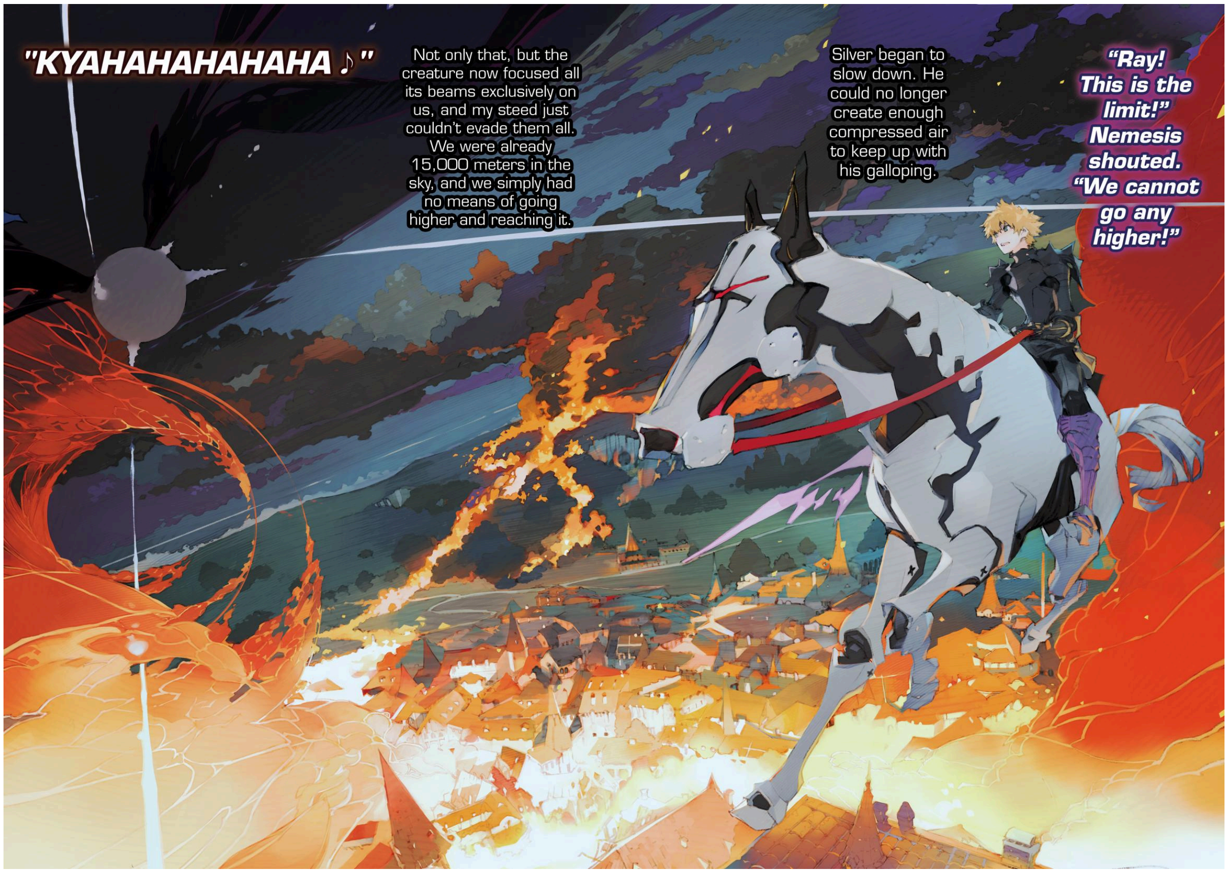
7. The Shield of Miracles

Infinite Dendrogram

7. The Shield of Miracles

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki

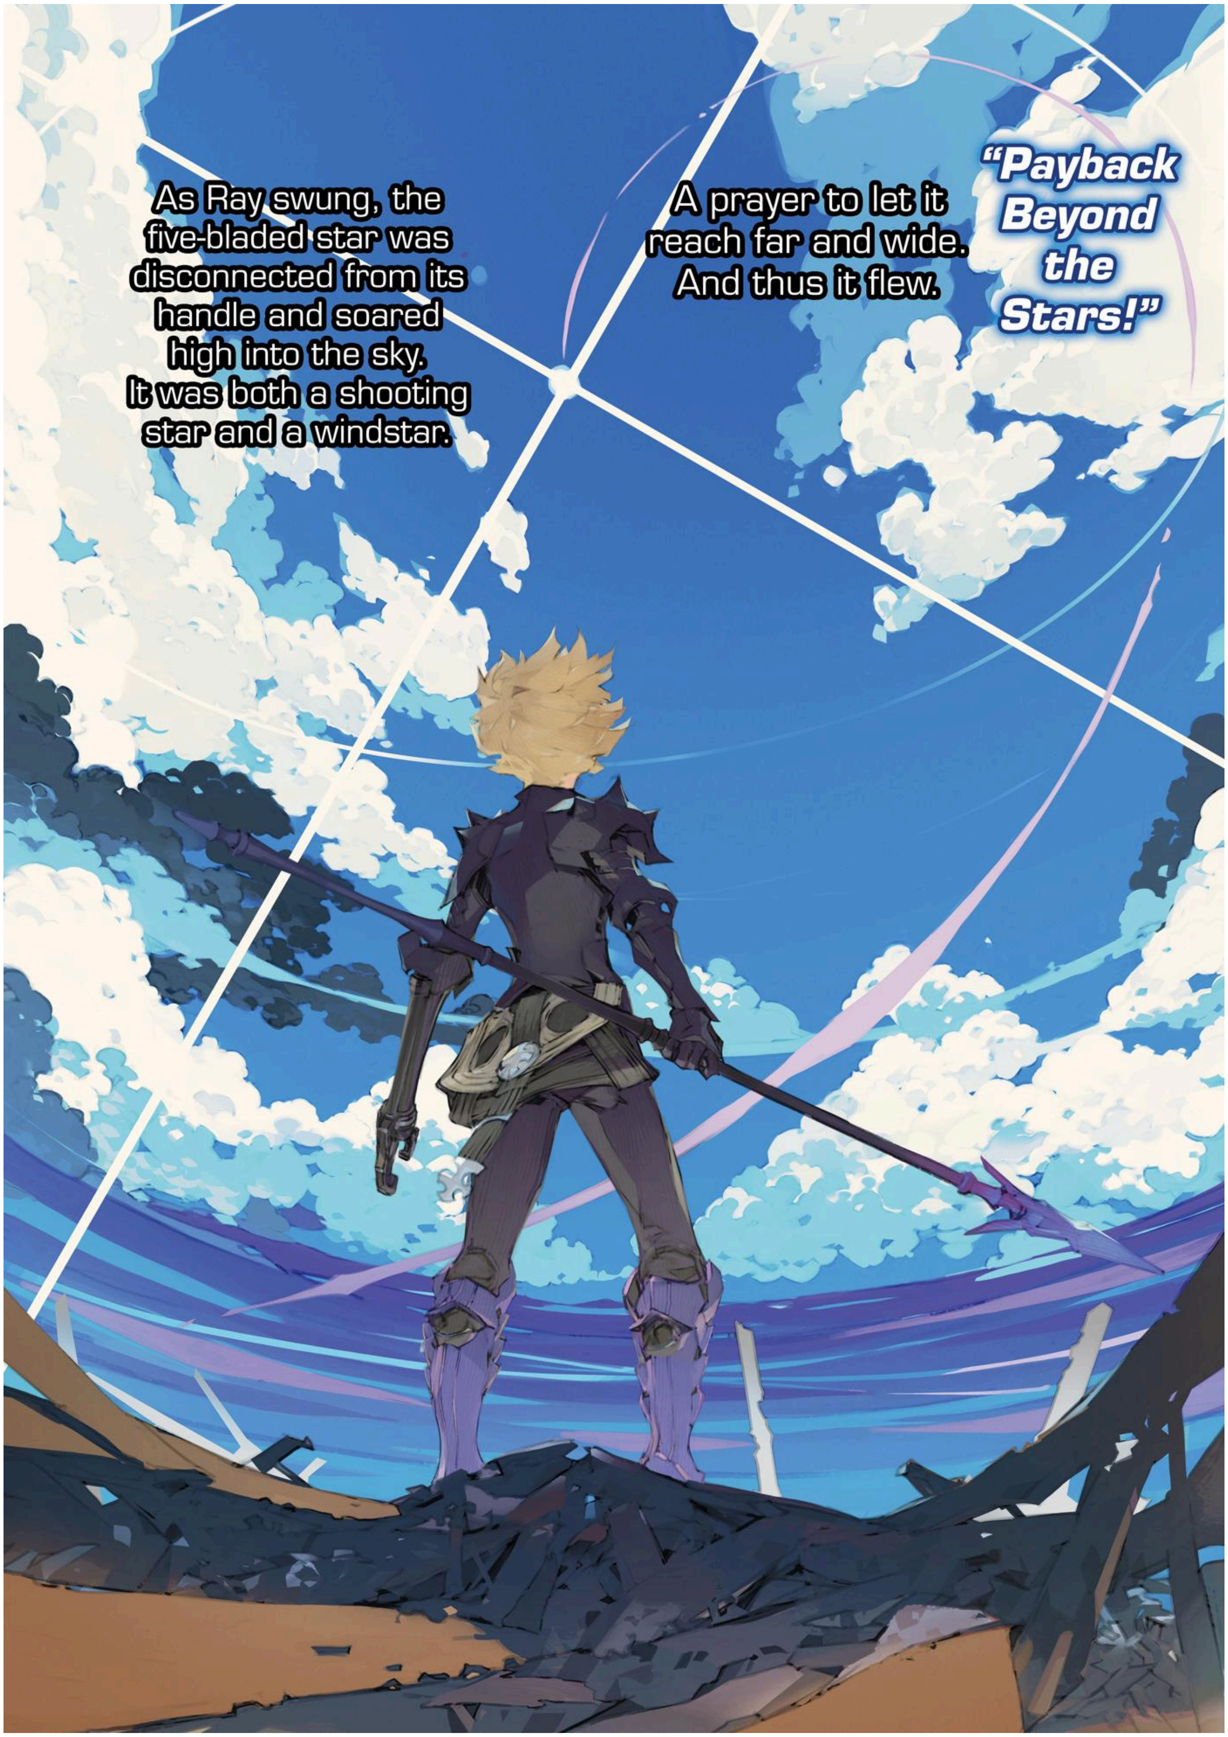


"KYAHAHAHAHAHA ♪"

Not only that, but the creature now focused all its beams exclusively on us, and my steed just couldn't evade them all. We were already 15,000 meters in the sky, and we simply had no means of going higher and reaching it.

Silver began to slow down. He could no longer create enough compressed air to keep up with his galloping.

"Ray! This is the limit!" Nemesis shouted. "We cannot go any higher!"



As Ray swung, the five-bladed star was disconnected from its handle and soared high into the sky. It was both a shooting star and a windstar.
A prayer to let it reach far and wide. And thus it flew.
"Payback Beyond the Stars!"

Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Conjunction Episode: The Tale of a Star

Chapter One: The Black Shield

Chapter Two: Ichiro Shijima

Chapter Three: The Real Ichiro Shijima

Chapter Four: Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome

Interlude: Family

Chapter Five: B. B. B.

Chapter Six: The Shield of Miracles

Chapter Seven: Soar High, Shooting Star

Epilogue

Midword

Side Story: The Case of the Unknown Murders — The Situation

Side Story: The Case of the Unknown Murders — The Solution

Side Story: Epilogue — Outlaw
Afterword
Bonus Short Stories

About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Conjunction Episode: The Tale of a Star

Centuries Ago

Long ago, something star-like floated high up in Infinite Dendrogram's night sky.

It was best described as a jet-black mass of rock hanging in the border between outer space and the planet. It spent its days bathing in sunlight, gathering it within itself, and then releasing any excesses come nighttime.

The light emitted allowed it to blend in with the countless stars brightening the night sky, and because it didn't seem to belong to any constellation, the astronomers of that era often described it as a "vagrant star."

That term couldn't be less fitting. It was no star, but a type of monster.

An elemental, to be precise. It wasn't even special enough to wear the crown of "UBM." Though the fact that it had never seen others of its kind might've made it "unique," it wouldn't have come as a surprise if it had been discovered that others like it were floating around in other skyscapes.

But its mind was much like that of a plant, so the existence of its kin, or lack thereof, didn't bother it at all. It merely bathed in light during the day, and shone as a star during the night, paying no heed to anything around it and displaying no signs of consciousness.

No joys or woes, no friends or foes — it was a being made up of nothing but itself.

However, it eventually underwent a major shift.

It was caused by a light. Not one coming from the starry skies above, but from the planet down beneath.

For a shine coming from below, the light was unusually strong. So much so that it entered the creature's field of vision and caused it to become something entirely different. What it actually saw was lost to all but itself, but the sight's effect on it was very clear.

It stopped being a mere decorational object up the night sky. Neither rock nor plant or animal, it became an entity. It became the epitome of fear.

Thus, with great dread in their hearts, the people began calling it “Blacksky.”

Chapter One: The Black Shield

Paladin, Ray Starling

Nemesis had revealed that she'd finally evolved to her third form. The long month of waiting since the battle against Gardranda had finally paid off.

I wasn't really sure how to feel about just... waking up to this, though. It felt so anticlimactic.

Well, sure, I didn't want all our evolutions to be as dramatic and intense as the first one, but at the very least, it could've come after a battle or something, like the evolutions had for Rook and Babi.

I mentioned this minor peeve to B3, and according to her, evolutions that happened while the Master was sleeping weren't all that uncommon. Sometimes, Embryos needed a bit of time to do the required processing, and the completion could easily coincide with the Master's sleeping.

Basically, not every evolution was as flashy and instant as our first one.

B3 also added that "Evolutions like this often happen when you have more than enough experience and growth energy, but you aren't sure what kind of direction you want your next form to take."

That fit my situation. I was two forms behind Rook, so I definitely had more than enough EXP and energy. And the fact that the evolution had finally come could only mean that the "direction" had been set.

Anyway, let's check it out, I thought. I wonder if it'll have a theme. Undead? Demonic, perhaps?

I was probably just imagining it, but I thought I heard my right Miasmaflame Bracer respond with, "You have a demon right here, you know?"

Then we had breakfast and went outside to test the new form.

The sun was shining, there wasn't a cloud in the sky, and a pleasant wind caressed my cheeks. I couldn't ask for a better day for this.

We were standing on the Shijima family's grounds. While we were eating breakfast, I'd asked Farica if we could use this place. She'd gladly allowed it, but she'd also asked us not to turn the lawn upside down. Though Shijima was gone, Farica was doing her best to make sure both he and his mount, Gringham, would feel right at home when they returned, and we had to respect this sentiment.

"You ready?" I asked.

"Yes," replied Nemesis.

She was currently in her first form, a greatsword, and I was about to turn her into her third.

With us were B3 and Louie, who seemed visibly intrigued. Farica couldn't join since she had work to do at home.

"Nemesis, third form."

"Form Shift — [ ]"

"Hm?" For reasons unknown, I couldn't hear her say the name of the form. It was as though it was drowned out by noise. "Wait, Nemesis, what did you just— oh?!"

She finished transforming while I was still confused by her words, so the thing she became caught me off guard and made me lose my balance.

"Whoa..." I was now holding Nemesis in her third form.

From the very first glance, it was obvious that it had a completely different nature than the other two forms.

While the greatsword and the halberd were clearly weapons, this was an object large enough to cover me whole.

It was a giant, circular shield.

“First it comes when I’m asleep, and now this,” I muttered. “This evolution is surprising in more ways than one.”

“I share your sentiment completely,” said Nemesis. “‘The Black Shield’ is apt for this form, I’d say.”

From a greatsword to a halberd to a... shield? Honestly, I wasn’t seeing the connection here.

I grabbed its lengthy handle and tried moving it around. Sure enough, the feeling was completely new to me. Handling a shield was nothing like swinging a sword or a halberd.

B3 had told me that mid-sleep evolutions often happened when the Master couldn’t decide the direction he wanted the next form to take. If there was any truth to that, this form might have become a shield because I’d watched B3 fight Rosa. It’d left an impression on me.

Then again, many of my battles so far had made me wish I had a means of defense that — unlike Counter Absorption — wasn’t limited by the number of uses, so this result might’ve been influenced by that.

“Though, if it actually considered my wishes, I’d have preferred it if it gave me a means of dealing with hopelessly distant enemies,” I muttered.

“Again, I share your sentiment,” Nemesis sighed as I recalled the time I had gone through a certain training course.

◇

It was a standard morning in Gideon. I was going around looking for my acquaintances and asking if they were free enough to spar with me. When I chanced upon Marie, she asked, “Would you be willing to try an odd type of training?”

“Odd... how?” I asked.

“Odd in that it allows you to experience something no duel may give you — a battle against a long-ranged enemy.”

I totally understood what she meant.

Through my sparring, I’ve learned the Impact Counter technique — credit to Rosa for that name — and many other things. However, because I’d only sparred in arena barriers, where the area was limited and my opponent was obvious, all of my new tricks could be applied only to face-to-face single combat.

Marie told me that all of that training could cause my skill as a player to become biased toward a select few situations, and she suggested this training to make up for that.

The design was simple: we first went outside, away from any barriers. She created enough distance between us that I couldn't even see her, and then she started attacking me, taking care to keep me alive.

She said that I was free to fight back, so I got all fired up and readied myself for what I thought would be an exciting battle.

Instead, I got a cold dose of harsh reality.

I couldn't do anything against her. Sure, I could defend against her attacks, but I couldn't launch even the simplest of counters.

Marie attacked me from distances I couldn't hope to reach and moved at speeds I couldn't follow, even while riding Silver. The training ended without me landing even a single hit on her.

Considering I'd been doing relatively well in our arena spars, this result came as a bit of a shock.

As a result, Nemesis and I became aware of just how weak we were against long-ranged attacks.

I had no means of defeating anyone who constantly stayed at a distance I couldn't reach. Marie was fully aware of that, and she'd given me this training as a practical reality check.

With this realization, both Nemesis and I thought the exact same thing:

I hope the next evolution has a ranged attack.

◇

And yet, what we actually got was a shield — pretty much the opposite of what we'd wanted.

This made both of us somewhat disappointed, but not enough to complain about it. If anything, the fact we'd finally paid the price for the first evolution and reached the third form was a cause for celebration.

"So," I spoke up. "What skills do you have?"

"This form can use Counter Absorption," she replied.

Hmm, that goes against one of my earlier assumptions, but I guess it fits. It's a shield, after all.

"Does it get more uses?"

“Alas, no. Though, I feel as though it became slightly more hardy. It’s... 1.5 times tougher, I believe.”

If that was true, it meant that a single Counter Absorption could now sustain 300,000 points of damage, which was pretty big. For perspective, it could now take a punch from Shu. His kicks would still be beyond it, though.

“So, what are the other skills?” I asked. “It’s not just Counter Absorption, is it?”

“I don’t know,” she replied.

...Excuse me?

“What do you mean?” I asked.

“Exactly what I said: I don’t know the other skill. It’s there, most certainly, but I don’t know what it is.”

I had no idea what she was implying, so I brought up the menu and took a look at the “Embryo” section. There, I found this:

■■■■■■■■ ■■■■■
Skills:
Counter Absorption Lv3
■■■■■■■ ■■■■■■ ■■■ ■■■■■: (Analyzing)

“What the hell?” I exclaimed.

The form name and the unique skill were both unintelligible, and the skill’s effect was still being analyzed.

“Nemesis, you mentioned some ‘bad news...’ Is this it?”

“Indeed it is. I’ve evolved and gained new powers, but not even I know what they are.”

“...How does that even happen?”

Despite my words, I had an idea why it had turned out like this. Nemesis’s first evolution had involved some sort of mystery function. It had greatly extended the time until she evolved again, and it wasn’t unreasonable to believe it had also influenced the result.

Upon closer look, I noticed that the shield was different from the other forms in more than just shape and purpose.

First, the lack of a black aura. With the greatsword, it came out from the hilt and wrapped around my arm, while with the halberd, it flowed out of the back of the ax part. The third form, however, didn't have it at all, making it look like a normal — albeit huge and somewhat extravagant — shield.

Second, it wasn't exclusively black. Its front had silver lines and curves forming a five-sided pattern. There was nothing like that on either the first or second forms.

"It says 'analyzing,'" I spoke up again. "How long will that take?"

"It could be done today, but that might be too generous an estimate," Nemesis replied. "Picture yourself being given a paper of text in a language you have never seen or even heard of. You are also given a dictionary and have to translate and read it all. Oh, and the dictionary translates not to Japanese, but English. That is how this process feels."

That's some weird homework you got there, I raised an eyebrow.

Whatever the case, it was safe to expect to see it revealed within the next few days.

I was about to let it go and just wait, but then B3 gave a comment. "Even if the analysis isn't complete, you might reveal the skill by using it correctly."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"I know someone who also had to wait for a skill to be analyzed, and the analysis sped up when he tried using the new form in various ways. Once done, the resulting skill turned out to have an activation method similar to one of the actions he tried."

"Oh, so making the movements that activate the skill can make the analysis faster, huh?"

Borrowing Nemesis's description of the process, it could be likened to a Japanese translation of the text. Anyway, I knew what I had to do now.

"Wait, Ray, what are y—NWHAAAAHHHHhhhh...?!"

Ignoring her words, I mustered my strength and threw Nemesis as far as I could.

"You fool! You unbelievable imbecile!" she cried.

"Sorry! That was definitely my bad!"

Unfortunately, she happened to land in a local farm's field.

All covered in mud, she returned to her human form, hit me with an intense dropkick, and drowned me in vocal fury. "Why did you throw me?! Who do you think you are, Captain America?!"

“Well, your third form was probably influenced by B3, so I thought that it might be related to throwing.”

Yesterday, B3 had killed a few K&R members by throwing her shield, so it wasn’t far-fetched to believe the skill would be based on that. Also, I had Counter Absorption as my main means of defense, so I didn’t really think the skill would be defensive.

Not to mention that I also want some ranged offense, I thought. And how do you turn a shield into a long-ranged weapon? Well, you throw it...

“Then don’t rush to act on that thought, you fool! At least tell me about it and throw me where it’s safe!”

“Again, sorry. I really regret that.”

I’d just decided to throw her where there weren’t any people, and it happened to be a muddy field.

“So, uh... Should I polish you?” I asked. Even her human form was covered in mud. I do hope that cleaning her in her weapon form will clean all her forms.

“Be thorough!” she said before returning to her Black Shield form.

I held her with my prosthetic, reached into my inventory, took out my cleaning supplies, and began polishing her.

“You seem used to this,” commented B3.

“I’m sure I do. She always asks for this after we fight undead and stuff like them.”

“It makes me a bit jealous. My Embryo is more Territory than any other type, so I can never touch it.”

“Oh, yeah, now that you mention it, it did seem pretty Territory-like.”

That means that all three CID members have Embryos of that type.

“Who told you to stop?” Nemesis asked grumpily.

“Okay, okay. Geez.”

I went on to polish her for the next 20 minutes, making sure to be as thorough as possible.

◇

We decided against doing any more third form tests.

Nemesis fervently insisted on analyzing the unintelligible skill by herself, and I wasn’t in a position to argue — nor did I feel inclined to, really.

With that entire matter pushed aside, we decided to focus on why we'd come here in the first place: gathering information for the purpose of finding Mr. Shijima in real life. We approached Farica with the intention of asking some questions about him, but...

"I'm sorry," she said. "I have to mend these clothes before noon."

Apparently, she had a Needleworker work order with today as the deadline. She had been planning to finish it yesterday, but Louie's disappearance had caused her to fall behind.

We couldn't really bother her if that was the case.

"I should be done by midday," she said. "Is it fine if we talk then?"

"Oh, yeah," I nodded. "We don't mind waiting."

Noon was only three or four Dendro hours away. Considering our quest was a search for a real person and how little time that was in real life, there was no reason we couldn't wait.

"Please enjoy the festival until then," she added. "The main event is the fireworks show which happens after dark, but the stalls and plays should already be up and running."

"Ohh?" Nemesis's eyes lit up.

Oh, dear. The biggest eater I knew was thoroughly intrigued by the word "stall."

Like, I knew she was hungry after skipping on dinner yesterday, but it didn't stop me from fearing for my wallet.

But man, she sure is a gluttonous creature, I thought.

"Nemesis, are you familiar with the concept of the 'seven deadly sins?'" I asked.

"Indeed I am," she nodded. "It has nothing to do with me, however."

"Reeeaaally?"

"What's with that tone of yours?!"

Continuing to banter like that, we made our way towards the stall-packed main street.

The idea of festival stalls made me remember the ones I'd seen in events held by the local shrine near my family home or the ones set up near cherry blossom viewing spots. The ones here in Torne weren't all that different from those. However, there were about 400 of them, which seemed a bit much for a village with only about 2,000 people.

As I bought crepes for Nemesis, I asked the shopkeeper why there were so many stalls, and he said that many of their owners were merchants from Altea who'd come here just for the festival.

Well, this did seem like a good time to make a killing, but I couldn't help but respect the mercantile spirit of the people willing to venture the roads stalked by monsters just for this. Mind you, from what I'd heard, a lot of those shopkeepers grouped up, pooled their money to buy some skilled escorts, and arrived here first thing in the morning of the festival day.

Also, the village surroundings were inhabited by monsters only a little bit stronger than those you'd find in beginner areas. Sometimes you'd get herds like the one encountered by Louie and his mother, but they were a once-every-few-years event, if not rarer.

Because of that, the journey wasn't a big deal for the escorts, either. The trip was also only about half a day long, so even Masters could take the job. And with them at the ready, not even a herd would be a problem.

Tourists were also requesting escorts here, so it finally made sense why I'd seen so many quests like that back at the capital's adventurers' guild.

Looking around, I saw many Masters who'd come here as escorts and were now partaking in the festivities.

Also, countless Masters and tians were holding one of those five-bladed pinwheels they called "windstars." We'd seen many of them decorating the fences next to the road to Torne. The passersby who weren't holding one often had them fixed onto their clothing.

Nemesis, too, had the windstar she'd gotten from Louie placed on her chest. She liked it a lot, apparently. She couldn't hold it in her hands, by the way, as she had a crepe in both.

"Mmm... " she hummed gleefully. "A good meal right after an evolution is simply unmatched."

"If you say so," I replied in monotone.

"What to eat next? I have room for far more than that."

The fact that she ate even faster than before and had gotten harder to fill up made me feel somewhat blue. Please don't tell me her evolution made her an even bigger glutton.

"Perhaps I should empty all the stalls here," she said.

"..." I froze, completely dumbfounded.

"That was a joke."

I found that hard to believe. There hadn't been a hint of falsehood in her eyes.

"Umm... there should be an ice cream shop there and a waffle shop over there," said Louie as he guided us. "And if you go there, there's a small stage where they do a play about the story of the festival over and over."

"Really?" I asked. "I'm interested."

"Okay, I'll show you. Ah..."

As we walked around, Louie occasionally stopped in place, fell silent, and just looked around. His expressions as he did so were always somewhat lonely, so I could only assume he was remembering the festivals he'd spent with his dad.

"Hm? Those are remberries, are they not?" asked Nemesis.

I followed her gaze, and sure enough, I saw the familiar fruits. Except here, they were frozen in ice. The sight reminded me of frozen mandarin sorbets.

I bought enough for us all and handed them out.

"Thanks, Mister Ray," Louie said before briefly falling silent. "Gringham also liked remberries..."

"Hm? Was he not a lion monster?" Nemesis raised an eyebrow.

"Yeah, he liked meat, too, but he could also eat fruit, and he liked remberries a lot. He only ate them peeled and cut into pieces."

So, despite being a lion, this Gringham was omnivorous and had a strangely posh side to him.

"Oh, but Dad was the same," the boy added. "He could eat the skin, but he always peeled it. He also took away the white parts from citrus fruits. Oh, and he never ate the seeds."

Ah, so Gringham was just taking after his owner.

Shijima sounds like a fussy guy, I thought.

"He always used to say, 'I know it's all fine here, but I'm still a bit scared.'"

"Scared?" I raised an eyebrow. What could be scary about eating fruit? Was he allergic? But if that was the case, he wouldn't have been eating them at all.

"Also, Juno couldn't eat unless someone fed her. She said it was her 'Maiden eating habit.'"

"How odd," Nemesis commented.

You're not one to say that. Your stomach capacity is more than a good match for that oddity.

"Ah," Louie exclaimed and pointed ahead, cutting through my thoughts about Mr. Shijima. "See that stone stage? That's where they do the Blacksky story play every year!"

I looked and saw a crowd of people surrounding a small stage where they were doing the play he was talking about.

Though B3 and I could see it just fine, Louie and Nemesis were a bit too short.

"Well, then," Nemesis said. "I would like you to take me on your shoulder."

"Sure, I don't mind," I shrugged. "You come here, too, Louie."

"Eh? You can hold us both...?"

"Easily." I took them both, placed them on each of my shoulders, Louie on the right and Nemesis on the left, and held them by the thighs so they wouldn't fall.

As I was now, I had STR bonuses from Nemesis, my Miasmaflame Bracers, and a 1.2x STR accessory I'd gotten from the gacha, among other things, bringing my total STR into the quadruple digits. I was literally stronger than a 100 normal men, so holding two children on my shoulders was nothing to me.

"Ray, let me remind you that I am a lady, not a child," Nemesis put in.

"No talking during the play, please."

"Gnhh..."

Anyway, we were ready to watch the play, and thankfully, it was just about to begin.

◇◇◇

A tale of olden times

Long, long ago, Torne was a farming village far smaller and far more peaceful than it was now. It was always caressed by gentle winds that made its windmills busily creak and turn, for hours and days on end.

But one day, the peaceful village was overcome by blackness.

It was a flying monster that came from the eastern sky. It ate the light of the sun, the shine of the stars, and everything else that was bright, making everything around it pitch black.

Seeing the blackness up above, the people were filled with fear and cried, “It’s a black sky!” “The Blacksky!”

Blacksky ate everything that was bright, looked down on the ground from the heights of the heavens, and laughed as it brought chaos and suffering as it pleased.

All humans and beasts who were seen by Blacksky were turned into “torches” and then consumed.

The people were too scared to be seen, so they closed their doors and windows and stayed in their homes in absolute darkness.

Every now and then, there would be knights and hunters brave enough to face Blacksky, but no sword or arrow could reach the heights it was in. Some even tried to challenge it atop flying dragons, but not even those large wings could take them high enough.

The knights, hunters, dragons and their riders — all were turned into torches and consumed.

What hope was there when not even a dragon could hurt it?

The monster left its challengers defeated, and kept the survivors hiding in fear. Everything below it belonged to Blacksky. Anyone who tried to escape would instantly be seen and turned into a torch.

The people had no choice but to hide, crushed by fear and hunger. The wind passing the village could no longer be heard, and it felt as if even the sky had died. All that entered the people’s ears was Blacksky’s malicious laughter. Everyone in Torne was grieving as they began to feel that this was the end.

That was when the heavens took pity on the people and shed a single tear for them.

It slid down the sky, leaving a trail behind as it became a shooting star and hit Blacksky with such force that it fell down and was buried beneath the mountains.

Under the cold rock, there were none of the bright things that Blacksky liked so much. Without its food, it lost its power and became unable to escape the underground.

And so, the people were saved by the heavens’ tear, and Blacksky was sealed deep down within the cold earth.

As if to celebrate it, the wind returned to the village and the sky became clear again.

The menace of the Blacksky was no more.

Ever since then, the villagers had held a festival. Every year, on the anniversary of Blacksky's sealing, they would make star-like pinwheels and light up the sky with bright, vivid fireworks to thank the heavens that saved them.

And the people lived happily ever after.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

"I see," I muttered.

The play was easy to digest, and I had no problems understanding how the festival had begun.

There was something I couldn't help but notice, though.

"So, B3, this play can be summed up as 'There was a really tough monster that got hit by a meteor and died,' right?"

"Probably," she nodded. "It was most likely a UBM. An astronomically unlucky one, at that. Then again, it only got hit because it made this area into its territory, so you might say it just reaped what it sowed. If the story is true, it didn't die and was merely sealed within the mountain. However, since it was described as a living creature, the lack of food and drink probably killed it centuries ago. "

Yeah, she was probably right about that, though some Masters around us seemed to think otherwise. They rushed towards the nearby mountains, and according to Louie, they definitely weren't the first to do so.

Every year, a number of Masters who'd seen the play would get the idea that the dying UBM might still be alive, and they hurried to look for it to dig it out and kill it for a special reward.

The fact that it still hadn't been found could only mean that it had already vanished years, if not centuries, ago.

Good riddance, I figured. A creature that could live for hundreds of years with no food or drink would be way more trouble than I'd like to deal with.

Following the play, we went exploring the stalls again. But this time, we didn't have Louie with us. At the play, the boy had bumped into a friend who'd invited him to enjoy the festival with him.

Though Louie had been hesitant about leaving us, I'd urged him to accept. We could find our way back to Farica without his help, and I thought that maybe playing with a friend would lift his spirits. Poor little guy seemed really down about his dad not being here.

Anyway, there were now only three of us: Nemesis, B3, and me.

"Are you thirsty, Ray?" asked B3.

"Ah, a bit, yeah," I nodded. I'd had a dry throat ever since the play started, but I couldn't have just gone and gotten a drink while it was still going.

"Then I'll go buy something for all of us. I saw a good-looking place nearby."

"Well, then I'll get something, too," I said. "Any requests?"

"Popcorn, please."

"Roger."

She walked away on the road we came from while we got in the line to a nearby popcorn stall.

The word "popcorn" made me recall the news about Shu's business I'd seen on MMO Journal Planter before logging in.

I'd tested his prototype popcorn. Even though it had been really good, the fact he'd refused to reveal the ingredients had left me somewhat scared. I also had a thing or two to say about the jingle that Lei-Lei had composed. I mean, seriously? "Let your tastebuds be destroyed?" The lyrics completely killed the nice melody.

"Hm?"

As I pondered Shu's weird song, some sort of trouble began at one part of the nearby road. I looked to see what was going on.

"Huhh?! Ya wanna go?"

"You're the one who bumped into me, ya shit! Bring it on! The Mohawk League never runs from a fight!"

It was basically the most generic clash of delinquents imaginable.

One group was wearing clothes with a symbol depicting a black circle over a red one, while the other was a bunch made up entirely of people with mohawks. Obviously, both sides seemed like trouble, but this seemed like nothing more than a minor hoodlum squabble. Additionally, they had crests on their left hands, making them all Masters.

Hoping that this didn’t escalate, I carefully observed the clash.

“What the fuck’s goin’ on here?” Suddenly, a new character joined the scene, momentarily breaking the tense atmosphere.

The person was three meters tall and wore armor large enough to cover his immense frame.

The full plate prevented me from seeing any part of his body, but it was easy to tell that he was huge.

At that moment, I realized that this was the same person I’d seen while waiting for B3 back at the capital.

“Sub-leader!” The circle symbol group welcomed him.

The mohawks were menaced. “Wh-Who the hell are you?!”

The armor guy then replied to the mohawks’ question. “What? Ya can’t tell just by looking at my armor?”

Uh... no, I can’t, actually, I thought.

“W-Wait, you’re the guy that... You’re him!”

“I’ve Identified it... It’s the real thing...” Unlike me, the mohawks instantly got his point.

I should get Reveal or Identification sometime, I thought.

“Got it now, huh?!” the armored brute roared. “We’re Sol Crisis! You know what that means, don’t ya?!”

“Go on, ya shits!” another person his clan yelled. “Drop a gold coin each or get ganked!”

So now it’s a shakedown?

“Sh-Shit...!” one mohawk growled.

“Kh! All right, but don’t get us wrong!” said another. “We just don’t wanna miss this festival ’cause of a damn death penalty! We’ll also have lots of cleaning to do after it, so we’ll back off this time!”

Intimidated by the armored individual, the mohawks said something really weird, threw some gold on the ground, and scrambled to run away.

“Did you see that, sub-leader?!” one of the other group became excited.

“Khahahah! Pathetic shits! Anyway, we’re off, boys!” roared the armor guyed as he got the circle group that was apparently named Sol Crisis to follow him and leave.

But then he paused.

“Hm?” he murmured, as he shifted his gaze towards my direction.

Though the helmet slits were too thin for me to see his eyes, I could tell that he was looking at me.

However, instead of saying anything, he just turned away and walked off.

What am I supposed to make of that?

“First at the fountain, now here... Why is he always looking at me?” I wondered aloud.

“Because you’re simply that noticeable,” commented Nemesis.

“I’m not holding a sign anymore, though.”

Nemesis said nothing in response. For some reason, she put on a tired expression and just continued eating her popcorn.

“Is anything wrong?” I heard someone say.

Turning to the side, I saw B3 holding a plate — well, a spare shield, actually — with three drinks on it.

“Two clans were mouthing off at each other just now,” I answered. “They were ‘Sol Crisis’ and... ‘Mohawk League,’ I think.”

“Oh, Sol Crisis is that new PK clan. I’ve never encountered them, but I hear the name quite often recently. And Mohawk League is a humanitarian volunteer clan.”

“...Excuse me, could you repeat that?” I felt like I’d just heard some words that didn’t belong in the same sentence as “mohawk.”

“Mohawk League is a humanitarian volunteer clan that started on the Internet,” she said. “Someone thought it would be fun to go around doing good things while looking like generic bad guys, and many people agreed. They have divisions in all the main countries, and they’re harmless unless provoked.”

“But... mohawks? Seriously?”

“Well, not everyone with a mohawk is a Mohawk League member, so you shouldn’t judge a book by its cover. Even my PK clan had a person with a mohawk.”

Well, I could definitely agree that it wasn’t wise to make assumptions based on a person’s hairstyle...

“There’s one other thing about the whole situation that had me curious,” I said.

“Which would be?” asked B3.

“Sol Crisis had this guy in huge armor.”

“Armor?”

“Yeah. He was over three meters tall. Is it even possible to wear stuff like that?”

“It is,” she nodded as she gave us our drinks. “The easiest way is to start the game as a giant.”

Oh yeah, Dendro allowed you to play as races other than human. Rosa, for one, was a wolf beastman.

“Having a giant avatar doesn’t affect your stats, so the size is merely for show,” B3 continued. “Also, giants have a large hitbox, and the XL equipment they have to get is really expensive.”

It seemed the negatives greatly outweighed the positives.

“Also, the high-rank job ‘Full Armor Giant’ allows you to wear armor that’s too large for you as long as you have enough STR.”

“I’m guessing that’s the armor version of your Shield Giant job,” I commented. “But wait, even if you have the STR to wear large armor, wouldn’t you still have lots of empty space inside it, making it hard for you to move?”

“Full Armor Giants have the Armor Adjuster skill. It fills the empty space with a force field that feels much like highly viscous air, allowing you to move without minding the size. I would say it’s highly similar to powered armor from sci-fi movies.”

“Ohh...”

This world sure has some convenient skills, I thought.

Also, B3 seemed really knowledgeable about that job. She was a Shield Giant now, but perhaps she had been a Full Armor Giant before? Then again, B3 was versed in data relating to the game, so it was only natural for her to know about other jobs.

“Large armors are really great, by the way,” she added. “They make it easy to menace your enemies, and even if something pierces them, there’s a chance it will just hit the empty spaces.”

Well, that definitely sounds like firsthand experience, I thought. Yeah, she probably did play as a Full Armor Giant before.

“Though that means nothing when the ‘something’ splits your head in two,” she sighed and put on a distant expression.

Did she remember something she didn’t want to?

◆◆◆

???

“When’re we doin’ it?”

“After the festival should be good. Someone might get in the way if we go now.”

“If the K&R shits didn’t cock it all up, we’d have done it on the road.”

“It’s not all bad, though. Now he’s got a Superior and K&R on his name.”

“Khahah! The prey got fattened up, eh?”

“Damn right. And yeah, just like you said, when he’s going back after the festival is the best time to go at it. Though, uh...”

“I know. If we get a chance to gank him while he’s here, we’re taking it.”

Chapter Two: Ichiro Shijima

Paladin, Ray Starling

By the time the sun was exactly south of us, we'd already experienced most of what the festival had to offer, so we decided to return to the Shijima family home. The fact that the sun was south during noon meant that this continent was in the northern hemisphere, but since it was also the only continent in the game, that didn't matter all that much.

"Welcome back," said Farica, seemingly done with her work. "Where's Louie?"

"We ran into one of his friends, and they went off to play together."

"I see..." she sighed. I couldn't really understand why, but there was relief in both her tone and expression. Would it have inconvenienced her if Louie was here with us? "I'm sorry, but I still have some mending to do. Just two more articles of clothing, and I'll be free to help you..."

"Ah, that's fine. Please don't mind us and focus on your job," I insisted.

And so, B3 and I ended up having to wait a little more.

Nemesis felt that she could make some progress in the new skill analysis, so she returned to the crest and focused entirely on that.

I thought of whiling away the time by talking to B3, but I noticed her taking a metallic cylinder out of her inventory and holding it tightly in her hand. Upon closer inspection, I realized it looked somewhat like a bullet cartridge.

"What's that?" I asked her.

"It's an add-on item for a piece of my equipment," she answered. "They have to be filled with MP before use, and I neglected to fill this one. I figured I'd do it while we wait."

An add-on item...? Why don't I recall her using it in her battle against Rosa? I pondered. Well, knowing her, she probably just wasn't using the equipment she mentioned. From what I can tell, she switches between her countless shields all the time, so the item might've not fit the situation.

B3 and I continued to chat until Farica completed her work twenty minutes later. Then it was time for us to get to the matter at hand.

The three of us sat around the living room table, B3 and me on one side and Farica on the other.

B3 didn't waste any time. "Now, let us ask you some questions. Two, to be exact. First, did Mr. Shijima ever say anything about his life on the 'other side'? And second, did he do anything odd shortly before he disappeared?"

"Umm, before that, can I make something clear?" Farica asked.

"Certainly."

"I... I don't believe there's a need to search for my husband."

"Eh?" I voiced my confusion.

What was that supposed to mean? Shijima, her spouse, had been gone for half a year now. Why would she be against searching for him?

"But since Louie wants it, I am willing to tell you about him."

"Please do," I said.

Farica nodded, and then she began telling us what she knew of the man.

◇◇◇

About Shijima

Farica's first impression of Shijima could be summed up as "a man who gives far too much."

Their first meeting was the dramatic moment when she and her son Louie were attacked by monsters in the Fadl Mountain Pass.

Shijima appeared out of nowhere, fended off the horde of beasts, and saved both of them, which was more than enough to make him a savior figure in her eyes. But that wasn't even the only thing he did for them. Shijima showed no hesitation as he used his own healing items to give Farica a first aid treatment, and he happily volunteered to guard them on the rest of the way to Torne.

Once they arrived, he helped them move into their new home, as Farica's leg injury made it a challenge. He even called a black-haired Bishop he knew to take a look at her leg and heal it.

After that, he continued visiting them at least once every two weeks, never neglecting to bring treats they enjoyed.

In a word, his consideration for them was "excessive."

Though Louie, pure as he was, thoroughly enjoyed all that Shijima gave them, Farica found it a bit strange, if not downright eerie.

After all, their relationship didn't go beyond that of a savior and the saved. There was no reason for him to care so much about them, and he definitely didn't treat everyone else as well as he did them. It was only natural for Farica to think that Shijima had some sort of ulterior motive.

She decided to ask about it the next time he arrived, even if it would bring an end to his boons.

As usual, he came in riding on his Gringham, bringing a lot of remberries, a luxury fruit, as a souvenir. Louie was overjoyed, and the boy's gleeful expression made Farica hesitate.

Still, she knew she had to make things clear, so she re-composed herself before inviting Shijima to talk in private.

Though the man found it strange, he left his Gringham and Juno to look after Louie and followed after her.

Once they were alone, Farica got straight to the point and asked "Why do you look after us so much? What do you want from us?"

Upon hearing her words, she regretted using such blunt language. The words got her point across, yes, but she felt that a bit of sugar-coating wouldn't have hurt.

Overly blunt or not, the words were honest, and Shijima instantly understood her question and why she asked it. For some reason, the man's expression became regretful.

"I'm sorry," he apologized. "I didn't mean to make you uneasy."

Farica couldn't understand what made her deserving of an apology.

"You're right," he continued. "I went a bit too far. I'm sorry. I just don't know the standard when it comes to this."

Another apology. It truly seemed as though he felt that he'd made a mistake.

"When it comes to... what?" asked Farica.

"I don't know how much I have to do for someone when expressing gratitude."

"Gratitude?"

Who here is deserving of gratitude? He's the one who saved us, she pondered.

The words he spoke next completely blew away that thought of hers.

"I only wanted to thank you for saving me."

Those words made her doubt her ears. She and Louie were the ones who had been saved by him, not the other way around.

His words didn't stop there, however.

"Getting to save you while you could do nothing but wait for death made me the happiest I've ever been. It... it meant a lot to who I am on the other side."

His words were dense with all sorts of emotions, and Farica wasn't able to read them all. Even so, there was something she could easily understand.

Back on that fateful day, Shijima had saved Farica's life, but that heroic act had also saved Shijima's own heart.

That meant everything he'd done for them was completely genuine.

She then noticed that Shijima was on the verge of crying, which made all her suspicions vanish as though they were never there.

"Again, I'm really sorry," the man said, seeming fully aware of his mistake. "I don't want to trouble you again, so I'll just..."

He readied himself to leave their lives forever, but Farica stopped him.

"Would you like to have dinner with us?" she asked.

"Eh?" Shijima exclaimed, completely stupefied.

"I've invited you to join our meals many times now, but you have yet to accept even once."

"B-But I..."

"You have given us so much now... so please, let me give something back. In fact, I would like you to join us every time you visit."

"Miss Farica..."

"You gave us your thanks, so now let us give ours," she beamed, making Shijima smile in return. "Please wait while I prepare something. Oh, I should get Louie to help me."

"Um! May I help, too?" the man asked.

"Of course. Please do."

A short while later, Louie and Juno came back home to find Shijima and Farica preparing food together. Shijima seemed completely inept at it and made many mistakes, but both he and Farica were clearly having lots of fun doing it.

Though Louie found the sight strange, watching them laugh together made him happy.

Juno didn't say a word, but she seemed proud, like a mother pleased by her child's growth.

It wasn't long until Shijima began living with Farica, and the year after that, they exchanged marital vows.

It was the 27th marriage between a Master and a tian.

Shijima, Farica, and Louie had become a family, and few could match them in peace and happiness.

Though Shijima was Farica's second husband and Louie's stepfather, there was little to no distance between them. Biology didn't stop them from being a natural family.

Until a major change happened in their lives — Farica became pregnant.

It took a while for her to realize it. At first, she merely thought that she'd eaten a bit too much and that it was showing. No one could blame her. After all, she'd thought that Masters and tians couldn't produce children.

But her stomach grew larger with every passing day, and she eventually got her first morning sickness. She'd been with child once, so she quickly realized that yes, she was pregnant.

Even the Doctor said that there were no two ways about it — Farica was going to have her second baby.

It made her happy beyond words. Even though Farica loved Shijima and didn't want anyone else but him as a husband, she'd always thought that their family would never grow bigger. She had been plenty satisfied with just him, Louie, Juno, and Gringham. But now that she knew that someone else would be joining them, she thought that it would make them all even happier.

Besides, she really wanted to see Shijima's joyous face when he heard the news.

She returned home and announced her pregnancy when they were all having dinner.

Louie was unreservedly gleeful. Juno didn't say a word, but she congratulated them with applause.

Shijima, on the other hand, was crying.

There was pure happiness in those tears, but at the same time, Farica felt as though he was lamenting something. Being his wife for over two years had made her perceptive of such things.

That night, the two of them talked in their bedroom.

Shijima repeatedly thanked Farica for bearing his child, but then, he spoke a resolution.

"Farica," he said. "I have something I must do on the other side."

"Is it related to our child?" she asked as she caressed her stomach.

He nodded vehemently and said, "If I want to meet our baby, I have to go through a certain trial. And it's... it's so dangerous that it might cost me my life..."

"Oh no!" she gasped.

"I would've been fine spending the rest of my days living the life we have right now. But I really want to see our child... I want to live in a family that includes him."

And apparently, to do that, he had to take this "trial." Farica could tell he was determined, and that the endeavor was unavoidable.

"If you survive the trial, when will you return?" she asked.

"...After a month, at best. No, wait, that's three months in here. Well, it could be half a year, if not more."

"That's so long..."

"But no matter what, I will come back. Believe in me."

No trial on the other side could separate him from his family. She believed that.

Farica nodded and said, "We'll be waiting. Louie, I, and the child within me will wait for you for as long as we have to."

"...Thank you."

The two exchanged an embrace, full of love for each other and for the baby.

The next day, Farica woke up to find that Shijima had disappeared.

She asked Louie about him, and he said that Shijima had said goodbye to him and gone off somewhere. That was enough for her to conclude that he had gone to take his trial on the other side.

Farica didn't tell Louie that Shijima could lose his life, as it would only make him worried.

Besides, she thoroughly believed that her husband would return to his family.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

"He will definitely come back," Farica concluded her story. "So I don't think there's any need to search for him."

Both B3 and I had no clue how to respond, and had no further questions. After all, she'd just given us everything we needed to complete the puzzle.

Shijima had left his family and was now on the "other side," doing something that required lots of determination.

That, combined with the information we'd gathered so far, gave us a good idea of what kind of environment he was in.

"Sorry," B3 broke the silence. "Would you mind if Ray and I had a brief private talk?"

"Not at all," Farica replied.

"Let's go, Ray."

Unable to say anything, I followed after her as she left the house and entered the carriage.

"This whole matter might be impossible to solve," she said right after the door closed.

"But..."

"Ray. You have an idea what happened to him, too, don't you?"

Yes, I more or less had an answer to the mystery of Shijima's disappearance. It was a combination of several factors.

First, for a Master like him and a tian to have a baby, he had to have been online longer than it was biologically possible for any normal player.

Second were his feelings towards Farica and Louie.

Third was the so-called "trial" he had to do on the "other side."

And fourth were his own words: I would've been fine spending the rest of my days living the life we have right now.

I had all I needed to form a proper conclusion.

"Shijima is— Hn?"

Before I could finish, the carriage suddenly began to shake. It continued for a short while before stopping.

"An earthquake?" I wondered.

If so, it wasn't all that strong. If I had to gauge it, I'd probably put it at Shindo 3.

That wouldn't cause much harm to people, and though the buildings here had a medieval appearance, Altar's architecture involved the use of magic strengthening, so the earthquake wouldn't damage them at all. The festival could go on without any problems to speak of.

However, it was possible that a utensil or something would fall off and hurt Farica.

"Let's go check on Farica," I said.

"Very well."

Inside, we found an open cupboard with some of its contents lying shattered on the floor. Thankfully, Farica didn't seem to be hurt.

"Are you all right?" I asked.

"Yes, none of it hit me," she replied.

"Let us help clean up," B3 said.

"But..." she tried protesting.

"You're pregnant, so please don't burden yourself. Ray, do you have any cleaning tools?"

"I do."

We each took out a broom and dustpan and began cleaning up the shattered tableware.

By the way, my broom and dustpan came from a Cooking Set I'd hit on the gacha. Weird to see something I'd thought was a bad roll becoming somewhat useful.

I gathered the shards into the dustpan and put them in an empty bag.

"...Huh?" I noticed something mixed in between the shards.

The things that had fallen out weren't just plates, so it wasn't strange for there to be more than porcelain. However, that particular piece struck me as odd. It was a small piece of silverwork, probably made using the Carving skill.

Though it wasn't unusual for a household like this to have such items, it felt somewhat off, as though it didn't really belong here. Also, I couldn't help but feel that I'd seen the design before.

"Ah!" I silently gasped as it came back to me. "Farica, have you seen this silverwork before?"

"Oh, that's something my husband used to wear before our marriage," she answered. "He stopped wearing it afterwards, so we just left it on top of the cupboard."

"I see."

Apparently, Farica didn't know anything about the group this piece of silverwork symbolized. No one could fault her for that, since she'd moved here from the capital about four years ago. And from what I could tell, this village didn't have any of their establishments.

"...So that's how it is," muttered B3 as she noticed what I was holding.

Naturally, she knew exactly what it meant.

"Apologies, but we have to leave for a moment," she said while facing Farica. "Oh, and we will finish cleaning up when we return, so please don't do anything."

"Eh? All right..."

B3 took me by the hand and led me out of the house.

"Ray, do you have a group talk app installed on your mobile?"

"I do."

"Then please log out and connect to the group with this ID. He should come soon, too."

She then told me the ID, and repeated it to help me remember.

I got it in my head and logged out.

◇

Once offline, I went to my mobile, activated speaker mode, and turned on the app. A few moments later, I heard B3's voice — or rather, Fujibayashi's.

"Seems it went well," she said. "I've already contacted him, so he should be here in a moment."

A brief while passed, and I heard a man's voice.

"Apologies for the wait. I was told you wish to talk?" It was none other than The Lunar Society's second-in-command, the King of Assassins, Eishiro Tsukikage. "Lady Tsukuyo is busy at the moment, so I will speak in her stead."

"No, you are the better person in this case," said B3, and I couldn't help but agree.

"Tsukikage," I spoke up. "You knew all about Shijima from the very start, didn't you?"

"Yes. Indeed I did," he replied as though it was nothing. "Since you arrived at this conclusion, I assume the madam told you about... No, you found physical evidence, did you not?"

“A piece of silverwork. It had a crescent moon and a closed eye on it,” I said. To my knowledge, there was only one group of people that used that symbol. “He... Shijima was a member of The Lunar Society, wasn’t he?”

“Indeed he was.”

And that was exactly why Tsukikage had suggested helping us search for him back at the guild. Of course he could find the man — he already knew the answer.

Now that I think about it, that was probably the only reason why he made the suggestion, I thought.

“If you knew it, why did you say it was a secret?” I asked.

“Privacy is something to be respected, no?” he replied, and I couldn’t tell if he was serious or just blowing smoke.

“...All right, fine. But there’s something I want to know, no matter what.”

“Please, do ask away.”

“How... How’s Shijima doing?”

“That is private information, as well... But then again, there is no reason to hide it at this point...” he said before momentarily falling silent. “Very well. Allow me to explain it all from the beginning. When this is over, you will know his background... and his relationship to us...”

◇◇◇

Interlude: The Awakening

Torne Village, Outskirts, Underground, ■■■■ ■■ ■■■ ■■■■■ ■■■, ■■■■■■■■■■■

It awoke.

Not because of the recent earthquake, no. The earth’s rumblings were of no consequence to it. Even so, there was no denying that its awakening was related to the quake.

Briefly after the tremor, a few rays of light began to leak through a crack in the bedrock burying its frame.

The earthquake had left an opening the size of a needle’s tip between it and the surface.

The amount of light was so miniscule it could barely be gauged. Its bedrock tomb was as still as dark as a starless night. But it just so happened that it made a huge difference for the creature.

To it, a darkness completely devoid of light and merely the darkest night possible were as different as one and zero.

“KyAhaAh!” it cried, as absolute darkness coated the tomb.

No — light was still coming through the crack, but it was consuming it all.

“KYahAHahAH!” it cried — cackled — as it ate more light and turned it into energy.

It had slumbered for 300 years.

Buried within the earth, surrounded by unlight, with no food or drink for sustenance, still bearing the damage from the meteor, it had waited for light to finally reach it.

Like a hibernating animal, or perhaps a corpse, it had silently waited, unknown to anyone.

Now, this monster dreaded as “Ancient Legendary” had tasted its first light in centuries, and it couldn’t have asked for a better appetizer.

The once-slumbering entity would soon turn the aboveground festival into a feast.

Chapter Three: The Real Ichiro Shijima

The Tale of a Certain Man

As I’ve already mentioned, Ichiro Shijima is one of our adherents.

Although young Louie does not recall it, Lady Tsukuyo and I met his family awhile ago. After all, Mr. Shijima was the leader of The Lunar Society’s battle unit. We even went to congratulate him after he married Mrs. Farica.

Now then, of course we know of Mr. Shijima’s current whereabouts. But before I reveal them to you, I must tell you about everything else. From the beginning to the end.

First, allow me to tell you of The Lunar Society’s origin.

Now now, patience, please. No need for anger. I assure you, this is relevant. We cannot omit it if we wish to talk about where he is now.

Now, I’m certain Fujibayashi already knows this, but The Lunar Society was founded nearly a century ago, in postwar Japan. At the time, Lady Tsukuyo’s ancestor and the person who would go on to become the founder of The Lunar Society, Master Gessei Fuso, was working as a doctor.

As you surely know, the postwar period was a very dark time. People lacked the materials they needed to recover from the damage, and death was with them at every step.

Some had battle wounds that grew more severe with every passing day, some became ill due to malnutrition, some turned mentally or emotionally ill and attempted suicide, and some were even worse. In a word, it was “hellish.”

Master Gessei is said to have been a kindly doctor who treated people regardless of profit.

That, of course, attracted many patients to him, many of which brought even more death. Countless people lost their lives. Even those who could’ve been saved in optimal circumstances died because of a lack of food or medicine.

Eventually, he came to notice the abject despair in many of their eyes.

Some say that “health is a state of mind,” and if there is any truth to that, then the patients had a terminal illness. Their hearts were as good as dead.

Being the doctor that he was, Master Gessei spent a lot of time pondering how to help them.

At the very least, he wanted to give them hope.

Sadly, it was an age when there just weren’t enough material goods to remove their illnesses or hunger — the cause of their despair. Japan would need more time until it was back on its feet.

So, he figured that, if there was no hope here, he had to envision a different world. Even if the material world couldn’t save them, he could still try to save their hearts.

“Escape the shackles of flesh and betake yourself to the true world of souls. Embrace this free world and celebrate your liberty to your soul’s content.”

As you are aware, those are our teachings. Those teachings are what started The Lunar Society.

Our doctrine tells people that even if their bodies are impaired, their souls are always free to dream of a world where they’re unbound.

It was pure escapism. An idea based in fantasy, if not delusion. But even so, it made people think in terms their souls... effectively keeping their minds from yielding.

Indeed, our teachings can be rephrased as “Let’s feel good by thinking of nice things.” Many call it cult-like, but that’s all it is. It’s no different from modern mental health seminars.

Admittedly, the economic progress over the past century has turned Japan into a wealthy nation, and it’s hard to fault anyone for calling us a cult. Eventually, we gathered not only patients who had lost all hope, but also youths who were pessimistic about their futures.

Being the current spiritual leader, Lady Tsukuyo often worries if the foundation presented by Master Gessei suits the modern world. Things have changed a lot over the years, after all.

Eh?

“If she’s worried about her cult’s state, she should reconsider kidnapping people, you say?

That’s unavoidable, I’m afraid. Lady Tsukuyo’s personality and disposition as a woman are a different matter than her worries.

The way I see it, she wishes to have someone she has taken a liking to at her side. Ha ha ha! You're right. Truly, that doesn't change the fact that it's a bother to you, Mukudori.

Back to the matter at hand...

Even after founding The Lunar Society, the Fuso family continued to run a hospital. On the surface, it had nothing to do with our organization. Additionally, it specialized in something different from most hospitals.

The term for it was "terminal care."

It operated with the purpose of caring for those ailed by the worst of illnesses and letting them live out their final days in peace. But of course, if it was possible, we never neglected to focus on prolonging the patients' lives or curing them altogether.

Mr. Ichiro Shijima was one of the hospital's patients.

Before you make any assumptions, we did not urge him to join us in his moment of weakness — he was already an adherent before his disease worsened, and when it did, he was taken to the hospital.

Indeed, we are not that dirty. The Lunar Society avoids doing anything that could get us arrested. Honest.

"The fact that you're emphasizing it makes you look suspicious," you say? Please, there's no need to think that.

Anyway, let us go back to Mr. Shijima.

He was suffering from an incurable disease that set a limit on his remaining lifetime. He had been ardently seeking a cure ever since he was young, but alas, he had no luck.

Four years ago, our time, he joined The Lunar Society. He probably saw it as a good way to divert himself from his imminent death.

"Wasn't his family against it," you ask? The circumstances of his upbringing are personal information we are not allowed to reveal, but we can tell you that he had no living relatives at the time of his joining. What matters is that he joined and became one of our adherents.

We have a century of experience at diverting people, so I would like to believe we were able to ensure that his last four years weren't burdened by fear of death.

Yes, you heard it correctly.

He joined us four years ago, when he had four years left to live.

At the time, the present day was going to be his absolute limit. Oh, but two years ago, they discovered a means of curing his disease. However, it had only a 10% chance of success.

It was the type of treatment that the body could vehemently reject, resulting in an instant death.

Yes, he chose not to go through it back then.

He was continuing to live through his final days, trying to divert himself from his upcoming death, when a certain turning point changed his life entirely.

It was the release of Infinite Dendrogram.

By the way, you two, where do you think the true value of VR lies? Oh no, I'm not trying to change the subject. This is an important preamble to what I am about to say.

Well? What do you think?

Of course, I'm not talking of failures like NEXT WORLD, but fully complete, dive-type dream games like Infinite Dendrogram.

Yes. The best VR transfers the five senses to the virtual world.

This means that even those whose bodies barely function can dive and experience being healthy as long as their brains and thoughts work as intended.

Because of this, at the turn of the millennium, we at The Lunar Society began looking into and funding VR technology. It was another thing our patients and adherents could look forward to. It gave them hope.

Of course, in the end, the perfected VR wasn't any of those we financed, but one we knew next to nothing about — Infinite Dendrogram.

...Oh, but that is unrelated to the matter at hand.

By now, you can imagine just how much Mr. Shijima craved that.

No matter how hard he tried to ignore it, his end was drawing closer with every passing day. It was impossible for any of us to gauge his will to live and to feel alive.

Now, since we were making sure to try out all of the VR technology on the market, we secured a number of devices from Infinite Dendrogram's first batch. One of them was presented to Mr. Shijima.

Thus, he logged in to Infinite Dendrogram and became the Master known as Ichiro Shijima, all for the purpose of escaping his limited days in reality and being free in the "true world of souls."

It released him from the distress of his fading life, the pain of the encroaching death, and the world with no hope for him.

Having gained a vigorous body, special powers, and a sense of fulfillment that could never compare with anything he could gain in reality, he went on to live out his second life for all it was worth. It would not be wrong to state that he was more content than any of us. After all, he was given everything he had not been able to gain in his entire life.

Having all but forgotten his state in reality, one day, he chanced upon a certain boy and his mother. They were overwhelmed by a horde of monsters — despair made manifest — and could do nothing but wait for death.

The sight likely made him feel like he was looking at himself in real life. Or perhaps it reminded him of his late family.

Whatever the case, Ichiro Shijima used his powers as a Master to save the mother and child. He, who could do nothing but await death, saved those two, who were in a similar situation.

Though they had met by accident, to him, it was surely fate.

He kept on interacting with them, and it wasn't long before they became a real family.

According to him, those days filled him with a warmth he had never felt before.

Yes, those are his own words. Exactly as I heard them.

After that, he went on to be blessed with a child, which was another thing he couldn't experience here in the real world. The joy the news gave him was so immense that it made him remember himself on this side.

He was half-dead by this point, kept alive only by various kinds of life support, and it would've been a great surprise if he had lived for more than two months longer.

That was a mere half a year in Infinite Dendrogram. Needless to say, time was short for him.

He would die without growing old with his wife, without watching his stepson mature... or even seeing the face of his real child. It made him remember despair.

Words couldn't describe the regret he most likely felt.

However, it wasn't enough to break him. He found new hope when he remembered the treatment he had once refused, and this time, he decided to take it.

Of course, the illness had progressed since then. The chance of success had dropped, and it was a question whether it even reached 3% now.

He needed a miracle for it to succeed.

Even so, he was determined.

Lady Tsukuyo and I both asked him, “Why?”

He responded, “For a future where I live with my family.”

Thus, he went on to return to reality and underwent the treatment.

With that, the story ends.

“How did it turn out?” you ask?

You likely already know, Mukudori.

Miracles are only miracles because of how infrequently they occur.

◇◇◇

Torne Village

After parting with his friend, Louie began to walk back home.

One of the festival’s main events, the Windstar Dance, would soon begin at the village’s plaza, and he wanted to go there with his mother.

It was an event where families or lovers paired up and danced to their heart’s content. Many from the “other side” would call it a “folk dance.”

Last year, Farica had danced with Shijima, while Louie had danced with Juno. Sadly, Gringham hadn’t had a creature to pair with — not to mention he was too big — so he’d ended up just watching the event.

Remembering the somewhat-downhearted look on the lion’s face made Louie giggle.

Then he remembered Shijima’s excited dancing as Farica led him. Combined with memories of Juno’s weird choreography, it brought a pleasant warmth to his heart.

This year, however, Shijima wasn’t with them. That meant that neither Juno nor Gringham could be here, too, as they were his Embryo and mount. Farica, being pregnant, couldn’t dance, either.

Even so, the Windstar Dance, and the rest of the festival in general, was an event that reminded Louie of the fun times with his family.

If nothing else, he wanted to watch the dance along with his mother. Even if they couldn’t dance this year, he hoped that his whole family would be there next time: Farica, Shijima, Juno, Gringham, and his soon-to-be-born little brother or sister.

“...Huh?” he exclaimed, stopping. Something strange was entering his vision.

It was a mountain not too far from the village. A flash of light burst out of one of its corners, and a short while later, a black object broke out of there and rose towards the skies.

It sounded a voice that could disturb the sanity of anyone listening.

“KyaHahAhahAHahAhaH!”

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

Right after our talk with Tsukikage, we logged back in to Infinite Dendrogram.

We’d talked for about 30 minutes, which was an hour and a half in the game. The Sun was still high up, and the festival still had a lot going for it. But neither I nor B3 were in any mood to enjoy it any further.

“...”

We were both completely silent. What we’d heard from Tsukikage was too damn grim.

Louie was searching for his dad, while Farica was awaiting for her husband to return. But the cold, harsh truth was that they would never see Shijima again.

“...This leaves a bad taste in my mouth,” I muttered.

“Looking back on it, we could have predicted this when Farica suggested that we not search for him,” commented B3. “She already knew that Mr. Shijima was risking his life for something on the ‘other side.’ And the fact that he isn’t back yet... means she probably realizes what happened to him.”

“...I guess so.”

In Infinite Dendrogram, Masters were immortal. But back in reality, we were only human, as prone to death as any living creature.

That was one of the harsh truths of life.

“Even if she had a feeling he was dead,” B3 continued, “she could still believe he was alive somewhere as long as she didn’t know the answer. Farica likely chose to merely wait because she wished to keep that hope alive.”

And that was exactly why she had been troubled by our accepting Louie's request to search for Shijima.

Farica's feelings weren't unlike those of someone whose loved one had gone missing in some calamity or accident. As long as the body wasn't found, she could keep hoping he was alive.

This reminded me of the time when the ship my sister was on had sunk in the Pacific Ocean. When I was told her death was all but certain, I'd cried my eyes out.

Then, after a whole lot of grieving from us, she'd returned back home with a cheery "Hellooo!" as if it were no big deal.

When we'd asked her to explain her survival, shocked to see her...

"Oh, I broke the wall of the sinking ship and swam around in the Pacific Ocean until I found another boat."

I just didn't know what to make of her. Her existence was an enigma.

That was only barely related to the matter at hand, but thinking of my sister lifted my spirits a bit.

"What shall we do, then, Ray?" asked B3.

"Well, we have to decide whether to tell it to them or not..." I said, and sighed. Regardless of whether I did or didn't reveal Mr. Shijima's fate to them, it'd still give me a bad aftertaste.

Both telling them the horrible news and hiding the truth from them were options that made me feel bitter, but...

I steeled myself. "I'll tell them."

"Are you sure?" B3 asked.

"...Yes. If we don't tell them, they'll never learn the truth. Mr. Shijima's fate will be shrouded in darkness for the rest of their lives."

If we didn't reveal it, they would never be able to properly part with him. They would forever be bound by the question of his whereabouts.

"It'll leave a bad taste in my mouth, it's cruel, and they'll probably resent me for it, but... but still, it's something that must be done."

Despite my resolve, the fact that I would have to tell them of Mr. Shijima's death made my body shake.

It scared me. The idea of giving them despair frightened me to no end.

"If that is what you choose, then it's probably for the best," B3 said.

"B3?" I raised an eyebrow.

"You should be the one to decide this. I am not nearly as considerate of NPCs... tians... as you are.” She looked to the festival off in the distance. Both tians and Masters alike were thoroughly enjoying the festivities. “I am what they call a ‘ludo.’ To me, this is nothing but a game.”

I was silent.

“Same goes for tians,” she said. “In my eyes, they are merely highly advanced AIs. If it had been up to me alone, I never would have even answered the request. Learning the truth, I would likely have disappeared from their sight, never actually deciding whether to reveal it or not. But now...”

She momentarily fell silent and looked right into my eyes.

“But now, right here, I see someone who outclasses every player I know in terms of consideration for tians. You see them as lives, grieve for them, and sympathize with them.”

She walked over to me and gently held my shaking hand.

“So please, don’t be afraid of your decision. There’s no Master who cares for them as much as you do.”

Her encouraging words had caused my trembling to fade.

“B3,” I muttered. “Thank you.”

“A good senior helps her junior,” she smiled in response.

Thanks to her, I was now ready. It was time to go and tell them. To reveal to them the truth about—

“KyaHahAhahAHahAhaH!”

A maddened cackle suddenly resounded around us. It was akin to the sound of scraping glass, but it came out as laughter of the purest ridicule.

“What?!” I exclaimed and looked to where it came from — the skies above a nearby mountain.

There, I saw a—

◆◆◆

Torne Village, Outskirts

A few minutes earlier...

“Shit! The assholes at SolCri cost us a bunch of money! We’ve gotta find something to make up for it!”

Ten-odd Masters were inside a mountain not far from Torne.

A group of them stood out, as they all had mohawks. They were the same Mohawk League members who'd faced off against Sol Crisis back at the festival. One of them was vigorously swinging a pickaxe, while another one heaved a tired sigh and spoke up.

"Hhhhaaa... but it's not like we'll find the UBM, right? The story is hundreds of years old, and people say that no one's found anything in the last two years. And hell, it's not like we can win against a UBM."

In response, the vigorous mohawk put up an indomitable smile. "Heh heh heh, I'm not going for anything that big. I just want the meteor!"

"The meteor?"

"Don't you know? In manga and light novels, the meteoric iron you get from meteors is a super strong weapon material. That has to be the same in Dendro."

"Ahh, I see. Even if the UBM is gone, the meteor that hit the creature should still be there."

"Exactly! So let's keep digging!"

"All right, all right."

Thus, they resumed their mining activities.

What they failed to realize was that, if the meteor had been large, all the villages around here would've been obliterated, meaning that the one from the story had to have been small. Even if they kept digging, they would leave empty-handed and return to the festival to try and lift their spirits.

Or so things would have gone, except... they were making a wrong assumption.

The thing they thought had disappeared was still there.

The thing buried beneath, now awakened by the meager amount of light, had realized that there were "torches" above it.

Not only that, but the "torches" it had drastically reduced 300 years ago had increased to incomparably great numbers.

Upon the moment of awakening, it hadn't had the power to escape to the surface. Since then, it had done nothing but wait while consuming the meager amount of light reaching it.

But its wait was now over.

Having absorbed enough light to regain some of its power, it recovered enough strength to escape to the surface.

"ＫｙＡｈａＨ!"

It extended a tentacle upwards — towards the crack leaking light into its tomb.

Having transformed all the light it gathered into MP, it used the crystalline protrusion at the end of it to fire a heat ray reaching thousands of degrees in temperature.

It hit the mark exactly, melting the bedrock and widening the hole to the surface.

That wasn't all. On its way, it hit the unenthusiastic mohawk Master, piercing him through the crotch to the top of his head, instantly evaporating him and giving him the death penalty.

The Master didn't even have a chance to realize what happened, and his friend wasn't quick enough to even notice, much less help. All he saw was his vanishing friend and the melting bedrock.

A moment later, it flew out through the hole.

It was a cracked, non-reflective crystal ball with a three metel diameter. It had black wings of an undefined shape. It had a set of four permeable tentacles with crystalline protrusions at the end.

It had no organs that could be used to express emotion... and yet it cackled.>

It had no mouth or anything that made up a face, and yet its crystalline body creaked out maddened laughter.

“ＫｙＨａｈＡＨａｈＡｈａＨａＨａｈＫｙａＫＹａＨ！”

It spread its dark wings and absorbed all the light that reached it, instantly restoring its MP reserves.

It became rejuvenated and overjoyed at the same time.

After all, there were so, so many “torches” here.

It was as happy and pure as a child about to blow out the candles on his birthday cake.

“Attack!” one of the nearby Masters shouted.

They had yet to realize what it really was, but they had more than enough reason to believe it was a danger and try to stop it with their skills and Embryos.

“ＫｙａＨａｈＡｈａｈＡＨａｈＡｈａＨ！”

But before they could do anything, it flew up. Up and up, higher and higher...

Ignoring all below, it rose to what seemed like thousands of metels above ground, if not more. Eventually, it passed the troposphere and arrived at the stratosphere.

To those below, it was nothing but a dot at this point.

“Did it just... run away?” asked one of the Masters.

The rest of them thought the same.

From there, the monster couldn’t harm them, nor could they attack it. They assumed the monster had felt cornered and escaped as high as it could.

But that couldn’t have been farther from the truth.

Suddenly, there was a flash of light from high above, and a few seconds later, one of the Masters on the surface was set aflame. His hair, the oil of his skin, the clothes on his back were engulfed in ultra-hot fire.

He stopped, dropped, and rolled to try and put it out, but since both his equipment and flesh were melting, that was far from enough, and he soon received the death penalty.

The sight made the other Masters tremble and look up at the sky.

"Eh?"

"No way... From there?!"

It reminded them of what they'd heard at the play.

But no sword or arrow could reach the heights it was in. Some even tried to challenge it atop flying dragons, but not even those large wings could take them high enough.

That play was the very reason why they were here. The words they'd heard there had inspired them to mine this mountain.

However, they had slightly underestimated Blacksky's altitude.

Still, no one could fault them for that, as expecting this would be insanity. After all, what madman could imagine a UBM that has an offensive ability with a range of 10,000 metels and uses it to one-sidedly attack from high up in the atmosphere?

"ＫＹａｈＡｈａｈＡＨａＨａｈＡｈＡＨ!"

Safe from all harm, the creature spread its dark wings even further and consumed all sunlight shining on the planet, effectively turning day into night.

As it ate the light, it used its supreme vision to look at the surface and light the "torches" below.

The heat ray it fired distorted the air around it as it reached the ground and set another Master aflame.

The sight brought it great joy.

Of course it did.

After all, it liked watching the "torches" burn.

Indeed, that was the one thing the play always got wrong. It didn't consume the light from the "torches." Sun and starlight was more than enough to give it the energy it required.

As an entity that ate only light and survived with just that, it had no need to harm any creatures living below.

But it enjoyed burning the "torches."

The sight of them burning, writhing, and dying always brought it great glee.

After all, that was its sole hobby.

"ＫｙａＨａＨ?"

Suddenly, it started to wonder.

If the creature had been human, the thought would have been something like this:

"This" has burned so much of them. But they don't burn like the "torches" "this" likes. There's not enough writhing and despair. Hey, but why? Why?

The Masters' sense of pain was disabled, so the agony of burning alive wasn't there. And it wasn't like they actually died, so their despair wasn't that great, either.

It didn't like that at all.

The torches with the funny patterns on the left hands are boring, it thought. "This" has to burn the torches without them.

It looked over the land below and instantly found what it was looking for.

The lively festival at Torne, bustling with tians.

◆

The disaster that had once attacked Torne arose from its 300 year sleep and once again set its sights on the village.

Its name was "Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome."

It was an Ancient Legendary UBM... and a creature that suspended itself in a domain none could reach.

Chapter Four: Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome

Paladin, Ray Starling

As the unnatural laughter resounded, the mysterious black object breaking free of the mountain rose up to the sky at an incredible speed. Like a rocket, it pierced through the clouds above and stopped when it was nothing but a mere dot in the sky.

A moment later, the heavens surrounding it winked into darkness.

Though evening was still a while away, it suddenly felt like the sun had set hours ago.

It made me recall the night summoned by the aberration, but this was probably the exact opposite cause. While her Superior Embryo had created the night, the dot in the sky was taking the light and effectively robbing the day.

B3 silently took out a binocular-like magic item and used it to look up at the dot. Her expression turned bitter.

"B3... what was that?" I asked.

"A UBM." She handed me the binoculars.

I took a look at the dot and saw a monster that had the appearance of a cracked crystal ball with a set of dark wings. Above it, there was the name "Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome."

"'Black Sky?'" I muttered. "Wait, that's...!"

It had to be "Blacksky," the UBM from the play. The monster from history who'd become the origin of the Windstar Festival.

The thing had been hit by the meteor and buried underground 300 years ago. Had that thing really survived all those centuries without any food or drink?

"So it's a light-eating energy life form... an elemental," said B3. "In that case, it's not too strange that it survived, but that doesn't matter now. What does matter is what it's planning to—"

Before she could finish, Monochrome made its move.

Still high in the sky, it began shooting beams of light. The first few went to the mountain it'd just exited, but then they started landing in the festival crowds. They birthed bursts of raging fire where they hit. Stands, households, and people were set ablaze.

And as though that wasn't enough, the beams didn't stop. They continued to drop like an unrelenting rain.

"KyaHAhAhahAHaaH!♪" the thing that caused them laughed. I could hear it clearly despite the distance between us.

The sound was thick with malice. It felt as though that was its way of telling the victims just how much fun it was having. The burning town, the terrified people, the children crying for their parents — all of it brought it great joy.

It watched the endless fear and tragedy and felt nothing but glee.

"You vile piece of..." I growled.

That monster made me feel exactly the same as when I'd found out about Maise's evils, when I'd faced Gouz-Maise, and when I'd challenged Franklin. My heart was pleading me, saying, Do not stand for this.

"SILVEEEERRRR!" Hearing my roar, my trusty steed appeared out of my inventory.

I jumped on his back, locked my prosthetic's hook on his reins, and used the MP stored in my Grudge-Soaked Greaves to activate Wind Hoof.

"Ray!" cried B3.

"You help Farica and the other tians find shelter!" I shouted. "I'll take care of that thing!"

Without even waiting for a response, I swung the reins and made Silver gallop towards the sky. A second later, the crest on my upper left arm began to shine.

"Ray!" cried Nemesis as she popped out of it, took her greatsword form, and wrapped around my right arm.

"You get the situation?!" I asked.

"Of course! We're shattering that damned crystal, aren't we?!"

"Yeah! That's all you need to know!"

Silver dashed towards the sky at a nearly 90-degree angle as I resisted gravity by charging magic into my prosthetic and adding force to my feet in the stirrups.

“What?” I burst out as I noticed something.

The vertical perspective was giving me a good view of Torne. Looking at it, I saw the silhouettes of four other flying mounts: a gryphon, a hippogryph, a wyvern, and a large skydragon — probably of Pure-Dragon tier.

All of them were being ridden by Masters who’d probably come to enjoy the Windstar Festival.

And now, just like me, they were taking to the sky to slay Monochrome.

“Hey!” the guy on the hippogryph called. “Hey! Aren’t you Ray Starling the Unbreakable?!”

“Yeah! Who are you?”

“I’m Lang, just a Gale Rider without a nickname! Riser told me about you! He’s a long-time member of our clan!”

“You know Riser?!”

“Yes! Anyway, talk about raining on a parade, huh? Let’s join forces and —” Suddenly, Lang’s head completely vanished.

“Wh...?!” I gasped.

In but a flash and without a sound, a beam from above had evaporated his skull. The body left behind was turning to particles of light, while his hippogryph was automatically returned to his Jewel.

“It’s intercepting us!” roared the heavily-armored Master on the Pure-Dragon.

Looking up, I saw the monster’s tentacles twist as their tips were directed at our direction.

“Hah!” chuckled the lightly-armored Master on the gryphon. “It’s like we’re in a shoot ’em up! Getting up close’ll be tough!”

“HyaHAH! We’ve gotta do what we gotta do!” exclaimed the wyvern-rider with a mohawk. “I’ll avenge my clan bro and the tians! We never run from a fight!”

They both made their mounts speed up.

“The beams go straight!” shouted the Master on the Pure-Dragon. “It’s not hard to dodge them! Just watch when the tentacles flash!” He was completely right about that. Though the thing had an immense range, evading its attacks was no challenge, and if we kept this up, it wouldn’t be long until we reached and killed it.

“Whoa, dudes, be careful!” said the mohawk guy. He sounded loud, probably because of some sort of voice-amplifying item. “I was there when it came out! Back then, it melted the bedrock and my clan bro in one hit, but when it shot from the sky, it just made the target burn! It means the beam power is inversely proportional to distance!”

“Ah, so its effective range is lower than the 10,000 meter actual range!” shouted the Pure-Dragon Master.

Basically, the real danger would begin when we got close to that monster.

If the power of the beams is still low, that means that Lang was instakilled only because it hit his head... Man, what an unlucky guy.

I heard a sound behind me and turned to see what caused it. “Hm?”

There were fiery fumes floating somewhere around the halfway point between us and the surface. It looked somewhat like a missile explosion.

“That’s exactly it,” said Nemesis upon reading my mind. “Someone on the surface fired a missile — most likely an Embryo skill — but it was shot down by the fiend’s beams.”

Being in weapon form expanded her field of vision, so she could see what was happening both above and below us.

Though the few of us here were the only ones who’d risen to the sky, someone left on the surface was trying to do something, as well.

“The missiles aren’t the only attacks coming from there, mind you,” she added. “But all the others, too, are being shot down by the beams.”

“All of them, huh?”

And yet, despite that, the remaining four of us flying riders were in peak condition. It was probably because we could dodge the beams, but I still found it pretty odd.

It felt like the monster was prioritizing stopping the attacks from the surface, as if there was no need to take care of us.

“Geez... Just how far is the damn thing?!” complained the gryphon Master, and I shared his sentiment.

Monochrome had started out at about 10,000 meters up in the sky, and though we were nearing that altitude right now, the distance between us still seemed about the same. The thing was actually rising even higher.

“Keh! What’s with its range?! It’s insane!” the mohawk guy complained, but he was probably reading the situation wrong.

“Indeed,” Nemesis agreed with my thought. “Its original altitude appears to have been the limit of its range. The beams have stopped reaching the surface."

Exactly. 10,000 meters was more or less the maximum distance those beams could reach before losing all their power and dispersing. But that had nothing to do with Monochrome's own maximum altitude. It could rise above that limit, and it wasn't hesitating to do so in order to avoid us.

There probably was a maximum height it could reach. At the very least, I hoped it couldn't leave into outer space, but even if it could, we had bigger problems.

"Ah...! Cra...p!" exclaimed the gryphon Master. His voice was starting to sound distant and meek.

Of course it did. We were 12,000 meters above the ground. The air here was many times thinner than on the surface.

"He...y, this is ba...d! My bod...y ca...n't hand...le this..."

This wasn't an environment that could support life. Even the jumbo jets in reality didn't go above 10,000 meters. The air beyond that point was way too sparse to allow long-term flight. The air density, temperature, and pressure here were far too low to allow the survival of any living thing, and even majestic flying monsters like gryphons and wyverns weren't welcome here. Unless we were supported by high stats, we Masters would either faint or freeze to death.

Monochrome, however, was still 10,000 meters above us, and it was only going higher.

Again, there might be a limit to how far it could rise. But even if it couldn't leave the atmosphere and escape to outer space, the limit for living creatures came far earlier.

That was the reason why it had focused on the attacks from the surface — it had known that none of us could reach it.

"Khh...! Sorr...y, I'm backi...ng o...ut...!"

"Shi...t...!"

The gryphon Master and the wyvern-riding mohawk had no choice but to give up. The Pure-Dragon was still holding out, but its movements had become too dull to be able to dodge the beam storm. It roared in pain as they burned its body, eventually piercing its wings and making it fall.

"Khh! Reca...ll!"

The Pure-Dragon's Master prioritized the mount's survival and returned it back to the jewel. Without anything to keep him in the air, the Master began to fall.

Crashing from this height would definitely give him the death penalty, but he was probably more than aware of that. After all, the look in his eyes was basically saying, “I’m leaving it all to you.”

“So we are the last ones,” sighed Nemesis.

“...Yeah.”

Silver was a Prism Steed, not a living being, so he could fly higher than the other mounts. Even I could survive thanks to his Wind Hoof. The skill created a faint membrane of compressed air that shielded me from the cold, oxygen-less atmosphere. But alas, our limit wasn’t far away, regardless of those facts.

“Ah!” I gasped as Silver suddenly stumbled.

Or, rather, the compressed air beneath his hoof collapsed under our weight.

I’d known it was gonna happen eventually. After all, Silver’s “flying” was actually “walking on hardened air.”

Here in the stratosphere, 15,000 meters above the surface, the air was far too thin for his Wind Hoof to form footing strong enough to support us, and giving him extra magic wouldn’t be enough to help.

Even the barrier that protected my life was on the verge of being broken by the beams grazing it. The surrounding air had less and less oxygen and more and more hazardous ozone. Going any higher would put me in danger of instant death the moment the barrier broke.

“Tch!” I looked up and saw that the distance between me and Monochrome was still as great as before.

“ＫｙＡＨａｈＡｈａＨａＨ!” It laughed raucously, and I couldn’t help but feel it was directed at us. Despite the overwhelming distance and the air around us being nearly nonexistent, I could hear its cackling all too clearly.

“That is most likely a skill,” said Nemesis. “One developed for the sole purpose of ridicule.”

“...”

Beams that could reach a whole 10,000 meters away, an ability to ascend into the stratosphere, a skill to mock its victims... All of its powers were focused on looking down on other creatures and completely extinguishing them.

“Ray! This is the limit!” Nemesis shouted. “We can’t go any higher!”

Silver began to slow down. He could no longer create enough compressed air to keep up with his galloping.

Not only that, but Monochrome now focused all its beams exclusively on us, and my steed just couldn’t evade them all.

We simply had no means of going higher and reaching the monster.

“Gh! We’re backing out!” I growled, trying not to give in to the rage storming within me, and ordered Silver to travel back to the surface.

He quickly turned around and began half-falling, half-galloping downwards.

Of course, that wasn’t enough for Monochrome to stop its attacks.

“ＫｙＡＨａＡａａＡａ!” it laughed, making me turn to look at it.

I saw all four of its tentacles flash and release the beams directly towards us. It clearly didn’t intend to let us retreat.

I gasped slightly, then took to action and roared, “Third form!”

“As you wish!” Nemesis instantly turned into the circular shield, and I used her to block the beams.

Upon hitting her surface, the deadly rays were dispersed to the sides.

The residual heat grazed both me and Silver, but there was little damage to speak of.

As expected, the shield’s defensive ability was on a whole different level than the greatsword’s and halberd’s. Though these beams were weakened by the nearly-10,000 meter distance they traveled, stopping them all without using Counter Absorption was no doubt an impressive feat.

“...What? It’s charging? Because of something other than standard damage...?” Nemesis muttered, but I was obviously too busy to listen.

Our resolute descent was almost perfectly vertical, so I fervently held the reins and tightened my legs around Silver to keep me from falling off.

Soon enough, we were over 10,000 meters away from Monochrome and escaped the range of its beams.

A few minutes later, we were back on solid ground.

“...Gh,” I vocalized my frustration. Sure, it was good that we returned alive and all, but that was synonymous with running away from that damn thing. It made me feel bitter, to say the least.

“The sheltering is... going well, it seems,” I muttered.

There were no people in our landing spot, but at the village, I saw a bunch of Masters protecting tons of tourists, helping them find a place to hide. Other Masters were looking up at the sky, thoroughly alert and ready for more beams.

There was no point in that right now, though, since the surface was still outside Monochrome’s range.

“KyAHakYahaKyaHaH!” Its laughter resounded despite the distance, bringing fear into the people’s hearts.

I knew that better than most, since my Grudge-Soaked Greaves were absorbing the surrounding negative emotions and turning them into magic.

The monster laughed again to induce terror while preparing to attack the moment the village was in its range again.

“At least it’s descending pretty slowly,” I said.

On our way down to the surface, I’d realized that it couldn’t go down as fast as it went up. Its descent was nothing compared to its rocket-like ascent. In fact, it was actually slower than free fall.

From what I could see, it would take about 30 minutes for it to return back to a range from which it could attack.

That was good. Considering that we now had more time to help people find shelter, our charge hadn’t been in vain.

“It’s grace, indeed, but we still have no means of shattering the crystal itself,” said Nemesis upon returning to her human form.

In her tone, I heard both vexation... and an unyielding fighting spirit.

We couldn’t even reach Monochrome, much less harm it, and yet she hadn’t given up. I was with her in that regard, of course.

“There’s another thing I noticed about it,” I said. “The thing’s probably not that tough.”

It had been shooting down all the anti-air attacks heading towards it. That might’ve been its way of showing its superiority, but what if it actually couldn’t allow a single attack to hit it?

“What’s your basis for that?” asked Nemesis.

“There’s a wound on the crystal ball making up its body.”

Looking at it through B3’s binoculars, I’d seen a pretty large crack, and since not one Master here had landed a single hit on it since it appeared...

“That has to be an old wound,” I said. “It’s probably the damage it got when it was hit by the meteor."

According to the play, it'd been shot down from the sky and buried deep within the earth for several centuries. However, the venerated meteor probably hadn't been all that large or powerful.

If it had been huge, it would've had obliterated both Monochrome and the surrounding villages, leaving no one to tell the tale. Therefore, it had to have been small enough to do next to no damage to the landscape.

Gouz-Maise or any of the tough UBMs Shu'd told me about could either bear such a meteor with their stats alone or easily regenerate from the wound it caused. Monochrome, on the other hand, had suffered great damage and hadn't even recovered from it yet.

From what I could tell, its fast ascent power, extreme range, and the ability to absorb light came at a cost of HP, END, and regenerative ability.

"This is just my intuition speaking, but I feel that a Vengeance with about as much charge as we used on Gouz-Maise would be enough to break it. Hell, even half of that might work."

And it was perfectly possible to charge that much by just letting the beams hit me and healing with consumables and my BR Armor.

"The problem is that we have no way to hit it," she said.

That was still the biggest issue with this monster. Even if it was one of the most physically weak UBMs, that wouldn't mean anything if we couldn't land a single attack on it.

"Living creatures can't get to it because it's up in the stratosphere, while attacks from the surface get intercepted. With that in mind, I can think of only two ways of dealing with it."

"Which would be?" asked Nemesis.

"Either we use an attack that ignores distance, like Xunyu's ultimate skill... or we use an anti-air attack that can't be stopped by its beams."

We didn't have Xunyu with us, so the former wasn't an option, and based on the fact that all the anti-air attacks had been shot down, no one here had any skills that fit the latter requirement. And of course, we were no exception to that.

Because of that, I thought the latter method just couldn't be put into practice, but...

Nemesis was silent. She seemed to have something else on her mind. At last, she said, "Ray, may I return to the crest for a moment?"

"What?"

Why now, of all times? I wondered.

"I am about halfway through the analysis of the third form."

Wait, do you mean that... "...the third form's skill can work on that thing?"

"It's not impossible. Although I must admit that what I've analyzed so far has more holes in it than swiss cheese. But I made progress when we shielded against its attacks."

When we shielded? B3 told us that the skill analysis speeds up when doing actions related to the skill. Is that what happened?

"The third form's skill is most likely similar to both Vengeance is Mine and Counter Absorption," she added.

"Wait, so..."

"What I know for certain at this point is that it's an offensive skill that accumulates damage from enemies and can only be used once per day."

So it basically combined the limitations of both Vengeance and Counter Absorption, which made it safe to assume it was more powerful than Vengeance. We still didn't know if the skill could reach Monochrome, though.

"This will be a double gamble," Nemesis continued. "We need to pray that the analyzed skill can harm the fiend... and hope we can use it well. If either of those don't come to fruition, we will be left helpless."

"But the possibility is there, isn't it?" I asked.

"Certainly."

Her answer made me form a faint smile. "Then..."

"...Your answer is already decided, correct?" She returned a smirk of her own.

Man, it's always the same with us, huh? I thought, drawing parallels between the current situation and our fights against Gardranda and Gouz-Maise.

In spite of everything at stake, the moments when Nemesis and I gambled on the future we believed in heartened and assured me like nothing else could.

"Get on that analysis, then," I said. "I'm counting on you."

"As you should. Expect only the best, Ray," she replied as she returned to my crest.

I gently caressed the mark before looking up at the sky, where I saw the malicious black grain of sand that was Monochrome slowly descend towards the surface.

There were a little under 30 minutes left before Torne was in its range. I could only hope that the analysis would be complete before then.

“KyaHAhaHahAhaH!” it cackled, as if to announce its approach.

I felt obligated to respond, and said, “I’ll shut you up... for good.”

The battle was only just beginning.

◇

“Is this an air-raid shelter?” I muttered as I looked up at a half-spherical building that hadn’t been there before.

I could see two other structures exactly like it, too. They’d probably been made by the cooperation between people with earth magic skills or Masters with earth-manipulating Embryos. Their material was the land itself, so they looked like they were buried in the ground.

Additionally, the structures’ surfaces were emitting a faint light. That was probably the result of some sort of barrier skills they were channeling in preparation for the attacks.

I had no idea whether those structures could take Monochrome’s close beams point-blank, but they could probably hold against its 10,000 meter range beams for a while.

I entered one of the shelters and walked around the crowds of tourists and villagers, searching for B3, Louie, and Farica.

We had about 20 minutes until Monochrome could attack us again, and Nemesis was still analyzing the skill, so I thought I’d spend this time by going to B3 and explaining the situation.

Finding her didn’t take too long.

“Let me go! Please!”

She was with Farica.

“I’m sorry, but I cannot allow you to exert yourself and risk hurting your baby...” B3 said.

The woman was desperately trying to leave the shelter, while B3 was holding her back. As I tried to understand what was happening here, I discovered that Louie wasn't with them.

A bad feeling came over me as I walked up to them and called out, "B3!"

"Ray, how did it go with Monochro—"

There was a menacing cackle from outside.

"Oh, I see." She instantly realized that the problem hadn't been solved yet.

"And what's going on here?" I asked.

"It's Louie!" cried Farica. "We can't find him anywhere!"

"He's not in the shelter?!"

"Right," nodded B3. "We looked in the other shelters, as well, but he wasn't there, either. According to one of his friends, right before Monochrome appeared, Louie went to invite Mrs. Farica to the dance."

"Ah!" I gasped. That meant that Louie had been all by himself at the start of the monster's rampage. I imagined the worst case scenario, and it made a chill go down my spine.

"I'll search for him!" I exclaimed.

"Let me join you," said B3. "Please wait here, Mrs. Farica."

"But Louie is..."

"For his sake, please don't go anywhere!"

After making sure she wasn't going to leave, we hurried out of the shelter.

Louie's life was in danger, so we had to find him as soon as possible.

Not much time was left until Monochrome's attacks would restart.

Please don't be hurt, I thought as B3 and I got on Silver and began frantically searching the village.

Interlude: Family

Torne Village

Louie was in one of the village's stone windmills, curled up and crying in fear.

The moment of Monochrome's first attacks, Louie had been on his way back home. Thankfully, due to having been away from the festival crowds, he hadn't been targeted by the monster, and had made it out completely unhurt. Nevertheless, the sight of the burning village had terrorized him into a panic, spurring him to run for it until he'd stumbled upon this windmill on the side of the road.

Going inside it had been no mistake. It did a good job hiding Louie from Monochrome's gaze, and it was too far away from the other houses to catch the fire. However, this place was nothing but a dead end for him.

Though it kept him safe from the immediate danger, he would instantly be burned by the fiend if he went out. The mill was both his shelter and his prison.

"Ohh..." he cried, all curled up in the corner.

The resounding cackling of the monster terrified him to no end, and the solitude made him feel helpless, but more than anything, he couldn't stop worrying about his mother, who, he thought, was still at home.

"If Dad were here, he'd..."

He'd save us just like he did back then, he thought.

This actually wasn't a situation that Shijima could have handled, but young Louie wasn't in a state of mind to consider that. Like the child that he was, Louie just wanted his father to save him.

The boy had adored Shijima ever since they'd met four years ago. Being his savior and an ultra-strong Master, the man was a real hero to him.

However, Louie's admiration was the kind you'd direct at superstars or famous sportsmen; Shijima definitely wasn't a father figure to him.

Because of that, he didn't know how to feel about Farica and Shijima getting married.

The boy's heart was rejecting the idea that Shijima was his dad now. His love and respect for the man was there there, but not his ability to see anything fatherly about him, which was perfectly normal for a child whose mother had just remarried.

That sentiment made it hard for the boy to idolize the man like before, and it started to create an awkward distance between them.

Shijima began living with them, and Louie behaved around him like a stranger, rather than the family they'd now become.

Neither Farica nor Shijima said anything about that. They believed that, regardless of how the boy went about it, Louie had to find the compromise by himself — by his own will. Because of this, Gringham and Juno were soon acting more worried than the parents.

After a whole month of awkwardness, the family came across a turning point — a visit to a certain grave at the capital.

It was the death anniversary of Louie's biological father, so they went to clean it up and decorate it with flowers.

The man had been a plain Carpenter who'd lost his life slipping off a roof and falling to the pavement below. The angle at which he'd hit the ground was so unfortunate that he'd died in an instant, not giving any time for healing magic to save him.

After cleaning the grave, presenting the flowers, and giving a prayer, Louie and Farica left the graveyard and prepared to return home, but that was when the boy realized they'd left their cleaning tools back at the grave.

"Wait here, Mom, I'll go get them!" he told Farica before speeding away.

Back at his father's grave, Louie found someone he hadn't expected.

It was Shijima, the man they'd parted from after traveling together to the capital. The man had told them he had business to attend to.

He placed some lit incense before Louie's father's grave, placed his hands together, and closed his eyes.

Shijima was so focused on his task that he didn't even noticed Louie hide behind one of the other graves.

After a long, silent prayer, the man silently spoke up, saying, "For as long as I draw breath, I will make sure they're happy."

Those were words directed at the person who'd protected Shijima's most cherished people before he'd come into their lives.

"So please... watch over us."

They were a promise to the man who was no longer with them.

Louie didn't come out of hiding and merely watched the scene, but it had a profound effect on him, culminating with a single thought:

Oh, he... he's a dad.

From that day forth, Louie slowly started to warm up to Shijima again, and they went on to become a happy father and son.

The Windstar Festivals the family visited after that were some of the best memories of Louie's life so far.

This one, however, was drastically unlike those.

"Why is this happening...?" Louie cried.

He was spending this Windstar Festival curling up, alone, and scared out of his mind.

Last year, he'd had his father with him, along with Gringham and Juno, but now, they were nowhere in sight.

He was even separated from his mother, leaving him shivering in solitude on the mill's cold stone floor while the dreadful cackling from above terrorized his heart.

"I want my mommy... a-and daddy too..." he continued to cry, with no one there to hear him.

◇◇◇

???

You might end up being released. If that happens, I won't be able to give you any orders. But if you... if the days we spent here are as much of a treasure to you as they are to me... if you see us as your family... then there's something I want you to do.

As those important words went through his mind, he slowly opened his eyes to find himself in a highly familiar landscape.

He'd been asleep for a full two seasons. Much had changed. And upon examining his current state, he realized that he'd lost his bond to someone he deeply adored, which made him profoundly sad.

"Eh...?" He then noticed that something was wrong with the sky.

He didn’t feel like it was night, and yet it was strangely dark, not to mention that there was an unpleasant laughter coming from high above.

Though the sound slightly annoyed him, he didn’t care about it too much.

However, the cackling was mixed with another sound — one he couldn’t ignore even if he tried.

After all, how could he disregard the cries of a child who was so precious to him? How could he act like he didn’t hear the weeping of a member of his family?

“GROAAAAAHHHHHHH!” roared the man as he kicked the ground beneath his four feet. He would give his heart and soul to run towards the voice. To protect his nearest and dearest.

Chapter Five: B. B. B.

Paladin, Ray Starling

“Where will we search for him?” asked B3.

“We’ll run around the festival plaza and the roads between the buildings!” I replied. “You keep looking around!”

“All right.”

We rode Silver as he galloped through the burning village.

Just an hour ago, it had been overflowing with people enjoying the festivities with bright smiles on their faces, but now, it looked completely deserted, and the only remnants of that fun were the countless windstars with their blades burned off.

Torne was filled with a blackness much like that of Monochrome itself. Burned and darkened remains were spread out as far as the eye can see. Homes, cattle, and even people had been bathed in fire and reduced to charred shadows of what they once were.

Hoping that Louie hadn’t ended up like that, I frantically searched for him.

B3 poked my side.

“...?” I raised an eyebrow. She seemed to have noticed something.

“My Killing Intent Perception skill is flaring up,” she whispered into my ear.

I gasped and asked, “Is it Monochrome?”

“No, it’s not. There are multiple sources, and all of them are approaching us.”

“Eh?” It took me a moment to process that.

Before I could ask her who could attack us now, of all times, I heard an odd set of words.

“Dreams of Electric Sheep — Gremlin!”

A moment later, Silver lost control of his legs and collapsed sideways, the running momentum taking him a fair distance forward.

I was still holding his reins with my prosthetic, so I fell along with him.

B3, on the other hand, instantly jumped off and landed beautifully.

"Gh... what the hell just happened?" I let go of Silver's reins and stood up. "Silver, what's wrong?!"

Still on his side, he wasn't moving. He didn't even twitch or anything like that. It was as though he was broken, malfunctioning like the machine he was, and I couldn't make sense of it at all.

"That thing won't be moving for half a day," said someone behind me. I turned around to see a malicious-looking man wearing a bandana with a mark depicting a black circle over a red one.

He wasn't alone. B3 and I were now surrounded by a group of ten-odd Masters bearing the same mark.

"Gremlin's this guy's Embryo. It turns off machines and stuff," the bandana guy said while scratching his chin and pointing at the man next to him, who formed a mean grin.

"So you're the ones who stopped Silver," I said. "What's your problem?"

"We've got some business with you, Ray Starling the Unbreakable," the bandana guy said.

It definitely wasn't the first time I'd been called by that nickname. That Lang guy I'd met before had used it, too. Unlike him, though, this man here didn't seem friendly at all.

"We're Sol Crisis, the PK clan," he said. "I'm the leader, Dum-dum Dan. Call me 'Dum-dum.' Not like that matters. We won't know each other for long."

Sol Crisis? I thought. Well, now that I think about it, some of them seem familiar.

They were the ones who'd wrangled with those mohawks at the stalls. The armor guy wasn't with them, though.

"Guess there's no point in asking what you want from me," I said.

They were a PK clan, so it was kinda obvious that they wanted to PK me. They'd made it hard for me to escape, and then come out to introduce themselves to make it easy for them to prove they'd defeated the Unbreakable later. There would be no point in killing me in a surprise attack and making it hard to tell who did it.

Hell, some small man in work clothes was actually filming this, so their motive was all too clear.

“Can’t you leave it for after Monochrome is taken care of?” I asked. “I’ve got something more important to do.”

“Not happening,” said Dum-dum. “Now’s the perfect chance.”

What?

“Sol Crisis is pretty well-known now, but we don’t have any real achievements to our name, so we wanna do something big and make our name blow up for real.”

“...Then why don’t you just kill Monochrome?” I demanded.

“Come on, dude, tons of people have killed UBMs at this point. It ain’t all that special. Not to mention that we can’t even touch the damn thing. Trying to take it out is just stupid. I mean, really, even you ran away.”

I had no counterargument to that.

Still, the fact that someone who was doing nothing against Monochrome was making fun of everyone who’d tried to fight it was seriously pissing me off.

“So yeah, we can’t beat the UBM up there, but it’s all good, since we’ve got some way better game right here. It survived against a goddamn Superior and the self-proclaimed strongest PK clan, despite not even being level 100. If that ain’t top-tier game, I don’t know what is.” The bandana guy named Dum-dum pointed at me and grinned. “I’m talking about you, guy.”

Well, I got their motive right, at least.

“Now’s not the time for this, damn it!” I shouted.

“Kyah ha ha! You dumbass! It’s the perfect time for this!” someone other than Dum-dum replied.

I looked over at the source of the voice and saw a guy in full armor surpassing three meters in height. The charred buildings at his sides were crumbling. It definitely wasn’t the first time I’d seen that armor. I’d seen it back at the capital’s fountain and here in Torne, during the wrangle between Sol Crisis and Mohawk League.

Wait, I think I’ve seen it elsewhere, too...

“When you were in Gideon, we couldn’t take you out ’cause of all the rankers and KoD, but now, that woman’s the only one with ya!” he laughed out loud. “And there’s no one here to bother us, either! You’re a really fucking easy target right now!”

He seemed pretty pleased about the situation.

"So yeah, that's how it is," said Dum-dum. "We also did our homework and found out you're not too hot when fighting lots of people and when the fight drags on. Think you can hold out against us?"

I was silent. He wasn't wrong about that. My defense had a limited number of uses, so prolonged fights against many people were my bane.

Damn you, Franklin. I'm too well-known now.

"Not to mention we've got a secret weapon — me!" roared the armor guy. "Name's Barbaroy! I'm the sub-leader of Sol Crisis and the strongest one here!"

"Hh?!" I gasped as a sudden chill went down my spine.

The moment he'd said those words, there was a surge of overwhelming rage and killing intent. However, it didn't come from the armor guy, but from my side. I turned and saw my only ally on the scene.

"Heh heh," she giggled.

Indeed — B3 was the source of the surge. I didn't know why, but she was emitting an aura so intimidating, it couldn't even be compared to the one she'd had when fighting K&R yesterday. It was strong enough to make me shiver, yet she looked as composed as ever.

...No, scratch that. I looked and noticed that her shield's handle was bent.

For some reason, the armor guy was making her really mad.

"That armor has a nice design," she said.

"Kyah ha ha! I know, right?" laughed the armor guy. "It's the one and only Gunhammer Plate, Magnum Colossus! A special reward I got from a UBM!"

"Oh my, that is quite impressive."

The armor guy continued to flaunt his gear, completely oblivious to B3's murderous aura.

"Now, if I may ask... who are you to be wearing such armor?" she smiled. I hadn't known her for long, but even I could tell she was faking it.

"Kyah ha ha ha! I already introduced myself!" he laughed again. "And what, ya can't tell by my armor? You don't know much, do ya?"

"...Perhaps. So, may I have your name?"

Armor dude, please stop. B3's murderous aura is turning so strong that she's scaring me more than the aberration. I don't know what's going on here, but you're clearly walking on a minefield.

“Kyah ha ha ha! I’m Barbaroy Bad Burn the ‘Crushing Canopy’! I’m the man who used to lead Mad Castle, and now I’m the sub-leader of Sol Crisis! There! Satisfied?!”

“I see.”

I have no idea how I am the only one here who feels the aura... I thought. Hm? Wait.

“Hold on. ‘Barbaroy’?” I muttered to myself. That name seemed familiar...

“Ah,” I exclaimed as I glanced at B3, then at my party’s stat summary. Suddenly, it all made sense. I understood why B3 was so mad, and what kind of person this armor dude was.

“Huhh? What’s up, Unbreakable, ya don’t know me, either?” he asked.

“Oh no, I do,” I replied. “‘Barbaroy Bad Burn,’ huh? Yeah, I know that name very well.”

“Kyah ha ha! Of course ya do! Try using Reveal or Identification if you want. See for yourself.”

The fact he mentioned those skills probably meant that you’d see exactly what he claimed you would, but I more or less knew what was happening here, so that didn’t matter to me.

“Killing you will make my and Sol Crisis’s fame skyrocket even higher! Man, am I glad I saw you back at that fountain yesterday!”

“Damn, dude, you sure are hyped,” commented Dum-dum. “I gotta say, though, when you told me you’d seen that guy alone at the capital, I thought it was just an early April Fools.”

“Kyah ha ha! C’mon, leader, you know you can trust me!”

Oh, yeah, it’s April Fools’ Day in reality right now, I thought. Talk about timing. This whole situation feels like a bad joke.

“Ray,” B3 spoke up.

“Yes?”

“Leave them to me and go search for Louie.”

“Well, we wouldn’t want him to get hurt while we’re dealing with these guys,” I conceded. “Is it really a good idea to leave them all to you, though?”

“Yes. In fact, let me have them,” she said as she lightly pushed me.

I nodded and went to retrieve Silver, who was still immobile. After putting him back in my inventory, I hurried away from there.

“Hey! Don’t think you can escape!” shouted the armor guy. The whole of Sol Crisis moved to stop me, but before they could do anything...

“Heaven’s Weight!” B3 activated the gravity field she’d used on Rosa, pushing the PKers to the ground.

They were rendered incapable of doing anything to me, so I quickly made my escape.

I left Sol Crisis to B3 and focused entirely on searching for Louie.

But man, some people sure have some weird ideas, I thought. I mean, there’s just no way that trick can work for long.

◇◇◇

Torne Village

“I... I can’t move!”

“What the hell?! M-My bones are breaking!”

“Is this a gravity field? Wait, don’t tell me that...”

None of the people Ray had left behind were moving.

To be precise, there was one person who didn’t move, while the rest of them just couldn’t move.

The latter were the Sol Crisis members, bound by a high gravity field, while the former was B3 — its creator.

She looked down on them as she reached into her inventory and took out a Job Crystal. It was a consumable that allowed the user to switch their main job.

B3 shattered the Crystal, changing her main job from Shield Giant to something else.

“Now then,” she said in a cool tone as she leisurely walked up to the armored man. “There are three things I feel I must point out to you, Mister ‘Barbaroy.’”

She gently touched one of the protrusions on his armor and just tore it off.

“Huh?! How the fuck are you do—?!”

“It’s not hard enough,” B3 cut Barbaroy’s words short and forced her fist into his abdomen.

She wasn’t using her bare hands. While no one was paying attention, she’d equipped a pair of gigantic gauntlets.

That description really was apt, for they seemed like a pair of metallic gloves a giant would wear. Not only that, but they looked very much like the gauntlets from Barbaroy's armor set, which, by the way, now had a number of cracks around its abdominal area.

"The real Magnum Colossus isn't nearly as fragile," B3 continued. Her tone had little emotion to it, making her give off the vibe of someone telling an apprentice cook about their mistake. "Although the appearance is good, you should have used a tougher metal."

In contrast to her mild mannerisms, her attack had left Barbaroy completely bewildered and barely able to breathe.

"Next point. I checked your name using Reveal, and true, it's 'Barbaroy Bad Burn.' However..." she stopped for a moment and cracked a faint grin. "On my screen, in my language... It's written in katakana."

As Barbaroy, on his knees, groaned because of the punch, B3 placed her foot on his head and stepped down on it.

Barbaroy's helm sunk a bit into the ground, but it was unable to withstand the impact and shattered, revealing a feeble-looking man.

"Th-The hell are you talking about...?" he asked. Losing his helmet made his voice lose its echo and with that, its power.

"The real Barbaroy Bad Burn's name isn't written in Japanese katakana," she explained with an emotionless voice. "I know it's hard to tell when we have the translation feature, but it's nothing you couldn't find out with a little bit of research."

B3 opened a window and showed him her status summary.

"The real one's name uses the English alphabet," she continued. "Like so..."

The window displayed B3's — B.B.B.'s — full name.

Plain as day, written in clear English, was "Barbaroy Bad Burn."

"Huh?!"

"Ahh... Thought as much," B3 said.

"Eh?"

"Wh-What's going on here?!"

Some Sol Crisis members reacted with mere surprise, while others looked thoroughly confused. Barbaroy — or, rather, the one who claimed to be Barbaroy — and Dum-dum, along with a couple of others, were the ones who seemed merely surprised. The latter were far more numerous.

"Oh, I see you haven't told your entire clan that you're a fake," B3 commented.

"N-No...!" said the armor man. "I'm Barbaroy and I'm wearing the Magnum Colossus! Reveal and Identification can prove it!"

"Yes, and that makes the truth that much easier to see. You have an Embryo that lets you falsify names, don't you?" She exposed his lie with a forced smile on her face. "Swindler and similar jobs have the 'Falsify Name' skill, but that can be exposed with a high level Reveal or Truth Discernment. Your Embryo has a skill that's above those two. Simple as that. After all, an Embryo skill's effect is much stronger when it's more restricted."

Ultimate superior job skills like Franklin's Analyzing Eye of Wisdom could probably expose the man, but luckily — or perhaps unluckily — the fake Barbaroy had never encountered anyone with such abilities.

"I considered that it could be a skill from a special reward," B3 continued, “but I cannot imagine someone wearing that fake armor ever becoming an MVP.”

“Gnhh...!” The fake Barbaroy didn’t know how to respond.

“It’s a great skill for tricking people, and pretending to be an influential player to make your clan more prestigious is definitely a good application of it. However, there is a limit to how many members you can gain before the truth comes out. From what I can see, many of them here did not know about this.”

Indeed, about half of the members present had thought that their Barbaroy was the real one, and many of them had joined just because of the name’s reputation. Now that the truth had come out, they gave suspicious glares to the members who’d known about this.

“That’s why you targeted Ray — you wanted the prestige.” B3 continued. “And when you were done with him and had an actual achievement to your name, you planned to make up a reason why Barbaroy had to leave and make him do exactly that. The prestige your clan would have then would be just enough to fool people and make them come to you even if you didn’t have him anymore.”

“Y-You bi— Stop!” The fake Barbaroy tried to shut her up, but he couldn’t move because he was far too close to B3, giving him the full effects of Heaven’s Weight: ultra high gravity and the Binding debuff. He simply didn’t have the STR to break free.

“The reason why you chose Barbaroy is simple — it’s because you cannot change appearances. Be it a battle or a public place, Barbaroy is known to always wear full armor, and that made him an easy choice, correct?” She momentarily stopped and looked down on the fake. “Your other options weren’t nearly as good. The Superior Killer was decent, but no one knows his name, so it would’ve been difficult to prove you were the real thing. The Unsheath and King of Burglary’s faces are too well-known for your plan to work, while the King of Crimes is in the gaol, so he is not even an option. You ended up choosing Barbaroy through simple elimination.”

“N-No! Don’t believe her! I’m the real deal!” shouted the fake.

“Well, let’s see you prove it, then,” B3 said as she freed him from the effects of Heaven’s Weight.

Being able to move again, the fake slowly stood up, then gasped as he realized what she meant.

"If you're truly the real Barbaroy, defeat me all by yourself and turn this situation around. Of course, I won't be holding back, either."

"Ghnhh..."

The fake couldn't even bring himself to nod to that, and that was more than enough to show how unauthentic he was.

"I'm a fake..." he gave in and admitted.

The members who'd been fooled began jeering at him.

"You tricked us!"

"Fuck! I can't believe I let this faker act like hot shit!"

"S-Screw you! Don't act like you didn't use Barbaroy's name to extort tons of money from people!"

The ones who were in on the plan retaliated, splitting Sol Crisis into two sides. Their relentless arguing resulted in lots of noise.

"Shut up." But all of it stopped with just those silent, yet extremely menacing, words.

Needless to say, the one who spoke them was B3 — the most infuriated person on the scene.

"Excuse me, but there's no need for you to quarrel. Regardless of anything you say, I'm about to kill you all."

The ones who were tricked argued against that.

"W-We were cheated!"

"It's not my fault! I don't have anything to do with this!"

"But you did use Barbaroy's name to rob people, didn't you?" B3 pointed out. "The fee for that will be your life. In fact, I am a player killer, so I do not need such excuses. Someone opposes me? I merely kill them all."

Her words made all of Sol Crisis, torn apart by the lie, unwittingly become one again. The gravity field made it impossible for them to escape, so they all were aware now that they were about to be massacred.

"Anyway, I suppose this isn't something you say so deep into a conversation, but I am quite upset right now," B3 continued.

Yeah, we can tell, they thought in response. The way she'd treated the fake was more than enough to see that she was furious.

"Do you understand why am I so angry?"

"B-Because we used Barbaroy's name...?" asked the fake.

"No. I actually don't mind that you chose Barbaroy as the imitation. Well, it's true that the low armor strength, low stats, and general lack of research somewhat vexes me, but the fact that someone used the name means that it holds enough weight to be used, so it's definitely not the focus of my anger."

"Th-Then why...?"

"There are two reasons," she said in an ominously gentle tone. "The first one is the fact that you used the name of the leader of Mad Castle on the sub-leader of your third-rate clan."

The members of Sol Crisis needed a moment to process what she'd just said, but they instantly understood just how mad she was. Her ferocious expression and fiery eyes spoke volumes about her rage.

"Th-Third rate?!" howled the fake. "You makin' light of us?"

"Heh heh heh. Yours is a clan that acts all big and tough when all you have is borrowed fame. If that isn't third-rate, I have no idea what is." B3 chuckled. "And despite being so lowly, you had the gall to disgrace both Barbaroy and Mad Castle, effectively putting that clan below your third-rate Sol Crisis."

Indeed, the true reason for her anger was her feelings for the now-gone clan. She had nothing against someone else using her name, but bringing it down was simply unacceptable in her eyes.

"Barbaroy Bad Burn isn't forgiving enough to ignore this."

B3's tone was composed, but the pressure she was emitting was immeasurable, making Sol Crisis realize what just kind of beast they'd been dancing with.

"As for the other reason why I'm upset..." she continued as she raised another finger on her giant gauntlets. "You stood in his way and ridiculed him when he earnestly struggled to stop this tragedy."

The passion in her tone made it clear that this upset her as much as the insult to her clan — if not more.

"And that's why I'm gonna trash you all," she changed her tone as a large set of armor covered her from neck to toe.

It looked exactly like that of the fake Barbaroy's, but the aura it exuded was incomparable, for it was the real Gunhammer Plate, Magnum Colossus.

"Oh, right, I forgot to point out the third thing," she said as all the bloodlust and anger vanished like mist.

“Th-Thing?” the fake meekly repeated her.

“Yes. I said that I have three things to point out, but I’ve only pointed out two so far.”

She’d mentioned two of the mistakes the fake had made, namely the armor durability and name display, but she’d yet to tell him the third.

“The third thing...” she said, still with a calm expression, as she took out the headpiece of the Gunhammer Plate from out of her inventory. “The third thing is that Barbaroy Bad Burn turns on his PK mode when he hides his face.”

She then placed the helm over her head.

“Oh, I just realized that I haven’t properly said it yet.”

The moment the plate covered her whole face, she declared, “The big boy Barbaroy Bad Burn we’re all talkin’ about... is me.”

Thus, one of the kingdom’s leading PKers, Barbaroy Bad Burn the Crushing Canopy, was reborn.

◆◆◆

About Sol Crisis

It all began with the Embryo of a Master known as "Vermin." Its name was "Amanojaku," and it had the ability to change the names of his items and himself.

Unaware of the Urikohime folk tale, Vermin wondered why it was a name-changing Embryo, but he liked its ability a lot. He figured that Amanojaku could work wonders for him if he used it well.

Infinite Dendrogram was a game where the system itself prevented name changes, so having the privilege of actually being able to do that gave him a great advantage.

Vermin used that power to swindle countless Masters. He avoided targeting tians because he didn't want to end up in the gaol, but that would never happen with his fellow players, so he went wild scamming them one after another.

Eventually, he met up with a pair of other Masters who also went around doing bad deeds: Dum-dum, an ambusher PKer, and Blue Screen, a player who'd gotten on Dryfe's wanted list for breaking too many machines.

They all found each other to be kindred spirits — or, rather, people they could use — and went on to join forces.

That was the start of the Sol Crisis clan.

Later, the new partners in crime wanted to do something big, and they eventually got the idea to fake an infamous PKer.

By using the name of someone feared and powerful, they could menace and coerce tons of other people, and if someone doubted the fake PKer's identity, they could freely show them the name, which would be changed by Amanojaku.

The stronger and more feared the PKer, the more it would frighten those who saw it.

Though the Embryo didn't allow appearance changes, they could still imitate PKers that didn't show their faces. Not even MVP-exclusive special rewards would be a problem if they just made items that looked similar and changed the name to make them appear real.

Additionally, upon reaching the sixth form, Amanojaku became able to fake not only names, but stats, as well.

They definitely had the means to pull off the lie, and after a short investigation, Vermin found the perfect PKer to fake — Barbaroy Bad Burn.

Before the Superior Killer settled in Altar, there were a total of five PKers who were particularly feared:

The sole Superior was the King of Crimes, Sechs Würfel.

K&R's leader, The Unsheath, Kashimiya.

K&R's sub-leader, Nobushi Princess, Rosa.

Goblin Street's leader, King of Burglary, Eldridge.

Mad Castle's leader and the sole high-rank job among them, Full Armor Giant, Barbaroy Bad Burn.

These PKers were greatly feared by Masters all across the kingdom. Of course, the KoC was dreaded by the tians, as well, and since he was quickly put on the country's wanted list, it was hard to consider him a Master belonging to the kingdom.

If Vermin wanted to pretend to be anyone in the kingdom, these five would be the most effective, as they were the most infamous PKers there.

Kashimiya, Rosa, and Eldridge were still actively playing, so they were instantly excluded from the possible choices.

As for King of Crimes... right before the war against Dryfe, he'd fought against someone unknown. They'd both ended up defeated, and KoC had been sent to the gaol, so he wasn't even an option.

Besides, even if he had still been here, taking up his name would just be far too dangerous, since the slightest mention of him would make the kingdom's officials instantly jump into action.

The kidnapping of the third princess, the massacre at Count Friebel's mansion, the deprivation of The Saint, et cetera... The many crimes committed by KoC had turned his name into a sort-of taboo word in the kingdom.

Because of all that, Barbaroy was the only real choice, and as luck would have it, his current situation was just perfect for Sol Crisis's plan.

After being defeated by the Over Gladiator, Figaro, Barbaroy's clan was dissolved, and he himself seemed to have disappeared.

There were rumors that he'd quit because of the shock from the defeat, making him the perfect person for Vermin to fake.

So Vermin did just that, becoming a Barbaroy Bad Burn that couldn't be exposed by any Reveal or Identification, letting them pressure other Masters like never before.

It didn't take long for the fake Barbaroy to uplift Sol Crisis and make it a relatively well-known PK clan. The fame attracted many new members, making it a highly popular underground option.

With that, however, came a certain problem.

There were now far too many members who didn't know that their Barbaroy was a fake. If he was somehow exposed, the entire clan would be at risk of collapsing.

So their countermeasure to that was to get fame from something other than Barbaroy.

Specifically, they decided to PK Ray Starling the Unbreakable — the famous Master who, despite being a newbie, hadn't broken before a Superior.

Achieving that would be proof that their Barbaroy was more than just for show, and the clan would no longer be in danger of collapsing. In fact, it would only grow bigger.

However, Ray Starling was almost always surrounded by duel rankers, his weird comrades, and even the King of Destruction, making him a scary target to attack.

There were probably many other PKers who wanted to take out the Unbreakable, but were giving up for that very reason.

But then Vermin saw Ray Starling at the capital's fountain. He was accompanied solely by Nemesis, so they figured it was a golden opportunity for them to take him.

Dum-dum used his trailing-specialized Embryo to track where he was going, then gathered the members and went after him, looking for a chance to PK him.

They planned on attacking him when he was at the Fadl Mountain Pass, but then their attack coincided with K&R's hunt.

Two of their members ended up getting the death penalty, but they figured that K&R's interference was actually worth it, since now the Unbreakable would also be known as the one who not even K&R could defeat.

If Sol Crisis managed to succeed where they'd failed, they would become an even bigger name than K&R.

With that positive, yet misguided mentality, they used Monochrome's attack to assault Ray Starling. Since next to no other Masters would interfere, they figured this was a perfect opportunity for them. The incident was working in their favor, and things couldn't be going any smoother for them.

However, they neglected to consider three things:

One — no matter how many tricks they used to make Sol Crisis appear strong, it would never be representative of their own strength.

Two — the one they thought had quit the game was still very active.

And three — they never pictured just how badly the real one would snap when their actions were uncovered.

Those were Sol Crisis's fatal mistakes, and retribution was dealt back to them in the form of an enraged juggernaut — the third strongest PKer in the kingdom.

◇◇◇

Torne Village

Sol Crisis was now looking at the real Barbaroy Bad Burn, clad in gigantic armor and donning a full helm that covered her entire face.

Putting on that helmet was what made Barbaroy "turn on" to her PKer mode.

Scared as they were, upon being told that, the members of Sol Crisis had wanted to laugh at her manga-like roleplaying. But once she actually equipped the helm and became the renowned PKer, all their amusement was blown away.

Even though she looked exactly the same as their fake had, the intimidating air she emanated and the ferocity leaking out from her armor were on a completely different level. Her presence was so intense that anyone who knew what it felt like would have easily been able to tell the fake from the real one, even if the fake wore her name.

"Right, then. Like I said, you're all about to get trashed." Barbaroy's words echoed within the armor. Her voice sounded somewhat masculine. "You can't move for shit right now, so I could take my time and kill you slowly."

Sol Crisis shivered in fear.

Each and every single one of them were currently bound by the high gravity field spread out around Barbaroy. Depending on the distance from her, that field multiplied their weight by a minimum of 200 and a maximum of 500, so they couldn't make any significant movements. The wide reach of the skill had allowed her to catch the entire clan.

At the edge of the field, the gravity was 200 times higher than normal, so those located thereabouts could move if they had 2,000 STR, which was 200 times higher than a normal person. It was a burden that most capable vanguard roles with low and high-rank jobs could carry with little trouble.

However, those positioned further away from Barbaroy were either ranged attackers or supports. And since magic, archery, or gunnery didn't scale with STR, they didn't have enough of it to be able to escape the 200 times greater than normal gravity.

And that was only for those who were at the edge of the field. Those who were closer could be exposed to 300, 400, and even 500 times greater gravity, and even, to top it off, receive the Binding debuff. Even max level high-ranks with good stat growth bonuses from their Embryos would find it hard to escape that.

Not to mention that merely being able to move wasn't enough, as the extra weight would still dull their mobility and make it impossible for them to fight properly.

For these many reasons, Heaven's Weight was a truly terrifying skill.

Of course, it wasn't absolute. During the capital blockade incident, Figaro had been able to break out of Barbaroy's maximum gravity field.

But if you looked at it another way, Figaro was the only one who'd succeeded at that, and he was a Superior.

The mix of Barbaroy's Heaven's Weight and ultimate skill had even killed Superior Jobs like Rosa and Eldridge. In fact, Figaro's feat had only been possible because of the powerful buffs from his Embryo and skills on his special rewards.

Naturally, Sol Crisis had nothing that could overcome this. So great was the gravity that some were forced to the ground and had their bones break.

Man, shame I'm not closer to the outside, thought the leader of Sol Crisis, Sneak Raider, Dum-dum. He was regretting setting the clan's battle arrangement to what it was, and the reason for that was simple. I might've been able to escape after she ran out of MP taking care of the rest. Just my luck.

Indeed, he would have liked to avoid the death penalty by using his clan members as decoys, and it wouldn't exactly have been impossible, either.

Though Heaven's Weight was strong, it also drained a lot of MP.

According to Dum-dum's Reveal skill, Barbaroy now only had about a third of her max MP left, and he expected it to run out before she PK'd everyone.

Thus, Dum-dum could have survived if he'd been at the edge of the gravity field. However, as a vanguard fighter, he'd been placed at the front of the encirclement.

He gave up and just hoped that he wouldn't drop any valuable items, but then... Barbaroy said something that made no sense to him or the rest of Sol Crisis.

"I'm gonna cancel this field now." The armor giant ignored their confusion and continued. "It'd piss me off something fierce if you started whining and telling everyone that you only got beaten 'cause I took you by surprise and crushed you when you couldn't move... so I'm giving you all a fighting chance."

Barbaroy began to slowly walk through the barrier.

For some, that made the burden lighter, while for others, Barbaroy's approach increased the gravity and made their bones break. However, those who could more or less move now chose to stay still and watch what Barbaroy did next.

"The rules are simple," she said. "You all come at me, and anyone who can take a tenth of my HP within five minutes gets to go."

"What do you mean by that?" Dum-dum asked.

"If you can manage that, I'm not gonna attack you at all. Hell, I'll even write a Contract for this. 'I will not attack anyone who, within the next five minutes, damages me for a tenth of my health' or something should do the job."

"Wh-Why five minutes?" Dum-dum ventured.

"What, you don't see the shitty UBM up there? I've gotta go and help my boy Ray deal with that damn thing."

In other words, five minutes was the approximate amount of time it would take for Monochrome to resume its attacks, and that was all the time

Barbaroy was willing to waste on Sol Crisis.

"You can try and run, but I already looked at you all with Reveal," she added. "Got all your names and stats in my cranium. Not gonna forget your mugs, either. My memory's pretty damn good."

So even if they escaped here and now, she'd kill them some other time — and probably more than just once.

However, Sol Crisis saw that her conceit was giving them a chance.

The fifteen members of the clan looked at each other. Both the deceived and the deceivers put their antagonism aside and became united again.

"Hey, you said that a tenth's fine, but, uh..." said Dum-dum, the leader. "We can kill you, right?"

"Sure. Do that, and you're all free to go."

With that, they had a verbal promise, and Barbaroy didn't neglect to fill out a Contract, either.

The sight made just about all of Sol Crisis silently chuckle. Dum-dum was no exception.

She only has about a third of her MP left, he thought. If we all attack her at once, she'll lose all of it before the fight ends. That'll be my chance. If I let the other guys distract her, I might become a PKer who's killed the real Barbaroy.

He tried to keep a serious face so that no one would realize what he was thinking.

Others might be picturing scenarios similar to his. Barbaroy was probably aware of that, but she showed no interest in it.

"By the way... Do you numbskulls seriously think I'm givin' you this chance just so you wouldn't have any excuses?" she said with a voice thick with frightening bloodlust.

Dum-dum faltered. "What... What do you mean?"

"Yeah, I bet you're curious. Anyway, just get ready to be broken in more ways than one," she said, causing a chill to go down each of their spines. "All right. I'll cancel it in three seconds. Threeeee..."

The countdown to the battle began...

"Two. Stronghold Pressure!"

...but then, before she was done counting, she canceled the gravity field and used both her shields to crush two of their casters.

Stronghold Pressure was a Shield Giant skill that turned defense into offense. Though she'd switched her job to Full Armor Giant, she could freely use the skill because she was using the appropriate weapon type — a shield. Of course, the damage dealt was more than enough to make short work of the casters' low HP and END.

If the expressions on the halves of faces that they still had left were anything to go by, the two unfortunates had no idea what had just happened.

After the first attack pulverized a large part of their skulls, Barbaroy confirmed that they were still conscious, then crushed them again.

This time, their heads were reduced to mince meat, and it didn't take long for the two to get the death penalty and vanish. One of them was a central figure of the clan and the one who'd stopped Silver — Gremlin's Master, Blue Screen.

"Huuuh?!"

"Th-That's so unfair!"

Sol Crisis' members stood up and distanced themselves while telling Barbaroy off, but she didn't seem to care in the least.

"Huhhh?" she sneered. "I said I'd cancel it in three seconds, didn't I? What the hell're you callin' unfair?"

Indeed, she'd canceled the skill exactly three seconds after saying that. She wasn't lying at all. However, she had purposely begun a drawn-out, purposeless countdown to make Sol Crisis believe that the battle would begin the moment she finished counting.

Also, they just hadn't been able to imagine that a person who wanted to fight after undoing her highly advantageous field would actually fight unfairly.

"And hell, what's wrong with a PKer being unfair?" she continued. "Got taken by surprise? Well, that's your own damn fault. If you want a fair battle, go and get your head lopped off by Kashimiya. Kyah ha ha ha!" Her belittling laughter was dense with cunning. "By the way, about why I canceled the field and gave you a chance..."

She'd chose to turn a slaughter into a fight, and the reason for that was...

"You dumb shits went and faked me, so I wanted to show you Barbaroy's style and DRILL IT INTO YOUR DAMN HEADS!"

And to that end, she was willing to discard her overwhelming advantage.

Her roar made all of Sol Crisis completely forget the notion that they could win if they just waited for her to run out of MP. It made them aware that they had to go all-out or be mercilessly PK'd.

And if they were to fight seriously, the fact that they'd just lost two casters was a huge problem.

"That bastard went and started with our magic attackers!" Dum-dum shouted.

"Who're ya callin' a 'bastard'?!" roared Barbaroy.

When fighting Full Armor Giants, who excelled at physical defense, magic was your strongest weapon. Barbaroy was fully aware of that, so she'd promptly and preemptively taken out the casters, not letting them do anything.

Having lost his offensive casters, Dum-dum focused on the next best thing. "AGI dudes, move around and confuse her! She's an END type!"

But alas...

"N-No dice... My leg broke while the gravity field was active."

"A-And I broke a hip."

Those two were both specialized vanguards with high AGI, but low STR and END. Their bones had broken while Barbaroy was walking around with an active barrier.

"She even took out our AGI builds...!"

Barbaroy herself had said that she'd learned all their names and stats through Reveal. It seemed she'd finished analyzing Sol Crisis's builds and preemptively crushed the weak END members with her gravity field.

"Get our Bishop to heal the—"

Before Dum-dum could finish his sentence, something flew through his vision.

It was a shield.

Barbaroy used the Flying Shield skill to throw one of hers towards the Bishop.

It hit him directly and, making short work of his low HP and END, cleanly split him in two.

"Damn, you're slow at makin' decisions," said Barbaroy. "And I know he's low level and all, but you're seriously underestimating my boy Ray. I mean, not one of you so far has had a Brooch. Are you dead broke or something? Also, you could at least get a maxed-out support."

After all, a max level Bishop would have had good chances of surviving a single Flying Shield. Though, in that case, Barbaroy would've taken care of him some other way.

“Tch...” Dum-dum voiced his frustration.

The battle had just begun, but he’d already lost three members — five, if you included the incapacitated AGI builds. And they weren’t even fighting a player with a Superior Job or anything else that deviated from the norm. Barbaroy was a high-rank — on the same tier as them — and these results were caused by nothing but her precise and ruthless tactics.

That was Barbaroy’s style.

She roleplayed a vulgar, violent, murderous, and antagonistic PKer while using well-crafted tactics that utilized the enemies’ job configurations and mental openings.

This was the reason why, despite being a high-rank, she was always grouped with the Superior Job PKers in Altar.

According to her, “Player battles aren’t all about differences in levels and stats. Preventing your opponent from using their powers while using your own cards in the best manner possible is far more important,” and she embodied these words well.

After all, she had been able to act on those words to crush both Rosa and Eldridge, solidifying her position as the third strongest PK in the kingdom.

Not only that, but she was now stronger than she had been back then.

“Gh... No! We can still win!” Dum-dum roared with more power in his words than usual. “She has less than a fifth of her MP! Same for her SP, too! Just keep attacking, and we’ll win! Don’t let her rest!”

He’d realized that his clan’s spirit was on the verge of breaking and saw the need to enliven them.

Some members who’d been fooled by the fake Barbaroy were still antagonistic towards Dum-dum, but they knew that he was telling the truth. If Barbaroy ran out of MP and SP, she’d be unable to use any skills, giving Sol Crisis a huge advantage.

“We’ve got no choice!”

“Eat THIS!”

Two members — a Strong Swordsman and a Strong Lancer — simultaneously used stat-buffing skills and rushed Barbaroy to make an attack.

They both excelled in terms of STR, so they could’ve dealt damage to her directly through her armor. However...

"Astro Guard!" Barbaroy activated a skill, repelling their weapons and protecting her from even the smallest bit of damage.

"Huhhh?!"

"Wha—? No way!"

The two were thoroughly dumbfounded by what'd just happened, but to Barbaroy, things were going exactly as expected.

Thanks to Reveal and Identification, she knew their stats and jobs, so she was fully aware what kind of damage they could deal.

Not to mention that Barbaroy was now even tougher than she had been back when she'd fought Figaro. After all, following her defeat, she'd gone on to reconfigure her build.

Picking Shield Giant as her sub high-rank job had raised her base defense from 3,000 to 5,000, so using Astro Guard, which quintupled the user's defense in exchange for rendering them immobile, increased her defense to 25,000.

As the leader of Mad Castle, necessity had required her to keep one of her two high-rank job slots dedicated to Commander, which increased the stats of her party and clan. Thus, back then, even if she'd boasted battle prowess that could make most non-SJs envious, she definitely hadn't been the best solo fighter she could be.

Things had changed since then. Following Mad Castle's dissolution, she'd repurposed her clan leader build for solo battle.

There was no need for her to lead anymore, and she wanted to become strong enough to hold herself against foes like Figaro.

She'd been so invested into perfecting her build that she'd accepted Tsukuyo's invitation to CID in order to gain access to their data.

As a result, she'd acquired the Shield Giant job, which now gave her new skills and greatly increased her stats.

Additionally, she still had skills from before the reconfiguration, such as Damage Decrease and Damage Reduction.

Due to all that, to damage Barbaroy in her Astro Guard state, one had to break through the 25,000 defense, make up for the 20% decrease, and still deal more than 500 damage.

According to her calculations, the only ones who could do that purely with stats and job skills were the two level 500 offense casters... the ones she'd crushed when the battle began.

Therefore, Sol Crisis could only damage Barbaroy if she ran out of MP and couldn't uphold her Astro Guard anymore, or if they had some sort of Embryo capable of that.

While considering what they'd do next, Barbaroy decided to continue reducing their numbers.

Thus came the ultimate skill.

"Emancipated Giant — Atlas!"

It was the ace up her sleeve — an ability that, for 10 seconds, multiplied her defense by 10 and transformed it to attack power.

A tenth of a second after using Atlas, she deactivated Astro Guard, and used her immense, greater than 250,000 offense to pulverize both the Strong Swordsman and Strong Lancer in one hit each.

Eight left, she thought, and it was hard to tell whether she was referring to the enemy count or seconds remaining for her ultimate skill.

Once Emancipated Giant's effect was over, it could only be used again after an hour-long cooldown, so Barbaroy didn't want to waste a second of it.

She took to repeatedly using the Flying Shield skill and throwing her 250,000 damage shields towards Sol Crisis members.

Though it lasted for a mere ten seconds, her ultimate skill gave her attack power that matched the one and only King of Destruction.

Under its effects, Barbaroy was a messenger of ruin. She pulverized her surroundings and ground Sol Crisis members into dust, one after the other.

True to her nickname, she crushed them before they could even scream.

And by the time the ten seconds were over, there were only three people left on the scene, Barbaroy included.

"So one of you survived, huh?" she said.

As the dust raised by the destruction began to settle, Barbaroy saw two other people. She'd purposely let one of them live, but the other had survived despite her trying to kill him.

The one she'd let live was the faker, Vermin, who was now cowering with his hands on his head, while the one who had survived was the leader of Sol Crisis, Dum-dum.

He wasn't in a good state, though. Barbaroy's attack had lopped off his right arm.

Dum-dum had his pain set to off, so it didn't hurt at all. Nevertheless, the feeling of not having a limb made him break out in a cold sweat.

"Damn monster," he spat out. "And you're supposed to be a high-rank like us?"

"It's all 'cause of the difference in our Embryo traits and the effort I've spent on developing my build and learning when to use my skills."

"You ain't wrong there. Not wrong at all." Dum-dum formed a self-deriding, wry grin. "Man, the devs keep talking about possibilities or whatever, but Embryos are just straight-up broken. There's weak shit like this guy's — only good for cheating people — and then there's beastly stuff like yours, which lets you fucking demolish everyone by yourself. It's just unfair. But still..."

He momentarily stopped talking and turned his grin into an indomitable smile before continuing.

"...I do like my Embryo. I'm not tough enough to win this, but this baby should at least let me take a tenth of your HP."

Dum-dum took out a billhook-like blade and brandished it with a backhand grip. That weapon, too short to be a longsword and too long to be a shortsword, was his unique Embryo.

Thus, the ex-leader of Mad Castle and the leader of Sol Crisis faced one another.

Dum-dum moved slowly, while Barbaroy was completely idle.

An AGI build looked for an opportunity to strike, while the END build prepared to counter it, making it a highly standard Dendro battle.

However, there was a great difference between the two players.

Barbaroy's MP is almost out, Dum-dum thought while using Reveal on Barbaroy. I've got a chance.

Using Astro Guard and her ultimate skill had nearly emptied Barbaroy's remaining MP, while all the Flying Shields had reduced her SP to below the tenth of her maximum. In just a few seconds, her passive skills would reduce her MP to 0, and that very moment would be Dum-dum's only chance.

He waited for it as Barbaroy waited for him.

Soon enough, the time came.

"OAAGH!" Dum-dum let out a war cry as he charged directly towards Barbaroy, who responded by preparing to pulverize him with her shields.

Dum-dum hit the shield like a bunted baseball, and...

“She Stands Behind You — Bloody Mary!”

...vanished.

He next appeared in the air right behind Barbaroy.

That was the ultimate skill of his sword Embryo, Bloody Mary. It made him teleport behind his target and raised the power of his next attack. Additionally, he was a Sneak Raider — a high-rank job from the raider grouping — so the damage he dealt increased even further when he was undetected by his enemy.

I’ve got her now! he thought as he swung his Bloody Mary, certain that he’d take away a tenth of her HP.

Without any MP, Barbaroy would be unable to use any defensive skills like Astro Guard, and Dum-dum was sure that she was just bare enough for his attack to damage her.

But that conviction of his disappeared the moment something cylindrical flew out of Barbaroy’s armor.

Being an AGI build, Dum-dum could make out that it was actually a bullet case.

It dropped out of her armor as if flying out of a shooting gun.

What was that? Dum-dum thought, but before he could reach a conclusion, Bloody Mary’s blade reached the back of Barbaroy’s neck...

“Astro Guard!”

...only to be deflected by a skill — one that she supposedly couldn’t use because of a lack of MP.

“What...?!” Dum-dum exclaimed, but Barbaroy made her move before he could make any sense of the situation.

She turned around, let go of her shields, formed spear hands, and directed them at Dum-dum. Being in mid-air, he wasn’t capable of evading what came next.

“Double Gauntlet Trigger!” she roared, causing two more bullet cases to fall out of her armor, accompanied by a thunderous sound akin to a cannon shot.

Following that, her gauntlets were fired forwards.

Barbaroy’s aim was perfect, and they cleanly hit Dum-dum’s stomach.

“Gh-ah...!” he exclaimed. The attack was both unexpected and powerful. Though he’d withstood the first with his Lifesaving Brooch, the second one split him in half. “Wh-What...?”

"If you're gonna fake my armor, at least learn its skills," said Barbaroy as she looked down at Dum-dum's separated halves and re-equipped the gauntlets. "Well, not like you could. I didn't leak 'em anywhere."

Exactly. Both the MP regeneration and the attack had happened because of her special reward: the Legendary Gunhammer Plate, Magnum Colossus.

The reason why it was titled "Gunhammer" were the bullet-shaped cartridges it used as the price for its unique skills. Their content was the MP that Barbaroy had channeled into them ahead of time.

One of the armor's skills was "Gauntlet Trigger," which used all the MP in a single cartridge to fire a gauntlet which dealt damage almost as great as that of ultimate skills.

The other skill was "Charge Trigger," a battle ability that injected the MP in a cartridge into Barbaroy, restoring her MP much faster and more effectively than Potions did. A single use gave her half of her maximum MP.

She could have a total of six cartridges, and she'd finished charging all of them just this afternoon.

That meant that she'd had enough to completely restore her MP three times, so there had never been a chance she wouldn't have enough of it to take care of Sol Crisis.

While they'd believed they'd have a chance if Barbaroy ran out of MP, she herself had never worried about it at all. If her MP reserves had been an actual problem for her, she wouldn't have wasted time examining them all with Reveal or undoing her Heaven's Weight.

In fact, she'd intentionally made them believe that her MP was her weakness and had them act accordingly. There was logic behind it.

"Ah, shit," Dum-dum grumbled. Despite being split in half, he could still talk just fine. "I thought I had it."

"Well, Mary sure ain't the only thing that's 'bloody' here anymore," Barbaroy commented. "I've gotta say, for someone lookin' like a Teke Teke, you seem pretty good. That a skill or something?"

"Nah. I have a bit of HP left, but this Bleeding'll kill me in seconds."

He wasn't wrong. It wouldn't be long until the death penalty took him and made him vanish.

"Oh, maaan," Dum-dum muttered with slight regret in his tone. "The scheme is over, the pretense is off, and we don't have any prestige anymore.

Guess that's that for Sol Crisis... Shame. It wasn't too bad."

Looking at his state, Barbaroy, being an ex-leader of a PK clan herself, felt like she had to make a comment, so she said, "Create a proper PK clan next time. If you ask me, you can easily make it to second-rate."

Her words were barely any consolation.

"Ha ha..." Dum-dum chuckled wryly. "What the hell's a 'proper' PK clan?'"

With those words as his last, the leader of Sol Crisis received the death penalty.

"And that leaves just you," said Barbaroy as she turned around and looked at Vermin — the fake.

"...Kh." He was silent. At first, Vermin just lay on the ground and lightly shook. The quivering gradually grew stronger until, it culminated in a thunderous, out-of-control laughter. "KYAH HA HA HA HA! Dumbasses! They all lost like the weak shits they are! I knew it! Without my skill, Sol Crisis was just a bunch of hopeless parasites!"

"Kyah ha ha!" Barbaroy chuckled. "You really think you can say that?"

"Shut up! You should've just retired like the loser you are! You just had to show up now, of all times! Fuck you!" Vermin stood up as his shattered armor made a clanging sound. Then, he pointed at Barbaroy and said, "And what the hell are you planning?!"

"Whaddya mean?"

"You weren't attacking me at all!"

Barbaroy heaved a sigh before replying, "That's because you were dialing defense skills like there's no tomorrow."

Indeed, Barbaroy hadn't left Vermin alive because the fake made her sentimental or anything. He'd used nothing but defensive skills throughout the whole massacre, increasing his defense so much that she'd figured it was best to take care of the others before dealing with him.

"You're a Full Armor Giant, too, so you can also use Astro Guard. And you were squatting and cowering for your sub job skills — Beast Boxer's Turtleshell Stance and Monk's Prostration Barrier. All of them multiply defense several times over, so even I can't do much when they're stacked."

"Well, aren't you a know-it-all," said Vermin. Though it didn't show, the fact that she'd pointed out his skills so precisely made his heart rate intensify.

“Well, I just barely redid my build. I considered takin’ those jobs, so I looked ’em up.”

They had been a decent choice if she wanted to buff her defense and maximize the damage of Emancipated Giant. However, she’d decided against them because they had worse limitations than Astro Guard. Turtleshell Stance would only activate when placing your hands on your head, while Prostration Barrier could only be used when you were prostrated on the ground.

“So, why’d ya finally decide to stop tanking and stand up?” Barbaroy asked.

“’Cause I’m done preparing to kill you!” Vermin shouted as his left hand began glowing and something appeared in his palm.

It was a pen — a fountain pen made of something that emitted an amethyst-like gleam. That was Vermin’s Embryo.

“The False Bride — Amanojaku!” he exclaimed as he crushed it in his hand.

That was the activation of his ultimate skill — the ace up his sleeve that he’d even hidden from the other Sol Crisis members.

A moment later, Vermin’s body was engulfed in a purple light similar to Amanojaku’s.

“I’m winning this shit!” he shouted.

“I see what’s goin’ on here,” Barbaroy said as she noticed a change in what her Reveal skill was showing.

Vermin’s stats and job config were now the same as Barbaroy’s.

With the exception of offense and defense, which also gained bonuses from equipment, he had the exact same stats as her.

Considering Vermin’s track record, it would have been fair to assume that it was just more fakery, but Barbaroy was experienced enough to tell that it wasn’t.

“So it’s a skill that lets you go beyond descriptions and perfectly copy the actual abilities, huh?”

“You got it right! It’s like copying and pasting! I now have the same powers as you! Including your Embryo!”

Barbaroy took a moment to consider whether he was bluffing, and concluded that such an ability was, indeed, possible.

The fact that he had to destroy his Embryo to activate it says a lot, she thought. There are probably other limitations, as well. For example, copying people with a higher total level or Embryo form would probably make the result incomplete. And there might be a time limit, too.

Barbaroy was assuming right, and that was exactly why The False Bride was functioning so well. After all, since she was in the middle of leveling her new build, her total level was lower than Vermin's — who had it maxed — and their Embryos were both in their sixth forms.

"I watched you fight and now know how to use your skills!" Vermin shouted with excitement. "Your crazy powerful ultimate skill, the Shield Giant attack skill, the Binding gravity field — I know them all!"

"So you focused on defense to watch me for as long as you could."

"Exactly! And that's why I can fight like you now! But there's one difference!" He reached into his inventory and took out a shield. "While you're still on your ultimate skill cooldown, I can use it just fine! Heaven's Weight!"

Vermin used the gravity field that he'd been subjected to just minutes ago on the original user herself.

The distance was such that the gravity around Barbaroy became 400 times greater. Though it wasn't enough to bring her to her knees, it rendered her immobile.

Despite being a copy, the field was about as strong as Barbaroy's.

"Astro Guard!" Vermin howled as he traced the steps taken by Barbaroy when she'd used her ultimate skill. "You're done! Emancipated Giant — Atlas!"

Vermin activated it the same way she had. In an instant, the great defense he'd earned through Astro Guard became even more immense offense.

Not wasting a moment, he charged towards Barbaroy. His extraordinary attack power made every step he took pulverize the ground beneath him.

Having gained such great damage potential made him shake with excitement.

The stat summary at the edge of his vision said that his current offense was over 100,000. It was lower than Barbaroy's due to the difference between their equipment bonuses, but it was still more than enough to break through her Astro Guard.

Vermin was assured of his victory.

Because of that, Barbaroy's next move amused him.

"—avity!" she shouted a skill, but he couldn't hear it well. "Looks like you'll need a fourth pointer. Heaven's Weight."

The fact that she'd activated the gravity field made him laugh. "You 'tard! Like that'll be enough to stop this powe—!"

Vermin had pictured himself pushing through the field like it was nothing and crushing Barbaroy with little effort.

However, what actually happened was that he stopped in place before getting to her.

"...Huh?" he exclaimed as he became immobile the same way as Barbaroy had just moments ago. "H-How?! I've got this much power! This shouldn't stop me!"

The seemingly impossible situation perplexed him. He struggled to break free, but Emancipated Giant's ten seconds expired before he could.

"Wh-Wh... Why?" he muttered, still utterly confused.

"You know how you said the word 'power'?" Barbaroy said as she sighed. "What the hell're you actually talkin' about?"

The question puzzled Vermin even further. "A-Attack power! Offense, damn it! It was so high, so why couldn't I move?!"

While under the effects of Emancipated Giant, Vermin had an attack power of over 100,000. Though it was lower than Barbaroy's because he couldn't copy her equipment, it was still more than 10,000 times greater than a normal person's.

There was no denying that it was immense. However...

"Yeah. Attack power," she replied. "Not STR."

"...Eh?"

Barbaroy showed her stat window and continued, "STR increases attack power, but offense doesn't do shit for STR, and Emancipated Giant is a skill that raises attack power directly. No matter how high your offense gets, STR won't increase a bit. Here's a good comparison for ya..." She paused briefly and waved her finger. "If a guy gets a crazy powerful weapon, does his STR grow any higher?"

"...Ah." Vermin finally understood it.

Though Emancipated Giant greatly increased the user's attack power — their influence on the outside — it did nothing for their own physical strength. Naturally, since STR was the stat necessary to resist the effects of the gravity field, the ultimate skill didn't help dealing with it at all. If the person whose stats Vermin had copied couldn't move, it was only reasonable that he would be immobile, as well.

"Huh?" he suddenly realized that Barbaroy actually was moving in the field. "Y-You're...! How?!"

"Yeah, I bet you're curious," Barbaroy laughed.

The reason for this mobility was another skill that she had used in conjunction with Heaven's Weight. It was "Anti-Gravity," which, true to its name, reduced the gravity of whatever she used it on.

During her battle against K&R, she'd used it to throw a shield, but she could also use it on herself to cancel out the effects of Heaven's Weight.

"I-If you can do it, so can I!" said Vermin.

"Well, yeah, you can," she replied. "If you know it, I mean."

"...!" Vermin responded with just a gasp.

"Your ultimate skill lets you copy the abilities, but your windows don't give you the details about them."

"Whuh?!" Vermin was at a complete loss for words. He had no idea how she'd figured that out.

"If you'd had descriptions and stuff, you wouldn't have screwed up like you just did, and you would've known how to escape the gravity."

She wasn't wrong. Vermin really did have Anti-Gravity among his copied abilities. However, he had no idea which skill it was. After all, Barbaroy hadn't used it during her fight against Sol Crisis.

Vermin could never know it, nor speak its name.

It was as difficult as trying to figure out a password with an unknown number of characters.

That was the limit of Vermin's copying ability. He'd thought he'd understood what he was copying after seeing just the surface of what Barbaroy could do.

It was less about the skill and more about his own nature, and that was exactly why he'd ended up being nothing but a cheap knock-off.

"Another thing," Barbaroy continued. "The defense skills you've stacked up are all there to help you take a beating while you figure out what skills the enemy has before you copy them and retaliate, right?"

He was dead silent.

Vermin knew little about Barbaroy's tactics, while she knew all about his. That was a clear difference between them that was in an entirely different realm than mere stats or Embryo powers.

"All right, time to wrap things up," she said as she walked through the gravity field as if it had no effects on her. "The five minutes are almost done."

Instead of holding shields, she formed spear hands and prepared a Gauntlet Trigger, the same skill that'd ended Dum-dum.

It would be enough to break through Vermin's Astro Guard and fatally wound him.

Barbaroy's approach made him imagine himself getting split in half, so he gave in to fear, and...

"C-Cancel! Turtleshell Stance! Prostration Barrier! Astro Guard!"

He deactivated The False Bride and returned to his original configuration before stacking his three defense skills and dropping to the ground.

"This again? You like prostrating that much?"

"Y-You can't hurt me when I'm like this! This defense is perfect!"

It had been enough to prevent Barbaroy from attacking him with her ultimate skill, so Vermin thought that she was now incapable of doing anything to him.

"You serious? Breaking through this is easy," said Barbaroy, not worried about it at all.

"Y-You're just bluffi—" Vermin tried to say something, but Barbaroy cut him off by picking his body up and throwing him into a nearby irrigational aqueduct.

The water inside was only up to the waist of an adult man.

"Ghbh! Thhellrudoohng?!" Vermin tried to get up and shout "The hell are you doing?!" but he was unable to do so. As if pushed down to the bottom, he couldn't rise up from the water.

Needless to say, it was caused by Heaven's Weight. Vermin was sunk to the bottom and held there by the ultra-powerful gravity.

Barbaroy looked down on him and said, "PKing ain't all about duking it out. Even if your defense is huge, you can still lose HP and die by suffocating. And that's why your 'perfect' defense is flawed. You're screwed the moment someone tries to hurt you with somethin' other than physical damage."

It was hard to tell whether Vermin was hearing her words. All he did was lie immobile at the bottom of the aqueduct and leak air out of his lungs with an anguished expression on his face.

"By the way, I'm speaking from experience here... suffocation is pretty bad," she said. "Unless you mess with the settings, this game turns all pain into basic impacts, but it can't do the same for suffocation. This does wonders to break people's spirit. That's been confirmed by both me and the Over Gladiator. Sure, diving without a parachute was pretty damn bad, too, but I can't pull it off as well as that guy. Also, I dunno if you can even hear me, but a faker like you deserves a fifth pointer."

As the original, she felt that there was something she just had to say.

"Whether you're studying, doing tea ceremony, or playing a game, starting by imitating someone else ain't a bad thing. Everyone begins as imitators, but as they put effort into polishing the art, it gradually becomes their own."

It was the like the concept of Shuhari. In fact, Barbaroy's own build and tactics included many features from the builds of those who'd come before. She'd imitated them, using her gathered data to polish her config, and eventually made it complete.

That was why, even though she'd found it malicious, she wasn't actually mad about Vermin faking her shape. The things that had made her mad were the devaluing of her clan and the fact that they'd gotten in Ray's way and ridiculed him, even though she was aware that she'd probably have said similar things as the leader of Mad Castle.

"But get this..." she'd said. "Effortless imitation won't get you anywhere."

Vermin had the form, but not the substance. He wasn't giving his all to the falsehood; he was satisfied with just using Barbaroy's name and appearance while imitating the target's crudeness.

In her eyes, that was exactly why he'd ended up at the bottom of this aqueduct.

There was one other thing Barbaroy wanted to add. "Oh, yeah, about the way you fought... Though all your ultimate skill does is imitate, it was clearly an original tactic you made up to make the most of it. There are flaws, sure, but it has good synergy with your Embryo. If you polish it a bit, you could..."

But Vermin wasn't there to hear it anymore. His body had changed into particles of light, leaving behind a significant amount of items.

"The suicide function, huh?" she murmured.

Indeed. Instead of suffering suffocation for a few more minutes, he'd chosen to escape it by suicide. Vermin's spirit had been shattered.

With the last one of them having received the death penalty, the battle between the real Barbaroy and the fake Barbaroy's Sol Crisis now reached its conclusion. Despite being outnumbered, the real Barbaroy had achieved an overwhelming victory.

The only thing that had damaged her was Dum-dum's ultimate skill, and that hadn't hurt her for as much as a tenth of her HP.

Despite it all, Barbaroy came out with the impression that Sol Crisis wasn't a weak bunch. She had no idea how the battle would've gone if she hadn't started by taking out the offensive casters.

If she hadn't incapacitated the AGI builds, they might've held a bit longer, too.

If Dum-dum had had more attack power or a special reward with strong debuffs, the tides might've been completely turned around.

If Vermin had had a better grasp of Barbaroy's powers and had done more research on how to wield them, she might've ended up thoroughly defeated.

And most of all, things would've been completely different if they'd had the cooperation and tactics of a proper PK clan.

Those, among others, were the reasons why they'd lost.

What Vermin and the rest of Sol Crisis had done could all be fixed if they listened her fifth pointer. If they truly wanted to be a big-shot PK clan, they had to put effort into their imitation.

Sol Crisis had gotten too big with too little work and ended up being crushed because of it. As the one who'd done it, as a PKer, and as an ex-leader of a clan, Barbaroy felt slightly conflicted about it overall.

However, it wasn't the time to think about that.

"Well, I'm done here, so I'll just hurry to Ray now."

It wouldn't be long until Monochrome's attacks restarted.

Barbaroy herself had no means of dealing with the UBM, but she figured that she'd be a good tank for her junior.

A man like him, so kind and prone to getting in trouble, could definitely use some protection from his senior, she thought as she rushed into the village to search for him.

Chapter Six: The Shield of Miracles

Torne Village, Windmill

It was difficult to tell just how long Louie had been holed up in the windmill. Perhaps the minute hand on the clock hadn't finished a single rotation yet. However, Louie felt like he'd been in there for many hours now.

All he saw were stony walls and floor, and all he heard was the laughter from above.

Whether it was a coincidence or a side effect of Monochrome's influence upon the environment, no wind was blowing upon the village. So, naturally, the boy couldn't even hear spinning from the windmill he was in.

"...?" Louie became confused as the laughter from above suddenly stopped. The monster's malicious laughter could no longer be heard.

Louie wondered what had happened to it.

It could've been defeated, or it might've flown off to a different area.

Regardless, with the laughter gone, Louie was now sitting in absolute silence.

The one thing he could almost hear was his own heartbeat.

"This reminds me of that time..." he murmured, recalling the morning when Shijima disappeared.

◇

On that day, Louie happened to wake up before sunrise.

It was the first time he'd ever awakened before the cries of the village's roosters.

Too early for anyone to be awake, yet too late for nocturnal birds and bugs to make their sounds, this time of the day had a kind of silence to it that made it feel like the whole world was asleep.

The were two beds in the house's children's room. One was occupied by Louie and the other by Juno, who was still sleeping soundly, wholly unaware that he'd woken up.

Outside the window, he saw Gringham asleep, spreading his large body upon the ground.

There was nothing strange about that scenery, but a short distance further, on a slightly taller hill near the house, there was a person he knew very well — Shijima.

He was standing still, all alone, as he observed the panorama of Torne before dawn.

Louie was somewhat concerned, so he walked out of the house, making sure not to wake up Juno or his mother.

When he opened the door, Gringham woke up and silently raised his head as if to ask, "What's wrong?"

Louie gestured to him to not mind him and keep sleeping, then walked up to the tall hill Shijima was standing on.

Once there, he called out to him, "What's the matter, Dad?"

"Oh, Louie," Shijima said, slightly surprised. "You're up early. Good morning."

"Good morning," Louie replied. "Why are you up so early?"

"...It's nothing. I just felt like looking at the village."

"Mh?" Louie tilted his head in confusion.

"I've been living here for more than two years, but I've never had the chance to take a good, long look at it. So I felt like burning it into my memory while enjoying the gentle wind here." Shijima looked down at Torne, which was still shrouded in darkness.

All Louie could see was the village's outlines, so he said, "But you can't see anything. Shouldn't you wait for morning?"

"Ha ha," Shijima laughed. "Don't you worry. I see well in the dark. Once, I even had to ride Gringham through a forest at night. It was the time I fought a UBM that'd wandered into Noz Forest."

"That happened?" Louie asked.

"Yes, it did. I was with many other Masters back then, but the enemy was very tough. He looked like a normal goblin, but he was faster and stronger than Gringham. And if you lost sight of it, it could attack you after transforming into something else, like a wolf or a bat. It was a very hard battle for all of us, but we were able to surround it and give a chance for Tsukikage — a person I know — to finish it off."

"Wow!" Louie exclaimed. Although brief, Shijima's story was enough to move and intrigue a child like him. "Hey! Do you have any more stories like that?"

"Ha ha. Of course I do," Shijima laughed. "Now, which one to tell next...? Here's a good one. It happened after I married Farica, but my friends called me over to help defeat the Tri-Zenith Dragon!"

"EEH?!"

Thus, Shijima and Louie talked.

The man spoke of his memories, while the boy listened with wonder, surprise, and a gleam in his eyes. The conversation fully befitted a father and son, and it lasted until the sun began to rise.

"...Oh. It's the sunrise," said Shijima. He'd just finished speaking one of his tales, and now he merely watched the sun rise from the eastern sky, looking both dazzled... and regretful.

"Dad? What's wrong?" Louie asked, worried about his father.

Shijima looked into Louie's face, seemed to think of something, and tried weaving the words. "Louie. I..." he said, but then fell silent again.

"Dad?"

"Louie... Juno, Gringham, and I have to go somewhere for a while."

"Will you fight another UBM?" the boy asked, still thinking of the tales he'd just heard.

Shijima shook his head, "No, but... it's an even bigger adventure."

"Really?! Then do your best!" At this moment, Louie felt nothing but admiration for his father.

The fact that Shijima was going on an adventure gave the boy relief. After all, being a Master, his dad was immortal, so he would come back home, no matter what.

He'd even died a few times in the stories he'd just told, yet he was still standing before the boy, alive and well. There was no reason for Louie to worry.

But...

"Yes... I'll do my best," Shijima said with a weak smile on his face.

The man's expression, combined with the sight of Juno riding Gringham up the hill, made Louie feel like something was off.

"Grooaoh," Gringham added.

There was nothing strange about the situation itself. It was only natural for Shijima to head out on adventures along with his trusty mount and Embryo.

Yet, for some reason, watching them prepare made Louie feel uneasy.

Spurred by the feeling, he held Shijima by his sleeve, looked up at his face and said, “You’ll come back, right?!”

The boy didn’t know why he was acting with such urgency. The worry coming over him was just so strong.

When asked, Shijima looked like his expression was about to crumble, but then, he formed a smile and patted Louie on the head. Then, with a voice as though he was doing his best to not to sound teary, he said, “Of course. I’ll surely... I’ll surely come back here. I’ll return to you and Farica... no matter what.”

Louie could tell that his voice was dense with emotion.

“Okay... All right,” he said as he let go of his sleeve.

He saw the man off with the words, “Later, Dad.”

“I’m off.”

The words weren’t rare or special in any way.

They were what people commonly said when a family member was going out somewhere.

However, they left an impression on Louie, as they were the last words the two had ever exchanged.

◇

Being in this silent windmill reminded Louie of that time before dawn.

No light was leaking inside, and no sounds could be heard.

But Louie hadn’t feel nearly as helpless then as he did now, which was surely because he didn’t have his family with him this time.

As Louie thought about things like that...

“Someonnne! Anyonnne! I’m here to helllp!” a voice came from the outside. “Heeey! Anyonnne! Are you heeere? Come out if you aaare!”

It was a loud voice calling out for survivors in the vicinity.

“It’s all fine nowww! The monster is gonne! Run while you caaan!”

Hearing that relieved Louie, as it made him certain that the laugh had stopped because the monster in the sky was gone.

“I’m saved... Oh right, if it’s gone, I have to go find Mom!” the boy cried. As glad as he was that he was saved, he found it more important to go to his mother and show her that he was okay. “I’m sure they kept her safe...”

Louie was certain that his mother was unharmed. After all, she was with Ray, Nemesis, and B3. Those three had accepted his search request when no one else had. Not to mention that they’d taken care of all the trouble they’d encountered on the way to Torne. To Louie, they were heroes who almost matched Shijima.

“Heeey! Someonnne! Are you therrre? Say something if you aaare!”

“Ah, yes! I’m right here!” Louie replied to the voice and left the windmill.

The boy had failed to realize that, despite the laughter stopping, the sky was still dark.

“Eh?” The boy went outside and voiced his perplexity. He’d expected to see the person searching for those in hiding, but he saw no one.

There were no people, the sky was black, and...

“Someonnne! AnyonNne! AnYoNnNe...!” the voice calling for the people became distorted and dense with a familiar malevolence. “FOUNDYOU... KyAHahAhaHaHAhAhaHah!”

It soon became the evil cackle from before.

Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome’s laughter ignored distance and differences in speed as it reached the most far-off of creatures. That was all it did — it could neither deal damage, nor protect the monster.

However, it could be used for more than just ridiculing those below.

300 years ago, Monochrome had developed the skill to lure out the people in hiding, just so that it could burn them.

“Ah...” Louie uttered as he looked up at the sky and saw a beam coming from beyond the clouds go straight towards him.

A moment later, he felt an impact, a sudden heat, and smelled the reek of burning flesh and blood.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

“Louie! Where are you?! I’m here for you!” I shouted as I ran around

Torne in search of the boy.

All I got as a response was the crackling sound, coming from the burning buildings all around me. For some reason, a moment ago, Monochrome's annoying laughter had stopped.

No matter how much I called, I couldn't hear anyone.

"Shit!" I cursed. "I could cover so much more ground if Silver were all right."

Sol Crisis's ambush had deactivated my trusty steed, and he was still in that state. I was doing my best to run with my own two feet, but with my level and AGI, I definitely wasn't very effective.

"That thing's about to be able to attack again, damn it!" I swore.

Monochrome was almost back at the altitude from which it could fire its beams.

There was basically no time anymore. Every second counted. I had to find Louie as soon as possible.

"Ray!" Nemesis appeared out of my crest. She'd been inside because she'd been focusing on analyzing the third form's skill, and the fact that was out now could only mean one thing.

"Nemesis! You're done analyzing?!" I asked.

"Indeed I am! I've finished it!"

We'd gambled on the skill being something that could deal with Monochrome, and now, the results were in.

As we still ran around and searched for Louie, Nemesis gave her report.

"I will start with the conclusion," she said. "The third form's skill gives us a chance to win against Monochrome."

"...For real?!"

"Yes. But be ready for yet another gamble. What the skill does is..."

Nemesis went on to give me the details of the third form's skill.

Sure enough, it was capable of reaching Monochrome, but Nemesis was very right that it'd be a gamble. It would be a battle that would test my and Monochrome's limits.

"It might reach it, or it might not," said Nemesis. "It all depends on how long we can—" Her words were cut short by a flash in the sky.

A phenomenon like that could only mean one thing.

I'd become all too familiar with it and stupidly sick of it back during our rise to the sky.

It was a sign that Monochrome was attacking, meaning that the surface was finally within range.

“Ray!” Nemesis cried as she became the shield and tried to protect me.

But the beams didn’t head towards me — they were directed at a stone-built windmill about a kilometer away from us.

“No way!” I’d shouted. The sight made a chill go down my spine, and I didn’t hesitate to rush towards the building, pleading for Louie to not be the one there.

◇◇◇

Torne Village, Windmill

Louie couldn’t understand what had happened to him.

A voice had lured him outside, the sky had flashed, he’d felt an impact, a sudden heat, and then smelled charred flesh.

The change was so sudden and bewildering that he still couldn’t grasp the state he was in.

All he knew so far was that he was lying on the ground.

He couldn’t open his eyes because of the soot in them, but he felt the cold surface on his back, and a heat caressing his cheeks.

Louie had never been burned before, so his hazy mind could only assume that this was how it actually felt.

But... he thought as he realized he felt not just heat, but warmth, as well.

Louie was lying on the ground, and the warm thing was covering him.

It had a familiar, nostalgic texture and smell.

What was this, again...?

He worked his hazy mind, trying his best to remember, and it didn’t take long for him to reach a conclusion.

“Groaoh...”

“Ah!” The thing covering him made a single sound, which was more than enough for Louie to realize what it was.

The haziness over his mind suddenly cleared, and he quickly rubbed his eyes to get the soot out of them, then open them and look at the thing.

“Gringham...” he uttered the name of a family member that was supposed to be gone.

The lion-like monster covered Louie, using his own body to protect the boy's life from Monochrome's beams. They were raining down on him in large numbers, yet Gringham shielded Louie without voicing any pain.

The only reason Louie had survived despite being targeted by the UBM was because his dear family was here to protect him.

It was an event many would think impossible.

Sure, one of the game's laws made it so that the monsters stored in a Master's Jewel would be released if the Master wasn't online for half a Dendro year, but who could've imagined it happening here and now?

Then there was the fact that a released — freed — monster had returned to where it used to live with its Master instead of going back to the wild like they normally did.

Lastly, the idea that an untamed creature would risk its life to protect a person was simply absurd.

All of those seemed like things that could never occur.

And yet, they had actually happened and aligned to save Louie's life.

The only word fit to describe this event was "miracle," and the only word fit to explain it was a "bond."

Shijima had disappeared from Infinite Dendrogram half a year ago, taking his Embryo and mount, Juno and Gringham, along with him. However, their disappearance hadn't been nearly enough to sever the familial bonds between these two.

"Grin...gham..." the boy shed tears as he called out the name of his family member. His face was a mess, and he cried like he'd found a priceless treasure he thought was lost.

"Grooaoh..." Gringham responded with a mild roar.

The beams from above were burning his back and causing him great pain, but he wanted to be the same Gringham Louie had always known, so he acted like it was nothing.

Two members of a family, once separated, were now reunited.

"KyAHaHahAHahAhaH!"

Alas, despite Gringham saving Louie, the situation hadn't improved.

Monochrome laughed again, as though ridiculing the large "torch" that wasn't avoiding any attacks and was just letting itself get burned.

If the laughter could become words, they would be, "I want both the big and small torches to burn and show me their despair."

"Grrrrr..." the Aries Leo growled.

He didn’t have any way of dealing with the monster trying to take Louie’s life. Though strong, Gringham was but a land creature.

His claws and fangs were meant to be used on the ground, and they could never reach the skies. Being an animal prevented him from ever defeating Monochrome.

All he could do in this situation was to use his elephantine frame to cover Louie and protect him using his HP.

Again — Gringham couldn’t win against the UBM, and that wouldn’t change even if his owner, Shijima, was here.

They had no cards to play here. Gringham would eventually die and become particles of light, and then the beams would burn Louie.

They could only wait for their deaths, and only a miracle could save them now.

Thus, despite already having wrought a miracle, Gringham pled for more.

Ah, please... You can use my life if you have to... I beg you... Anyone... Give me a miracle that could protect my little family...

As if picking away at his plea, Monochrome fired another beam at Gringham’s back. The energy used in it was greater than in the previous ones, which immensely increased its penetrating power.

It was enough to pierce through Gringham’s large frame and burn Louie.

“GROOAAAOHH...!” he roared as he felt the energy from above and sensed that the incoming attack was incomparable to the ones before.

He braced himself in the hopes that the beam would stop with just him, but it was thoroughly meaningless.

A shield of flesh simply wasn’t enough to stop this particular beam. Both Gringham and Louie would die.

However, right before it hit...

“Lend me your back for a sec.”

...a certain man said those words and jumped up on Gringham.

He then held the black shield in his hands towards the sky and stopped the devastating beam.

Unable to penetrate the shield, it scattered and rained on the surrounding buildings, either setting them aflame or downright melting them.

However, the heat from the beam increased the temperature of the shield the man was holding, leaving him scorched.

Though burned by both heat conduction and radiation, he continued holding the shield up to protect both Gringham and Louie.

Eventually, the beam stopped.

After protecting their lives, there was an interval in which Monochrome didn't fire anything, likely because it was charging another powerful beam.

The man used this opportunity to talk. "Do you hear me, Monochrome?!"

The UBM's laughter was still reaching his ears, but the man didn't know if his voice reached Monochrome.

"Your eyes look down on us all, but do they even see?" he continued regardless, presenting the monster with a question that came from his heart... and a declaration just as passionate. "There's nothing here for you to break."

Perhaps he was talking about the exact place he was in, the burning village, the miracle wrought by a certain family, or all of them at the same time.

"I won't let you take another life."

The pleasant time at Torne had ended with the advent of the tragedy above. It had brought pain to many and was endangering Louie's and Gringham's lives at this very moment.

The man claimed that he would put an end to that — that nothing would be lost now.

This man, Ray Starling, took a deep breath and gave his whole heart into the words he said next.

"Come, monster! This is the shield of miracles!"

They were the same words Louie had mentioned when talking about Shijima.

When Louie and Farica had been attacked by an inescapable despair, the man had spoken them before braving the horde of monsters in order to save the mother and child.

He had no doubt been a miracle worker, and Ray thought it seemed right to start his battle against Monochrome by borrowing those words.

Just like Shijima before him, he was determined to destroy the sky-nesting despair before it could take Louie’s life.

That declaration was the trigger that started the final fight between Ray Starling the Unbreakable and Monochrome, the Void of the Black Sky.

Chapter Seven: Soar High, Shooting Star

The Tale of a Star

Monochrome didn’t know its own origin. It wasn’t even aware if it had been birthed by nature or created by someone’s hand.

The name above its head was something it was never conscious of, either.

The world called this monster the “Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome,” but the creature never considered itself any such thing.

To it, the world was made up of only “this” (itself) and “everything else,” so coding things with names was simply unnecessary. All that was important was the fact that it had a set of powers, and it was complete with nothing more than that.

As a being that gained all the energy necessary for its activities by merely absorbing light, Monochrome had no reason to do anything. And thus, ever since its appearance, it had done absolutely nothing. There was no necessity to do anything, so it didn’t even think about doing anything.

In fact, it didn’t think at all — nothing ever made its mind or heart budge.

That was its existence long before it was dubbed the “Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome.”

It merely floated high up in the sky and did nearly nothing but “exist” — just “being there,” so to speak. It ate all the light it needed to survive, and radiated any excesses come nighttime.

Those looking up at the sky would see it as just another star. All that made it different from the rest was the fact that it was slightly brighter than most and that it wasn’t fixed.

That was extent of its existence, presence, and effect on the world.

It would have been entirely possible for it to mindlessly float in the sky as a faux-star for aeons and beyond, but somewhere along the line, it became Monochrome.

The thing that caused the change inside it was a light it saw on the surface several hundreds of years ago: a fire burning throughout a city-state below.

Monochrome — or, rather, what it was before it got the name — looked down upon the scorching flames of war.

Man killed fellow man. Many were hurt, their homes were burned, and their lives were extinguished as the air became dense with anguish and despair.

But despite the horror, someone was looking at the scene while laughing with pure glee.

The commander of the invaders cackled loudly as the enemy nation burned to the ground.

A display of emotion so intense was something that the plant-like creature up in the sky wasn’t familiar with, and looking down at the scene made something within it — something that had been dormant all this time — suddenly stir.

Heart, mind, core — there was no telling what it actually was, but the fact remained that it was moved, and it had no idea why.

Regardless, it was the first change the creature had ever experienced since the beginning of its plain, almost rock-like existence. Due to that, it didn’t find it important whether the horrible scene’s effect on it was positive or not.

It only cared that the presence of despair caused it to change, like it caused change to those in pain and those who laughed.

That realization was so fresh and unknown to it that it quickly took it upon itself to bring new despair.

It had already known that focusing its excess light allowed it to fire a heat beam that could reach the surface, and that was exactly what it did.

Mimicking those fighting in the war below, it used its own power to hurt and burn, starting with the one who laughed at others’ despair.

The result?

The person anguished — showed despair.

“...Kya... ha.”

Watching the sight, the creature felt its core stir once more. Even its voice function, never used before, began to play a sound.

“KyA…ha…Ha.”

It fired more beams, creating even more people who drowned in anguish and despair, and they died without even realizing what was happening to them.

As the suffering grew, the creature felt something be born within its core, which had once been akin to rock.

“KyAhaHAhahAHaHahAh!”

Eventually, its voice function began releasing a loud laughter.

Pure and innocent, it laughed like an infant it had once heard while looking down at the world, making its joy known far and wide. It found pleasure in its changes and reassessed its consciousness.

Let’s burn more and more. Those are “torches.” When they burn, they light up this heart.

Somewhere down the line, it was given the name “Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome,” but it didn’t care about that in the least. Monochrome simply continued floating in the sky and burning animals to see them despair.

Every now and then, there would be those who’d challenge the creature, but they would all end up burned to death before they could even reach it.

Monochrome realized that its core was stirred the most when the determined faces of those who struggled against it became overcome with despair, and due to that, the entity eventually decided to stay in one place.

If “this” stays here and waits, “this” will get to see torches with determined faces show despair, right?

With that thought, it began nesting in the sky above the place that would come to be called “Torne Village.”

That eventually led to it being hit by a meteor and getting buried underground for 300 years, but those centuries would do nothing to change its nature and modus operandi.

Monochrome continued to stay in place and wait for determined “torches” to challenge it, and it didn’t take long for its wish to come true.

After all, right now, right below it, there was a man who was struggling against it with more determination than anyone ever had before.

◇◆◇

Torne Village

That man, Ray, was using Nemesis in her third form to defend against Monochrome's beams.

The shield prevented all direct attacks, but part of the heat they carried reached Ray's hand by conduction and left it hideously burned.

Even so, he did not yield or even consider letting go of his shield. He merely spammed his healing magic while intently listening to Nemesis's words.

"27,210... 30,635..."

They were nothing but numerical values. Nemesis voiced a greater number with every beam that came. It was much like her usual damage counter, but there were a few differences.

Ray assumed the damage already accumulated was more than enough to defeat Monochrome, but even so, he continued taking the attacks.

Even when reduced by the shield and Paladin's Aegis, the raining beams still dealt more damage than Ray healed with his magic and BR Armor's Bloody Regeneration, but the difference wasn't particularly great, so Ray's HP was being scorched away only gradually.

"Mister Ray!" Louie cried, looking at him, still protected by Gringham.

Ray was no longer on the beast's back, for Monochrome had already switched its focus away from Gringham over to the Master fighting it. That was clear because the beams weren't raining down on the unshielded parts of the beast, but instead following after Ray.

Thus, he'd jumped off Gringham and faced the rain all by himself.

At this point, the beast was damaged so badly that he could barely move, but even so, he continued protecting his dear Louie, who was looking at Ray as he struggled against Monochrome and its beams.

"ＫｙａＨＡｈａＨａｈＡｈＡＨ!" the entity laughed.

Its field of vision captured countless things on the surface.

It saw the armored "torch" running towards the windmill.

It saw the many torches hiding at the shelter built against it.

It saw the beast torch and the little boy torch it was protecting.

It saw the men and women torches hiding within the dark.

It saw a few torches preparing to attack it again from the surface.

It saw the mohawk torch preparing to take to the sky, only to be stopped by another torch.

But none of those torches mattered to it anymore.

Monochrome was now interested in and cared about only one torch: the one that was directing the strongest feelings towards it.

Indeed, that torch had captivated it, and that was something that had never happened before.

Until now, the creature had never paid much attention to torches separately. To Monochrome, the world was just “this” (itself) and “everything else,” where the latter were mere torches that burned in anguish and despair, and thus never had to be differentiated in any way.

This torch was on the verge of being the only exception. From the surface, it looked up at Monochrome with not a hint of fear or despair — only pure rage.

The creature gazed back at the torch that was Ray Starling, and pondered.

Yes. That’s him. He’s the one who came closest to “this.” What’s different about him?

It recognized the man as one of those who’d tried to approach it not too long ago, and despite having been brought down once, the man still looked at Monochrome with a challenging expression, which the creature found highly peculiar.

All of those struggling against it in the past had had something they wholeheartedly relied on. Some had been skilled with the sword, some had had excellent archery skills, while some had fought alongside dragons.

Oftentimes, upon realizing that their favored arts, tricks, and beasts had no effect, their daring expressions would change into those of despair, and those faces were the ones that shook Monochrome’s core more than anything else.

Ray, however, was still struggling. His heart hadn’t yielded after failing to reach it by flight, after having his flesh seared by its beams, and even after having seemingly no moves he could play against it. He just didn’t break.

Thus, he made Monochrome think, Then let’s go all-out.

This would be its first time using its full power since its appearance hundreds of years ago.

It converted light into MP, changed the MP into beam energy, and continuously gathered it within itself.

After repeat converting and charging, Monochrome eventually had the maximum amount of energy it could sustain, and condensed it all in its crystalline body, rather than the tips of its tentacles.

The crack on the crystal began leaking waves of energy that evaporated the surrounding clouds and created a space of clear sky around the creature.

Monochrome's body began to shine so brightly that it was hard to believe how dark it had been just moments ago.

It was preparing to unleash its trump card — not just a powerful-yet-nameless beam, but a uniquely-titled skill.

The creature spoke its name: "SHINING DESPAIR!"

For reasons unknown, the pronunciation of the word "despair" was unlike that of Earth's, being closer to "disappear."

Nevertheless, the text was honest — the skill was most definitely a light that could end all hope, carrying energy incomparable to all the beams that came before.

Before its might, even the loss of power due to distance was negligible. If it stormed down to the ground, it would not only evaporate people, but destroy and scatter an immense part of Torne itself.

People could feel it in their bones by simply looking up at Monochrome, as proven by all the despairing faces the creature saw.

"KyAhaHAhahAHaHahAh!" it cackled. The movement in its core made it far too happy.

Then, it looked at the face it wanted to see the most — Ray's.

Did ya despair? Hey, did ya? Did ya... Huh?

However, Ray's face was one of the few that showed no grief. He merely looked up at Monochrome with even more rage in his gaze than before.

Despite the abject dejection around him, his two eyes remained those of an unyielding challenger. If they could speak, they would surely say, "I will defeat you."

Scary, Monochrome thought, the first time it felt something that wasn't joy.

However, the sentiment was only momentary, as Monochrome quickly prepared to fire another beam of Shining Despair towards him.

Perhaps the creature was spurred into action by its first taste of fear.

Even so, Monochrome was far too clueless. It didn't know that the man was called "Unbreakable."

Even when faced with countless tragedies and disasters far exceeding his own power, Ray had never even considered backing down.

Even when dealing with evil and despair that could bring most to their knees, he'd stood tall by the sheer force of anger alone.

And he'd seized miracles for every single one of those disasters.

Monochrome knew none of that, but now, it would become painfully aware of it.

"Gringham!" Ray shouted while looking at Louie. He could tell that the immense sky beam would soon be fired down.

With just that alone, Gringham understood what he had to do. He raised his hurt body, took Louie in his mouth like a parent cat takes a kitten, and dashed away to distance him from what will soon be ground zero of the massive beam strike.

"Gringham! Mister Ray!" Louie called out as he was taken away.

Ray didn't say anything and instead responded by raising his shield to the sky.

And thus, Ray and Nemesis were the only people left in ground zero.

He wouldn't run.

Even if he tried to, he'd only be caught up in the destruction, not to mention that the tians in the shelters would fall prey to the beam's power.

He couldn't back away.

"That must be the fiend's ace," said Nemesis. "I wonder how powerful it is."

"Well, it's clear that one won't be enough," replied Ray. "Two might do the trick, but I can't be sure."

"Do we not have Brooches?"

"I'm all out. I put my last ones on Louie and Gringham."

Lifesaving Brooches prevented fatal damage, and before heading to Torne, Ray had had three of them in stock. However, having had used one up in yesterday's battle against Rosa, and handing the rest to Louie and Gringham today, he currently had none left. Nevertheless, he didn't regret the act at all.

"So... it all depends on us," he concluded.

"Very well. You may count on me."

"Yeah. I believe in you."

They had two more uses of Counter Absorption.

If they, his shield, and his passive defense skills weren't enough, Ray would surely receive the death penalty.

If that happened, he wouldn't be able to launch his counterattack, and Monochrome would reduce all of Torne to ash.

Out of all the gambles they'd taken today, this was likely the greatest.

Stats, skills, equipment, Embryo — this moment would test whether all they'd acquired during their time in Infinite Dendrogram would be enough to resist the despair about to rain down from the sky.

"SHINING DESPAIR!" Monochrome repeated the name of the skill again and launched the devastating beam of light directly from its crystalline body.

It was akin to a pillar linking heaven and earth, and it was dense with a heat so immense it could easily scorch the surface.

Were it to hit the ground, it would surely evaporate the area and turn Torne into a land of death.

The light made the many lives in the village be overcome with despair.

They, however, didn't break.

"Counter Absorption!" Nemesis shouted, calling forth a different barrier of light.

This new one momentarily stopped the might of the pillar, but then it was shattered. Even so, it was clear that it had an effect — the pillar's diameter had gotten smaller.

Then the beam was blocked by yet another barrier of light exactly like the one before.

It was a chained Counter Absorption activation — a technique Nemesis had acquired over the last month. One that they'd already used against Rosa.

The second barrier kept the pillar of light at bay longer than the first, but it, too, was shattered, letting the beam reach the surface.

The beam that was supposed to scorch a vast amount of land around it had lost most of its power to the barriers. What could have potentially annihilated the whole village had been reduced so much that it only affected an extremely small area.

Even so, the energy that made it past Ray was nothing to dismiss.

The ground zero of the explosion caused included the nearby windmill, which melted and all but vanished, while the surrounding ground became covered by an insufferable heat and turned red with fire. It looked akin to the depths of hell, and it was hard to imagine that someone could stand there alive.

And yet, there was one.

“We... did it...” Ray muttered, still alive in spite of it all.

His state was such that words like “hurt” or “injured” seemed too lax to describe it. It was a wonder he was even alive.

A person didn’t have enough fingers to count the debuffs he was affected by, while the heat was such that it colored his skin red or even black.

Some pieces of his equipment, too, shattered and fell into the lava below. These included his accessories and the prosthetic on his left arm.

His BR Armor was melting, but it still held well enough to continue bestowing its Bloody Regeneration.

Ray’s hellish state was not enviable in the least.

“...Heh,” Nemesis chuckled. “Its trajectory got knocked slightly off when it passed the second barrier. Most fortuitous. You probably wouldn’t be standing right now if it’d hit you directly.”

“Yeah,” Ray forced a reply. “What a stroke of luck.”

Even if the strike hadn’t been direct, Ray was still exposed to its aftereffects. He was currently surrounded by a molten, heated hell.

Of course, being a Master, he felt no pain, but he could still feel the searing heat touching his skin and taste the throat-scorching air entering his body. The red-hot hell burned his legs, but even then, his knees didn’t give in — and neither did his heart.

“We’re using it, Nemesis,” he uttered, and you could almost picture Nemesis nod in response.

“We have accumulated about 650,000...” she said. “That would be 65,000 metels.”

“Will it reach?”

“I shall make sure it does.”

“I’ll leave it to you, then.”

Following that exchange, Ray began holding the shield in a different manner.

Instead of making its surface face the enemy above, he held it in front — like a weapon.

“Nemesis. Third form β.”

A moment later, the shield changed its shape.

The handle he was holding slid and extended to turn Nemesis into a strange long-handled weapon with a shield at the tip.

The shield itself changed, as well. The five-sided silver pattern on its surface emitted a light and opened up, effectively unfolding the shield.

It looked akin to a flower bud beginning to bloom — no, like a pinwheel spreading its blades. And with five blades in total, it was much like what those from Torne called a “windstar.”

Indeed, this was a convertible weapon that changed from a shield to a star-like pinwheel.

“Form Shift...”

Thus, they declared the name of their new power — the title of Nemesis’s third form.

“...Shooting Wheel!”

Fittingly, it was a mix of “Shooting Star” and “Pinwheel.”

◇

A few minutes before Ray jumped in to protect Louie and Gringham and went on to face Monochrome...

“In short, this skill is basically a ranged, homing Vengeance,” Nemesis said.

Ray was still searching for Louie, and as he did so, Nemesis told him the details of the new skill.

“Ranged and homing...?” Ray asked.

“The damage taken in shield form is stored as propulsive power,” Nemesis continued. “Then, once activated, it chases after even the most distant of enemies, hunting them down and dealing double... no, triple damage.”

It was clearly a strong skill. Not only did it make up for their weaknesses against distant and fast-moving opponents, it also carried more power than the standard Vengeance is Mine.

In fact, it was far too strong, even when you considered the fact that it could only be used once per day.

Due to this, Ray instantly assumed that it had other conditions, and he was correct.

"But there are two problems with it," said Nemesis.

"Which are?"

"First is the fact that it bases not only its power, but also its speed and distance flown, on the damage dealt by the enemy."

According to her, the skill used a tenth of the damage taken as the value for its distance and speed. For example, with 10,000 damage taken, it would chase the enemy for 1,000 metels at 1,000 AGI.

"Yeah... that is a gamble," said Ray.

The highest distance Monochrome had reached during the pursuit was 25,000 metels, meaning that the damage they would have to accumulate to reach it with that condition was at least 250,000.

And that was only assuming that that distance was its absolute limit. For all they knew, the creature could be double that far away, and gathering enough damage to cover that distance would be no small task.

"Second, its activation takes one minute of preparation," Nemesis continued.

"...Seriously?"

"During this time, you obviously won't be able to use the shield, nor will you have Counter Absorption as an option. We will have to survive the time in some other way."

In other words, once they were done gathering the damage, they would be fully exposed to Monochrome's beams for a whole minute.

Ray instantly remembered the moment of Lang's head vanishing right before his eyes, but even that wasn't enough to affect his choice.

Even if the minute would severely endanger him, he would still use the skill, so that definitely wasn't wasn't the main issue here.

"Regardless, that's the only thing we have that can get through to the damn thing, right?" he said.

"Indeed," Nemesis nodded.

So, what mattered the most was whether the skill would reach it or not.

This would be a battle between two decisive numbers — the maximum amount of damage Ray could gather without dying and the maximum altitude Monochrome could arrive at.

◇

And now, after weathering many beams and the monstrous Shining Despair, the Shooting Wheel accumulated the greatest damage they could possibly expect in the situation.

“Start up,” said Nemesis, causing the damage gathered when she was in third form α — the shield — to become propulsive power for third form β.

The five black blades on the Shooting Wheel slowly began to turn and spin, gradually accelerating as though dancing with the wind.

Despite the air being still just moments ago, a fierce wind began to blow as though summoned or caused by the spinning wheel.

Ten seconds after the start, the blades were turning so fast that it was hard to see them with the naked eye, and Ray used his sole right arm to tighten his grip around the handle, as if to prevent the centrifugal force from taking it away.

The spinning was the very process of converting the accumulated damage into the power needed to reach the target.

Ray’s tooth and nail struggle had led to him gathering somewhere over 650,000 damage, meaning that the attack would be a supersonic seeker boasting a 65,000 metel flight distance and AGI of the exact same number. And upon landing on Monochrome, it would unleash nearly 2,000,000 points of damage.

No doubt, if released, it would be a decisive blow that would surely end the fight.

“ＫＹａａＡａＡＡａＡａａａＡａＡＡａＡａ!”

Monochrome in the skies above no longer laughed or expressed joy in any way.

After all, Ray had survived the greatest beam it had ever released.

Not only that, but the man was facing the creature with an even stronger spirit while wielding a weapon bearing energy so immense that even Monochrome felt it.

It was overcome by an ominous certainty.

“That” cannot exist. If “that” exists, “this” will be broken. It will be ended.

The entity had given up on trying to make Ray despair. It felt only fear that it would be ended if it didn’t end the man first.

It was the first time that Monochrome, the untouchable sky-dweller, had ever felt the danger of death. That feeling was something not even the meteor from centuries past had been able to give it.

“ＫｙＡｋａＫＹａＡａｋＹａＡＫａＡａａＡＡａＡＡａ!”

The creature charged energy for more beams.

Having attacked him many times by now, it assumed that weak beams, no matter how many, wouldn’t be enough to defeat Ray. Regardless of what the truth really was, it just didn’t think that the beams it used to light the torches would be enough against someone who hadn’t broken after all the attacks so far.

However, Monochrome didn’t have the time to fire another Shining Despair, so it opted to use the piercing beams it’d fired at Gringham.

They were quite powerful in their own right and charged much more quickly, so it thought to end the fight by firing them a few times.

“The fiend isn’t firing... but it’s gathering power!” yelled Nemesis.

Twenty seconds had passed since the spinning began.

Not a single beam had dropped during this time, but that definitely wasn’t something to be glad about. Just like Nemesis had realized, Monochrome was preparing to instantly kill Ray.

She was also aware that her Master didn’t have the power to avoid it anymore.

Even if they were all out of defensive options, he might have been able to survive if he could just move well enough.

But alas, Ray was far too heavily injured. It wouldn’t be strange if he fainted right then and there, and the fact that he’d even activated the skill was nothing short of miraculous.

“What do we do?!” Nemesis panicked. “The charging will take forty more seconds! We don’t have a means to defend against the beam!”

Just as the Black Shield was a form focused entirely on defense, the Shooting Wheel was a form focused solely on offense.

As she was now, Nemesis had the power to defeat the enemy, but not the power to protect Ray, and thus she thought that it was all over.

Her Master, however, seemed to think otherwise.

"Hey, it's fine," he said.

"Ray?"

A single look at Ray's face was enough to tell her that he wasn't just putting up a front. Despite being nearly thoroughly drained of power, he still seemed to believe in something.

"What do you mean, 'fi—'?" Before Nemesis could finish her question, something above them changed.

Monochrome was done charging, and it prepared to release the piercing beams that would obliterate Ray.

"Ray!" Nemesis shrieked.

Ray, on the other hand, showed no fear or pain, and calmly said, "We're making quite a show here. Anyone would notice this."

There was no doubt he believed in something. In fact, he was so confident that he put on a smirk.

"And if she noticed... she'll surely come."

Then Monochrome fired a number of fatal beams. A single one of them was enough to make short work of Ray's current HP and make his body evaporate, along with any chances of turning the tide.

Even so, Ray showed no fear, again looking like he believed in something... or someone.

"Right? B3?" he called.

"Ya don't even gotta ask!" And she brashly answered.

"Fire Resistance! Astro Guard!" the three-metel giant named Barbaroy Bad Burn roared as she jumped in between Ray and the beams, protecting him from harm and becoming his shield by using skills that upped her fire resistance and defense.

"Tch...!" she shouted. "Damn asshole went through the elemental def like it's paper! But hell if it'll be enough to break through my defense!"

The hail of fatal beams continued for over twenty seconds, and yet, like an all-enclosing canopy, she shielded Ray from them all.

"Ha," she chuckled, looking somewhat satisfied in spite of the white smoke coming off of her armor. "There goes almost a third of my HP. That shitty thing has power, I'll give it that."

Her words and state made Ray form a wry smile. Nemesis, on the other hand, looked thoroughly confused.

"B3...? Eh? This is B3?" she asked.

"Well, yeah..." Ray replied. "No matter how you look at her, it's B3."

"'No matter how you look at it'?" Nemesis repeated. "But the armor design is the same as... oh, never mind. I must say, though — first Marie, now her. I'm quite impressed by how good you are at recognizing people."

Despite her perplexity, Nemesis didn't stop spinning the Shooting Wheel. Only twenty seconds were left until the third form's power would be unleashed.

"Here ya go," said Barbaroy.

"Ah..." Ray lightly exclaimed as she poured an HP Recovery Potion of the highest quality on him.

"So that skill's gonna reach Monochrome, right?" she asked.

"...Yes!"

"Then you just think only about getting the stuff to the damn thing. I'll eliminate anything that gets in your way."

"Thank you!"

Ray entrusted his defense to Barbaroy and focused entirely on Nemesis's skill.

Half-frenzied at this point, Monochrome continued raining down its beams towards the surface.

It had clearly stopped thinking about the balance between power and energy regeneration, and kept on attacking while breaking its limits.

The crystalline tentacles it used to fire were now heated and smoking, but Monochrome continued using them regardless.

Despite that, not one of the beams reached Ray.

"That ain't enough!" shouted Barbaroy.

She was acting as the best tank Ray could possibly hope for in this situation — the beams couldn't take his life, no matter much effort the UBM put into it.

Thus came the time.

"Ray! The preparation is done!" Nemesis declared.

"Give it hell, Ray!" Barbaroy encouraged.

"Yeah!" Ray answered.

As the Shooting Wheel stirred the air at supersonic speeds, Ray brandished it behind him as if preparing to throw a ball into the sky and began speaking a set of words.

"Payback..."

It was the Shooting Wheel's unique skill — the crystallization of Ray and Nemesis's hopes.

It was their oath to overcome their weakness and the manifestation of their wish.

It was the materialization of their desire to prevent tragedies that were outside their scope, and its name was a prayer to let it reach far and wide.

"...Beyond the Stars!"

And thus it flew.

As Ray swung, the five-bladed star was disconnected from its handle and soared high into the sky.

Being both a shooting star and a windstar, it made you wonder why it was so reminiscent of the legend of Monochrome's sealing and whether it was a coincidence or not.

Leaving a trail of black aura behind, Nemesis, the supersonic shooting star, rose towards the dark star up in the sky.

"KyAaAAaaAAAahAaaAaAAaAaAaaaAaH!"

Upon seeing the shooting star flying at it at speeds several times greater than sound, Monochrome shrieked and began soaring higher.

It didn't even consider shooting it down, for the shooting star's speed was far too immense for its beams.

The creature flew away at full power — at speeds it had never even tried before — greatly exceeding its previous record.

Both the chaser and the runner stars rose to the sky with supersonic velocity.

To those on the surface, the sight would be akin to seeing two shooting stars fly from the earth to the heavens, rather than the other way around.

But reversed or not, shooting stars all shared the same fate — to flash through the sky, fade, and expire.

"KyAaAAaaaAAaaAaHaAaAAaaaAh!"

Monochrome flew upward — soared higher and higher.

It paid no heed to its MP reserves or even considered using any power to convert light into it.

It focused all of its functions and mechanisms solely on speed to escape the black shooting star behind it.

They were already far past the limit any living animal could bear, and yet, the chaser showed no intention of stopping.

The pursuit showed no sign of ending even as Monochrome itself surpassed the greatest height it had ever reached.

The altitude was now over 35,000 metels. The world beyond was alien even to the creature, and there was no telling how long its cracked frame would last. But even so, it continued flying, for stopping meant certain extinction.

Escape, it thought. Escape escape escape! "This" will end if it doesn't escape!

What it felt right now was perhaps the very same feeling it had been causing all this time.

Despair — the sole source of its joy.

No, it wasn't despairing quite yet, for it still had some hope.

With that speed, "that" shouldn't be able to fly too far! "This" has a limit! "That" has to have a limit, too! "This" will not end if "that" reaches its limit first!

That was its hope, and it wasn't wrong in the least. The Shooting Wheel's limit was 65,000 metels — the distance it could fly after converting the accumulated damage.

The altitude had now exceeded 50,000 metels.

There were only about ten seconds left until the Shooting Wheel lost all its propulsion power.

The outcome of this chase would surely be decided here in the thermosphere — the place where shooting stars are said to expire.

"Such beauty," murmured Nemesis as she continued the vehement chase.

As an Arms type, she had a large field of vision, so she could both focus on Monochrome and see the world below.

She could now look at the planet without the horizon cutting off her vision.

Her eyes could now see far beyond the single kingdom she and Ray spent their time in. She could see some activity in the neighboring countries and even catch glimpses of the unique sceneries from those far away.

There was also something gigantic far off in the distant south.

Nemesis could now see both the extent and vibrance of this world, and she found it nothing but beautiful.

She hoped to someday get a good, long look at this scenery with Ray at her side.

“But now... there’s something I must do.”

She had to destroy the tragedy that had appeared before her Master. Ray had entrusted her with the role, and she wanted to do it, too.

The Shooting Wheel’s limit was close, but Nemesis still flew, swearing to make it reach.

“You could have just watched the world from here,” she uttered while looking ahead. The words merely escaped her mouth, but that was probably her final, ultimate sentiment towards Monochrome.

She forced out the last of her power.

The end! Monochrome panicked as the shooting star approached. “This” will be ended!

It had already lost all hope of escaping. With all its core, the centuries-old UBM feared the coming end — the gaze of death.

Because of this, it began to think things it had never considered before.

“This” will be ended! If it ends...! If it ends, then...? it thought and paused as an alien idea came to its mind. Wait... What would happen if “this” ended?

For the first time in its long existence, it thought a question that most minds would come across at their earliest stages.

It had never considered that back when it was plant-like, and ever since becoming Monochrome, it had done nothing but cause ends, but now...

Huh? Why doesn’t “this” want to end?

As a creature that had originally been nothing but a star-like thing hanging in the sky, it shouldn’t have had anything to feel about its own end.

Before becoming Monochrome, it hadn’t even considered whether it existed or not.

By witnessing a human conflict, it had learned of despair, learned that made its core stir, deemed it to be joy, and decided to mass-produce despair to please itself.

Right, if “this” ends, it won’t see more despair. And if it doesn’t see despair, it won’t feel joy.

It didn’t want to end because it wanted to feel more bliss.

But then, it suddenly began to question the centuries-old principle of its behavior.

But then... why did "this" enjoy it?

It finally realized that, in its first exposure to despair... the one who'd found joy in it wasn't Monochrome, but some human on the surface.

The creature's own joy was just a borrowed imitation, and it had misinterpreted that by thinking that it had gained a desire, despite the fact that it had absolutely no necessity to derive joy from despair.

Thus, the belated question made Monochrome slightly slow down its ascent, letting Nemesis catch up to it.

One of the Shooting Wheel's five blades bit into the creature's crystalline body...

"Farewell, star of the black sky!" she screamed.

...and returned triple the damage it had done to Ray and Nemesis.

The vast amount of damage delivered by Payback Beyond the Stars was too much to bear, even for an Ancient Legendary UBM — especially one that had sacrificed its endurance for other qualities.

Ah, then... Monochrome began to weave a thought, but it was cut off by its own extinction.

No one would ever know the conclusion it came to.

◇

That day, there was a dazzling bright light in the sky.

It was the light stored within Monochrome, now released by its collapse.

However, it was nothing like the scorching beams it had fired when active — it was only a pure shine, much like the one the creature had emitted before becoming Monochrome.

In a certain village in Altar, a boy was looking up at the sky alongside his little sister.

"Wow! It's so pretty!" she said joyously.

"Yeah! It's sparkling!" he agreed.

Exposed to the unusual light in the sky, the innocent little children felt nothing but jubilation.

Such exchanges were common among those who saw the light, and there was not a hint of the despair Monochrome had once brought. Those who saw it merely reveled in the joy inspired by the beauty of the sight.

Perhaps this had been a common spectacle back at the age before Monochrome became a creature of despair.

The entity that had spent the last few centuries leading a false existence spent its very final moments lighting up the world as it had originally... and then vanished completely.

Epilogue

Paladin, Ray Starling

Upon confirming that Monochrome was gone for good, I passed out instantly.

I didn't just get the Fainting status effect, either — I actually became so relaxed that my consciousness turned off.

I felt like I slept the whole time I was inside that weird space you go to when you're out cold.

Also, it might've just been my imagination, but I thought I saw a blackish, reddish humanoid silhouette act all sulky, saying, "I finished it and you come here like this..." or something.

Anyway, upon waking up, I was greeted by several changes, with the first of them being the special reward, which, just like you'd expect, went to me.

It was called "Black Warcoat, Monochrome," and it was basically a crystalline, transparent greatcoat.

Upon seeing it, Nemesis... oh, right.

Speaking of her... after defeating Monochrome, she, still in her Shooting Wheel form, simply came back down to the surface like it was nothing, merged with the handle I was still holding in my hand while unconscious, and turned back into her human form.

Now, upon seeing Monochrome's special reward, she muttered something like, "How unexpected. Knowing you, I assumed it would be black and appear far more sinister," which I found very rude. Just what made her automatically assume that my gear would be sinister?

Anyway, the Black Warcoat had a passive skill called "Light Absorption," and when I equipped the coat and activated it, it instantly went from transparent to black. True to its name, the skill absorbed light, and it seemed to do it so well that the whole coat turned completely dark.

"I knew it," said Nemesis.

That aside, Light Absorption wasn't the only skill it had.

I expected the other skill to have something to do with flying or voice, but its name — "Shining Despair" — basically said it all. As expected, its description said that it fired a beam, and I could only assume it was a weaker version of the greatest one fired by the UBM.

However, it left me wondering about something.

When the monster fired that beam, I'd heard it say "Shining Disappear," rather than "Despair," so I was slightly curious why the pronunciation had changed after it became a special reward. Was it adjusted to me or something?

Come to think of it, in Infinite Dendrogram, certain English words were used or pronounced differently than in real life. Was there something going on with the translation function?

Regardless, on to the next change.

While I was out cold, everyone in Torne had been fully healed.

Like, even those with severe Scorches all over their bodies, and even those who'd lost limbs were now in perfectly good health — and I was among them.

Most of the wounds I'd gained in my battle against Monochrome had vanished, and not only that, but the left arm I'd lost before this incident had grown back. The arm worked as smoothly as it did in reality, and it honestly felt like it had never been gone.

According to Nemesis and B3, the healing had happened while they weren't looking.

I'd call this a mystery, but I had a strong guess about who was responsible. After all, the kingdom had only a single person who wielded healing magic powerful enough to cure loss of body parts.

"So you were here, too... Miss Aberration," I muttered.

◇◇◇

A certain pair of people

"Ohhh, dear, am I tired. Weird, considering I didn't do anything."

"Most excellent work, Lady Tsukuyo."

The spiritual leader of The Lunar Society, Tsukuyo Fuso, was in an empty part of Torne village, lying down on and rolling around the low grass as though it was the floor in her home.

Her Mythical junihitoe was now covered in grass stains, but she didn’t seem to care one bit.

“Hey, I didn’t do anythiiing,” she said. “They just became healed for some reason. Oh dear, what a shame, and I was planning to have Ray join us in exchange for healing his aaaarm. Just what in the woooorld healed them allll?”

“I fail to see the need to feign ignorance when I was there to see it,” he responded. “And I feel you are overdoing it with the monotone.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“Very well, then.”

Despite being there to witness his mistress walk around the village and heal everyone, Eishiro Tsukikage was the first to give up.

Anyway, to answer the question of how long The Lunar Society’s top had been in Torne... they’d actually arrived here long before Monochrome had appeared.

Yesterday, Eishiro had told Tsukuyo that Ray was heading there alongside Shijima’s son-in-law.

At first, her reaction was just a lukewarm “Really now?” She didn’t seem to care at all.

But come morning, she said, “I wanna go see the Windstar Fest. Oh, but it’s got nothing to do with Ray,” and then went out to Torne.

This seemed to be something she’d decided on after a whole evening’s worth of consideration. Perhaps she wanted to see what kind of choice Ray would make when faced with the Shijima family’s problem.

Tsukuyo was accompanied by Eishiro, and for their means of transport, they invited a member of The Lunar Society — a Master who used a Pure-Dragon-tier skydragon.

Thanks to that, they arrived at Torne in no time. But right after they did, B3 called Eishiro on his real life mobile — yes, the same call in which she and Ray asked about Shijima’s relationship to The Lunar Society.

Eishiro had to log out to answer, while the Pure-Dragon’s Master had to look after his creature, so Tsukuyo ended up walking around the stalls all by herself.

Of course, with her being an infamous, stand-out beauty known to wear a junihitoe, there could’ve been many people noticing her and realizing who she was, but that was countered by the disguise Eishiro had given her before logging out.

Tsukuyo went on to have a decently good time walking around the stalls, and upon Eishiro's return, he told her about the situation.

Then, once Ray logged in again, they went on to watch him from the shadows — quite literally — and Tsukuyo was somewhat satisfied to see him resolve to tell Farica and Louie about Shijima.

But then she said, "Oh, dear. We should stop this. Kage, what did you even tell him?" and tried to call out to Ray, but that was exactly when Monochrome appeared.

Ray instantly took to the sky, and even their Pure-Dragon rider joined him and challenged the UBM.

Tsukuyo had heaved a sigh, but then, she and Eishiro had begun walking around the attacked places in order to heal the ones who'd been critically hurt.

"Oh deaaaar, I could make a really good deal with the first princess if she was here, but now I'm working for freeeee," she whined despite indiscriminately healing all those injured while still hiding in the shadows.

Thanks to her efforts, not a single tian died.

And during it all, she watched over Ray's struggle and didn't do more than that.

"Shouldn't we have been the ones to defeat the UBM?" Eishiro asked.

Though she'd helped the tians, Tsukuyo had done absolutely nothing to influence Ray's battle.

This was despite having the options to assist Ray directly or to defeat Monochrome by themselves and taking the special reward.

The reason why she didn't do that was simple.

"Ehh? But that would've been boring."

And there was nothing more to it.

She'd watched Ray the whole time — saw his resolve and the actions he'd taken — but not even once had she considered assisting him. She believed it would've sullied the purity of his behavior.

Tsukuyo wanted to see Ray at his most natural. In a way, she was continuing the observation that had been ruined by Figaro's intrusion back at their HQ.

The conclusion? Tsukuyo ended up liking Ray even more than she had after their conversation when she'd kidnapped him. So much so that she'd cast Mercy of the Holy on him, giving up on using it as a card in a deal.

"Oh deaaaar, Ray's healed and I didn't even do anything, so now I'll have to put off inviting him to CID until the next time he's almost dyiiiing," she whined.

Eishiro gave her a flat look, not saying a word.

When it came to deals, Tsukuyo's style was to present the other party with severe conditions and wait until they had no choice but to accept them. In this case, however, she'd betrayed her style twice — first by lowering her condition to him joining CID, rather than The Lunar Society, and then by actually giving him the treatment for absolutely no reward.

Her strong, continuous, repeated assertion to Eishiro that she hadn't done anything back there was just her way of denying the reality that she'd departed from her principle and helped Ray for nothing.

She reminds me of herself when she was a child, Eishiro thought in response to the highly unconvincing and ineffective denial. He chose to say nothing more.

"But... well..." Tsukuyo continued. "At least Shijima's family is saved, and Ray gave me a good show. I guess that was his way of seizing miracles."

"'Miracles,' you say?" Eishiro commented. "I believe people consider wounds that cure themselves to be miraculous, as well."

"I don't know what you meaaaan."

"Oh yes, of course, of course. I must say, though..." Tsukikage sighed at his mistress's obstinance before letting out a whisper. "Miracles are certainly commonplace nowadays."

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

One more thing seemed to have happened while I was asleep: Louie and Farica received a letter from Mr. Shijima.

It was from before he'd taken the surgery. Apparently, Mr. Shijima had put it in a metal pipe and given it to Gringham ahead of time so the lion could deliver it to them just in case he himself wasn't back after half a year had passed.

The man had entrusted it to Gringham, believing that his loyal beast would listen to his desire even after returning to the wild.

Mr. Shijima's letter said that he was fighting his illness and that the fact he wasn't back yet meant that it was lasting longer than he'd expected. However, he also added that he would definitely come back.

Aside from that, it contained his most heartfelt feelings for Louie and Farica.

Upon hearing that, I decided to call off telling them what I'd found out before Monochrome's appearance.

The letter contained Mr. Shijima's own words, so I had no business getting involved in this anymore.

Not to mention that there was a decisive misconception on our part regarding this whole situation.

When I'd asked Tsukikage how the man had ended up, the goddamn King of Secretaries had put on a depressed tone and said, "'Miracles' are called 'miracles'... because they're unbelievably rare."

Those words had seriously shocked me, but now that I thought about it... that sneaky bastard hadn't said anything about the miracle not happening or the man dying.

And to top it all off, when I'd logged out just a moment ago and ran a search for "Fuso hospital terminal illness" I'd instantly got a result for a medical article from two months ago, titled, "SURGERY FOR GLOBALLY INFAMOUS DISEASE SUCCESSFUL IN JAPAN FOR THE FIRST TIME EVER!"

It said that the patient would have to spend a few months in an ICU for follow-up medical care, and that the patient's condition was stable.

Out of respect for his privacy, the man wasn't named, but it was more than likely that it was our guy.

The miracle... had actually happened.

"Man... I've been had," I muttered.

I knew today was April Fools' Day. And, well, I had clearly been fooled. Hook, line, and sinker.

Was I feeling bad about that, though? Nope. Not at all.

That evening, after thanking me for saving him and Gringham, Louie went on to withdraw his request, saying, "I'll keep waiting for Dad with Mom, Gringham, and my little brother or sister! He will come back!"

He made the right choice, if you asked me.

After all, the day he was waiting for wasn't too far away.

◇

It was the first morning after the Monochrome incident.

B3 and I were about to leave Torne as Louie, Farica, and Gringham were seeing us off.

Oh, yeah. I forgot to mention that Gringham was tamed by Farica. If he'd stayed untamed, he might've been accidentally killed by someone, so yesterday, she'd gone out to get the Tamer job and made him hers.

Of course, an Aries Leo wasn't exactly a creature that could be tamed by a completely new Tamer, but it was different in Gringham's case. They were family, and he'd wanted to be tamed, so the process had been completed without a problem, and he was now lying asleep on their grounds like some enormous housecat.

Now, he too, would be waiting for his original owner alongside his family.

"Thank you so much for everything you've done," said Farica as she bowed her head. Louie followed after her. "You helped with Louie's request and even saved us from that Monochrome..."

"No need for that," I replied. "I did those things because I wanted to."

It would have left a bad taste in my mouth if I hadn't done them, and having done them, I was feeling nothing but refreshed. That alone made it all worth it.

"Oh, right," said Louie. "I canceled the request, but the money..."

"Oh, no need for that, either." I raised my hand to stop him.

"Yes," B3 nodded. "We never agreed on an amount."

Exactly — we hadn't decided on a reward. Not to mention that...

"Thanks to this matter, we chanced upon a windfall," she continued. "And that's payment enough."

...Yeah, the reparations from K&R would do just fine.

I'd gotten a closer look at the contract and found out that the interest for delayed payment was insane in more ways than one. If Rosa didn't hurry and pay up, she'd be in for a serious debt hell.

Anyway, we were about to depart, but before that...

"Louie," I addressed the boy.

“Yes? What is it?” He looked up at me.

There was just one more thing I wanted to tell him before I left.

“Make sure to support your little brother or sister when he or she’s born, all right? Little brothers rely on their big brothers more than you’d expect.”

“...Okay!”

And with that exchange as our last, we left the Shijima household.

Silver, having recovered from the effects of that “Gremlin” Embryo, was pulling B3’s carriage forward.

Nemesis, B3, and I were all on the coachman’s seat.

Looking around, I could see people reconstructing the parts of the village Monochrome had destroyed yesterday.

A group of Masters with mohawk haircuts looked particularly enthusiastic about their volunteer work.

Can’t judge a book by its cover, huh? I thought as I watched the scenery when I felt B3 look at me, both silently and intently.

“Is anything wrong?” I asked.

“No, it’s just that... I find it strange that you aren’t saying anything about me when I was in armor. Tone, looks — nearly everything about me was different, so I expected you to ask.”

Yeah, she’d definitely been more manly back then. That was what she’d called being “turned on” or something. Nevertheless...

“Well... I’m used to it.”

“‘Used to it?’”

“I have two family members and a few friends whose tones and behaviors, like yours, drastically change depending on the situation, so I don’t really mind it at this point.”

“I... I see?”

Both of my siblings, Marie, Hugo... probably Rook, too. Looking at it like that, I realized I had quite a number of two-faced characters around me. But at least they were all good people at heart.

“By the way, may I ask you something?” Nemesis joined the conversation with a question for B3. “What should we call you from now on? ‘B3’ or ‘Barbaroy’?”

“Oh, uh, please use ‘B3’ when I’m not wearing my armor and ‘Barbaroy’ when I am.”

She separates them...?

"Hm... Why the separation?" asked Nemesis.

B3's face turned slightly red as she said, "Well... That makes it cuter... and cooler, right?"

Those words of hers made me suddenly burst into laughter.

She turned all sulky and lightly whacked my head a few times before escaping into her carriage.

Yep. She's an unexpectedly charming person, I thought with a grin. ...Those hits took some of my HP, though.

"You have no one to blame but yourself," said Nemesis.

Can't argue with that.

And so, our carriage left Torne.

I turned around for the last time and took a look at the village, now a small dot on the horizon.

"Now that I think about it... what will happen to the Windstar Festival now?" I muttered.

Monochrome, the origin of the festival, had awakened, greatly damaged the village, and vanished.

Though not many had been hurt or injured, the same couldn't be said for their homes, which were charred or even burnt to the ground.

Reconstruction would take a lot of time, and it wasn't certain whether they could continue the Windstar Festival tradition.

"It will go on," said Nemesis, sounding certain. She was sitting off to my right.

"Why do you think that?" I asked.

"People are creatures that advance forward while etching their pain and grief into the past, so I'm certain they will do the same with this incident."

I silently pondered, thinking that it seemed much like throwing a festival during the anniversary of an air-raid or some other calamity in order to comfort the dead and pray for restoration.

"You and I are like that, as well," she added.

"You, too?"

"Indeed. I am an Embryo that changes your pain and sadness into power that lets you keep moving forward," she said as she gently grasped my left hand — the one I now had again. "But the will to do that is none other than yours... and the same applies to everyone else. So if those calling this village their home have the will to move on, it will be restored in no time, and the festival will continue to happen as it always has."

"...That's true."

We rode the carriage as it traced the road leading back to the capital.

A gentle wind was blowing over it, spinning the windstars decorating the fences.

◇◇◇

The following year’s Windstar Festival happened without a problem to name.

However, there was a slight, but noticeable, change — the windstar decorations were now being held up by small paper dolls, which seemed to represent the person who’d shattered the star of the black sky.

At the year’s Windstar Dance, one could see a certain family dancing among the crowd — a wife with her husband, and a young boy with a silent girl.

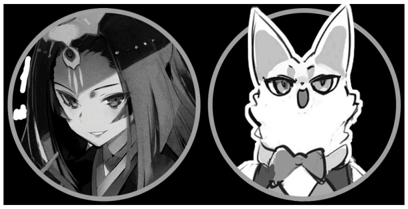
Not far away from them, there was a lion with a baby sleeping on its woolly mane.

Though it was much like the scenes from years before, it was definitely new.

And that day, too, there was a pleasant wind that gently spun the windstars.

END. To Be Continued in the Next Episode...

Midword



Fox: “Lookie here, we got the good ending! Things like this make waiting for the new volume allll worth it!”

Cat: “Indeed they dooo. Now, if only someone didn’t destroy the aftertaste.”

Fox: “Eehh? Whoever do you meaaan? Ah, almost forgot. I’m the fox, Tsukuyo Fuso.”

Cat: “I obviously mean you. I’m the cat, Cheshire. And I didn’t have any scenes again.”

Fox: “Our presence in the story sure is strangely patterned, isn’t it? Where’s the bear?”

Cat: “...In jail.”

Fox: “...Huh?”

Cat: “For more about that, read the following side story! It takes place during the events of volumes 6 and 7.”

Fox: “...So this volume also has side stories shoved in after the main story, huh?”

Cat: “We have our reasons for this. Promise.”

Side Story: The Case of the Unknown Murders — The Situation

Lost Heart, Rook Holmes

That day, I was in Gideon's first district, carefully observing all the people passing by, immersing myself in deep thought while at the same time gathering information regarding my surroundings.

My father had trained me in that, along with other such skills as lipreading, lockpicking, and reading mystery novels in a... somewhat peculiar manner.

Specifically, rather than trying to unravel the tricks and mysteries within the work itself, I'd been trained to read while getting into the mind of the author and trying to understand his personality well enough to guess what kind tricks he would be inclined to use in his story, which... might be a sub-optimal way to read a book.

Regardless, on the day Ray was kidnapped and the day before that, I was undergoing a change in my schedule that had me skipping out on the training from my father.

I had to attend the hellish training prepared for me by Ray's brother.

Of course, "hellish" is not an adjective you use lightly, but all things considered, there was just no better word for it.

After all, I was told to turn on my pain setting and come close to the death penalty over and over again.

I couldn't even describe the pain I felt when I had only 1 HP left.

Most would surely think that anyone providing or accepting this training had issues with their sanity, but Shu had said, "You're the type of guy who's fine with this, aren't ya?"

And yes, indeed I was.

According to him, "It's not guaranteed, but people-like Embryos sometimes have their evolutions influenced by the Master's needs or intense feelings. The more hardship you face, the more likely it is that your Embryo will be able to counter difficult situations."

And looking at Ray, I could fully understand what he meant.

Nevertheless, Shu's training had been so hellish that Marilyn and the other girls became cross with him, and I couldn't quite fault them for that.

I was supposed to be undergoing that training today, as well, but there had been an issue on Shu's end, so now I was just sitting here in front of the knight offices, thinking about... his arrest.

"Rook," Babi spoke up.

"What is it?" I asked.

"I was sleeping, so I didn't hear the reason. Why did they arrest the bear man? Food fraud?"

"No. Nothing like that." I could concede that the materials used in his popcorn were a mystery in itself, but that had nothing to do with his arrest.

The reason for that was...

"Serial burglary and murder."

Indeed. Shu was suspected to be the one behind a case troubling the city.

It all began in the evening two days prior, when someone discovered the gory remains of a certain head of a merchant family.

It was in such a terrible state that they didn't even realize it was him until they restored his body.

It was obviously no accident or suicide, so Gideon's authorities instantly took to action, and as soon as they began the investigation, they discovered that all the money and goods in the hidden safe had been stolen. The evidence suggested that they'd been taken before the murder.

But they hadn't been able to find a single trace of the culprit even after mobilizing all those with investigative sense skills.

The household also had an alarm system with potential equivalent to high-rank magic, but there were no signs that it had been triggered.

They failed to find a single piece of evidence that the culprit had even been there.

The only exception was a strange card placed next to the remains.

None of those officers were able to read the language on it, so although it was an important piece of evidence, it wasn't quite good enough to be considered a clue.

The following evening, there was another burglary-murder at another merchant's household.

Like in the previous event, the remains were in a dreadful state, the money and goods had been stolen, the alarm had failed to activate... and there was a card left nearby.

That was more than enough for the officers to become certain that the culprit for both incidents was the same.

The details of the investigation hadn't been made public, so it was impossible for it to be a copycat killer.

Now, about the cards... they both had the exact same text on their front, but different text on their backs. However, the text of both the front and back were written in languages unknown to the investigators, so they weren't able to read them.

They created copies and spread them out to the relevant institutions, but no tian working at them recognized the letters or characters.

But then there was a ray of light. Marie happened to visit the offices due to Elizabeth-related business, and when she caught a glimpse of the card the Knights had, she read it aloud, saying, "'I am Unknown?'"

That was the nickname of Ray's brother, Shu Starling, the King of Destruction.

Though his identity had become unveiled during the previous incident, he had yet to be given a new one. Then again, his face was still a mystery, so people were probably fine with keeping the nickname "Unknown."

"Oh," Marie continued, "and this weird character on the other side looks like a bear. Did the furball write this?"

With that new piece of information, the case moved from its standstill, resulting in Shu's arrest.

He protested verbally, saying, "I've been fur-amed!" But he didn't resist his arrest, possibly because he wanted to be considerate of the investigators who'd been given the absurd, unreasonable task of taking him — a Superior — in.

Their expressions as they did were both venerably resolute and heroically tragic.

Apparently Shu logged out every now and then, but he respected his situation and always returned to the knight offices.

Currently, he was being subjected to investigation and questioning using various skills.

Naturally, one of them was Truth Discernment, but its results weren't considered all that important because they assumed that a Superior could have a means to fool the skill.

Ironically, the man's status and the unknown extent of the power that came with it actually worked against him, keeping him as the prime suspect.

Truth Discernment was one of the most important factors in this world's judicial system, yet even that was considered inadequate against a Superior.

Additionally, there was circumstantial evidence that suggested that he was the culprit.

First, of course, the card implied the connection. Second, his Mythical special reward, Kim-un-Kamuy, had camouflage and presence manipulation skills powerful enough to fool the alarm systems.

As for motive... he was currently short on money, so it was not unreasonable to believe he would commit burglary.

Due to all that together, he continued to be held as a suspect.

I had received all that information directly from Ray's brother by using Telepathy Cuffs. Thankfully, they hadn't confiscated his possessions.

"Considering the motive, means, and opportunity, Shu happens to be the only suspect the investigators have," I muttered. "Which makes him the prime suspect."

"But Mr. Bear wouldn't do that, right?" Babi asked. "Don't you think so?"

"Babi, detectives are human, too, and yes, we do have our share of preferences when it comes to people, but those shouldn't be incorporated into our investigative deductions."

In both reality and fiction, there had been countless cases of detectives believing that a suspect was too good a person to be the culprit, and then gone on to have that belief betrayed.

"Then... what's your deduction?" she asked.

"Shu isn't the culprit," I said. "That's far too obvious."

Indeed, I could take it for granted that him being the one who did it was downright impossible.

"If all he needed was money, then there was no need for him to kill anyone," I explained. "Not to mention that he wouldn't leave a card saying that he did it. He is not some phantom thief you'd find in fiction."

In fact, not even my mother would do work this... trifling, I thought.

"This is definitely a crime committed by a person who's trying to make it seem like it's Shu. The true culprit... is someone else."

The unknown murderer was still at large, laughing after having transferred the blame to someone else.

It was in my nature — in my genes from my father — to want to expose his identity and close this case for good.

I knew exactly what I had to do now.

Shu might've had told me all that information because he'd guessed what course of action I would take. In that case, this might be part of the training.

Regardless, for the first time in a while, I once again had an objective.

When it came to using my parents' lessons, the only thing I'd been doing recently was teaching Elizabeth my mother's thieving techniques. But now, I would put into practice what my father had taught me.

"I'll expose the culprit... and bring him to light." I swear that upon my father's honor.

"Rook... That line is a biiit..."

"I know. I regret saying it now."

Anyway, I began the investigation.

"First we have to find out how the culprit got in, right?" Babi asked.

"No, actually. The 'how' is thoroughly meaningless here."

This world had an awful lot of skills, including ones from Embryos that were unique to each Master, so the means of passing the alarm system were far too many. Even I personally knew of two people who could do it — Shu and Marie.

"So we will look into the method last," I said. "First, we have to work out the culprit's mentality."

"How will you do that?"

"I'm thinking on it now while I'm recovering my detective's intuition."

I sat on a bench in front of the knight offices in the first district, observing the people passing by. It was both preparation for my first detective work in a long time, and part of the investigation.

On the nearby notice board, the authorities had left a brief explanation regarding the murders.

This was true for many other incidents, and the text on them followed the format of “This and that happened, and this and that person was caught.”

I was observing the reactions of the people looking at the board.

If the culprit was interested in how the case was proceeding, he might come to take a gander at it, and depending on his reaction, I might find my target early in the investigation. Still, it wasn’t too likely that the culprit would come here, so my hopes weren’t high, and most of my focus was on recovering my intuition and gathering my thoughts.

“’Male suspect,’ eh?” I muttered, still on the bench, looking at the notice board several meters ahead.

The explanation for the murders described what had happened and ended it with just a “We arrested a male suspect.”

Shu’s name was nowhere to be seen, partly because it wasn’t certain that he was the culprit yet, but mostly because the news of one of the kingdom’s Superiors getting arrested would be far too shocking.

During the incident started by the Giga Professor, Shu had revealed his identity as the King of Destruction and destroyed Pandemonium and the horde of monsters attacking Gideon.

The significance of those feats couldn’t be taken lightly. Just like the moment of Ray defeating the RSK, Shu’s feats had given hope to the people of this declining kingdom.

In fact, that might very well be the reason why the culprit was framing him.

Arrest alone wasn’t enough to send a Master to the gaol, and if they had save points in other countries, they could come back through those. According to Shu, he had marked save points in all seven countries, so that wasn’t a problem.

However, if he was put on Altar’s wanted list and lost his nationality, he would obviously disappear from the country’s rankings, making it impossible for the King of Destruction, the top of Altar’s kill rankings, to participate in the war.

And with him being the hope of the kingdom, his exit would mean far more than just a severe loss of war potential. It would be a severe blow to morale.

Then... was this another strategical move by the Giga Professor?

"...No," I murmured.

It didn't make sense for these murders to be part of a plot to remove Shu from the war.

If someone truly wanted to achieve that, they would have framed him for a crime grave enough to get him on all the wanted lists.

If that had been my objective, and I'd had the means to do it... I would have killed Elizabeth, who happened to still be here in Gideon.

If I framed Shu for that, he would instantly become wanted everywhere — no two ways about it.

His next death penalty would send him to the gaol, and the fact that their own Superior had killed their princess would drop Altarian morale to an all-time low, giving Dryfe a great advantage in the war.

"But as things are now..." I murmured.

Since this was just a case of two merchants being murdered and having their possessions stolen, it was likely that the country would suppress this whole event. The crime was certainly severe, but it was nothing compared to the future that would come if they lost their greatest force in the upcoming war. As the idiom goes, "desperate times call for desperate measures."

From Shu's standpoint, it would be quite disgraceful to be released despite not being proven innocent, but even if it made him feel bad, he would become free nonetheless.

I found it hard to believe that the true culprit would be unaware of that, so I still couldn't tell what the culprit's goal was.

I needed more information, and quite a lot of it, as well, so I made my way to a place that could give me what I wanted: the local DIN branch.

I went inside and bought copies of the documents relating to the murders and the cards found on the crime scenes. The fact that the DIN had documents for an ongoing investigation as though it was nothing made me somewhat wary of their organization, but for now, I decided to use it to my advantage.

Besides, not even they seemed to know who the real culprit was, and they said they would pay a lot for that information.

It was pretty evident that they didn't believe Shu was the culprit, and according to the documents, many of the knights seemed to feel the same way.

Due to the incident's prime suspect being a Superior, and due to the crime having happened in Gideon, which was currently hosting the second princess, the Royal Guard were also taking part in the investigation.

Liliana and a number of other Paladins in the group were strongly asserting that Shu wasn't the culprit.

"Is this an example of that?" Babi asked. "That thing you said was bad?"

"Yes and no, Babi," I replied. "What I said was bad was for detectives to let their preferences warp their deductions. Everyone else should believe in whoever they want, so Liliana and her knights aren't mistaken to do so."

And that was why I'd taken it upon myself to find the culprit. I knew enough to assume that Shu wasn't the one who'd done it, but I would do my best to not let my investigation become warped if I discovered proof to the contrary.

"Rook, will you be on the lookout tonight?" she asked.

"No. I haven't the slightest clue where to go on the lookout. Not to mention that no murder would happen with things as they are now."

"Why? Shouldn't it happen tonight, too?"

"No. Because Shu is currently in jail."

If I was the culprit, I would never do anything while he was still arrested, for that would greatly reinforce his innocence.

The next murder would surely happen the next time he was released, or if he logged out and disappeared from jail. Shu was almost certainly staying inside because he was thoroughly aware of that.

"Instead, tonight, I will focus entirely on deciphering these cryptograms," I said as I looked at the cards in my hand — the copies of the ones left behind by the culprit.

They had cryptograms on their backs, and I would spend the night solving them to see if they had any hints.

Let's see what secrets you hold, I thought while eyeing the characters.

◇

And so came the next morning.

Just as I'd expected, nothing special had happened during the night. I'd spent the whole time deciphering the cryptograms on the cards and, well...

my silence as I looked at the results said all that had to be said.

"Rook, you look so displeased," Babi commented. "How rare."

Of course I'm displeased, I thought.

The cryptograms were basically sets of words written with their characters randomly switching between different languages. While the one making it had only needed to type it down into some dictionary app, I, as the solver, had to use all the possible combinations for every character.

The base was clearly the alphabet, and he replaced a lot of the letters with the corresponding characters from other writing systems, but every now and then, the rules of conversion changed, and there were some actual mistakes.

For example, despite using readings or order until that point, he eventually equated "E" with the Japanese hiragana for "i." Going by the rules used for the other letters, it had to be either the Japanese "ii," the "e" in their transliteration of Latin characters, "o" — their fifth character overall, or "ho" — the fifth character in the Iroha.

It'd taken me far too long to understand that part was nothing but a mistake by the culprit.

It wasn't the only mistake, either, and I'd spent a lot of time racking my brain trying to figure out if there was any meaning to those things, only to finally realize that they were nothing but pointless errors. Honestly, it made me more vexed than I had been facing that young lady back during the incident.

This person was highly insincere when it came to making cryptograms. He'd clearly intended to have someone solve them, but he'd also neglected to check how solvable they were, and that, in my eyes, made them some of the most abysmal cryptograms I'd ever encountered.

Insincere as these cryptograms were, however, I'd still solved them, which made me aware of an even more annoying fact: the culprit didn't care about them at all.

That was the reason for both the mistakes and for the actual content:

Card 1: "Today's lunch is a hamburg steak at Tricellas."

Card 2: "Today's dessert is a pudding parfait at Café White Sugar Peach."

And that was it.

Those establishments did exist here in Gideon, but the lines were clearly just some basic social network posts, turned into cryptograms for seemingly no reason at all. They had nothing to do with the incident, and all they did was irritate the one who solved them... but that was exactly what made me realize something.

Since these cryptograms used Earth's languages, a tian could never, ever solve them, and if there was any non-tian who might lay his eyes on the cards, it would be none other than Shu.

The criminal had figured he might try to prove his innocence by solving them, only to get these meaningless words... and that would surely get on his nerves.

If there was any sort of purpose for these cryptograms, that was exactly it — to anger Shu after having framed him. That was the only real damage being done to him by this whole situation.

And, assuming that was the culprit's intent, it led me to another realization.

The fact that Shu was the prime suspect was being kept hidden from the public, and the only ones who knew that he was in jail were he himself, the authorities, personal acquaintances such as me and Marie, the DIN, and the real culprit.

That knowledge would never have stayed contained if the reason for it was a personal grudge.

For example, if Franklin had successfully framed one of the Starling brothers, who were his sworn enemies, he would have made sure that all of Gideon and Altar knew about it. Then he would have followed it up by spreading vile rumors about them, both here and on the Internet, in order to make sure they never recovered.

If this was personal, the culprit would've done at least that much, and yet he hadn't.

The framing, the disgraceful release that was sure to come, and the cryptogram wasn't quite enough to ruin Shu. It seemed as though all the culprit was doing was playing around with society and Shu in order to upset them.

"But what does he gain from all this?" I murmured.

Money was the first thing that came to mind, but if that was all the culprit wanted, he wouldn't have left the cards. They'd made Shu into the prime suspect, but if he hadn't left anything, there wouldn't have been any suspects at all, and the case would never have been solved.

Due to that, it was safe to assume that there was meaning in the very act of playing around with Shu — that the culprit's desire was to toy with the King of Destruction.

"It's as if he wants to show that the KoD is an entity so meager that he can get him to dance on his palm," I muttered. "Or perhaps it's the other way around? This whole plot would never come into fruition if Shu hadn't been powerful and famous. The framing itself would have failed."

In that case, this could be the culprit's way of asserting that he was above Shu.

"Is he merely trying to show someone who knows that he's the culprit that he can lead the KoD around by the nose?"

Is it a strange sort of sales promotion? I thought.

It wasn't certain if this assumption of mine was correct. With all the mental leaps I was making here, that deduction wasn't all too reliable.

However, it fit all the details I knew so far... not to mention that my intuition was telling me that I was on the right track, so I decided to search for the culprit from that particular perspective.

"Currently, the only clues I have are these cards," I said, looking at them.

The cryptograms on them had been written by the culprit, no two ways about it. I momentarily considered that he could've made a tian write this and then killed them to hide the evidence, but I quickly dismissed that idea.

The cryptograms used many Earth languages, so tians would find it extremely difficult to copy them properly, and I didn't see a single bit of hesitation in the writing. Despite the errors, this had been written with confidence.

Then perhaps the culprit had another Master partner-in-crime?

No, that couldn't be the case, either. After all, this culprit seemed to feel a dark sort of exhilaration due to playing around with someone as strong as Shu, so I found it unlikely that he would share this "great deed" with another Master.

Not to mention that Masters couldn't be silenced, and due to the risk of them revealing the truth on the Internet and the like, the culprit was most possibly a solo criminal.

Additionally, with these cryptograms, the culprit was both hiding and asserting his existence. That might seem contradictory, but it was evident due to the fact that the hidden text revealed what he was doing.

It seemed to me that he wanted to show that he was here while at the same time avoid being exposed.

Honestly, I could probably find him by waiting for a few more cryptograms and deciphering them, but it wouldn't be good to let the number of victims increase, so I needed to find the culprit before that happened.

"Sooo... will you analyze his handwriting?" asked Babi.

"Babi, that's only effective if you have handwriting you can compare it to."

Without any writing by the culprit, I couldn't match it to what I had on the cards. People had to give signatures whenever they took quests from the adventurers' guild, but if the person in question hadn't taken any quests here in Altar, that wouldn't mean much to us.

All I knew at the moment was that the handwriting on both cards was a perfect match.

"This would be far easier if there was an Embryo that could trace a person just by looking at their handwriting," I said.

"But Rook, wouldn't that be boring?"

"Babi, making things interesting is the domain of the phantom thief," I said. "A detective's sole interest is in unraveling the truth."

To that end, I would do many plain, difficult, and yes, even outright boring things. I wouldn't hesitate to request the help of a person with the aforementioned Embryo. Sadly, I wasn't aware of anyone like that.

"Wait..." I murmured.

I actually did become acquainted with someone similar recently, I thought. Her Embryo's power might prove to be a great help. I'll have to contact her.

"To find anything that could lead us to the culprit, we should first take another look at what he did," I said.

During the murder-burglaries, he'd stolen the goods and money from the hidden safes before going on to kill the heads of the households.

The murder had come after the theft to make it easier for the culprit to escape once the smell of the blood and the like led to the incident's discovery.

This implied another fact about the culprit — instead of uncovering the locations of the safes by interrogating the victims, he'd known where they were ahead of time and had removed the contents before the murder.

Now that I think about it, I haven't yet investigated anything about the residences besides the hidden safes and the alarm systems, so let's try approaching this case from that angle.

I paid another visit to the DIN and bought the additional information regarding the two crime scenes. The organization knew so much that it felt as though its sole purpose was to make detectives' jobs easier.

"So both of the hidden safes were coupled with something in the houses, eh?" I noted.

Apparently the walls slid open and exposed the treasure only upon pushing a bookcase or inserting a gem into the eye of a statue. Being a fan of retro games, Shu would probably call it a "Capcom-like design."

Such mechanisms seemed to be quite popular among Gideon's wealthy, and it was imperative that they were installed during the construction phase... and both the households that had suffered the murders had been built by the exact same contractor.

I see, I thought as I considered the three possibilities of why the culprit had found the safes so easily.

One: he had an Embryo with such abilities. Since this theory left little room for a detective to work in, I skipped it for now.

Two: he'd decided which houses he would commit the crimes in ahead of time, and then gone in to secretly take a look at the blueprints in the contractor's offices. Considering how skillfully he'd snuck into the residences, that wasn't too far-fetched.

Three: he was an employee of the contractor who'd designed the houses.

Also, I asked the DIN, and they confirmed that the culprit couldn't have bought the info, like I'd done — I was the first one to ever show interest in it.

Anyway, the only real connection between the two murdered merchants was the fact that their houses had been built by the same contractor. What they'd traded in and the scale of their business had been entirely different.

If I were urged to name another similarity between them, I would add that both had dabbled in methods which, though not illegal, were definitely crooked.

They had probably been chosen because they seemed like people Shu might've targeted, but he certainly wasn't the kind of person to do it, and even on the off chance that he had, he definitely wouldn't have been secretive about it. In a way, this choice of targets was proof that the culprit hadn't observed Shu for long enough.

Additionally, according to the DIN, there hadn't been any recent assassination contracts in Gideon lately, so it was highly unlikely that the murders themselves were the goal.

In fact, the city was currently being patrolled by a group of ninjas hired by the count, and the intelligence network they provided made it extremely difficult for assassinations to occur, as they would quickly get wind of a disturbance of public order as major as an assassination plot.

...On the other hand, that meant that the culprit was above not only the house alarms, but the ninjas, as well.

Now, if it wasn't a hired murder, it could also be a personal grudge, but I'd already established that the link between the two victims was far too thin to think the culprit would kill them both two days in a row using the same method.

And according to the DIN, I was the first to acquire the info that both residences had been built by the same contractor, so if the culprit was someone uninvolved, he couldn't have known where they'd been designed or where to find their blueprints.

A part of me felt like he'd chosen his targets based on who had safes he could easily rob of gold and goods, and that would make the third theory highly likely.

"I should go for a little questioning," I said, preparing to pay a visit to the contractor in question.

Before going there, I first went to one of my contacts, little Elizabeth, and asked her to make me a temporary investigator.

She immediately replied with a lively, "Anything for my teacher!"

I went straight to the one in charge and asked if they had any Masters among their employees.

The answer was "No," and from his expression, it didn't seem like he was lying.

I followed it up by asking whether they had designers working at home, and he said that they had a total of eight, so I asked for their addresses and took my leave.

“Sooo... there was no culprit, huh?” asked Babi.

“We can’t be certain of that yet, Babi.”

“Ehh? But there aren’t any Masters working for the contractor, right?”

Indeed, I thought back. At the very least, the chief was being honest about that.

“However, Babi, Masters may pretend to be tians,” I said.

Though it was a severe crime for tians to pretend to be Masters, there was no law or punishment for the reverse.

Consider Ray: he’d lost his left hand and now used a prosthetic. The left hand was where we Masters had our crests, and losing it made it move to a part of the left arm that was still healthy, be it forearm or — as it was in Ray’s case — upper arm.

I didn’t know what happened when a Master lost his whole arm right up to the shoulder, but I was certain that it moved in that case, as well.

Now, what if someone who’d lost their left hand began using a prosthetic that, unlike Ray’s, focused not on function, but on looking as much like a real hand as possible?

You would have a person who didn’t have a crest on his left hand.

Now, all he’d need to do was to proclaim himself a tian, and he would appear to be such, even under the scrutiny of Reveal. Though that skill had no trouble with names, jobs, and stats, it didn’t give any information about Embryos.

That person would look like a tian as long as you weren’t around to see the moment he summoned his Embryo from his crest.

“Oh, I get it,” Babi nodded. “But why are you only looking at those working from home?”

“No matter how well they fake being tians, Masters are still Masters,” I replied. “They log out every now and then, and if someone found that suspicious, it would invalidate the rest of what made up the façade. Because of this, a fake tian cannot work alongside others.”

They could only do jobs from home, where they were by themselves.

In that case, our culprit could easily come to see the plans of the houses he’d committed the crimes in if he’d just went and said something like, “I need to see the previous blueprints to help me with my work.”

“Wouldn’t he just quit right after seeing the blueprints?” asked Babi.

“Anyone would be able to see the link between a person who quit upon getting a gander at the blueprints and the incidents that happened at the residences based on them,” I said. “The culprit should still be working there, in order to avoid that scenario.”

If all my deductions aren’t off the mark, anyway.

“Also, there’s probably another reason,” I added.

“Another reason? For pretending to be a tian and working at the contractor?”

“There are Masters that do such jobs and do them properly, but this time, we are dealing with someone who commits burglary and murder. For all we know, he might be planning something.”

If I was correct in my assumption that the culprit wanted to flaunt the extent of his power, it was likely that he had someone who knew of his situation — someone who, the culprit believed, would be impressed by his deeds.

In that case, there might be some sort of secret organization involved here.

“The culprit and his ally were planning something, and he began working for that contractor as part of the preparation for it,” I said. “These murders were a personal plot that had nothing to do with the original plan. That’s what it seems like, anyway.”

That assumption gave me a decent idea of what the culprit was like. He was part of an organization, but his position there wasn’t all that great. He was dissatisfied with that and didn’t have the patience to hold back from acting on his own authority to prove his ability.

He was also so imprudent that he hadn’t considered what it meant to use the blueprints he had handy for a crime. He’d thought leaving behind cryptograms would be more than enough.

“Hm...”

The really troublesome part about this person was that, despite all the flaws, he actually had an impressive set of abilities.

Just as I’d told Babi, the “how” of this incident wasn’t too important.

Even so, his feat was such that I only knew three people who could do it: Shu, who had his Mythical special reward; Marie, a Superior Job from the onmitsu grouping; and the King of Assassins, who’d kidnapped Ray.

That made it safe to assume that the culprit had powers matching theirs.

To summarize: our person was an extremely rash, thoughtless, Superior-tier fool with a strong desire to stand out.

“Oh, dear,” I muttered.

I was capable of finding the culprit, but it didn’t seem like I would be able to do anything about him.

The situation would turn quite dangerous if the situation became rough, so I had to think of someone who could fight against him. Marie, Figaro, and little Xunyu came to mind, but they were all outside of Gideon right now, so the only one I could rely on was... him.

At first I would have to handle the situation all by myself, but I was sure I could do it long enough for him to finish the culprit off.

I’ll probably have to ask Elizabeth to help me with the legal process, I thought. This incident certainly has me relying on her a lot. I’ll thank her by teaching her a high-level thief technique.

I couldn’t imagine Liliana and her Royal Guard liking that, though.

“Nngh...” Babi groaned.

“What’s wrong?” I asked.

“Your thoughts just now were either toooo fast or allll over the place. They’re hard to understand.”

“I don’t feel that way myself, but I guess it might seem that way to someone else,” I conceded.

Oftentimes, I had developed convictions that looked like far-fetched gambles to others — mostly my mother and father.

“But enough about me,” I said. “Let’s go question those working from home.”

“Okay.”

Before that, however, I had to go meet someone.

I’d contacted her ahead of time, so all I had to do now was go to the designated place.

“Hello, Kasumi,” I greeted the girl. “I’m glad you could help me.”

“I-It’s nothing... I-I’ll do my b-best!” she meekly replied.

The girl was Kasumi — a person I’d partied up with many times before.

Her Embryo, Taijitu, would be invaluable in this case.

It was capable of locating nearby Masters, and if it discovered one of them among the "tian" employees we were about to question, it would greatly increase the chances of them being the culprit.

"Rook, I feel that you're bringing something waaay too useful and boring to this mystery," Babi complained.

"Babi, just as I said, a detective's job is to unravel the truth. If a method is effective, it has to be used, even if it's excessively convenient."

Not to mention that I have no obligation to be considerate of a culprit who is so insincere towards the mystery genre.

"We should go, then," I said. "Oh, before that, though..."

There was another bit of preparation I had to do before walking around the houses.

"Babi."

"What is it?"

"Can you break my right arm?"

"Okay."

"Eh?" Kasumi became perplexed as Babi took my right arm with both of hers... and snapped it in the middle of the forearm, just like that.

It was now bending in a direction it shouldn't be.

"E-Eeeehhhhh?!"

"There we go," I said. "Looking good."

"N-No you aren't!"

"No, this is good because I now have a reason to use my left hand."

Assuming the culprit was hiding his left hand using a prosthetic or something else, it was necessary for me to touch it directly to check if there was anything strange about it.

A handshake was a good method to do that, and if I had a broken right arm, it wouldn't seem unnatural for me to shake hands using my left.

Handshakes, questioning, Kasumi's Master detection, and one more thing — I would search for the culprit using this four-layer check.

"Y-You could've just put on a cast..." said Kasumi.

"If the person has Reveal and takes a look at my stats, it would be off if I wear a cast while not having the 'Broken Right Arm' status effect," I explained. "Don't worry. I will definitely heal it after all of this is over."

Kasumi looked at me like she didn't know what to say.

I guess seeing an acquaintance break another acquaintance's arm was a bit of a shock to her, I thought. That's no good. I'll have to make it up to her, somehow. Both for her help and for giving her a scare.

And so came the time to walk around the houses of those working at home.

I started by showing my investigator badge and exchanging a left-handed handshake with each person.

Not hiding anything, I revealed that both of the buildings in which the serial murders had happened had been designed by the contractor they were working for and that I was investigating the case from that angle. I then gave them a few questions made with the assumption that they weren't the suspects and keenly observed their reactions.

Along with asking Kasumi if the person ever showed up as a Master, I repeated this process on seven out of eight of the employees. Some among them hadn't known that the residences had been designed by their own, while some hadn't even known about the murders altogether.

None of them seemed to be lying, and I never saw anything strange in their reactions to my questions.

"Missing the mark this many times makes me think that my deductions were mistaken," I muttered.

Or perhaps, like I'd once considered, the culprit might have an Embryo that could discover safes.

But since I had only one more employee to check, I decided to redo my deductions after finishing this.

And so, we arrived at the eighth person's apartment building.

I looked at Kasumi, and she silently shook her head.

So she's not detecting any Masters here, too, eh? I thought.

Nevertheless, I wanted to be absolutely certain, so I left Babi and Kasumi behind and made my way towards the employee's apartment.

I rang the bell, heard a "Coming!" from inside, and a moment later, the door was opened.

"Ah... Umm... Yes? Who are you?"

The person behind the door was a young woman — probably in her late teens. Assuming she was a tian, she was clearly an adult by this country's standards, and she didn't have a crest on her left hand, either.

"Good day. I am Rook Holmes," I introduced myself. "I am a temporary investigator on a quest to investigate the series of burglaries and murders that began three days ago."

“Oh, my.” Despite the lack of crest, I didn’t see the need to shake her hand to confirm whether it was a prosthetic — it was obviously flesh and bone.

However, this person was clearly the culprit.

Upon first seeing me, there had been a brief moment of surprise on her face. Then she’d quickly put up an expression of confusion. It was obviously a reaction one would make if they recognized me, but tried to hide it.

And it wasn’t far-fetched to believe she would know me. She’d tried to frame Shu, so it was only natural for her to look into those around him, and since I was being trained by him, I would definitely be among them.

As indelicate as it would be for me to say it myself, I didn’t exactly have a face so plain it could be easily forgotten, and that was exactly why the last part of the four-layer check was my own face.

Her reaction to it had been far stronger than that of someone who’d merely caught a glimpse of it before, and she’d instantly tried to hide it. That was more than enough to make her seem suspicious.

Still, since I didn’t have any positive proof, I had to dig deeper.

“The two residences that have been targeted were both designed by Fródi Construction — your place of employment,” I said. “I am currently visiting the employees to see if you might have any useful information.”

“Oh, I see,” she replied. “We shouldn’t stand around while talking. Care to come in?”

“...If you don’t mind.”

I walked through the door to her apartment, feeling like I was entering the lion’s den.

The young lady introduced herself as Gerbera. As I sat down on the sofa, she presented me with tea and doughnuts, saying, “Here you go.”

“Oh, thank you very much,” I replied.

“Heh heh. Those are the new doughnuts from White Sugar Peach Café. They’re delicious.”

...Eh? But that was the name of the shop in one of the cryptograms. Why would she present me with pastries she’d bought there?

“Well, they certainly look like they are,” I said.

“They’re more than just looks, I assure you. The café had some great pudding parfaits, too, but their doughnuts are just amazing.”

Was she aware that I was suspicious of her? Was she trying to confuse and trick me? Her expression didn't make it seem like it was so. Still, there was a hint of ulterior motive towards me.

Did she actually assume that the cryptograms still weren't solved? In fact, it almost felt like she wasn't even aware that the cryptograms and this conversation could be linked.

...No, surely she couldn't be that unobservant.

It made me wonder if I was just misunderstanding things, and she was just a simple tian.

"So, you wanted to talk about the serial burglaries?" she asked.

"Yes," I nodded. "Would you mind if I asked you a few questions?"

"Not at all."

And so, I began giving her the same questions I'd given the other employees.

Ten minutes later, I had to struggle to keep my eye from twitching.

Why? Because the thoughtlessness behind her answers was even greater than I'd expected.

During the first half of the questioning, I asked, "Have you seen the blueprints of the two residences where the murders happened?" to which she replied with a "Yes."

But then, during the other half, I asked, "Have you shown any of the contractor's blueprints to anyone not involved in the company?" to which she said, "No. I only recently became an employee, so I haven't seen any of our previous blueprints."

She was blatantly contradicting herself. From what I could tell, she'd made the decision to act like she didn't know the blueprints while I was still questioning her.

It was common practice in police inquiries to ask a question, wait a while, then ask a similar question in order to see if the questionee slips up, but this was the first time I'd seen a person contradict herself so quickly. Not only that, but she didn't even seem to realize she was doing it.

She could've at least prepared a proper, polished cover-up story, I silently lamented.

"Thank you for your time," I said.

"Oh, it's nothing. I'm glad I could help," she replied. "But... this is awfully troubling, isn't it? I mean, this incident got the King of Destruction arrested."

"...Truly," I said.

Lo and behold — what a finishing blow.

Once again, I momentarily thought that she was trying to trick me, but that didn't show on her face.

She actually, honestly believed that speaking of the KoD's arrest — information currently unknown to anyone but a select few — was good small talk material. She obviously hadn't even checked to see how the incident had been described to the public.

This woman was thoroughly convinced that, because she framed and had him arrested, society surely knew about it already.

It was only natural to expect the public to show a far stronger reaction if that had actually happened, yet she'd failed to even check, feeling absolutely nothing strange about the unchanged state of the city.

I already knew from the cryptograms that the culprit lacked sincerity towards the mystery genre, but not even I could predict that the extent was this immense.

My deductions were mistaken. I'd pictured the culprit as "an extremely rash, thoughtless, Superior-tier fool with a strong desire to stand out," but it also turned out to be "a person so exceedingly careless that she constantly piled up mistake upon mistake, yet never recognized them as such."

Father... The situations you put me in during my detective training never had a criminal as hopeless as this. She's a bit... beyond the boundaries of my hypothesizing.

Nevertheless, it was settled — this person going by the name "Gerbera" was definitely the culprit.

She didn't have a crest and couldn't be detected by Kasumi's Taijitu, but that was probably just because her Embryo was specialized in concealment. All I had to do now was leave her flat and prepare to corner her, but...

"To think that the King of Destruction would do such a thing..." she said.

Those words compelled me to respond.

"He's not the culprit," I said. Though my tone was plain, I probably wasn't so composed on the inside.

After all — I wasn't ignoring what I probably should be.

Careless as she was, this woman had definitely killed two tians and framed Shu for the crime, and the fact that she'd said such a thing as though she had nothing to do with it made me so vexed that I simply had to retort.

As evidenced by her twitching cheek, she was displeased with my response, which probably didn't fit her plot, so she asked, "Then, in your opinion, what kind of person is the culprit?"

"An idiot."

There was no hesitation in my response. It came out reflexively, not giving me a single moment to consider my words.

Apparently, this criminal's insincerity towards the mystery genre had made me more irritated than I thought.

My response was so unexpected that her eyes were wide in shock.

However, I wasn't able to take back what I'd said, so I chose to continue instead.

"An idiot with a poor grasp of the personality of the person he's trying to frame. An idiot whose whole 'steal, murder, leave a card' schtick is nothing but a ridiculous mess. An idiot who doesn't even realize that even a child could understand that this is merely a plot to frame Shu. An idiot who ciphered some of the most immature text on the cards. An idiot who made mistakes in his ciphering, but didn't even bother to check. An idiot whose crimes are so basic that even leaving cards doesn't make him seem like any less of an idiot. An idiot who might actually be idiotic enough to believe that this was enough to successfully frame Shu. An idiot who considers other people idiots to a downright unbelievable extent. An idiot who thinks other people are idiots despite he himself being such an idiot that he doesn't even notice his own mistakes. An idiot who — and this is just conjecture, by the way — despite having such strong convictions regarding other people, doesn't understand why he's being thought of as an idiot, is thoroughly convinced that none of it is his own fault, and thus ends up going around in circles like the idiot he is. To summarize: he's an idiot."

With that, I released all of the frustration that'd been building up since I'd solved the cryptograms.

And yes... not even I had realized I was this upset.

Still, it was too late for me to take back what I said, so I just prepared to take my leave, leaving behind the culprit — who looked shocked beyond words.

"Apologies for the intrusion," I said. "I have to continue the investigation, so I will be leaving now. Thank you for the doughnuts and tea."

And so, I walked out of Gerbera's flat.

Right after I left, I heard an enraged scream and the sound of porcelain being shattered in a fit of rage.

Hearing that made me assume that, if I'd taken just a few moments longer to leave, she'd have attacked me regardless of the fact that it would've exposed her.

When I entered an alley that couldn't be seen through the apartment building's windows, I was approached by Kasumi and Babi.

"H-How was it?" asked Kasumi.

"If that's not the culprit, I'll give up on being a detective."

She was just that undeserving of any sort of investigative deduction.

"Also, I'll probably be attacked tonight," I added.

"Eh? W-Will you be all right?!"

"I should prepare for it, at least... She might prove to be troublesome."

"Ehhh?" Babi voiced her confusion. "But she's sooo hopeless that you easily found out that she's the criminal, right?"

Indeed — Gerbera truly wasn't suited for crime. Not because of her disposition as a person, but because she was just that inept.

"Even so, she made it past the alarm systems unnoticed and fooled the sense skills of many investigators," I said. "She herself isn't fit for crime in the least, but... I think that her Embryo is an entirely different story."

Its category was most likely in the Guardian series.

Other categories would've probably had her going out to the scenes herself, so there would've been even more mistakes on her part.

And assuming it was a Guardian, its current form would be...

"The situation could become even more dangerous than the night Franklin's Game happened."

Worst case scenario, we might've been dealing with someone on the level of a Superior... or an actual Superior.

"Still, it isn't like we don't have ways of dealing with her," I muttered. "Babi."

"What is it?" she replied with a smile. I couldn't tell why, but it looked like she was having fun.

"There's something I'd like you to do..." I said.

And I named two things I wanted done.

◆◆◆

Dead Hand, Gerbera

"THAT SHITTY WEAKLIIIIING!" I shouted as I threw the cup with tea in it towards the wall. "That non-Superior weakling thinks he can say whatever he wants just because he has a pretty face!"

I really liked that part of him — he was a total freakin' cutie-pie — but everything else was a "no" from me.

I'd tried to soften him up with doughnuts and tea to casually seduce him, but no — he was no good.

I'd wanted to make him fall for me, but now, I just wanted to tear his insides apart.

"Heh heh," I giggled. "He said he's investigating it, but he still doesn't know that it's me."

If he had, he never could have said all those insults straight to my face. But he could still get in my way and stop me from cornering the King of Destruction.

"I would be done with that in just a few more days, so I'll give him the death penalty to take him out long enough for that."

I'll make him regret saying those baseless insults about the true culprit: me.

Of course, he would never know why he'd even gotten the death penalty. No one knew what my Embryo was, and no one could kill it.

"My Embryo... is the strongest," I said before looking to my side.

Common people wouldn't see anything there, but I did.

It had a body covered in hard leather. A set of bull-like horns. The teeth of carnivorous beasts. A head without any eyes. An arm similar to that of a praying mantis. A human-like, bipedal lower body.

It looked like a monster from a horror film, but that was very fitting for what it was.

This was my Superior Embryo.

Only I could see it. Only I could hear it. Only I could smell it. Only I could taste it. Only I could feel it. Only I could realize it was even there.

It was my very own "Ego Sublime, Alhazred" — the strongest Embryo that wouldn’t lose to anyone.

“Ahahahahahahahah! I’ll rip you to pieces, you shitty weakling!” I yelled.

Tonight, I would repay him for that humiliation, and imagining the moment made me laugh out loud.

Side Story: The Case of the Unknown Murders — The Solution

Lost Heart, Rook Holmes

A few hours had now passed. I was having dinner at a popular restaurant. There were many customers here, but I was eating alone.

Kasumi and I had parted ways soon after I'd found the culprit, while Babi was out following my orders.

On top of that, Marilyn and Audrey were in my Jewel, so the only company I had right now was Liz, who, as usual, I wore as an article of clothing. Since it had gotten warmer over the previous month, she was a jacket, rather than a coat.

Ever since leaving the apartment building, I'd purposely stayed exclusively in crowded places. No matter how hopeless she was, Gerbera had powerful concealment abilities, and I wasn't neglecting to be wary of them.

Given that, I figured she wouldn't attack me if I was in an area with many Masters. After all, things would become quite dire for her if someone had an Embryo that could trace her.

I assumed she'd wait for when I was all by myself, and since I hadn't been attacked yet, I was probably correct about that.

Of course, she might currently be observing me with her Guardian, but nevertheless, I was glad to know she wasn't careless enough to attack with so many people... around... and...

"...Huh?"

The thought that "Gerbera wasn't careless enough to X," had just passed my mind, and now that I'd actually talked to her directly, it made me consider a question that had never came to mind before:

Just how much of an idiot is she?

Though it sounded like a casual insult, it was an actual question — I wanted to know the extent of her stupidity.

What I'd said before leaving was the equivalent of telling her, "I already know that you're the criminal." And yet, although my words had greatly enraged her, she hadn't chased after me when I left.

It wouldn't have been surprising for her to attack me in order to silence me, abate her anger, or because she believed I was already preparing to get her on the wanted list and to either arrest or defeat her.

The fact that she hadn't done that could only mean that she was trying to keep her identity as the culprit a secret.

Indeed — she actually believed that she was still unexposed.

It wasn't logical for her to stay unaware despite all I'd said, but in all honesty, she certainly did seem like an idiot foolish enough to stay clueless.

But now that I knew she had enough discretion to not attack me in public, it left me with a new question.

"Did the extent of her stupidity change...?"

She was certainly a careless idiot, and I was more than confident that the disgraceful behavior she'd shown me in person was no lie or act.

However, that wasn't quite enough to explain her excessive naïveté when it came to perceiving the situation as it was.

There was also her Embryo to consider.

The crimes committed made it safe to assume it was a Guardian specialized in concealment, and that was most likely based on the Master's personality, as was the case with most Embryo abilities.

Could the Embryo have truly developed into what it was if she was just an excessively careless idiot?

Of course, the relationship between a Master's personality and an Embryo's powers wasn't absolute, but considering the immense strength of her craving to stand out, it was pretty curious for her Embryo to have ended up having abilities that seemed like a direct opposite of that.

"The result is the same... but the equation is different," I muttered. "That's the impression this is giving me."

Both "2 divided by 2" and "2 times 0.5" result in 1, but the nuance of those equations is entirely different.

Her actions were careless and foolish — no doubt about that — and they brought about fitting results. However, I might've made a mistake while deducing her thought process leading to them.

"Let's think about this a little..."

The case had already been solved. There was no need for me to make any further deductions about that, so this was nothing but a superfluous extra — a deduction for the sole purpose of understanding her character.

Thankfully, I still had time until the moment she would attack me, so I immersed myself in thought and used all the information I'd gathered to re-assess the nature of the Master known as "Gerbera."

◆◆◆

Dead Hand, Gerbera

It was a few hours after sunset. Through Alhazred, I watched that guy slowly walk over from the other end of the street.

He was the dumb, shitty weakling whose only plus was his pretty face. He probably didn't even realize it, but I'd known him before our meeting today.

I'd seen him when I was investigating the KoD before starting the murders, so I knew the inn he was staying at, and could easily ambush him — like I was about to do right now.

Through Alhazred, I looked at him while standing in the middle of the road, and that shitty weakling didn't even realize I was here.

My Alhazred was the strongest Embryo, after all.

Completely focused on concealment, he couldn't be noticed by any of the five senses, and even skills like Danger Sense and Killing Intent Perception had no effect on him. He couldn't be caught by machine or magic sensors, either.

No one could ever know that Alhazred was there.

He could sneak in anywhere and kill anyone, so, obviously, if he wasn't the strongest — no one was. But for some reason, my clan members couldn't see that. They really needed to have their eyes checked.

Remembering them made me a bit angry, but whatever. I had a plan to get back at them.

For now, I just had to wait for when the KoD left jail and then commit another murder. I'd keep framing him and lowering his reputation over and over until he became so angry that he'd stop caring about appearances and go out to search for the true culprit. And then, I'd gladly battle him.

He'd be crazy with rage, so he wouldn't care and would fight me here in the city — where he couldn't use his full power.

If my Alhazred had a flaw, it would be his weakness to random attacks that covered an area so wide that it didn't matter if they knew where he was or not — and those were the KoD's specialty. So, if I wanted my Alhazred to kill him, I had to limit his firepower.

He couldn't use his wide-area attacks in the city, because if he did, he'd get on the wanted list. I wouldn't mind if that happened — it'd still be clear that I was the one who'd pushed him to that point.

Anyway, if he wouldn't use his firepower, he'd only have his stupidly high strength. He'd be useless, and I could easily kill him with my Alhazred. No matter which one of those happened — the fact would remain that the KoD would be defeated by my planning and my Embryo's power. That would surely make my clan members rethink their opinion of me.

"Before that, I have to crush this annoying, shitty weakling," I muttered.

My unnoticeable Alhazred started walking towards him.

First, I'd slowly tear off his limbs, and when he started to bawl, I'd cut his face into pieces. My heart danced as I imagined that moment, and then I made my Embryo run forward.

But when he was only about 50 meters away, the shitty weakling jumped away from Alhazred.

He was wearing the same metal slime he'd wore while training with the KoD. It grew tentacles that hit the ground and launched him to the other direction.

It almost felt like he knew my imperceptible Alhazred was here and was trying to escape him.

"It's just a coincidence!" I snarled.

He just couldn't have avoided what he didn't know was there.

I went after him again and attacked from a completely different angle. Alhazred's Resources were focused on stealth, so his speed stayed below the speed of sound, but it was good enough to catch up to this shitty weakling.

I quickly got close, and...

He jumped in the opposite direction right before I could attack, just like he'd done the first time.

"Again?!"

It wasn't just a coincidence. He was actually perceiving my imperceptible Embryo.

But how...? I thought. And even if he knows my Alhazred is there, how did he expect to be attacked by an invisible enem— Huh?!

“Gh?!”

Suddenly, my vision changed from Alhazred’s to my own avatar’s back in my apartment.

I came back to find the room on fire. The window was broken, and next to it, there was a red-haired devil — the shitty weakling’s Embryo.

“Little Flare! Petrifying Breath! Grand Dash!” She launched skill after skill, not holding back at all. She was clearly treating me as an enemy.

Wait... does he actually know that I’m the culprit?!

How could he have realized that just from our talk?! The way I’d answered the questions and controlled the conversation was perfect!

Is the shitty weakling actually some sort of genius?!

◇◇◇

A Few Minutes Ago, Lost Heart, Rook Holmes

It was a few hours after sundown. The sun’s warmth had already faded from both the air and the ground.

I finished gathering my thoughts about Gerbera and made my way back to the inn I was staying at.

There was no one nearby, so I was walking this nightly street all by my lonesome.

“Hm...” I murmured.

I presumed that Gerbera would only attack me when I was all alone, and this seemed like a great opportunity.

“Liz,” I whispered my slime’s name inside my mouth, making sure to not make it audible, and she responded with a single tap on my arm inside my sleeve.

So there’s nothing yet, then... I’d prefer it if she attacked me before I reached the inn. Breaking it would trouble those working there.

As that thought ran through my mind, Liz tapped my arm twice. It was a code we’d decided on ahead of time, and it meant “Something invisible is closing in.”

A moment later, Liz jumped to the side opposite of whatever was approaching us. She was moving the same way she had when fighting that young lady during Franklin's Game — by hitting the ground with tentacles she extended from her jacket-like form.

However, they weren't the only thing that were reaching out from her. She'd also used the part of her that didn't make up the jacket to spread out countless thin and shiny threads all over the surrounding area.

Mithril Arms Slimes like Liz were capable of turning themselves into armor as well as weapons, and in this case, she'd turned herself into threads.

Of course, the focus on thinness and length came at the cost of attack power and endurance, making them break upon the slightest touch. However, that was intentional. Their purpose was to detect, and breaking was how they did it.

I'd determined that Gerbera's Embryo was a Guardian focused on concealment, and based on the... better parts of her performance as a murderer, I'd made a guess that it was also invisible, soundless, and odorless. Considering the absurdity of Superiors, it was also likely that you couldn't be aware of it even if you touched it.

That was why I'd made Liz spread out a number of weak, easy-to-cut threads. Even if she couldn't see it or feel it by touch, Liz could still notice when she lost parts of herself.

This could only be done because Liz was a slime — a creature that could change shape and didn't seem to feel pain.

But the fact that I was able to counter that wasn't the actual crux of the matter. The very fact that I was even capable of thinking of such a countermeasure made it clear that Gerbera had already made a grave mistake.

An invisible Embryo was no doubt a scary concept. No one could defend against a creature that you couldn't even feel by touch. However, that only applied if the target didn't know of its existence.

Gerbera had committed crimes that were thoroughly based on an extremely high concealing and stealth abilities, and that was exactly what had allowed me to guess her Embryo's powers. By giving me the information that I was "fighting against an enemy with a perfect stealth ability," she'd made it possible for me to develop a functioning counter.

Such a power would lose half of its value if the target merely knew that it was there, and that was Gerbera’s greatest error — even greater than leaving all the evidence I’d found.

She so confidently believed in her Embryo’s “unknowability” that she’d effectively made me aware that an “unknown” entity actually existed. It was as though she’d colored everything surrounding something colorless, making its shape stand out.

If she’d tried to assassinate someone without trying to stir any sort of murder-mystery drama, her Embryo would have been able to accomplish that without a flaw to name. Even the likes of royalty would’ve been easy targets. But now, the “colorless” existence was no longer imperceivable.

“Babi should be attacking her right now,” I muttered.

After the questioning, I’d asked her to do two things. One of them was to observe Gerbera, which was easily done with the Optic Camouflage skill she’d gotten from a monster by using Drain Learning.

Babi was to observe the apartment building, follow Gerbera if she left, and be on standby to attack her if she attacked me using her Embryo.

Even if it was Superior, the fact that it was a Guardian meant that it had a certain unavoidable weakness: its Master. No matter how tough and strong the Guardian, it couldn’t protect its owner if it wasn’t at its side.

Due to this, Gerbera and I were tied now.

However, I had the advantage in the fact that I’d predicted her attack, while she hadn’t even considered that could happen.

“Now, it’s just a matter of which Embryo defeats which Master first.”

Naturally, in terms of overall battle potential, their side was far above ours, but due to the excessive focus on concealment, her Guardian’s speed and power weren’t particularly great. By running away as I was, I could keep buying time for a decent while longer.

The only thing we actually had to worry about now was...

“...whether or not Babi can take care of Gerbera in time,” I murmured.

She, too, wasn’t a particularly powerful Guardian. Due to dedicating her Resources to charm, drain, learning, and the merging power, her base stats were lower than that of other Guardians in their fourth forms.

As an incognito employee, Gerbera might currently have jobs such as Carpenter, Architect, and Swindler, but even so, she was a Superior, and it was highly likely that she was max level.

It was a gamble whether Babi would be able to defeat her... In fact, it was best not to expect that to happen.

Babi's attack wasn't the main part of the plan.

I was suddenly overcome by a mild shock. Liz had just touched me in a way that said, "It's not coming after us."

The Guardian had probably returned upon realizing its Master was in danger.

That reaction was only natural, and I'd hypothesized that it could happen.

So now, to switch to the main part of the plan, I made my way to Gerbera's apartment.

Upon arriving there, I found her standing there with wounds covering her entire body, and on the floor next to her, there was a broken Brooch.

Looks like Babi did a good job cornering her, I thought.

"Mrrgh!"

My Embryo kept on attacking her, but all her attacks were stopped by something invisible standing before Gerbera. Apparently, the Guardian was focusing on staying in one place to protect its Master.

Even the way Gerbera used her own Embryo seemed to be greatly flawed. Gerbera should've simply made it drop defense altogether and just defeat Babi.

"So you're here... 'Rook,' was it?" she said while looking at me through her invisible Guardian. "I don't know how you did it, but you found out that I'm the true culprit."

"Yes..." I replied. "You're the one behind the serial murders here in Gideon."

Somehow, I could accept that she'd still believed she wasn't found out yet, but the fact that she didn't even know why I'd found her out had me at a loss.

No, wait. She was merely acting as if she didn't know.

In her mind, she already understood the reasons.

"Yes. That's right," she continued. "I am Unknown — the one behind those murders."

That certainly doesn't seem like a nickname you would use to refer to yourself, I thought.

Nevertheless, I now had the culprit's confession. My work as a detective was done. Case closed.

"It seems unbelievable, but did you also actually find out my Superior Embryo's... Alhazred's power?" she asked.

So the invisible Guardian was called "Alhazred," eh? Also, though I'd expected this myself, she'd actually just revealed that she was a Superior.

"Yes," I nodded. "It probably cannot be perceived by the five... no... the six senses."

"Exactly. Alhazred is an Embryo that only I can feel... Heh heh heh heh heh." Gerbera began laughing for some reason. Her smile was... ridiculously unpleasant. "You completely exposed my plan... You must be a real genius."

Though it sounded like it, she wasn't praising me. In fact — it was the exact opposite.

"Even if you raise me up, it will not change the fact that you were outdone by a newbie," I declared.

As long as she couldn't consider me a genius or something else outside the norm, it would make her consider herself inferior.

My words made her face, still displaying that unpleasant smile, turn stiff. She didn't speak a word in response.

Yes. Of course you'd react like that, I thought. I'd already developed a decent grasp of her mentality, the extent of her thoughtlessness... and the essence of the very core of her heart and mind.

"During this investigation, I considered you not just as a criminal, but as a person, as well," I continued. "When I visited you here today, I said that the culprit was an idiot. But now..."

I hadn't been mistaken, but that assessment wasn't quite complete, either.

"Now... I see that you're more than just a thoughtless idiot."

I'd arrived at a single conclusion that answered everything there was to know about her person.

It was the reason behind her excessive carelessness, the naïveté behind her evaluation of Shu, the mistakes in her cryptograms, the lack of caution in her words, and the fact that she hadn't realized that I'd found her out even when I'd basically spelled it out for her.

All of that stemmed from a single problem.

"You only see the world how you want it to be."

She stared at me, still not saying a word. However, something in her eyes had changed.

"You don't think you will fail, so when you do, you don't understand the reasons why," I said. "You don't want to believe that others are better than you, so you evaluate them as inferior to yourself. You think your targets will fall for your schemes, so you don't even try to confirm whether you're off the mark or not."

Yes, in order to see more value in herself as she appeared in her own mind, she averted her eyes from reality.

Of course, there was some actual idiocy in her, as well, but most of her failures had their roots in the fact that she always turned away from her own absurdity.

Because of this, others always saw her as an abject idiot, her plans always ended up being sloppy, and her behavior was always thoroughly thoughtless.

I was certain that she couldn't even listen to others without warping their words beyond recognition, and it was probably so bad that even the most reasonable of warnings seemed completely off base.

"However, your evaluation of me was correct," I continued. "I am certainly below you, and it's fair for you to see me as a weakling."

Gerbera hadn't warped reality when it came to me — I was, no doubt, inferior. But that was exactly why the truth-filled tirade directed at her had delivered such a powerful effect. She'd taken the words into her mind without warping them in any way, and they had become like venom to her.

She'd then hastily tried to mend her image, convincing herself that my words were absurd and warping them to conclude that I hadn't yet figured her out.

"You tried it just now, as well," I said. "You're cornered by someone far below yourself, so you tried to convince yourself that I'm actually not below you."

It was all for the purpose of keeping her perceived reality in line with her ideal. Gerbera wanted to be free to believe that she hadn't failed or made a mistake — she'd just encountered a really bad enemy.

That was how she functioned, and it even showed in her Alhazred, which was based on her personality.

"That's why you are the only one who can see your Embryo. You only see the world as you want it to be, so your Embryo became a creature that can only be seen by you alone."

It was a being that only lived in the vision of one person — much like an imaginary friend. And yet it followed her whims and influenced the world like a sort of phantasmal beast. That was what her Guardian was, and there was much to be said about a mind that could birth it.

"That is the truth behind your Embryo... and you yourself," I declared. "You're no 'Unknown.' You're merely someone who avoids her own truth, senses, and even the nature of her mind. In other words — an immense idiot."

If words could truly hurt people, then what I was saying was a double-edged sword, for they hurt me, as well. I, too, was avoiding my own truth and path in life. But even so, I spoke those words to her.

"Eh... No... I... That's... not..."

Gerbera was unable to refute what I'd said.

She swallowed all the responses she tried to speak. Although she was trying her hardest to ignore the inconvenient reality as she'd always done, my words were like a wedge keeping her from escaping it.

Unveiling the truth behind her heart made it impossible for her to subconsciously avert her gaze from her failure, stopping her every time she tried it.

The words had now been carved into her mind, and she would remember them every time her escapism made an attempt to take over, forcing her back to reality. Having heard my words, her brain was correcting her every time she tried to avert her gaze.

For all I knew, she might even be remembering the many failures she'd committed throughout her life. Those were surely memories she'd rather have forgotten.

"Aaahh, aaahh, AaAAhHh!" Gerbera wailed as she strongly covered her eyes with her palms, as though to say that she didn't want to see this reality.

But alas, her mind had already seen it — her heart had witnessed the truth.

She could no longer convince herself that she was the greatest, or that she'd never failed.

"...AHhhH." Gerbera suddenly moved her hands from her face, and her eyes looked directly at me. They showed no emotions I could easily read — all I saw was an amalgam of countless feelings. However, they all converged into a single emotional vector, which was best translated into "I have to erase him."

She now had a strong will to eliminate me.

"Who... a...m... I?" she asked. The words had a meaning, but it didn't feel like was actually talking to me... or anyone else, for that matter.

"You're Gerbera, no?"

"N o," she shook her head. "I a m U n k n o w n."

A moment later, she began losing parts of herself.

Not bleeding a single drop, she gradually vanished as though eaten by the air itself. No — she was actually becoming impossible to see.

Like the mad wizard her Embryo was based on, she disappeared as though she was eaten by an invisible monster.

"Total Eclipse of the Flesh — Alhazred." She spoke the name of her ultimate skill. The process was now complete, and Gerbera was nowhere to be seen.

I silently gasped as I realized the skill's effects. It was akin to Babi's Union Jack — the merging of Guardian and Master. It made Alhazred take in Gerbera's only weakness — herself — and make them both imperceptible.

"Babi! Liz!" I shouted, giving them the order to attack the place where she'd just been.

Liz's threads had already been spread out around the room.

None had been cut yet, meaning that Gerbera was still there.

If she tried to evade, I would simply refocus the attacks to where she moved.

She had no means of escaping this.

"Huh...?!"

And yet, it didn't seem like any of the attacks were landing.

In fact, it was as though...

"Is this more than just imperceptibility?!"

[I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown], [I am Unknown]

Before I realized it, the surroundings had completely changed.

The walls were now covered in carved writing, all saying just “I am Unknown.”

The term was repeated countless times, and it felt as though she was trying to assert the words to me, or perhaps even to persuade herself.

It was no exaggeration that the words appeared “before I realized it.”

I hadn’t seen the moment the words were carved, nor had I heard the sound of it happening.

Additionally, all of Liz’s threads had been cut as if they’d never been spread out.

“The concealment power is even greater than before...!”

Originally, it’d only concealed Alhazred, but now, it extended to anything it influenced, making it impossible to perceive the moment it changed something.

This was the apex of concealment. It affected the world and prevented anyone from noticing any changes made.

“Good grief...” I muttered.

It was clearly among the most troublesome Embryo abilities I’d ever seen.

However, despite displaying such power, Gerbera was still being herself.

After all — there was no need to carve any letters on the walls.

Gerbera could’ve easily given me the death penalty and escaped this place, yet she was wasting time on this meaningless nonsense.

It was a testament to just how strongly she was clinging to her old self and wanting to get back at me.

She was asserting her presence while trying to imprint the “ideal Gerbera” back into her subconscious, which I found... terribly pitiful.

“Ah...!”

Suddenly, I realized my left hand had a laceration on it and was covered in blood.

It had obviously been inflicted a few seconds ago, yet I’d only noticed it just now.

“What’s going onnnn?!” Babi, too, was being tormented by wounds that increased without her even realizing it.

Babi and Liz were indiscriminately and randomly attacking the surroundings, but I couldn’t even tell whether the attacks were hitting or having any sort of effect.

Although it focused on concealment, we were facing a Superior's Guardian that no doubt had its stats increased due to the merge with its Master. We, on the other hand, weren't a particularly powerful group. There was no hope of winning for us if we didn't focus our firepower, but we couldn't do even that.

I momentarily considered using Union Jack to become a Metal-Devil-Man, but I realized the situation wouldn't change in the least — in fact, I wouldn't even be able to use it. We simply couldn't win this.

"Looks like this is it," I silently spoke. There was nothing more I could do.

Before I realized it, my Lifesaving Brooch shattered and fell from my neck.

Looks like she had enough messing around and decided to end it, I thought, realizing that it was over. Still, there's one thing I can say here...

"You truly are careless."

The very fact that she'd actually taken the time to corner me meant that she'd done the worst thing she could have. She might've been able to use her increased stats and concealment power to instantly kill me and run away.

But instead, she'd wasted precious seconds on me... giving him enough time to make it here.

"Sorry 'bout that, kiddo," said a voice coming from the outside. "I took the shortest path, but it still took longer than I thought."

A moment later, the wall facing the road was pulverized, and someone human-sized jumped into the room.

I knew full well what... no... who it was.

Today, I'd asked Babi to do two things.

One of them was to observe Gerbera, while the other was... to deliver a message.

She'd told it to Elizabeth, who'd then passed it over to the authorities, and it went: "I will expose the true culprit, so please release him once I'm done."

I looked through the window — or, rather, through part of the wall where the window was — and saw a flying eyeball with bat wings growing out of it.

It was a Broadcast Eye — a communication monster first created by Franklin, now salvaged and used by Gideon.

Through it, the authorities at the knight offices would've seen and heard our entire exchange here, so the investigators should already know that Gerbera was the true culprit.

She was probably already on the wanted list, and more importantly — Shu had been released and was now here.

"And so... the star of the show enters the stage," I said.

"Yep," he replied. "Kept you waiting, huh?"

The moment I'd considered the possibility that Gerbera might be a Superior, I'd entrusted this incident's resolution to him. For that, it had been necessary to prove that Gerbera was the true culprit, so I'd gotten her to confess to it.

The preparations were now complete.

A detective's job is to expose the truth — not to arrest or defeat the culprit.

That role belonged to Shu — the real Unknown.

"I heard about ya through both the eye's feed and the Telepathy Cuffs," he said. "You're still here, aren't ya, Miss 'Unknown'?"

He was not in his bear costume, but in the "Godcloth" he'd worn when fighting Franklin back on that day. It was proof that he was ready to fight with his full power — as both a Superior and the King of Destruction.

Thus, this would be exactly what had happened during Franklin's Game — a Clash of the Superiors.

"As you clearly know, I'm the ex-'Unknown,' Shu Starling."

There was no response to those words, and I couldn't tell whether it was because we couldn't notice it or if she actually wasn't doing anything.

Still, it was obvious that she was listening. If she'd been the type of person to escape with Shu's appearance, things wouldn't have gotten to this point in the first place.

"I got tons of things to say to you, but it doesn't look like we can have a conversation here, so I'll just say one thing," he pointed at his neck with his thumb. "I won't run or hide, and I'll fight you right here, so just bring it on, will ya?"

It was no mere provocation — he was completely honest.

And those words signaled the start of the battle.

Since Gerbera's ability was perfect stealth, the thing she had to be most wary of from Shu's arsenal was the battleship focused on wide-scale attacks. Because he couldn't use it here in the city, this was probably the very situation she'd been yearning for. However, she didn't attack him once even after a whole minute had passed after his words.

Did she escape? I thought. No, that can't be it.

"Oh, right," I said. "She's actually being cautious."

Gerbera was wary of how Shu could counter her attack. Although he was focused on STR, a single attack from her wouldn't be fatal, and even if it would be, he still had his Brooch. She, on the other hand, would die from just a single lucky hit by him.

For Gerbera, who'd already lost her Brooch, that wasn't a gamble she could take.

"Oh, you're worried about this?" Shu said while pointing at his Lifesaving Brooch. He too, realized the reason why she wasn't making her move.

He then took the Brooch in hand and...

"There."

...crushed it to pieces.

"I just have one life now. So come on, don't be shy. Kill me and take the 'Unknown' title."

A destroyed Brooch couldn't be replaced for the next 24 hours. With this, Gerbera and Shu were on even ground.

Part of his face was hidden by bear fur, but you could still see him crack an indomitable smile as he said, "Bring it."

Those words seemed to work as a trigger, since the situation visibly changed, even if all I could see were Shu's movements.

The left hand he'd extended suddenly became a blur, and the next moment, it was tightened next to his neck.

"There you are."

His whole body became filled with vigor as he performed a Kodachi — the roundhouse kick I'd seen him do many times during training.

From my perspective, it didn't look like he'd grabbed anything or kicked something.

Suddenly, the scene drastically changed again.

Blood began gushing out of Shu's neck, a large hole opened up in the wall, and I could hear someone's — most likely Gerbera's — scream coming from far in the distance beyond it.

After that, there was nothing.

He didn't follow after Gerbera, nor did anything else break.

"Ow ow ow," Shu lightly groaned, and that was the sole notable thing about the situation.

As I silently watched, I could make a conjecture about what had just happened here, but it was difficult to understand and accept that as the reality behind it all.

The wound on Shu's neck had come from an attack by Gerbera.

The hole in the wall had been made by Gerbera when he'd blown her away with his kick.

And the scream had been Gerbera's voice after suffering so much damage that the Master-Embryo merge was undone.

Basically, Shu had perceived the attack on his neck, stopped it with his hand, and defeated her with just one hit.

As for how he could perceive the imperceptible... his groaning was an excellent hint.

"You turned on your pain?" I asked.

"Yeah," he answered. "I already heard that she had powers that made her hard to perceive, and I could somehow tell that she also hid her influence on other stuff, so I tried to see if that worked on pain, too, and sure thing, it hurt like hell."

Pain was something that most of us Masters had turned off, and we couldn't experience it here in Infinite Dendrogram unless we willfully turned it on. I hadn't known just how bad the pain could become until I'd gone through the hellish training, and I was quite sure that Gerbera had never known any in-game pain, either.

It was quite reasonable for Alhazred — an Embryo that could only be felt by Gerbera — to be unable to conceal pain — a sensation that she couldn't feel.

"How did you know that pain was still there?" I asked. It was the only thing I still didn't understand.

It would make sense for him to turn on pain and confirm whether it was there after some time into the battle or after getting a scratch, but Shu had just arrived here, and he hadn't suffered any damage until the final attack.

Liz couldn't experience pain, so not even I had known about the fact that it was still there. His knowledge of this had me curious.

"I have a bunch of reasons... but they all boil down to intuition and experience. Rules of thumb and all that jazz," he answered, not giving a single proper detail.

I looked at him in silence. This was a man who'd turned on his pain to fight an enemy he couldn't perceive, gambled that it would work on her, and actually succeeded as though it was nothing.

He really is Ray's brother, I thought. They're very alike in just how absurd their methods are.

"Heh heh," I chuckled. All the thinking I'd done on this case suddenly seemed exceedingly comical.

"All righty then!" Shu said as he switched from his Godcloth to the bear suit. "The culprit's blasted off, so let's go get some chow! I'm beary hungry fur some non-prison food!"

"Ah, but I just ate, and—"

"Rooook..." said Babi while looking at me with lots of resentment in her eyes. "I haven't had aaany dinner yet... And I worked sooo hard observing her... Nom nom!"

And thus she chomped at my head.

Err, I would prefer it if you didn't bite into my head. You remind me of Nemesis.

"Let's go eat." I gave in.

"Hell yeah! It's on me! Come on, I'll take you around fur a while! I couldn't bear not to take you! Let's go where I usually go whenever I eat out!"

From Shu's voice, it was easy to tell he was enlivened. No one could fault him. The man was tasting freedom after being in a cage longer than a day.

Anyhow, all's well that ends well, so... ah.

"May I ask you something?" I said.

"Hm? What?"

"Just what, would you say, are those holes on all those buildings?"

Beyond the wall he'd broken through, I could see countless structures with holes similar to the one we had here. It seemed as though something human-sized had moved here while breaking through every wall in the way, and it felt like it continued all the way to the offices in the first district.

"I was in a rush, so I went straight here."

Well, he had mentioned using the shortest path. Though breaking walls slowed down most people, Shu was on such a level that they were barely a hindrance.

Merely by looking outside, I could tell he wasn't lying about having come straight here. I also saw the people in the now-holed buildings start to evacuate.

"Sh-Shu Starling!" roared one of the investigators who'd just rushed in through the apartment's door. "Y-You're under arrest for property damage!"

"Gyaah! It was an emergency! Sbear meee!"

...It appears that he will stay in jail for now, I thought.

Alas, this was a case I could do nothing about.

◇

A short while later...

Due to no one being injured, some mediation by Elizabeth, and the fact that it had been for the purpose of taking care of the culprit, Shu had ended up only having to pay for the damages.

I could recall him shouting, "This is gonna cost me all my bearnings!" as he continued vigorously selling his popcorn.

Thus, the curtain fell on the serial murder case that had shaken Gideon.

Although, it was still a mystery who, exactly, Gerbera had been trying to show off to by creating this incident.

Side Story: Epilogue — Outlaw

The Gaol, Dead Hand, Gerbera

I logged in after 50 hours of being offline and found myself somewhere that wasn't Gideon.

With dirt roads and dusty wooden buildings, it looked like a set for a western. The scenery obviously didn't belong to any of the seven countries.

"How unexpected," I said. "I thought the 'gaol' would be more... jaily. Like... an indoor institution with thick walls."

I looked up and saw a blue sky, but then I realized that there weren't any birds or clouds. It was also bright, but I couldn't see the sun anywhere.

Maybe this actually is indoors? I wondered.

"Well, at least it looks like a nicer place to live in than I thought it'd be. Then again, I'm breaking out soon, anyway."

Yep. I've been sent to the gaol, but I'd be leaving in no time. I could just use my Alhazred's ultimate skill and escape this stupid place, as easy as pie. And then I'd be the first Master to ever break out of the gaol!

That's my countermeasure to this situation!

"...Which is probably just another thought he'd consider to be 'warping reality into what I want it to be,'" I muttered.

This was the first time I'd even had the idea of a "countermeasure." I'd never thought I'd ever mess up, so I'd never even bothered to think of anything like that.

I now knew that I'd been warping reality to make it convenient to myself... and it was all because of him.

"Argh! I'm such a mess!" I shouted.

Ever since hearing Rook's words on that day, I'd started worrying all the time. When I tried to think something that made me feel good, I always questioned myself.

It wasn't just for what was happening now, either. Even my fun memories and the old moments of thinking I was great were falling apart.

This had been happening ever since that moment. It was why I hadn't been able to log in right after the death penalty ended. I'd needed time to get a grip.

"I won't forgive him for this!" I swore.

I'd make Rook pay for digging into my mind and making a mess out of it.

I also had a bone to pick with the KoD for destroying me and my Alhazred, which should've been invincible even without my warping, but that grudge was nothing compared to what I felt for Rook.

Now that he'd said those words to me, I couldn't have even a bit of fun. I couldn't even become my ideal self back in reality. His sharp words prickled and bit me like a curse.

That was why I decided to do everything to escape this gaol and get my revenge.

It's the reason why I even logged in!

"First, I'll make Alhazred check up on the gaol's structure... But wait, if the rumors are true and it's a different server, then escape is impo— No, I should still be able to... cough!"

As I thought aloud, I suddenly started to choke on the dust in the air.

Ugh! I can see that this place is based on westerns, but the amount of dust is awful, I complained. I want to rest in a clean place somewhere. They do exist here, right? I've heard that prisons that charge you are like hotels, not to mention that this is part of Infinite Dendrogram, so there should be more proper places here.

If there weren't, I'd find and force someone with a building-related Embryo or job to make me one. I had taken some construction jobs for my infiltration, so I could make designs. All I needed to build something was labor and materials.

Yes — though it would only be a temporary home, I was a Superior, so I could obviously stand at the top of this place.

Heh heh, becoming the queen of the gaol sure seems like tons of fun, I grinned. There might even be a hidden Superior Job for that! If I got it, my clan members would obviously think more of me!

"But... can I really do it...?" I began to worry again. "Argh, come on, now!"

"Hey there," some man with a basic-looking avatar spoke to me. "Some new girl, aren't ya? What's with all the faces you're making?"

His appearance made it clear that he was some sort of PKer. He was obviously a shitty weakling.

"Does it matter to you?" I snapped. "Get lost. You're annoying."

If you don't, I'll tear you up with my Alhazred. He's right behind you.

"Whoa. Scary," he said. "Well, I guess it's normal to be mad when you arrive here for the first time. When I came here after the Prodigy of Feasts killed me at Wez Sea Route, I also..."

He's actually talking about himself. I'll just kill him.

"Oh yeah, by the way," he said before I could do that. He then gave me a book. "You should have this."

"What's this? I'm not joining any cult."

"Hey, it's nothing like that. I'm not the damn Lunar Society. This is about that," he said as he pointed at a piece of paper on the notice board.

[Every day of the month that is a multiple of 10 is for reading. If you read a book from the library and write a review, you will receive 100 of the gaol's currency, jailir. Everyone is free to participate.]

[Note 1: When reading, make sure to do it in silence. And those who aren't reading, please make sure not to disturb those who are.]

[Note 2: Reading enriches both mind and heart.]

- [The Gaol's Control AI, Red King.]

"...Is this a school or something?" I muttered.

And if 100 jailir were worth the same as 100 lir, that was just a miserable sum of money.

Also... me? Reading books? Do you think I'm stupid?

"Are the prisoners here that bored?" I asked. "If you are, why not just go stealing or something?"

You're all on the wanted list, so this place has to be crawling with thieves, right?

"Most of us don't actually care about the Red King and the guy's good conduct and morality events," he replied. "But you should still have a book, just in case. He is very passionate about this."

"'He'?"

"His name is Sechs. He's one of the four Superiors here in the gaol. The man's a model prisoner, and he's pretty big on these events."

"...Huhhh?" I let out a confused sound.

I obviously knew about the King of Crimes, Sechs Würfel, but... was I really supposed to believe he was a model prisoner enthusiastic about morality events? What kind of stupidity was that?

Just think about the job name, "King of Crimes." Why would such a person ever enjoy reading, writing reviews, and getting a little money for it?

"So yeah, it's better if you act like you're participating in the event. It'll reduce your chances of getting on his bad side and— GHEH!"

I grabbed the well-informed shitty weakling by the collar and asked, "Where can I find this 'Sechs' person?"

Using the info I got from him led me to a place that looked pretty clean, especially for something in the gaol.

It looked like a café. Its white walls didn't have any dirt on them, and it seemed to be taken care of so well that it felt like it belonged in Gideon.

The place was called "Dice," which was probably why it had a wooden die as its front-door decorative feature. After getting a better look at it, I realized that all the faces on the die had six dots each.

Shouldn't cheat dice be four-five-six?

"Ah, now that I think about it..."

When making up the cryptograms for the cards, I'd used characters from several languages, so I remembered a few words from them.

If I recalled correctly, in German, "six" was "sechs," and "dice" was "würfel," which meant that "Sechs Würfel" was "six on a die."

Wait, so maybe the die isn't a café feature, but his own symbol? But why is it in front of a café, then?

"Maybe he uses dice to mark his territory?" I became a bit more cautious and opened the glass door leading to the café.

I was greeted by a mechanical waitress speaking in monotone. "Welcome."

It didn't look like there were tians here in the gaol, so I could only guess that customers were served by these machine dolls.

Does nobody break those things and take what they have?

Also, this one was so well-made that I almost thought it was a person at first. All that made it obvious it was a doll were the spherical joints and the diamond-like gem buried in the forehead.

I became curious, so I used Identification on it and found out that its name was "Diamond Slayer," and that, according to the description, it was a "Prism Person."

?! I realized. Wait... Forget about stealing what it has — the thing itself might be a crazy luxury good...

Trying to imagine the market price of the doll made me all dizzy.

"Is a-ny-thing the mat-ter, miss?" the doll asked.

"...Huh?!" I quickly went back to my senses and did what I'd come here to do.

"Sechs Würfel!" I shouted as I stopped the doll from trying to take me to a table. "Is the King of Crimes here?!"

The customers sitting here and there looked at me like I was some weirdo, but I didn't care. I didn't know what Sechs Würfel looked like, so I couldn't find him if I didn't call for him.

He should be here somewhere!

"I'm Gerbera!" I shouted. "A member of Illegal Frontier! The clan you made! I came because I want to talk to you! Are you here?!"

Yes, Sechs Würfel was the leader of IF — the secret organization I was part of. It was a clan that only allowed Superiors who were on wanted lists.

I'd been picked up by the clan after he was jailed, but I'd heard lots of things about him from other members.

That was why I'd targeted the King of Destruction. If I'd killed the one who'd sent our leader to the gaol, it would have proved to everyone else in the clan that I wasn't to be taken lightly.

Well, that hadn't worked out and I'd ended up here myself, but I thought I should at least show myself to him.

None of the customers came out to claim they were him.

For some reason, they just sighed like they were relieved and began reading books.

Yes — all of them were reading books.

"What's going on?! Is he even here?!"

None of the customers were reacting, but right as I was about to assume he wasn't here, someone spoke to me, saying, "Err, may I have a moment?"

It was a plain-looking young man wearing an apron and black-rimmed glasses. He was probably the shopkeeper.

And here I thought the gaol didn't have any tians.

"What?!" I shouted. "I'm not ordering anything! I just came here, so I don't have a single jailir! Got a problem with that?!"

"No, I did not want to ask for your order. What I want to know is, are you really a member of IF?"

"I just said I am! So just bring the King of Crimes to me, and—"

"That would be me."

"...Eh?" For a second, I couldn't understand what he'd just said. But then I looked at the back of his left hand and saw an Embryo crest, making it obvious he wasn't a tian.

"I am the King of Crimes, Sechs Würfel," he said. "A pleasure to meet you. May I call you 'Gerbera?'"

The plain-looking young man was nothing like what I'd imagined the King of Crimes to be.

A few minutes later, I was sitting at the counter and drinking coffee he'd prepared for me. It kinda angered me that it was actually good.

For some reason, the snack he gave me with the coffee was popcorn, and when I asked about that, he said, "A friend of mine has been absorbed in popcorn recently, so I tried my own hand at it, as well."

The KoD had a popcorn stand, too. Was it trendy or something? Honestly, though, I would've liked doughnuts way more.

...Remembering popcorn and doughnuts made me angry again.

Damn you, Rook and KoD!

Once he showed me his stat summary, I finally accepted the truth.

"Wow... you really are our leader."

His name was clearly Sechs Würfel, and his job was definitely King of Crimes.

His total level has to be some sort of glitch, though.

"Yes, I am," he said. "But I find it rather questionable whether I am truly the leader."

"What do you mean?"

"I only filled the position because Zeta and Rascal asked me to, so you might consider me to be a leader in name only. Also, I was sent to the gaol soon after the creation, so they are the ones doing most of the clan administration now....”

Rascal was the Superior who’d invited me to the clan, and yes, he was the one operating it now.

Uh huh, this man really is our leader, I thought. He didn’t act like it, and didn’t look anything like a “King of Crimes,” but it was definitely him.

I’d honestly expected him to be someone violent and wild-looking, or like a mafia boss with a cat on his lap.

“Why are you the shopkeeper of a café?” I asked.

“I had a lot of free time, so I thought I’d get a hobby. I’ve become quite good at preparing coffee over the past half a year.”

“If you’re this good without any skills, you should open a café in real life.”

“Oh my, I didn’t expect such praise... Thank you very much.”

He’s so... modest and soft. Is he really the King of Crimes?

“By the way... all the customers here are reading books,” I said.

“Indeed they are. This is a reading day, after all. They’re quite enthusiastic about it.”

“Mhm...”

I looked over the counter, saw Nightingale’s biography with a bookmark in it, and realized that he, too, was juggling work and reading.

It was obvious that he was passionate about it, but this choice of book made him seem way too well-conducted. There was a limit to just how much of a model prisoner you could be. Once again, I could hardly believe he was the King of Crimes.

...I’ll just ask about it.

“I heard you are a model prisoner,” I spoke up. “Why?”

“What do you mean?”

“You’re the King of Crimes, so I thought you’d be controlling the gaol from the shadows and raising hell.”

“Oh no, that’s quite wrong,” he replied. “Criminals that serve their time are supposed to follow the prison’s rules. That is why I am doing just that.”

“I see... Hm...?” It seemed like his words were strangely nuanced. Was I just imagining it?

Because of Rook, I was starting to overthink a lot of stuff like this.

“By the way, you talk to Rascal and Zeta by mail, right?” I said as I recalled reading something like that in a clan notice.

"Yes. I have to rely on translation software a lot, though."

"Next time you send something, make sure to tell them about me. That I'm 'escaping this place soon.'"

"You intend to attempt escape?"

"Of course. My Embryo is... probably not the strongest, but it's suited for this kind of thing."

It hurt that I couldn't say that my Embryo was the strongest.

Damn you, Rook.

"Then you should consider waiting a short while more," he said.

"Why?"

"Candy... the King of Plagues is currently trying to defeat the Disaster Bioweapon. Once the preparations are done on that front, the three of us will definitely be able to escape."

I'd heard of the King of Plagues. That was the criminal who'd killed the most tians ever and come here after being defeated by the Superior Killer. I was pretty worried about that one because our compatibility seemed really bad, and... wait.

"'The three of us'?" I asked.

"Yes," he nodded. "Hannya's term will soon be over, and we couldn't make Fu'uta cooperate with us, so that only leaves us three."

Those were probably the names of the other Superiors here, but that wasn't what I wanted to ask.

"You're escaping, too? Aren't you enjoying your life here?" I mean, he even had his own café.

"Yes. After all, felons obediently serve their time while at the same time trying to escape. That is why I will do just that."

There it was again.

Something about his words felt weird, but I couldn't really tell what it was.

"Oh, speaking of escaping, why are you here in the first place?" he asked.

"Well... I..."

It was hard for me to speak the reasons and details about that, because it meant speaking about my failures using my own mouth.

The "me" from before I heard those words would probably speak a tale of success, but as I was now, I really couldn't do that, so I gave up and spoke objectively.

From start to end, I told the leader about everything that had happened in Gideon. He silently nodded while refilling my coffee every now and then.

Also, when we started talking about this, all the other customers read the mood and left the café. It seemed like they were used to this.

“Then, I fought the KoD to prove my power... and lost miserably,” I mumbled.

Talking about my failures made me very tired.

“That must have been hard,” the leader said while nodding. “I understand how you feel. I, too, am here because I lost to Shu.”

“‘Lost’? But I heard it was a draw...”

“No. I lost, fair and square. I received my death penalty because he gave it to me, while he got his death penalty because of a side effect to doing that to me. It’s definitely my loss.”

He spoke calmly while admitting his own defeat. It didn’t look like he was the least bit frustrated about it, and I couldn’t tell whether it was because he’d made peace with it while being here, or whether he had never been bothered by it at all.

But... for some reason, it felt like he was talking about the KoD with affinity instead of hostility.

“I must say, I do wonder how Shu noticed your Embryo,” the leader went on, pondering something for a moment. “He perceived Alhazred despite it being impossible to perceive, yes?”

I’d already told him about Alhazred’s powers. The other clan members knew them, so I thought I might as well tell him, too.

“Yes... and I still don’t know how,” I answered.

“I see... Let’s test it, then,” he said as he walked out from behind the counter. “Please attack me.”

“Eh? Wait, but... Eehh?”

What kind of person just asks to be attacked? Is he a masochist or something?

“There’s no need to hold back. It doesn’t matter where. Please, do attack me with your Alhazred.”

“Don’t complain about it after that.”

It didn’t seem like our conversation was going to go any further until I attacked him, so I gave in and did it.

I made Alhazred move and stand next to him, and it didn't look like he knew he was there. Then I made Alhazred swing his sickle-arm to slightly cut his upper arm, when...

"Oh, we should also spread out some newspapers so that—"

"Ah! Don't move...!"

A moment later, the mantis arm that was supposed to just lightly cut into his arm cut off his head instead.

"AAAAAHHHH!" I screamed as his head rolled on the floor and hit the glass door.

The Masters outside who saw it also screamed and ran away.

"O-Oh no... Wh-What do I do...?!"

I accidentally gave the death penalty to our leader! Wait, is this really my fault?! What if the other members think that I killed him just to prove my power?! What do I do now?!

"The pain is still there, it seems." I suddenly heard the same voice I'd been hearing until a few dozen seconds ago.

"...Eh?"

I looked and noticed that our leader's headless body wasn't turning into light.

Not just that, but it was actually speaking, even though it didn't have a head.

"April," it spoke again. "Sorry to bother you, but would you kindly pass me my head?"

"Un-der-stood, my ve-ne-ra-ble ow-ner," the doll next to the glass door — April was her name, probably — replied as she took the leader's head and threw it towards his body, which easily caught it.

"I figured it out," he continued speaking without even connecting his head to his body... not like I knew if he could. "Your Alhazred doesn't cancel pain."

"E-EEHH?! Forget about that! Your head's clearly not where it's supposed to be! Are you okay?!"

"I am quite okay, yes. It's normal for me to lose body parts or be blown to smithereens. Our clan member Emily is the same in that regard, no?"

"She is?!"

I didn't know that! I've never seen her become like this!

“A-Also, why are you talking without a head...?” I burst out.

“Vocal cords and lungs aren’t in the head, after all,” his body said. “Isn’t it only natural to speak through here?”

There’s nothing natural about losing your head and acting like it’s nothing! And wait, “pain?!” Did he really just say that?! He was being so calm despite having his head cut off with his pain set to on?! Excuse me?! Is he some sort of monster in real life, too?!

“Allow me a moment to reconnect. I cannot even look you in the eye like this,” he said as he placed his head where it had been. A moment later, it reconnected and became as normal.

The sight was more shocking than the decapitation. Pain and all that aside, though, as unusual as the scene was, it was probably possible if it was caused by an Embryo.

“...Gross,” I muttered. “Is your Superior Embryo based on a Dullahan?”

“Dullahans, you say? That’d be quite the cool concept, but no, my Embryo is based on something else.”

Then what other kind of Embryo can let you stay just fine without a head?!

“For now, let’s keep talking about your Alhazred. Just now, when you cut off my head, I felt pain, most likely because Alhazred cannot hide it. Shu surely knew about that.”

“How could I have expected that?” I exclaimed.

I mean, you’d have to be insane to turn on your pain. And wait, you turned on your pain and seriously asked me to attack you? Are you okay in the head?!

“This time, attack me with your pain turned on,” he said.

“Okay,” I replied as I prepared Alhazred. Swinging had resulted in disaster, so this time, I’d lightly pierce him, and...

“Oh, about what part of me you should targe—”

“I told you not to move!”

The tip of the sickle was going for his upper arm, but then he turned around and it penetrated his heart.

Come on, now, why does this keep happening?

“I see. I understand now,” said the leader. Like before, he didn’t get the death penalty and actually looked pretty fine.

Is he immortal...? KoD, just how did you kill and send this thing to the gaol? You seriously freak me out.

"This time, I didn't feel any pain," he kept talking. "It seems to be based on your own senses."

So, apparently, Alhazred's ability to hide pain was based on whether I had my own pain set to on or not.

I'd never realized this. And I was Alhazred's Master.

"But Masters who play with their pain on are rare, so it's not really a weakness, right?" I asked.

"I wouldn't be so sure," he argued. "There are some Superiors who turn it on, depending on the situation. And some even have it on all the time."

All the time...? Are they idiots? Or just a bunch of masochists?

"Then I'll have to avoid Masters who might turn it on, and—"

"But you have an even simpler method. You merely have to always have it on yourself."

...Huh?

"No no no no, not happening," I insisted. "Are you even listening to yourself? Are you stupid?"

His crazy suggestion made me reply to him without any respect, but he didn't seem to care and just placed his hand on my shoulder.

"No need to scared. There is a way to make you capable of living like that," he said as if presenting the greatest idea ever. "Training straight from hell."

Below the café, there was a stage that looked like a smaller version of the dueling arenas in Gideon.

"They only look the part, though," the leader said. "Unlike in dueling facilities, we don't have any convenient barriers here. Are you ready?"

"Yeah, yeah..." I replied with melancholy in my tone as I turned on my pain setting.

He would basically do to me what the KoD had been doing to Rook. Except here, it wasn't to influence Embryo evolution, but to make me get used to pain.

I didn't want pain, and I'd tried to resist, but in the end, the leader's words and his weird, intimidating aura had made me consent.

Honestly, at that moment, he looked more like a "King of Crimes" than at any other time.

"Also... I need this training to become stronger, I guess," I muttered.

Alhazred's weakness would stay if I didn't do this, and I couldn't have that. I wanted to once again believe that he was the strongest, and I was willing to bear some pain for that.

It's all so I can honestly claim that I have the greatest Embryo.

"I will begin, then," he said.

"Please don't make it too painful," I pleaded.

"Sorry, we cannot have that. I will begin by tearing out your tongue, so it should hurt a lot."

"Eh?" I couldn't react in time to prevent him from taking my jaw and, just as he said he would, tearing out my tongue.

For a moment, my mind became filled with pain and shock so powerful I couldn't even think anything.

"Wha har hou dhoinh...?!" I cried with a mouth full of pain. Blood flowed freely from my face.

"I did say it would be training straight from hell," he answered. "If you become used to the pain of losing your tongue or limbs, you will be able to fight without caring about any damage you take."

"Buh haht's...!"

Training that involves losing body parts?! Are you insane?!

"No need to worry about the damage done," he said as he took out and used a Job Crystal, changing his job to something other than King of Crimes before whispering, "The Saint's Prayer. I healed you just now. Please see for yourself."

I hesitantly tried to move my tongue. The feeling was enough to tell it was there again. I then touched it with my fingers and yes, all seemed to have gone back to normal.

"What was th—" I began. "Eh?!"

As I looked up, the changes on the leader shocked me way more than the healing. Up until a moment ago, he had been a plain-looking man wearing glasses. Now, however, though the clothes were the same, his chest was now big, his stature had changed, and his hair had grown — he had clearly become a woman.

My Reveal skill said that I was looking at The Saint, Sechs Würfel.

I couldn't understand anything that was going on here — I had no words for it. The fact that I'd had my tongue torn out, the healing that had instantly made the wound vanish, or the fact that the King of Crime had become The Saint.

This reminded me that one of the KoC's crimes was "the dispossession of The Saint."

I had always thought that there was a strange meaning behind the name of that incident, but it might've actually been exactly what it said.

"With me here, even the heaviest of wounds can be healed without having to resort to the death penalty," he said. "So please, be at peace and lose yourself in this training."

Also, it made me come to understand another thing about our leader.

His demeanor was soft and he was definitely a calm person... but every single one of his screws were loose.

"Today is your first day, so let us start off with something lighter... Loss of all four limbs. Ten times."

"A hah hah hah hah." A dry laugh escaped my mouth.

Suddenly, I realized something. I'd always thought I was above other Masters and always acted like it, but ever since meeting our leader, I'd never once looked down on him.

It was probably because — as stupid as other people thought I was — even I could understand, with just my instincts, that I was no match for him.

"Hhhhaaa," I sighed, gave in, and prepared to go through the training.

Now that I thought about it, that Rook guy had gone through this, as well.

I will overcome this, too, become flawless, and get my revenge on him after becoming the strongest I've ever been!

"...Go easy on me," I said.

"Apologies, but no. Going easy isn't quite enough to cut it, you see," he replied while raising his hand.

"Wait, you're using a knife hand? That's just sca— AAAAAHHHHH!"

And so began my life at the gaol... and my days of hellish training. A long road that would lead me to my new destination.

Damn you, Rook... I'll make you pay for this someday!

The End

Afterword

Cat: “With the side story over, it’s time to jump into the afterwooord!”

Xun: “I wasn’t in thE midword, but I’m ‘Xun,’ fOR ‘Xunyu.’ So, where’s the beAr?”

Fox: “He couldn’t be here ’cause he’s still in jail. The afterword is related to where we are in the story, isn’t it?”

Xun: “Well, there was thAT time he wasn’t hEre ’cause he was waiting for his tUrn.”

Cat: “The afterword is a mystery space where the fourth wall doesn’t exist and characters who never interact in the actual story get to talk to each other, and it changes depending on what’s currently happening.”

Xun: “Is that hOW it is?”

Cat: “Yes. Anyway, it’s time for the customary serious comment from the authooor!”

Thank you for your purchase, dear readers. I am the author, Kaido Sakon.

With this Dendro volume, I’ve been able to conclude the first arc of the second part of the series.

In this part, you will see many more stories focused on tians. Volumes 6 and 7 were the first step into it, and they presented a story about close bonds between players and tians.

In Dendro, players are split into worlders and ludos, and I believe the same applies to the readers, as well. Many of the happenings in the story will likely appear different depending on which kind of reader is reading them, and that too, is a very important part of this work.

Volume 8 will introduce a character who is very important for both the setting and the work itself. Little would give me more joy than your excitement for her first appearance on the stage of this story.

Fox: “Now that that’s done, can I ask something?”
Cat: “Go aheaaad.”
Fox: “Why did you add a side story after the main story? You did the same in volume 3, but still...”
Cat: “First of all, the reason why they exist in the first place is because there are things we can’t show if we focus only on the events that involve Ray. We have the side stories to compensate for that, and the information in them is necessary for the main story.”
Fox: “Oh, I can see why they’re important. One of the side stories in volume 3 gave us the identity of the Superior Killer, and heeere, we had the King of Crimes.”
Cat: “That’s exactly why we need them. However, as things are, we can’t release a book with nothing but side stories.”
Fox: “True.”
Cat: “That’s why we will be adding them next to the main one. It’s all so we can tell as many Dendro stories as possible.”
Xun: (He sounds a bit like the author’s serious comment right now.)
Bear: “I’M BACK IN THE WILD!”
Bear: “VOLUME 8 IS SET TO COME OUT AROUND OCTOBER, I GUESS, SO BEAR IT UNTIL THEN!”
Cat: “That was too sudden! And you completely ruined the flow!”
Bear: “We have a limited amount of space fur the afterword! Sudden or not, it’s time to announce the next volume!”
Cat: “That’s so meta! You actually can’t say that anywhere else but here!”
Fox: “Here I was thinking he wouldn’t appear here this time, but he barged in and took an important honor and the entire spotlight allll for himself...”
Xun: (This afterword sure had a lot of talk about the afterword itself...)

Bonus Short Stories

Signed

Paladin, Ray Starling

Normally, the monsters of Infinite Dendrogram had their names displayed above their heads.

As game-like as that sounded, however, the names were visible even to the tians who called this world their home. When you think about it, it was kinda obvious those names would be, considering they were by far the simplest way to differentiate human from monster. At the very least, not having them would definitely make things a lot more confusing and difficult.

I used "normally" for a reason, though. There were exceptions — monsters with names you didn't always see, such as those who could use conceal, stealth, and similar skills.

Prime examples of this were the Mimics. These RPG favorites were present in Dendro, just as in many other games, and most of them had skills that hid their names. Indeed, you'd find many unfortunate souls lured and defeated by a Mimic's promise of immense loot.

With all that in mind, I was currently faced with a certain choice.

"All right... Is this one safe?"

I was in the now-familiar Tomb Labyrinth, looking at the end of a hallway, intensely pondering the treasure chest placed there.

Unlike in other areas, the monsters in created dungeons automatically respawned, and the same applied to these treasures. They were scattered around randomly, and though they could be very hit-or-miss, the hits had the potential to be really great. Figaro, for instance, had gotten a Prism Steed from one of those.

That was all well and good. Treasure was always welcome. But that was where the Mimics came in.

Mimics replaced some of these chests. Sure, you were about as likely to encounter one as you were likely to find a rare item, but even those on the lower levels were absurdly strong — about Pure-Dragon-tier.

“If only the others were here,” commented Nemesis.

Yeah, I thought in response.

Today, things hadn’t panned out according to plan, and I’d ended up exploring the lower levels of the Tomb Labyrinth all by myself.

That was how I’d chanced upon this treasure chest. Opening it without anyone to help me out was dangerous, but with these things, the one who’s first takes it all, so it definitely wouldn’t be here by the time I returned with my party.

“Ignoring it would be the safe choice here,” I pondered out loud.

“But that would be quite a waste.”

Yep. Leaving behind the first treasure chest I ever found would definitely sting.

“All right...!” I shouted. “I’ve decided! We’re opening that chest!”

“Then I shall prepare to use the Counter Absorption, just in case!”

We gathered our resolve, and I kneeled before the chest. Tightening my right hand’s grip around Nemesis, I pushed it open with my left and... found a single scroll inside.

“...Seems like it was no Mimic.”

“Yeah. No surprise attacks or anything.”

Overcome by relief, I took out the scroll, and the chest became light particles and vanished the same way Masters and monsters did. In a way, this scroll could be considered a drop from the chest.

“All right, let’s check this thing out,” I muttered excitedly. “Perhaps this is one of those item recipes I’ve heard about.”

I undid the string, opened the scroll, looked at the content, and saw the text with the largest font pop out at me, saying “Tomb Labyrinth Exploration Permit.”

“GHAH...!” I exclaimed as I was overcome by shock and pain far greater than any Mimic could give me, bringing me to my knees.

“Oh dear... Just how many of these have we gotten by now?” asked Nemesis.

My daily gacha rolls had made me more familiar with these than I ever wanted to be. Unlike those, however, this one was diligent and automatically signed itself with my name before I even opened it.

"Why the hell would you give TL Permits to someone already exploring the TL?! Why would you auto sign it and make it worthless on the market?! No one could need this! Ever!"

My pained shout resounded, but gained no response, and I was now the not-so-proud owner of yet another Permit I could add to all those I'd gotten so far, making up a grand total of I-actually-forgot-how-many.

A Certain Interview at a Certain Contractor's Office

Dunton Contractors

Three days had passed since the terrorist incident at Gideon.

The head of the Dunton Contractors, Rob Dunton, was thoroughly troubled.

"There's so much work to be done, but I don't have nearly enough workers..."

Gideon was currently overflowing with emergency requests. Countless residences, businesses, and even some arenas had to be rebuilt or repaired due to the damage they'd sustained during Franklin's Game.

In a way, this was a great time to make a killing, but Rob didn't have enough Designers and Carpenters to answer all the requests. Some had fled the country once the war began, and even more left because of the incident, leaving him with a lack of labor too damaging to accept all the jobs, and forcing him to make the painful decision to reject some of them.

"Well, at least there's a new Designer coming for an interview," he murmured.

He intended to take what he could get, and he wouldn't hesitate to accept any new workers even if he had some issues with them. And so, an hour later, he was interviewing a certain woman.

"Let us start with your name," Rob said.

"Gerbera!" she replied proudly.

He found it strange that she didn't have a surname, but he didn't ask anything about it. There were places where surnames didn't exist, after all.

"So, Gerbera, do you have any experience working in other offices similar to ours?"

"Nope! This is gonna be my first job!"

Rob raised an eyebrow, unsure of what to make of her. She'd just proudly revealed that she had no work experience to speak of, yet was behaving as if the job was already as good as hers.

“May I have your statistics, please?” he asked. Levels, stats, and the presence of construction skills played an important part in getting a job in this field.

“Here!” She readily presented him a paper that showed her stats, and...

M-Max level...?! Rob was overcome by shock.

It showed that she was level 500 — a true rarity among tians. Each tian had different talents and maximum number of jobs they could take, making any tian who reached that level a product of both talent and hard work.

She... She is a tian, right? he pondered.

Level 500s weren’t all that uncommon among Masters, but since Gerbera had no Master symbol — the crest on her left hand — he concluded that she had to be a tian.

I also feel that her AGI is strangely high.

Jobs like Architect Designer and Carpenter should’ve raised primarily DEX and STR, but her stats made her seem like a battle job.

Perhaps she was a fighter until now and just decided to settle down and get a job?

People who raised their levels through battle weren’t all that uncommon, after all.

Her DEX is higher than your usual Designer’s, and I certainly don’t see any problems with the construction skill levels...

All in all, Gerbera seemed like a highly promising individual, especially for an employer as desperate for new workers as Rob.

“So, Gerbera, do you have any requests regarding your employment with us?” he asked.

“I want to work by myself! From home!”

This interview so far was enough for Rob to realize that it was best to let her do her job alone, so he had no problems with that. He continued asking questions, and though some of her overly confident answers confused him, Rob became more and more certain that he would hire her.

“I will tell you right now — you’re hired,” he said as he extended his hand to Gerbera. “Let’s make this a relationship that benefits us both.”

“Okay! I’ll benefit you!” she said as she shook his hand. “Also, I’d like to see the blueprints of the buildings you’ve built in the past. It’s to help me with my work.”

“Very well. I’ll show them to you.”

Gerbera’s words greatly impressed Rob. She talks a bit strangely, but she’s clearly passionate about the work.

With that, he finished welcoming the new employee into his workforce.

There’s no shortage of work, and we just got a skilled worker... Things are looking up! he thought with nothing but certainty.

Some time later, the inquiries and investigations about the incident caused by Gerbera greatly affected his work, but that was a story for another time.

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 8 of this series, coming soon!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 7
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2018 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2018 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

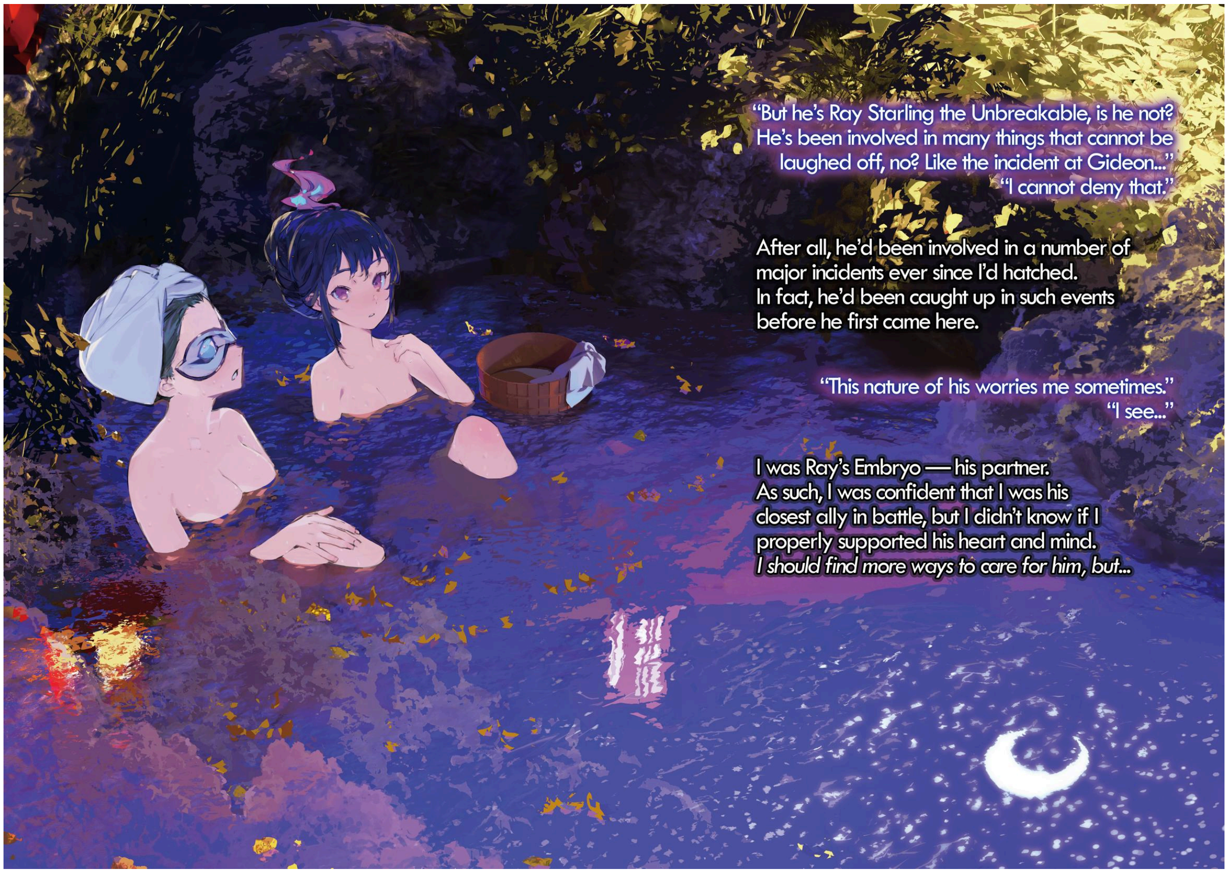
Original Japanese edition published in 2018 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2018 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: September 2018

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
8. The Hope They Left Behind

Infinite Dendrogram
8. The Hope They Left Behind
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki



"But he's Ray Starling the Unbreakable, is he not? He's been involved in many things that cannot be laughed off, no? Like the incident at Gideon..."

"I cannot deny that."

After all, he'd been involved in a number of major incidents ever since I'd hatched.

In fact, he'd been caught up in such events before he first came here.

"This nature of his worries me sometimes."

"I see..."

I was Ray's Embryo — his partner.

As such, I was confident that I was his closest ally in battle, but I didn't know if I properly supported his heart and mind.

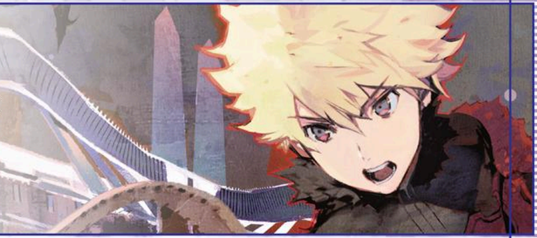
I should find more ways to care for him, but...

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

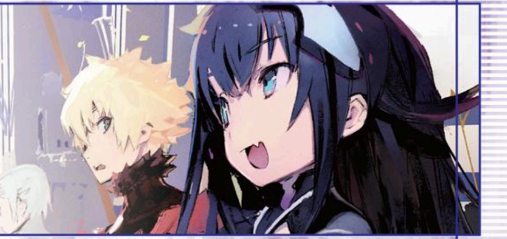
A young man who began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of righteousness that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.



Nemesis

Nemesis

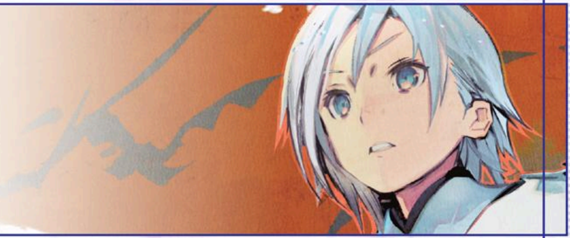
A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She has the ability to transform into a greatsword or a halberd, and is equipped with skills such as Vengeance is Mine, which damages enemies for twice as much as they damage Ray.



Rook

Rook Holmes/Lucius Holmes

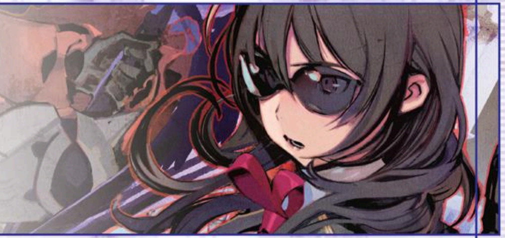
An astonishingly beautiful boy in Ray's party. His job is "Pimp" and he fights using his tamed monsters. His Embryo is the Type Guardian "Depraved Devil, Babylon."



Marie

Marie Adler/Nagisa Ichimiya

A Journalist player working for the information organization called "DIN," giving her access to lots of various info. Having gained an interest in him, she now accompanies Ray, who has a tendency to be at the center of large incidents.



Shu

Shu Starling / Shuichi Mukudori

Ray's brother and the one who invited him to the game. He wears a suit because, during character creaton, he accidentally made himself look just like he does in real life.

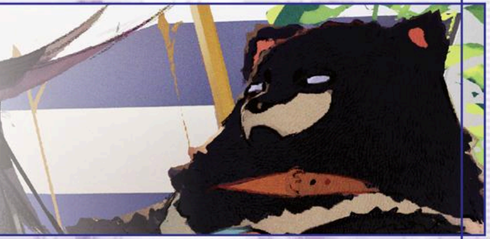


Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Prologue One: A Glimpse Into Days Long Gone

Prologue Two: The Unearthed Ruins

Chapter One: Change of Clothing — Dark Edition

Chapter Two: “I Ran Into Someone Shady” x2

Chapter Three: It’s Not Against the Rules

Chapter Four: The First Night

Chapter Five: Countess Quartierlatin

Chapter Six: Ruins

Chapter Seven: Power and Will

Chapter Eight: Freedom

Chapter Nine: The Three Armies

Conjunction: What Was Left Sleeping

Afterword
Bonus Short Stories
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Prologue One: A Glimpse Into Days Long Gone

Those who know true hope are the ones who stand on the brink of the abyss of despair.

Those who have already fallen into it can never hope again, and those on the precipice are more hopeful than anyone else.

◇◆

An amber dragon was speeding through the heavens.

It was a majestic entity, clad in armor that shone like precious gems.

Its eyes, however, had no trace of life in them. They were window-like, and you could see the silhouettes of men inside.

The dragon's head was a cockpit, and those within it were managing various control columns and gauges.

This was the Zweier Imperium's First Special Machine Force.

Its name was Amber Abyss, and it shared the name with the dragon-like weapon they were operating.

There were four people inside, each with their own role in managing the artificial skydragon.

"Captain. With our current speed, we will arrive at the battle area in 20 minutes," said the one in charge of the radar to his commanding officer. He was a man in his thirties.

"I see," said the captain, nodding. His voice was heavy. "So it's about to begin."

"Dr. Flagman finished this Prism Dragon just recently. This is its first battle, isn't it?!" asked the youth holding the control column. In contrast to the captain's voice, his voice was cheerful.

"Indeed," the captain replied. "This Amber Abyss isn't the only one of its kind, though. We've shared Mr. Flagman's technology with other countries, and they're making their Prism Dragons, as well. I also hear that Mr. Flagman's very own Prism Steeds and Prism Persons shall soon be used in battle, too."

"That's great!"

The youth's glee made the captain crack a wry grin and think, It means that the situation is so bad that the countries have to ignore all their differences and cooperate in order to win.

Exactly. Everything on the continent — be it the Zweier Imperium or any other nation — was on the verge of collapse.

And it was all because of a certain enemy.

"That aside, what of our advance unit? Have the Skydragon Knights responded yet?" asked the captain.

"No." The subordinate shook his head. "Apparently, there's a powerful magical force obstructing all communication magic."

"...I see," the captain muttered. "Keep trying to contact them."

The lack of response made a cold sweat run down his back.

Overcome with worry, he looked over his subordinates.

That was how he noticed that the one on the control column was smiling while looking at a photo.

The captain looked and saw that it displayed a young woman with a baby in her arms. She looked about as young as the youth holding the photo.

"Sublieutenant, what's that?" the man asked.

"Ah, Captain!" The youth jumped a bit, then spoke with joy in his tone. "Heh heh heh. Well, this is a photo they sent me from the evacuation center! I'm a father now! It's a boy!"

"What...? Then why didn't you refuse this mission?! Right now, we're heading fo—!"

"I know!" The sublieutenant cut the captain's words short. "I know what all of this is! I know this weapon was sent out without any trials, and that we're facing those abominations!"

"Sublieutenant..."

There was none of the man's cheer from before. The happiness he'd expressed talking about his child hadn't been fully genuine — he'd forced it to try and dispel the fear.

Right now, his expression was one of absolute desperation, but at the same time, it was also the face of a man who had looked ahead and knew what he needed to do.

"But I can't just escape," the man said. "If we don't defeat them, the Imperium... Amelia and the son we haven't even named yet... will die...!"

"Sublieutenant..."

"That's why I... we have to defeat them! With this Amber Abyss! We have to show everyone that there's hope!"

"...You're right."

The youth's words made the captain subdue his fears and face ahead.

"My friends," he muttered. "Let us win, and attain this hope."

"Yes, Captain!" they shouted in unison.

Their wills were now united. They were determined to head into the battlefield and become a beacon of hope for all humankind.

They prepared to face the enemy approaching the man-made dragon as they confirmed what information they had.

"Prism Dragon Unit 1, Amber Abyss, has arrived at the airspace of the battlefield!"

"There's still no response from the Skydragon Knights!"

"We're picking up an immense energy signal! It's a servant of the Extra-Continental Vessel... the Incarnation of Armaments!"

It was far beyond the distant horizon, but their radars were already capturing absolutely obscene amounts of energy.

"The Incarnation of Armaments will be visible on the horizon after 25 seconds!"

"Get its attention!" shouted the captain. "We'll take care of it with the first attack!"

"Understood! Abyss Cannon... prepare to fire!"

As ordered, everyone readied the man-made dragon for its greatest attack.

The Amber Abyss opened its maw and started charging the weapon inside — the compressed magical baryon acceleration cannon. The artificial dragon's power reactor created energy greatly exceeding 1,000,000 MP, then began gathering and compressing it all.

The magic became an ultra-hot ball of fire. If its mouth hadn't been protected by a special barrier, the dragon would most likely have evaporated on the spot. In spite of that, the energy only continued to increase.

"The energy is at 80... 90... 100%!"

"Blow it away!" roared the captain. "Wipe it out with the horizon itself!"

The moment it reached the limit, the sublieutenant pulled the trigger on the column.

"Abyss Cannon... FIRE!"

And so, the artificial dragon released the fireball from its jaws.

Distorting the very space around it, it flew towards the ground and shattered the earth, directly hitting the enemy in the distant horizon.

The ground around it instantly evaporated, and the enemy's approach was halted.

Then, with a searing blast, all the magic compressed within the core was released. Half of the unleashed power was used for a long-distance gravity spell, while the rest became an even greater heat.

This was the true nature of the Abyss Cannon — it was a fatal weapon that sank and settled the target with an immense gravitational field, then burned it until not even ash remained.

A few seconds later, the distant abyss it created spat out an enormous pillar of fire. And, as one would expect, nothing inside it was moving.

"The Incarnation of Armaments has fallen silent!"

"Yes!" shouted the captain, completely overwhelmed. "We did it! The Prism Dragon's Abyss Cannon worked!"

"We finally defeated one of them..."

"Indeed," nodded the captain. "And this won't be the final victory we claim. If we can beat one, we can beat the rest of them."

"Though I imagine that the Incarnation of Beasts will be quite troublesome."

"But I'm sure it's possible. There's still hope."

They all cheered. They had every reason to. After all, the man-made dragon they operated had become a sign of hope in this desperate war. It would still be an uphill battle, but just having a means of fighting back was more than enough for them to feel hopeful.

However... needless to say, that only applied if this means was actually successful.

"...Eh?" the one in charge of the radar exclaimed.

“What is it?” asked the captain.

With a face warped in shock, he replied, “The Incarnation of Armaments is active again!”

You didn’t even need a radar for this — you could see it clearly through the optical sensors in the dragon’s eyes.

Something was rising from the abyss they’d created.

It was a humanoid figure surrounded by thousands of Legendary-tier shields, which it had just used to protect itself from the greatest attack mankind had at their disposal.

It was the inimical entity that freely commanded a seemingly inexhaustible arsenal — the Incarnation of Armaments.

“Charge it again!” the captain howled.

Alas, they hadn’t the time to prepare another Abyss Cannon.

The Incarnation of Armaments instantly unequipped the thousands of shields and instead took out a single blade.

Like All the Stars in the Sky — Kaleidoscope.

In a blink of an eye, the single blade became several thousand, and the incarnation launched them all, creating a barrage of Legendary-tier blades that easily exceeded the speed of sound.

They all went towards the Amber Abyss, piercing its heavy armor with next to no effort.

The outer shell, designed to shield it against its own devastating Abyss Cannon, was no match for the bladestorm.

The captain wailed and instantly died as one of the blades pierced into the cockpit and fatally wounded him.

“AMELIAAAAAAAA...!”

The sublieutenant and the other members faced a similar end.

They and their hope, the Amber Abyss, became atomic dust in but a blink of an eye.

◇◆

The battle between the Amber Abyss and the Incarnation of Armaments was just one of the many encounters between this continent’s humanity and the Extra-Continental Vessel.

The war certainly wasn’t limited to just the sky.

“Th-This is the Seventh Magical Infantry Division! We need reinforcemen— No! Tell the rear area to evacuate! We can’t hold much longer!”

“We’re fighting the Incarnation of Beasts! We don’t know their total number, but there are so many, we can’t see a single patch of ground!”

Infantries were being annihilated by a force of beasts so great that they drowned out the land.

“This is the Zweier Imperial Fleet! The final line of defense was consumed!”

“It... The Incarnation of Maelstroms is about to reach land!” A fleet all but vanished, consumed by a black, vortex-like space in the sea.

None of what they had seemed to stand a chance.

Faced with an overwhelming power they couldn’t hope to match, mankind — the prosperous society that would eventually be known as the “pre-ancient civilization” — was facing its demise.

All-dominating weapons blotting out the sky.

Countless beasts covering the ground.

A bottomless maelstrom consuming even the ocean itself.

With forces so staggering all united to annihilate them, humanity had no choice but to despair.

◇◆

Having heard the news that all the front lines were lost and that the three incarnations were closing in, the capital was in a state of absolute panic.

The people of the Zweier Imperium were desperately trying to escape to either the edge of the world or the underground.

There was a man observing them.

He was the Imperator of the Zweier Imperium, which was once the most advanced nation on the continent... now on the verge of collapse.

“God does not exist,” he muttered as he watched his proud country wither.

He couldn’t believe that there was any meaning in praying to God in a world so cruel that it would allow everything that men had created to collapse so easily, especially when the incarnations responsible were so God-like themselves.

“I am certain that, after this, no one will pray to gods ever again,” he continued. “That is, assuming humanity somehow survives...”

As the Imperator looked upon his dying Imperium, a youth called out to him, saying, “Your Majesty, we have finished evacuating the people to the underground and sealed the various underground factories.”

“I see...”

“Four of the five Prism Dragons have been confirmed to be thoroughly destroyed. The last one sank into the ocean and isn’t coming back up. Three Prism People have been thoroughly destroyed. Two are missing. All of the Prism Steeds are lost, as well.”

“I see...”

“As confirmed before, the throne isn’t working. The natural magic channels leading to the construction zone have been cut, so activating it will take 100 times longer than originally planned... which will probably be over a 1,000 years. However, we have successfully constructed an automatic mass-production system for the Prism Person and Prism Rider series. We have set it to sleep mode underneath the Eldim Mountain Range. Acra-Vesta — our ultimate weapon no. 3 — is also being constructed there.”

“I see...”

“Acra-Vesta will be automatically designed and constructed based on the data gathered from the incarnations. The operation will be executed in a way they won’t discover. Considering the overwhelming power of what they’re based on and how difficult it will be to counter them, I believe that constructing it will take between 3,000-4,000 years.”

“Heh heh,” the Imperator chuckled. “That will certainly require some patience.”

“Indeed,” the youth replied. “However, I will eventually get back at the Extra-Continental Vessel. I shall not die until I witness that happening.”

“I see... Then, please, do it for the both of us. My friend... Flagman.”

“As you will. Then I will go make preparations in countries that still exist.”

“Very well. Do your best.”

“I will... Thank you, Your Majesty... for everything,” said the youth, Flagman, as he left the Imperator’s presence. He was fully aware that the man would want to accept his demise like any ruler should.

“Now... which one of them shall give me my end...?” the old man murmured.

Too many of his people had lost their lives against the Extra-Continental Vessel’s incarnations, and thus, he thought he would go out the same way they did.

This would be his end.

However, their will wouldn’t die with them.

Though faced with complete and utter annihilation, they still had a desire within their hearts.

“I will be waiting for you to join me on the other side, Flagman,” the Imperator said as he saw a score of beasts break through the walls. “The Incarnation of Beasts, eh? Perhaps I should be glad that it’s a foe I’m not helpless against — I can die fighting.”

He then stood up and covered his body in a set of mechanical armor.

“I am Imperator Machina, Wolfgang Magna Zweier. Face me in my final battle as the ruler of this land... Incarnation of Beasts!”

“■■■■■■——!”

◇◆

This was a slice of history etched onto the stage of Infinite Dendrogram.

Going by the world’s time, it had happened 2,000 years before the first players arrived. That was the end of the period now known as the “pre-ancient civilization.”

The ruler of one of the countries from that era faced his demise at his very own throne.

His was not the only country, and he was not the only ruler to die in such a way.

However, they did not vanish without leaving anything behind.

The seas and the underground were comparably safe from the onslaught, so many facilities were left there. The later generations eventually started calling those places simply “ruins.”

Within them were powers left over from the people of that era, which could become a source of hope for what remained of mankind — artifacts and technologies carrying the will to revive the dying civilization.

Even after two millennia passed, they were still waiting for the arrival of the later generations.

However, those who left the hope behind had made two major mistakes.

One was not of their own fault. It was the complete and sudden disappearance of their enemies, the incarnations, and their mothership — the Extra-Continental Vessel.

And the other was the fact that they failed to consider how the hope they left behind would actually manifest. Many of the technologies they entrusted to the later generations started acting completely unlike how they intended.

One underground facility held environment-fixing bacteria, which went out of control and started consuming other living creatures.

An underground town had a defensive golem weapon, Magnum Colossus, which went haywire and began annihilating all who came close.

Some were due to glitches in the technology, others due to the effects of time, but the things the pre-ancient civilization left behind began acting in ways their creators hadn’t intended.

The hope they’d entrusted to the future was warping into despair for those living in the current era.

It was a nightmare scenario for both the ones who’d left it behind and the ones who were given it, making it very clear that something had gone very wrong in the process.

Thus, certain people started calling these occurrences “errors.”

One such error could be found in the ruin in the Eldim Mountains — though the place now had a different name.

Millennia after the era of the Zweier Imperium, the land now belonged to another country.

It was now the territory of The Kingdom of Altar — specifically, the Quartierlatin County — and it was right next to the border to the Dryfe Imperium.

Prologue Two: The Unearthed Ruins

Her dream

She saw a dream.

“Father! Do you really intend to go to battle?” she cried.

It was a dream showing a past event. Not even a year old, it was still painfully fresh in her mind.

After all, a mere three days before, the first princess of Altar, Altimia A. Altar, had lost much of what she held dear.

“Why are you not doing what the imperium’s doing, offering rewards to the Masters who join the war?!” she desperately asked her father and king, Eldor Zeo Altar.

He was a gentle-looking man, who looked younger than he really was.

“Altimia,” he began. His tone was gentle, but it had a certain power behind it. “I did not do that because this is a revolutionary era. The once-few Masters started growing in number a few years ago, and the kingdom alone already has thousands of them.”

“But that is exactly why you should make an ally out of them!”

Masters were immortal entities bearing the supernatural powers of Embryos.

The Contract of War prohibited all except certain rankers to participate, but even so, few could match those Masters in battle. They were significantly stronger than the tian majority, and they would never be at risk of losing their lives.

Even so, Eldor had rejected the idea that Masters should be hired for this battle.

“Altimia,” he said. “If you speak of them that way, you are basically saying that they have been increasing for that sole purpose.”

“Eh?”

“There are more Masters now, and there will likely be even more in the future. They are bound to change the world. I believe them to be the current era’s agents of revolution, sent by the world itself, and believe that their special powers exist for that purpose. However, I don't believe that using them for war is a good thing. A world where we tians see them as nothing but tools of war, and a world where Masters acknowledge that... is far too bleak," he said as he looked outside the window — into the world beyond. "That is why I cannot allow myself to be like Dryfe and warp their wills with the promise of rewards."

After saying so with absolute certainty, Eldor smiled.

"Still, I cannot begin to express my thanks to the Masters who have chosen to stand with this country regardless."

On this day, Eldor had recruited Masters to stand and defend against the imperium. Because of the aforementioned reasons, he hadn't promised any rewards, but some had stood up to protect the country, regardless.

"But...!" Altimia protested. Both she and her father knew full well that the quality of those Masters was significantly lower than that of those fighting for the imperium. "But the kingdom will surely lose! If you can't win, try making peace with—"

"We cannot." Eldor rejected the idea in an even stronger tone. "Altimia. The current imperator... Leinhart is dangerous. If we do not stop him, he will become a threat to the world itself."

"Father...?"

Back when the kingdom and the imperium had been on good terms, Altimia had lived in the country as a foreign transfer student.

Thanks to a certain connection, she'd met and talked to Leinhart for a bit, and he hadn't seemed particularly dangerous.

However, Eldor's expression as he mentioned that man was intense beyond words, making it quite likely that Leinhart was the reason why the two countries were now going from allies to enemies in such a short amount of time.

"Father..." she said worriedly.

"Don't worry, Altimia. I used to fight at Langley's side as a Paladin. And our teacher... the Arch Sage... is with us, as well."

"Father... Then..."

Altimia was about to suggest something to him, but Eldor cut his daughter's words short, saying, "One more thing, Altimia. This doesn't just apply to Masters. I do not want to push people to fight just because they have the power to."

"But..."

"And that's why, Altimia..."

◇

Altimia woke up right as her father was about to say something.

The dream just now had shown her last conversation with him. She'd seen it countless times after he'd passed away.

"Your Highness! Marquis Findle is here!" The voice coming from beyond the door was the reason why she had awoken. It was her attendant. "He has urgent news! Please hurry to your office!"

"Coming," Altimia said, as she wiped the tears that gathered in the corners of her eyes as she slept, got up, changed, and went out to her office.

"Is that information reliable?" she asked one of her retainers.

Marquis Findle was the one in charge of intelligence, and right now, he was bearing a valuable piece of information.

"It most certainly is," he replied. "Ruins have been discovered to the north of Altea... in the Quartierlatin County, bordering the imperium."

"I see," Altimia said, and began to ponder.

Ruins were best described as "dungeons left behind by the pre-ancient civilization." Both tians and Masters would understand that.

The pre-ancient civilization had held magic and science far more advanced than the people of the current day, and the ruins left over from their demise contained many relics of that era.

Considering that those ruins had once been fortresses, research facilities, or castles, it was fair to consider them a kind of natural dungeon.

The ruins discovered so far included Dryfe's foundation, The Underground City of Granbell, as well as the seven Seafloor Excavation Fortresses Granvaloa had found at the bottom of the sea, and the countless, nameless ruins in Caldina.

Ruins oftentimes contained technology that couldn't be made today. Much of Dryfe's magic machine tech and Granvaloa's shipbuilding knowledge came from analyzing and applying the information found in such ruins.

Though that was a definite perk to such facilities, there were downsides, as well. Particularly, when the technology inside somehow went out of control. It wasn't rare for them to house dangerous UBMs, as well.

For better or for worse, ruins had the potential to drastically change a country's power.

The fact that such a place had been found in the kingdom was critically important, but there was a problem in that it was in Quartierlatin — a county bordering Dryfe.

Dryfe had invaded through another area last time, so it hadn't ended up becoming a battlefield, but there was no guarantee that it would escape that fate the next time — it could easily become the front line.

It was an area of such importance that both armies had fortresses full of soldiers around it, and now there was a ruin there... something that could change the fate of a country.

"Does the imperium know about this?" she asked.

"I would like to hope not... but they have Masters helping their intelligence operations."

Embryo unique skills could easily include powers of interception or clairvoyance. It was best to assume that Dryfe knew about this, as well.

That fact made Altimia anxious. After all, the technology in the ruins had the possibility of restarting the war earlier than expected.

"Your Highness?" Findle prompted.

"No, I'm fine," she replied. "Now, what of the imperium? Have they done anything?"

"We haven't seen any movement from the army garrisoned at the border. It's hard to think that they would use the appearance of these ruins as an opportunity to invade again."

"Then they might be considering an ambush, or stealing the technology in the ruins."

"Yes. I believe the imperium's Masters will make a move, like they did back during the incident at Gideon."

He was referring to the major act of terrorism by Franklin, one of Dryfe's superiors, in the kingdom's strongest city. He'd kidnapped the second princess, brought destruction upon the city, and even planned to completely annihilate it with a horde of monsters exceeding even the number he'd used in the war.

Thankfully, the kingdom's Masters — including one Superior, the King of Destruction — had stemmed the flow of Franklin's abominations at the source and defeated the mad scientist himself.

Remembering the incident, something she'd only heard about while suffering the Epidemic, Altimia clenched her fists in determination.

She couldn't stand the fact that Dryfe's Masters had sparked the act of terror, and that Masters had been the ones to subdue it.

Only she would understand who this frustration was directed at, however.

Why did...? she thought, but then shook her head and came back to the matter at hand.

"Let us do something about it, too," she said. "We will send someone to investigate the ruins and counter the forces sent by the imperium."

"Very well," nodded Findle. "Then I shall contact the guild and ask them to prepare quests for powerful Masters, so that—"

"Do not do that."

"Huh?"

Following the appearance of Masters in the world, requesting Masters to deal with difficult problems had become the optimal course of action.

However, Altimia rejected the idea.

"I will send someone of my choosing. And I do not deem it necessary to contact the Masters or the adventurers' guild about it. Prohibit it and the job guilds from making any quests related to the ruins."

"But if the imperium is sending Masters, only other Masters would be able to counter th—"

"That is my decision as acting ruler."

"As you command." Marquis Findle made a pose of acknowledgment.

"You may leave. Also, keep in mind that I might not respond for a few days as I deal with this situation. I will tell this to the other departments."

"Very well." Findle bowed lightly and excused himself from the office.

Altimia stood up from her chair and walked to the front of the full body mirror.

"Tians have little chance against Masters... I know that much," she muttered to herself.

She looked into her own eyes and remembered those defeated and dead at the hands of Dryfe's Masters. A number of them had been especially dear to her. Even her own father had been beaten by a Master and eaten by his monsters.

"Even so, I cannot rely on Masters to accomplish something that could have such a powerful effect on the war," she whispered as she touched the mirror. "I cannot use them as tools of war."

Those were the words she'd heard many times in the dream of talking to her father for the last time.

Masters were the current era's agents of revolution. They should not be used in tian... "human" battles.

That was how she understood those words.

Though her interpretation was slightly different from her father's will, she was determined to abide by it.

Then she considered another thing.

During the war, many Masters had sided with Dryfe for the rewards. Her father had offered no rewards to the Masters of his kingdom, leaving Dryfe with far more of them.

Just like her father, she was thankful for the Altarian Masters who'd participated.

However, she couldn't help but feel hatred for the many Dryfean Masters who'd fought the kingdom, grudge for the many Altarian Masters who'd done nothing, and rage at the Altarian Superior who had made absurd demands in exchange for her participation.

She even felt like things would never have turned out like this if Masters had never existed in the first place.

Altimia knew full well that this was naught but the result of war. Dryfe's Masters had only acted as they were requested to, and the kingdom hadn't made the request because her own father willed it.

Even so, Masters... Superiors... have taken far too much from her, and thus, her mistrust for them ran deep.

"But..."

There were some things that shook her mistrust.

During the capital blockade incident, Masters had formed vigilante groups to take care of the ones responsible.

During the Epidemic, some Masters had walked around nursing people without asking for any reward.

And then there was Gideon...

"But now..."

The matter of the ruins was related to war. Regardless of her likes or dislikes, she wouldn't rely on Masters, for she wished to respect her father's will.

Thus, she would do something else.

"This is a job for Azurite."

◇

After leaving the first princess's room and walking a short distance away from it, Marquis Findle took something out of his pocket.

It was a magic item used for magical communication, and he used it to connect to one of his subordinates in the intelligence department.

"It's me," he said. "Send a request to DIN to leak the information about Quartierlatin's ruins to the kingdom... Yes, that would be enough... Prohibit all ruin-related guild quests, just as she ordered. They... The Masters will act on their own."

With that, he cut the communication.

"I understand what Her Highness is saying, but Masters are best left to other Masters," he murmured.

Even if there was no official request, the Masters investigating the ruins on their own volition would deal with any attacking Dryfean Masters.

Also, if the kingdom's Masters sold any of the technology they found there, it would improve Altar's economy.

If it turned out to be something particularly important, the country itself could send its agents to buy it off of them.

The people they called "Masters" rarely considered life-related risks, and acted mostly on curiosity and potential returns. That was why Marquis Findle thought that this was the best way to deal with this.

"But... No, there is no use in thinking about that."

With those words as his last, he returned to his office.

There were still many things he had to do in regards to the matter of the ruins. That order to his subordinate was just the first step.

Marquis Findle dealt with the next step while thinking of both the current situation and Altimia's consideration for her father's will.

One believed that Masters shouldn't be used for war, while the other thought otherwise, but both believed themselves to be right, and neither could be proven to be completely wrong.

However, regardless if they were both right or wrong... it would all be pointless if the Masters sent by Dryfe were significantly stronger than the Altarian Masters investigating the ruins.

◆◆◆

Dryfe Imperium's Imperial Palace — Throne of the Imperium, Dryfe Imperstand

Dryfe Imperium's capital, Vandelheim, had two faces.

One face was relatively modern, while the other was a face of clockwork superscience.

There were two prime representatives of the latter.

One was a large research institute right outside of the capital — the headquarters of the Triangle of Wisdom.

And the other... was this imperial palace.

On the outside, the palace looked like little more than an extension of the modern city surrounding it.

However, the same couldn't be said about its core — the heart of the palace.

It was best described as an "enormous clockwork fortress," a castle of ever-moving gears bearing the name "Throne of the Imperium, Dryfe Imperstand."

It was an ancient construct that was both Dryfe's core, its strongest weapon, and an existence some would refer to as an Irregularity.

◆

A weapon and the imperial residence at the same time, the Imperstand also had offices for the senior statesmen.

In one such office, two people were having an exchange while enjoying a game of chess — or, at least, a game that looked like it.

"A short while ago, I was informed that one of our Masters had confirmed the appearance of ruins in the kingdom's Quartierlatin County," one of them said. The other silently listened. "Could you send the Hell General there?"

"May I ask why, Prime Minister Vigoma?"

One of them was Prime Minister Nobrome Vigoma, the one in charge of the imperium's internal affairs. As for the other...

"That's simple," said Nobrome. "Because there is no method with more certainty, Field Marshal Barbaros."

"...I see."

The Zero General, Field Marshal Gifted Barbaros, was the one in charge of the country's military, and easily the strongest tian in the imperium.

He was both a General and a field marshal at the same time. It wasn't unusual for tians to have different jobs and official roles. Though there were Superior Jobs, such as "Commander-in-Chief" and some that included the word "General," a "Field Marshal" job simply didn't exist, so there was no helping that.

Despite being the top of the country's military, Gifted Barbaros was strangely young — somewhere around thirty — and didn't seem to have the air of command you'd expect from a leader.

To put it frankly, his eyes seemed dead.

"He is in the field marshal faction," Nobrome continued. "If you convince him, he—"

"We only share a method and approach. He's not part of any faction," Gifted argued. "But... very well. I'll try to persuade him."

There was next to no vitality in his response, either.

Two of the leaders of the three factions that comprised this country's forces were sitting at the same table, but he felt nothing about that or the fact that he was one of them. He merely replied emotionlessly and moved the pieces on the board.

But Prime Minister Vigoma didn't care about the man's attitude.

After all, he had known him for a long time.

Because of that, he knew better than most that Gifted was akin to a sleeping lion — no, something far scarier than that — and understood that, unless the situation called for it, it was best to let him keep sleeping.

"I must say, this is quite unexpected," Nobrome added. "I expected you to ask more, or outright reject what I want to ask of Hell General."

"Masters are free," Gifted replied. "They aren't bound by rank or faction — they do what they feel like doing. Even their lives are secondary to them."

"That is true," Nobrome agreed, but Gifted's words couldn't help but make him think, Doesn't that apply to you, as well?

"Also, I understand the situation," Gifted added. "You're giving this request to Logan because the one you're sponsoring, Franklin, is currently unusable... or, rather, you mustn't use him."

"Oh?"

"Franklin's strength is the strength of variety. He lost his forces in the previous incident, and is now being pressed into developing new units and stocking up on the mass-produced ones. The matter of the ruins and the potential technology found inside is important, but mostly in the long-term. It will have little effect on the upcoming war. Therefore, you can't send out a force that's being developed for the sake of the war — you need them to focus on growing. Then there are the recent additions to our Superior forces — the King of Chariots and the King of Thieves — but you have reservations about using them. I'm with you on the latter. Though we've hired that one with a detailed contract, a criminal who's wanted in many places is still a criminal." Vigoma silently listened.

"That leaves only the other two senior Superiors. The King of Beasts is the epitome of solo strength — an absolute powerhouse that needs no price or preparation. However, she's a tad too strong, which makes it likely that she will damage the ruins if she goes there. She has a track record of doing just that. By contrast, Logan needs to pay a price, but he can prepare an army instantly and adjust it easily. If you just give him a sacrifice, he will surely agree. And that's what makes Logan the optimal Superior to hire in this situation. That's my assumption, anyway."

"...Goodness."

Looking lifeless the whole time, Gifted had fluently spoken pretty much everything Nobrome was thinking in regards to this.

Though the man was a field marshal at his young age for reasons other than his eye for strategy, there was no denying that he was an excellent army man, as proven by his conjecture.

"Heh heh," the Prime Minister chuckled. "If you know that much, then I don't think I have to tell you anything more."

"Then I will immediately arrange a meeting with Logan."

"Excellent. Thank you very much, Field Marshal."

Nobrome extended his hand for a handshake, and Gifted responded, his eyes lifeless still.

"I must say, you evidently have the skill to do it yourself, so why do you leave the army management to your subordinates?" Nobrome asked.

"I still don't understand why I'm the field marshal. I'm just a soldier. I'm not fit to lead people."

"Ho ho ho!" Nobrome laughed heartily. "I sometimes question why I am the prime minister, as well. After all, we were simply the most influential of the few military and civil officials who sided with the one who became the imperator."

Upon hearing those words, Gifted showed emotion for the first time — it came out as a heavy sigh.

"Too many people died during the imperator selection and the chaos that followed."

"Indeed. But I am truly glad that you, I, and your subordinates remained."

"As am I."

People liked to say that the imperium was split into three forces: Prime Minister Vigoma's, Field Marshal Barbaros's, and the current imperator's. That wasn't false in any way.

Even though the imperator, the highest authority, occasionally participated in politics from the shadows, he spent most of his time messing with machines, training, and other affections. And those left in charge, Vigoma and Barbaros, had different ideas about what was best for the imperium.

That didn't mean they were antagonistic to each other. Though they had different approaches, they shared two common goals: to bring about the best result for the imperium, and to fulfill the will of the imperator. Thus, they had no reservations about cooperating whenever it was best to do so, as in the current matter.

They were no monolith, but they were facing in the same direction.

"Prime Minister," Gifted spoke up. "May I ask something?"

"Yes?"

"You said that the ruins are in the Quartierlatin County?"

"...Yes."

"I see. Then I shall send a special soldier."

"A special soldier? But they are... wait! Do you mean...?"

“There’s no better person for the job. Wouldn’t you agree?”

And so, their flexibility and coordination birthed a nightmare scenario for the kingdom — the dispatching of a Superior and another powerful force.

◇◆◇

Thus, the kingdom’s and the imperium’s intentions intertwined, setting the stage for a new incident surrounding the ruins at the Quartierlatin County.

However, there was another faction making a move, too. It was a group that no one, tian or Master, could anticipate or understand.

◇◆◇

———

“Pre-ancient civilization ruins were discovered in the kingdom, point A05.”

“Reallyyy?”

“A change in the crust exposed it to the surface. Tians and Masters went on to find it.”

“Well, the Earth recently started lots of earthquakes therrre. But it didn’t appear on the ruin search, did iiit?”

“Apparently, this one is a facility from the later period. It used highly advanced anti-discovery technology. It’s somewhat like the Red King’s gaol.”

“Then I guess we should worry about what’s insiiide.”

“There won’t be a problem if it’s your average ruin, but there’s no guarantee that it doesn’t hold weaponry that exceeds Prism Dragons or the throne. If either the kingdom or the imperium uses something like that in their war, the already-shaky balance might completely collapse.”

“It’d be much easier if the Masters were the only ones breaking balaaance... I should say that to Jabberwock, too. Anyway... All right, I’ll go investigaaate. Such chores are part of my job, after aaall.”

“We’ll leave it to you.”

“Oh, and I’ll ask for permission to use the original, just in case.”

“I’ll ask, too.”
“Please dooo.”
“Be careful.”
“Sure. All right, I’m offff.”

Chapter One: Change of Clothing — Dark Edition

Paladin, Ray Starling

"Hmm..." Sitting on the coachman's seat of the carriage, I made an audibly perplexed groan.

The reason for it was the transparent mantle that became black when worn, "Black Warcoat, Monochrome."

It was the day after the deathly struggle against the Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome, and we were heading back to the capital in B3's carriage, drawn by my Silver.

On the way, I considered testing the Black Warcoat, just like I'd done with the Miasmaflame Bracers and the Grudge-Soaked Greaves. After all, special rewards were often, well, "special" in how they functioned, so using them without the proper testing was somewhat scary.

They weren't like Nemesis, whose new skills somehow always provided the desired results shortly after we got them.

Anyway, the reason for my groaning were the specs of my new special reward:

Black Warcoat, Monochrome
Ancient Legendary Item
An ancient legendary item embodying the concepts surrounding the false star that consumed light, shrouded itself in darkness, and devastated its targets with searing light.
It has the power to consume light that touches it, gather it within, then fire it.
This item cannot be transferred or traded.&#10;No level limit.
Equipment bonuses: None.
Equipment skills:
Light Absorption

Yes — the Black Warcoat didn't give any stat bonuses. I'd been told that the higher tier special rewards were generally greater in that regard, so I felt a bit disappointed about that. (I'd also found out that the +100% to STR on Gardranda was actually a jackpot of a bonus.)

Anyway, I didn't know if it was to make up for it, but the Light Absorption skill it had was completely passive — as in, constantly active.

Its effect was "Absorbs 100% of the light damage it takes." That sounded pretty strong. After all, though limited to a single element, it negated all damage.

However, according to B3, "For example, if you were attacked by a sword or anything else covered in light, it would prevent the light damage, yes, but you would still get the damage from the sword itself," which basically meant that Figaro's Fang of Gloria would still make short work of me.

I then asked her how it would work against enemies who used light itself, such as yesterday's Monochrome, and she said, "The coat would prevent that, yes, but until light attacks hit, they often carry heat, so, when dealing with beams like the ones from yesterday, you would negate their light damage, but still end up being burned by the heated air they bring. The coat would need to have something like 'Heat Absorption' as well, to prevent that."

And in case it wasn't obvious, Light Absorption did nothing against fires such as the ones from Purgatorial Flames.

Having heard her explanations, I now realized that enemies who attacked using light were extremely rare to begin with. The only ones I'd ever fought were the RSK and Monochrome.

That was the reason for my groaning — it seemed like a really difficult skill to use. And as for the other, Shining Despair... well, I could only hope that time would make it clear.

"I must say," Nemesis commented, "a coat of darkness that absorbs light is far from 'Paladin-like.' I would even argue that it's quite the opposite."

"Wow, rude," I replied. "I'm a proper Paladin... even if I don't have Grand Cross yet."

Killing Monochrome made me reach the job's max level, though, I thought. Liliana's Paladin level is lower than mine, and she has it... am I missing something?

I raised the question to B3.

"Grand Cross?" She raised an eyebrow. "You can only increase the chance of getting it by helping people through Paladin quests."

I see, so I need to help... eh?

"This isn't bragging or anything, but I'm quite sure I've done a lot of quests where I helped people," I said.

"You always run head-first into the most troublesome matters, after all," Nemesis commented.

Well... you're not wrong.

"I'm aware," B3 said. "I'm saying that the only people who count are the ones you help in Paladin job quests."

"...Paladin job quests?"

"Yes. Grand Cross has a 'number of people helped in Paladin job quests' times 0.5% chance to be acquired when leveling up."

I began, "Is that on the...?"

"No, you won't find it on the wiki. It's a conjecture The Lunar Society made, based on their data."

"Ohh..."

Then that was most likely true. Though I didn't trust them as an organization one bit, I did trust them to have more reliable info than the wiki.

Anyway... job quests, eh?

I'd almost forgotten that, in addition to random event quests and adventurers' guild quests, there were also quests exclusive to certain jobs, managed by the relevant guilds.

While we were still at the capital, Rook had leveled himself through Pimp job quests, and ended up getting Marilyn.

I, on the other hand, had become a Paladin after skipping the relevant low-rank jobs, so I'd figured I didn't have the power most would expect from your usual Paladin, and thus avoided the job quests... only to end up here, with the job maxed-out without me having taken any of them.

"But I can't get any more levels," I said.

"No need to worry," said B3. "You can still learn it as long as you keep Paladin as a sub-job. You won't be barred from taking job quests, either."

“What a relief...”

Then I’ll be able to get Grand Cross without any problems. I guess I should thank B3, the Paladins, and even the eldritch abomination for this.

Suddenly, a certain thought came to mind. “Hm?” The fact that The Lunar Society had data on this meant that a significant number of them were Paladins.

Switching to the job required you to fulfill three conditions: to defeat a boss monster (and be responsible for a decent part of the damage dealt), to donate to the church, and to get a recommendation from someone in the knight order. The first two wouldn’t be hard for The Lunar Society, considering they had their own churches, but how did their members get the recommendations?

Curious, I asked B3 about that.

“The Lunar Society gets recommendations for free,” she said.

“Why?!”

“It’s the result of a deal.”

According to her, it all went back to the previous war with Dryfe.

Needless to say, it had been a crushing defeat for Altar. The knight orders had returned completely devastated.

Many of them, including the venerable commander, had lost their lives. Survivors had been heavily wounded, with some of their lives at risk, others facing a future of living with heavy disabilities even if they made it. If that had happened, many of the knight orders would have simply collapsed.

That was when the aberration, as though waiting for this, had offered to help them. “If you promise to write recommendations for any Lunar Society members who want knight-related jobs, I’ll heal alllll of you.”

It was a deal the knights simply couldn’t have refused. Desperate times called for desperate measures.

Thus, the first princess and the knight representative, Liliana, had accepted the deal.

Ever since then, the knights, having had their lives saved by the aberration, had had no choice but to write recommendations for any Lunar Society members who wanted them.

That’s probably a small price to pay to keep their lives, but man, Miss Eldritch sure likes employing dirty methods, I thought. Well, she’s still saving lives, though, so it’s definitely more good than bad.

"Back to the jobs," B3 spoke up again. "What job are you planning to take next?"

"I still haven't decided, actually."

If I took Priest, like Liliana, I'd improve the power of my healing magic. If I wanted to get skills that were useful in the general sense, I'd take jobs from the thief or adventurer groupings.

Simply picking Knight to learn the relevant sword skills was pretty sound, too.

Regardless, it would be my second job, so it was time I started taking my build into consideration.

"Oh, then use this," B3 said as she reached into her inventory and took something out with a curious flourish. "The Suitable Job Diagnostics Catalog."

I'd seen that type of presentation before. It reminded me of Shu taking the same item out.

Is there some sort of rule that makes it necessary to mimic Doraemon whenever taking these Catalogs out?

"Well, that's definitely a useful thing whenever you're not sure what job to take next," I said. "I'll gladly use it."

"Do go ahead."

I still had the Catalog I'd borrowed from Shu, but since she'd taken hers out, I might as well use hers. Just like the first time, I began answering the questions and diagnosing myself. I was done in about ten minutes, and the job I got suggested was... the low-rank job called "Prism Rider."

It was definitely a job I hadn't considered.

Also...

"Did this page even exist before?"

I could've sworn it hadn't been there when I'd been casually checking the Catalog about two weeks ago.

"I don't know it, either," admitted B3.

"Not even you know it?"

That meant it was a job alien even to her... a person with access to The Lunar Society's database, significantly more knowledgeable than the average player.

Anyway, I figured I might as well look at the conditions to see what kind of job it was like.

This was what it said:

Conditions:
Possession of a Prism Beast (any kind)
Horse Riding or Riding skill level 5 or above

Just like you'd expect from a "Rider" job, it involved, well, Riding. And then there was the other condition, which implied that it was related to Prism Steeds, like Silver. Though it said Prism "Beasts," so there were probably more than steeds.

"For a low-rank job, the skill condition is quite harsh," I said.

"It's not unheard of for low-rank jobs to be difficult to acquire," B3 explained. "Such jobs are quite rare, though. The stats they give aren't that much different from other low-rank jobs, but they often give unique skills."

I see. It's the first time I've ever heard of such jobs.

"Whatever the case, neither of us know enough about it," said B3. "Let's log out and check the wiki... no, we're close to the capital, so let's see if the DIN knows anything."

"All right."

And so, we soon arrived at Altea and made our way to the city's DIN office.

They actually had information about the Prism Rider job.

Or, rather, they'd just gotten it.

Apparently, the job had been discovered only two days ago, Dendro time — right as I'd been making my way to Torne.

According to the DIN, ruins of the pre-ancient civilization had been discovered to the north of the capital, in an area called the "Quartierlatin County."

When touched by a Master exploring the ruins, a giant crystal there had displayed the conditions to switch to the Prism Rider job.

The discoverer hadn't owned a Prism Beast, but one of the other Masters exploring the ruins had, and he'd been able to become a Prism Rider.

What the job actually did was yet to be verified, but apparently, it had skills that improved the Prism Beasts you were riding.

"So they discovered a lost job," said B3.

The term "lost job" was used for jobs that not a single person had at this point in time, and the conditions for which were lost. Regardless of whether they were low or high-rank, lost jobs didn't appear on the Catalog.

The concept of version updates didn't exist in Infinite Dendrogram — the whole world was already complete as it was. There were probably still many jobs, Superior or otherwise, that had yet to be discovered.

"Just as you would expect from the conditions, it appears that Prism Rider really is a job focused on Prism Beasts," B3 said. "And it seems that both originals and replicas work for it."

"Originals and replicas?" I raised an eyebrow.

"Let's take this outside."

For some reason, she cautiously looked around the DIN office we were in, and then led me out.

She took me to a relatively empty café, where we both ordered something, and she continued.

"Prism Beasts come in two forms: originals and replicas, focused on easy mass production. Replicas are much like the imperium's Magingears, in that they use MP to move, but your Silver doesn't... which means that he's an original."

"Seems like it."

He did consume lots of MP for powerful Wind Hoof barriers, but I couldn't recall him ever taking any of it when simply moving. Also, his description mentioned something about some artisan.

"As far as Prism Beasts go, the Prism Steed series is particularly well-known, as some of them have already been discovered," she said. "There's the kingdom's now-lost national treasure, the lightning-based Gold Thunder. Then there's the earth-based Obsidian Earth-Edge that the Over Gladiator uses for mounted battles. And there's the fire-based Ruby Ignition that's owned by a Superior from Huang He."

Oh yeah, I almost forgot that Figaro has a Prism Steed, too, I thought. He says he only uses his for the race battles in the eighth arena because it's faster for him to just run, though. Apparently, he'd acquired it deep in the Tomb Labyrinth.

"However, it's still unknown where the ones based on other elements are," B3 said. "And it's highly likely that your Silver is the wind-based Prism Steed."

The X rarity and the power of his Wind Hoof made it clear that he was no ordinary item, and what she was saying confirmed it.

But wait, his official name is "Zephyrus Silver," right? The way the others are named would have you guess it's "Silver Zephyus," but it isn't. Why? Is there a reason?

"So he's really valuable, huh?" I asked.

"Oh, he is," said B3. "If I were still in Mad Castle and we weren't acquainted, I would have attacked you for him."

"He's that expensive?!"

"He's worth at least 500,000,000. You could probably get billions for him in Caldina's auctions."

Silver... I had no idea you were such a treasure, I thought. I'll polish you real good, all right? "Man, am I thankful that no one's stolen him from me."

"While in Gideon, you had the likes of Brother Bear and Marie with you," Nemesis commented. "I would like to believe no one is idiotic enough to steal from you in that environment."

True.

Sol Crisis hadn't exactly been wrong about me being a difficult target while in Gideon.

Wait, doesn't that mean that I'm in danger now that I'm away from there? I'm kinda worried.

"Replicas are often silver, so it's also likely that they simply didn't realize that Silver is an original," said B3. "However, there's no guarantee that people won't, so why not buy an inventory that prevents Steal and similar skills? It will be expensive, but it will completely negate even the highest level Steal."

"Good idea. That'll be reassuri—"

"But Superior Jobs might still steal him with their ultimate job skills."

"Well, you don't normally run into them," I said.

Superiors focused on thievery (like King of Thieves or something) were probably few and far between. Like, in the low single digits in this entire world.

"I'm sure I won't run into them."

Her eyebrow arched. "You say that, but how many Superiors and Superior Jobs have you met already?"

You have a point.

Well, I would probably meet more Superiors sooner or later, so I could only hope that they wouldn't be in the thief or burglar groupings.

Speaking of which, the only one of the four people in charge of the capital blockade incident that I'd yet to meet was the Superior Job of the burglar grouping, King of Burglary, Eldridge.

I'd heard that he was a really crafty PKer who controlled the flow of battle by stealing both his enemies' equipment and even their body parts.

There was little doubt that he would be a formidable foe. I could only hope that I wouldn't meet him.

"But... 500,000,000 minimum is really big, isn't it?" I asked.

"It really is, but most of that value is not because of the Prism Steed's abilities, but because they're antique, and often thought to be works of art," she said. "Think about it: it's an OOPArt from 2,000 years ago that's in a perfect state. There's no way it wouldn't be expensive."

"2,000 years... so that's how old the pre-ancient civilization is."

"Yes. The ancient civilization ended around that time, too."

"Hm?" The "ancient" and the "pre-ancient" both ended 2,000 years ago? "Shouldn't the pre-ancient civilization have ended before the ancient one?"

"I've only read a little bit on this in the data gathered by The Lunar Society, so I'm not all that knowledgeable, but that seems to be the conclusion historians have come to."

Two civilizations, both of which had died 2,000 years ago...

Silver was a relic from the pre-ancient civilization, so this definitely piqued my curiosity. I wanted to look into this.

"Anyhow, you're picking Prism Rider as your next job, yes?" she asked.

"Yes," I nodded. "Might as well. And if I go right now, I should be able to switch during this weekend."

Right now, in real life, it was Saturday afternoon. We left for Torne on Friday night, and I'd spent two days here since then, but I still had more than half of the weekend left. I had about four days I could use here.

I'd heard that the distance between Altea and the town at Quartierlatin was about the same as the one between Altea and Torne, so I ought to be able to go there, switch jobs, and even go exploring for a bit.

"If you want to switch, you will have to enter the ruins themselves," B3 said. "Since it was just discovered, many experts must have gathered there.

Some of them might even have an answer to your question."

"I see..."

Great! So I might get an archeology lesson. I'd been into history since I was a boy, so I was kinda excited.

"This should be exhilarating," said Nemesis, who sounded genuinely curious.

"Yeah," I nodded, sharing her sentiment.

All right, my next course of action was decided. My goal was to switch jobs and investigate the history of the two civilizations!

My destination was the ancient ruins in the Quartierlatin County.

Let the quest... begin!

◇

However, right as we were about to take off for Quartierlatin, something happened.

"Ah, sorry," said B3. "Someone's calling me. I'll log out for a moment."

And she did just that.

Someone seemed to have called her on her phone.

When you set up a link between your Infinite Dendrogram hardware and mobile, you could set it to inform you of calls, messages, and social network alerts, the same way it informed you whenever you needed to sleep or go to the bathroom. I'd set up a link, myself. It ignored messages, but it always informed me of any calls.

Usually the only people who called me were my parents and Shu, so it was always best to answer right away.

"Ray," Nemesis spoke up. "Since you're heading for another place instead of returning to Gideon, you might want to contact Brother Bear about that."

"You have a point," I said. "An update certainly won't do any harm."

I'd already told him that I was going to spend the weekend questing with B3, but I had no idea how long I would be switching jobs and investigating the ruins. For all I knew, I might only be able to return to Gideon next weekend or something.

He could be planning something under the assumption that I would be back soon, so it was best to inform him of this.

Just in case B3 returned before I was done, I left a note saying, “I’m also logging out to make a call. — Ray Starling,” and went offline.

I called Shu and told him all I needed to, but I didn’t really understand what he was saying.

He kept complaining, telling me something about how he’d been arrested, that he’d destroyed some buildings but was still innocent, and that it was all Gerbera’s fault or whatever, but I wasn’t listening properly.

Who the hell is Gerbera, anyway?

It felt like he wouldn’t shut up, so I just hung up and logged in again.

I looked around. “So B3’s not back yet, huh?”

“Mm-hm,” Nemesis nodded. “It must be a long call.”

We continued to wait for another five minutes or so. Then B3 logged in again, looking somewhat apologetic.

“Sorry for the wait,” she said. “I... My family told me to come to them.”

B3’s family are practitioners of the Way of Tea, right?

“I can picture it with B3,” Nemesis said telepathically. “But trying to imagine Barbaroy performing a tea ceremony brings up some amusing results.”

“Nhh!”

Damn it, you almost made me spit my drink!

“B-By the way,” I stammered, doing my best to keep myself from laughing, “where is your family home, anyway?”

“Kyoto.”

A refined place, indeed. It was also in Kansai, which would explain why Miss Aberration, who’d studied there when she was a child, now talked in this weird mix of Kyoto and Kansai dialects.

B3 explained, “My parents planned to invite a very special guest and start a Fujibayashi-style tea ceremony, but everyone there became ill.”

“Oh, uh, that sounds pretty bad.”

“It is. And since we can’t have a tea ceremony without a Fujibayashi there, I’m the one who needs to do it. I have to be home by the evening.”

In a maglev, the journey from Tokyo to Kyoto took only a bit over an hour, but there were preparations and the like, too. And that meant that...

“Sorry,” she said. “I won’t be able to join you at the ruins.”

“Hey, there’s no helping that,” I replied. “Family and real life are important.”

In fact, I doubted I could've survived the K&R attack and the Monochrome incident without her, so I had no idea why she was apologizing to me.

"I'm grateful you say that, but... will you be all right?" she asked.

"Don't worry. I've got my left arm back, so I'm sure I can handle the monsters on the road to Quartierlatin."

From what I've been told of the current monster distribution, the ones in that area were at about the same level as the monsters in newbie hunting grounds, or just a bit higher. Apparently, monsters escaping the burning of Noz Forest had gone northwards, making the entire distribution shift a bit in that direction.

I was capable of using Purgatorial Flames again, so I shouldn't have any problems there. And if things looked really bad, I could just hop on Silver and ride in the sky.

"That's not what I meant," said B3. "You might be attacked by PKers like Sol Crisis again. Not to mention that someone might try to take your Silver..."

I'd almost forgotten that the wilder Masters were way scarier than the wildest of monsters. "I'll buy an anti-Steal inventory before I go."

With that in mind, it was time to shop.

B3 still had some time until she had to leave, so she would accompany me for that.

"I suppose we're heading to the shop where you messed up and bought a Permit?" she asked.

Yeah, "messed up" is pretty apt. I didn't intend the result of that at all, I thought in chagrin. But that was my own fault for not investigating enough — I won't blame the shop.

Anyway, the shop had lots of rare and curious items, so it was likely it would have the inventory I was looking for.

I ran through my memories to try to remember where it was, and it didn't take me all that long to figure it out. So we headed there right away.

Standing outside the shop, I noticed a detail I hadn't paid attention to before, which was that the the sign at the front said, "Monster King's Antique Store, Central Continent Branch."

But there's only one continent, right? Or do they have shops in Granvaloa, too?

The name made me raise an eyebrow, but I quickly shrugged it off and went inside.

Just like last time, the place was completely devoid of customers, which I found strange, considering that it had some pretty good items.

The shopkeeper inside was the same hooded fellow from last time. I wasted no time in calling out to him.

"Excuse me, do you have any inventories that aren't affected by Steal?"

"Yes," he said. "We have quite a selection. Give me a moment to bring them from our stores." Then he went deeper into the shop.

Just so you know, there weren't any other employees around. The rarity of the items here made that seem extremely careless.

Well, I guess I'll wait while looking around, I thought.

B3 looked around at the shields. She'd gotten a number of hers broken by Rosa, so she was probably considering stocking up.

"I should buy some defense, too," I muttered.

Most of my defensive equipment, including the BR Armor, had been burned by Monochrome. I could fill the bracer, boot, and coat slots with my special rewards. However, I had no proper upper and lower body armor, so I was wearing some really weak clothing I'd gotten from the gacha.

"Lose that, and you would be a naked guy in a coat," Nemesis commented.

"Now that would just freak people out."

"Well, what you have been wearing up until now was quite freaky, too, to be honest."

"You need armor?" B3 joined our conversation. "Should I give you what I have?"

"Eh? Your armor?"

The first thing that came to mind was the Gunhammer Plate, Magnum Colossus — her Barbaroy mode armor — but special rewards like that one were bound to the MVP. Not to mention that she wouldn't hand it over even if she could. That meant that she intended to give me something else.

"You mean... lady armor?" I asked hesitantly.

Crossdressing is a big "no" for me, to be honest...

"Heh heh," she giggled before I could voice my thought. "Heh heh heh... sorry. And no, I don't mean my old armor or anything like that. I mean armor that's been left to me by my clan members."

"Clan members... ohh."

Her clan, the great Barbaroy Bad Burn's Mad Castle, had split up because of the results of their battle against Figaro, and also because many of them were simply too busy with real life. At the time, the members quitting had given their items over to the ones continuing.

"My job is Full Armor Giant, you know?" she said. "That's why most of the members, the girls and the guys, gave a lot of their armor to me... heh heh."

Again the giggle. She seemed to be remembering something funny, so I decided to just ask what it was.

She replied with, "Oh, one of the members accidentally handed me a speedo-shaped piece of armor, so everyone else ganked him and it became a real bloodbath... heh heh heh."

Is that really something you remember fondly and giggle about?

"Back to the matter at hand, that's the male armor I want to give you."

"A speedo?!"

"Not that. I mean something normal."

Man, what a relief... It felt like the conversation was going in that direction.

"I have my Gunhammer Plate, and whenever I wear something else, like right now, it's always female armor, so I've never really used the male armor they've given me. They're like gifts, so selling them wouldn't sit right with me, and that's why I'd like you to have a set. Thankfully, the one I'm thinking of is better than any armor here, and you only need a total level of 100, so you can use it right away."

I hesitated. "Are you sure I should have it?"

"Yes. Tools are meant to be used, so would this armor be better off in your hands." She reached into her inventory and took out a set of armor that would cover both the upper and lower body. It was a composite work, combining crimson beast leather and black metallic armoring.

"This is Volcanic Darkmetal Armor, otherwise known as just 'VDA.'"

That name almost made me say, "Wow, that sounds strong," but that felt too ten-year-old, so I just kept my mouth shut. Even so, there was no denying that it sounded and looked both strong and cool.

"It's magic armor made in Legendaria," B3 explained. "It has Fire Resistance and Dark Resistance, both level 4, meaning that it reduces fire and dark damage by a whole 25%. Even its leather bits are strong and really hard to burn. And, most importantly, the crafter used their crafting skills to keep the level limit low."

Whoa, that's really grea— hold on.

My Black Warcoat — an Ancient Legendary item — cut light damage by 100%. That meant that a combined resistance of 50% was also reasonably powerful.

"How much does it cost, by the way?" I asked.

"I feel like you won't accept it if I say the price, so I won't," she replied.

So it's really expensive.

"I really shouldn't—"

"It's pointless to leave it rotting in my inventory. Please take it."

"Then at least let me pay for—"

"I don't want money for something I was gifted."

She's pretty obstinate.

"You, Marie, and Rook weren't any better after you defeated Gardranda," Nemesis commented telepathically.

Oh, you mean the time when we were splitting the reward.

It'd happened only a bit over a month ago, but I already felt nostalgic about it.

Back to the matter at hand... how do I get us both to agr— ah.

"Let's do it like this," I said. "if I take this armor, I won't take any of the reparations from Rosa."

"That is... tolerable."

Doing it that way, she wouldn't be making money from this gift, and I wouldn't feel like I was getting too much.

And so, I accepted the VDA and quickly equipped it.

"You look good," said B3. "It really complements your bracers and coat."

"I feel the same way," I replied.

This is great. I've gotten something that both has good stats and matches the rest of my equipment!

I looked to my side and noticed Nemesis, staring at me in silence.

"What's wrong?" I asked.

"Oh, it's nothing," she replied. "As long as you are satisfied, then... Yes, don't mind me."

What's with her? I wondered.

With vacant eyes, she murmured, "I completely forgot that B3's equipment was in the same vein as his... Can't expect her to point it out..."

So she's thinking about my and B3's equipment...? Oh! Does she also want something else she could wear in her human form? I guess I should find something for her... but wait, this is an antique store. I should visit something with newer clothes for that...

◇◇◇

While Ray was pondering that, this was what went on in Nemesis' head:

I appreciate his sentiment, but the problem is with his clothing — not mine. That set... That armor... No matter how you look at it, it's the attire of a villain. Of course, I'm aware that it came from a clan of villain roleplayers, so that is only to be expected. Still, unlike how he looked with the pirate hook and the spiky armor, there's far more consistency here, making him appear even more sinister than before.

She heaved a heavy sigh before concluding:

I feel like his appearance makes him look far more evil than Sol Crisis.

This somewhat worried her... but she had no idea that her worries would soon come to fruition.

Chapter Two: “I Ran Into Someone Shady” x2

Paladin, Ray Starling

After B3 gave me the VDA, the shopkeeper brought out four kinds of anti-Steal inventories — bags, wallets, rings, and small side-pouches.

I opted for the last one, because it was easy to take stuff out of it and because it matched the rest of my equipment. It looked somewhat like a deck case worn by characters from card game anime, and it reminded me of the president of EGRS.

One thing about this inventory, though: in exchange for its resistance to Steal and other types of destruction, it had a limited number of item types it could carry.

Though it had about as much space as my other inventory, it could only carry ten types of items. Strange as that seemed, adding resistance to Steal came at the cost of storage variety.

Because of this, I would continue using my previous inventory for general storage, and use this new one for whatever was really precious, like Silver.

By the way, this inventory cost me 10,000,000 lir, which was... kinda expensive, but the fact that I was even able to afford it spoke volumes about how much my situation in Dendro had changed over the past month.

As for Nemesis’s clothing... we didn’t find anything that suited her perfectly, so we decided to leave it for another day.

With the shopping done, we saw B3 off as she logged out to prepare for her visit back home, and then we headed out to our destination.

I considered taking a monster-slaying Paladin job quest to make the most out of my trip, but for some reason, there were no job quests relating to the ruins in Quartierlatin County.

I had expected there to be something, considering that new ruins seemed like a big deal but, apparently, that was off the mark.

Giving up on the job quest, I just headed straight to the Quartierlatin County.

Surrounded by a pleasant heat, Nemesis and I rode Silver on the path to our destination. Though he wasn't running at full speed, he was at least twice as fast as he'd been when pulling the carriage. We'd probably be at the town of Quartierlatin by evening.

Silver was clever, so he automatically made his way to the destination and avoided all obstacles and passersby as long as I held his reins. He even knew when to slow down and speed up.

Looking at him again, he really was something special.

I'd never really put much thought into him before, but having heard B3's words made me somewhat curious about him.

The ruins we were heading to right now were a place where you could get a job related to Prism Beasts, so it was likely that we could find info on them there, too, and I was reasonably excited about that.

"Now, Ray," Nemesis spoke up. "Silver is moving automatically, so why not check how it's doing?"

"'It'?" I raised an eyebrow, not sure what she meant.

"Shining Despair's charge."

Oh, that.

"Right-o." I opened up the menu, went to my equipment details, and picked the Black Warcoat's equipment skill, Shining Despair...

Shining Despair: Releases the light accumulated through Light Absorption to melt all things with a scorching beam of despair.
Active Skill.
Charge: 3%

"It's only increased by 1% after a whole four hours." I heaved a sigh.

This skill was no doubt the devastating beam attack used by Monochrome. I knew its power better than anyone else. It'd shattered two of my Counter Absorptions, yet still delivered enough damage to almost kill me.

Being able to use it myself would be... pretty good, to say the least.

However, we had a problem in the "charge" part. It displayed how much of the necessary light the coat had absorbed so far. And despite me wearing it ever since I'd gotten it yesterday, it had only gathered 3% of the amount needed for Shining Despair.

"Basic math tells me that I'll need a whole month before I can fire it for the first time," I complained. Considering that I'd be logging out for college and so forth, that was probably quite off the mark, too.

I can't even try it out like this, I thought.

"If only you could fire it with small amounts of charge," Nemesis commented. "The fact that it can only be used at 100% makes it quite inflexible."

And it makes actually using it kinda scary, I added.

Though it would be significantly weaker than Monochrome's original beam, you couldn't know what to expect. The original had almost blasted away all of Torne. Though toned-down, the coat's version was bound to be something fearsome.

"What can we do about this, anyway?" Nemesis asked. "Merely letting it burn in the sun is far too inefficient."

Considering how the Light Absorption skill functioned, Shining Despair was probably based on the premise of gathering light from light-based attacks, rather than charging through exposure to the sun. However, opponents who used light-based attacks weren't exactly common.

"What about Figaro's Fang of Gloria: Overdrive?" Nemesis suggested. "That seems like it could charge it up in an instant. If you take only the beam, you wouldn't suffer the blade damage, so you would only need to do something about the residual heat, no?"

"I'd rather not..." I said.

That sounded like it was one slip-up away from suicide. Not to mention that Figaro was currently soloing the Tomb Labyrinth.

"Perhaps you're right... I wonder if it would work with strong light that is not necessarily of the light element?"

"Strong light, eh?" I muttered. "Ah!"

I actually did have something that fit the bill.

Not wasting any time, I used Purifying Silverlight on the Black Warcoat. Normally, equipment affected by this skill emitted a silver glow, but the coat stayed all black, probably due to Light Absorption.

In other words, Silverlight was being absorbed. It was of the holy element, rather than light, so I had my doubts about this working, but if basic sunlight counted, perhaps this result was only obvious.

With this, I could charge the coat with both sunlight and Silverlight, which ought to speed up the process a bit.

“It’s pretty smart, if I say so myself,” I muttered.

“Agreed,” Nemesis nodded.

High and proud, I continued riding Silver while using the skill.

An hour later...

“Man, am I tired...” As Silver’s movement shook me, I lazily hung my head.

“You look like you have summer heat fatigue,” commented Nemesis.

“It’s probably close,” I muttered.

I was wearing the Black Warcoat’s hood to both hide from the sunlight and absorb more of it, so I couldn’t fault Nemesis for thinking that I looked like the heat was doing me in.

“I am unsure if it’s because of Light Absorption, but the Black Warcoat’s hood makes your face really dark and hard to see,” she commented.

“Really?” I couldn’t tell by myself. The hood didn’t limit my vision or anything.

“Mm-hm,” Nemesis nodded. “It’s like the darkness is hiding the upper half of your face. You look somewhat like a ghost-like monster, and even though I know it’s you, it makes me a tad scared.”

“Just wearing a hood makes me look like an undead?” I raise an eyebrow.

“Oh no, I wouldn’t say it’s just the hood...”

“Is that so?”

Well, my appearance aside, what we had to consider now were my summer fatigue-like symptoms. They were caused by my continued use of Purifying Silver.

It had greatly increased the Black Warcoat’s charge speed, and it was now at 6%. However, doing this wasn’t good for my MP, and I’d already run out of all the MP I’d had at the start.

I still had the MP my Grudge-Soaked Greaves had accumulated during yesterday’s Monochrome incident, but I decided to keep it just in case I needed to use Wind Hoof.

Because of this, I had continued using Silverlight by restoring my MP with Potions, but after a while, it was making me feel a weariness much like summer heat fatigue.

Considering I was just riding Silver, this wasn't all that bad, but I couldn't say the same if I somehow got into a battle, so I decided to stop.

But how else can I charge it? I thought.

"Ah!" I lightly exclaimed. "Maybe I should buy lots of light element attack Gems and fire them at the coat?"

The idea sounded like it would eat a lot of my money, but if I was careful with how I used them, I wouldn't be harming myself.

I should've thought of that before leaving the capital, I thought. I guess I'll have to buy them in Quartierlatin before exploring the ruins... Hm?

"What is it?" I muttered as I felt that something was wrong.

Unlike B3, I didn't have any skills like Killing Intent Perception, but I still had my natural intuition.

I couldn't guarantee its reliability, but I couldn't help but feel like something disquieting was happening nearby.

"Nemesis," I said.

"Aye." Instantly understanding, she transformed into a greatsword and went into my right hand.

"Over there!" I shouted as I heard a faint sound coming from the dense broadleaf forest at the side of the open road.

The sound was followed by a scream that made me gasp.

Realizing that Silver couldn't go through the forest all that fast, I returned him to my inventory and started running on my own two feet.

Ten-odd seconds later, I found the sources of the sounds.

"Ah... aahh..." One was a girl, scared to the point of being unable to stand.

And the other was a mechanical humanoid approaching her. "Threat level — E. High-ly op-ti-mal. Se-cure tar-get."

It appeared to be a monster, as evidenced by the name above it — Teal Wolf.

"In what world is that a...?!"

I knew full well that Teal Wolves inhabited the north of the capital. But this thing before me was metallic, rather than furry; bipedal, rather than quadrupedal; and used some gun-like arm attachments as its weaponry, rather than claws and fangs.

It was nothing like the Teal Wolves I'd fought before.

In fact, this thing was more like a Magingear.

"De-ter-min-ing threat lev-el."

The mechanical Teal Wolf (?) noticed us and made its helmet-covered head turn to me.

The way it talked was blatantly robotic, but upon closer look, I noticed that it had animal fur sticking out through the spaces in the helmet and the mechanical parts.

Is the text actually right, then? Is that really a Teal Wolf? I thought.

"Threat le-vel — B+. Pri-or-i-ti-zing e-lim-i-na-tion o-ver re-triev-al."

My observation mattered little to the Teal Wolf (?). The gun-like attachment on its arm began spinning.

The sight gave me a sense of deja vu and made a chill go down my spine. I instantly jumped to the side.

A moment later, countless bullets pierced the space I had been in, turning the trees a distance away into swiss cheese.

"A Gatling gun," I muttered. "First time I've seen someone other than Shu use one."

Even Hugo's Magingear had used a single-shot gun.

Though this Teal Wolf's (?) Gatling gun wasn't nearly as menacing as Baldr, it still wasn't something you'd want to face.

"Pur-su-ing."

Making all its metallic pieces clang, the mechanical beast turned its weapons towards me.

I continued moving, effectively dodging all that came my way.

The bullets flew in a straight line, and they didn't have a particularly powerful impact. They didn't chase after me, have needlessly high penetrative force, blow up the surroundings, or become manga characters.

Compared to my mock battles against Shu or Marie, this was actually really tame.

"Hold on... is that the smell of gunpowder?" I asked.

I suddenly realized that the weaponry wasn't based on magic, but some sort of explosive chemical substance.

"Then I can use that!"

The monster had even moved away from the girl to focus on its attacks on me. The situation was perfect.

"Gardranda," I said as I raised the left arm I'd regained just yesterday and, for the first time in over a month, brandished the left Miasmaflame Bracer. "Purgatorial Flames."

It had always been my main weapon against monsters, and I didn't hesitate to use it on the Teal Wolf (?).

A moment later, the construct underwent a dramatic change.

The flames scorching it quickly ignited the chemicals inside its weapons, causing it to swell... and blow up.

"Fire safety's important, you know?" I grinned.

As I looked at the smoldering mechanical remains, I was relieved that my idea had worked. It had been entirely possible that the weapons were fireproof, just like Baldr. Then again, the fur sticking out had made that very unlikely.

"What was that, anyway?" I asked.

The exploded, blackened remains of the Teal Wolf (?) were spread out on the ground.

I walked up to take a better look at the machine's interior.

There was some open space inside, but there was nothing there — not even the owner of the fur that had been peeking out. During the explosion, I'd seen some light particles, so I could only assume that it was dead. However, the machinery, despite being all burned and broken, was still there.

It didn't look like it was about to drop something — it was now just scrap metal spread out on the ground.

I picked up a piece of the scrap and opened the menu for a description, but all I got was, "The remains of a mysterious machine."

Still, the fact that it got an item description and the fact that there was no name above its head meant that the remains didn't belong to a monster.

"What the hell is this?" I wondered out loud.

Machines and monsters made me think of Dryfe... particularly, Franklin. However, I had a feeling that he wasn't involved in this.

That lab coat asshole would've been way more nasty with his work. At the very least, he'd have made sure that burning it would've caused a far bigger explosion, or a release of some poison gas.

"Well, there's no point in thinking about it now." Albeit still curious, I put the remains in my inventory.

The fact that I can do this is conclusive proof that it's not a monster...

right?

“All right. Now...”

The girl who’d been attacked by the Teal Wolf (?) was now unconscious because of the shock from the explosion.

However, it didn’t look like she was hurt in any way, so it was safe to say that this little bit of trouble was over. Still, even though that weird Teal Wolf (?) was dealt with, I couldn’t really leave an unconscious girl here in the forest all alone.

I walked towards her to see if she was all right.

But then, as though to stop me, a blue flash ran before me.

“Nh?!”

It was a sword. It separated me from the girl... then changed its course, and went for my neck.

In haste, I raised the left Miasmaflame Bracer to block the blade. It was more of an act of instinct, rather than thought, but it worked.

Thankfully, the blade stopped after digging just a little into the bracer. If I hadn’t been so lucky, I could’ve lost my left hand... if not my head.

“Who’re you?” I asked, as I assessed the trajectory and threat level of the attack. It had clearly been meant to kill me instantly, which reminded me of Rosa. It shook me so much that my heart began to race.

Wondering what I’d done to deserve this attack, I turned, puzzled, and looked at the attacker... only to be taken completely aback.

The attacker looked that shocking.

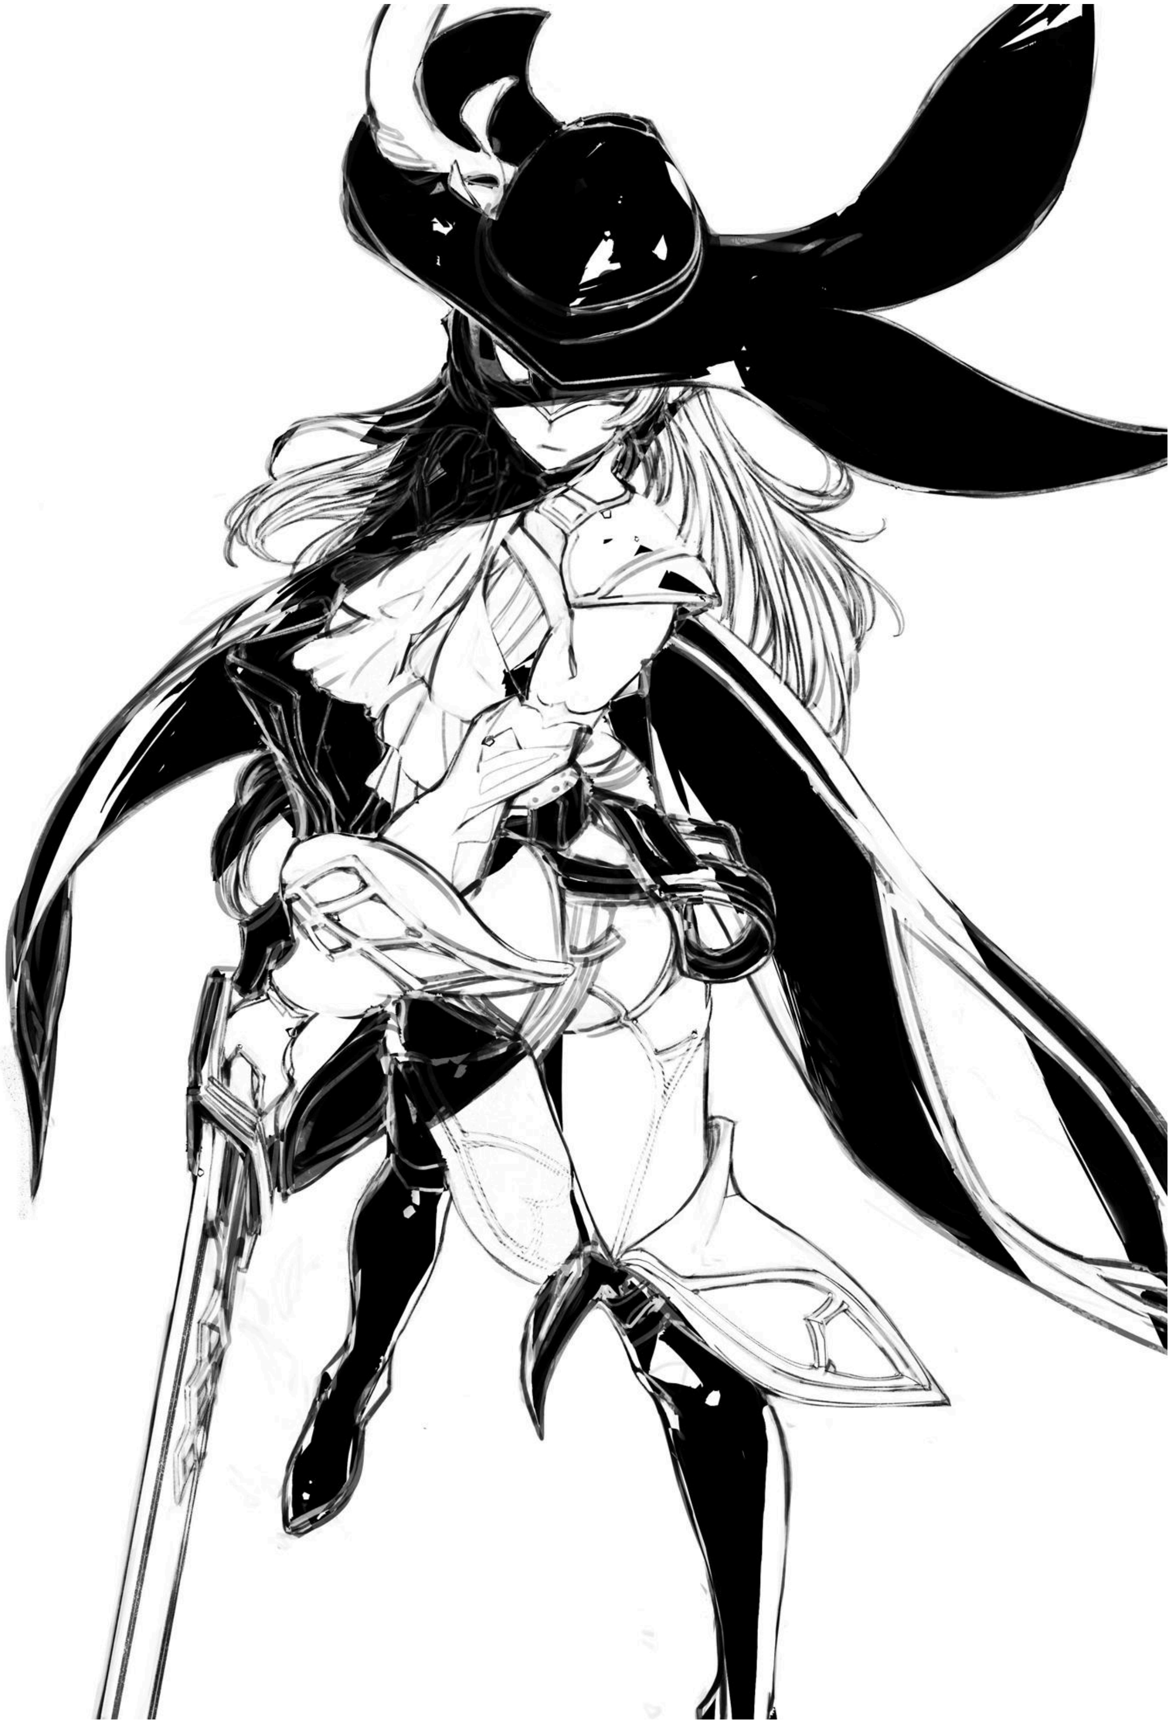
It was a swordswoman with long, azure hair and a mask on the upper half of her face. Her noble-looking clothes were partially reinforced with metal, and in her hands, there was a blue blade with a strangely pressurizing presence.



There was only one thing I could say about a person who looked like that.

“Shady!” She and I simultaneously spoke the same word.

Excuse me, but why?

“That sinister apparel...” she continued. “A perfect fit for a shady scoundrel rotten enough to assault a helpless girl in broad daylight.”

“Assau— ‘Scoundrel’?!” I exclaimed.

I’m not sure how to feel about a shady masked woman who attacks people out of the blue speaking such baseless slander about me.

“What do you mean, ‘a perfect fit’?” I sputtered. “Do I look like some villain to you?!”

“She is definitely misunderstanding your actions,” commented Nemesis. “But I can’t help but agree with her on the apparel.”

“Nemesis?!”

Why would you say that?! Do you have the Confusion debuff or something?!

“Funny you mention debuffs,” Nemesis said. “Not a day goes by when I do not wonder how many Elixirs it would take to fix your fashion sense.”

A damaged sense would’ve probably been a mental debuff, though. Elixirs didn’t work on those.

Wait, I mean, why are you even saying that? I asked Nemesis telepathically. It’s nothing like an animal suit, being shirtless, a junihitoe, a four-meter-tall jiangshi, or a damn lab coat.

“Don’t use Superiors as your standard! They’re all nuts!”

...You have a point.

“But Nemesis, all I’m wearing is demonic gauntlets, corpse boots, a light-consuming coat, and red and black composite armor. None of these are that bad, right?”

“ALL! OF! THEM! ARE! Spend just a second thinking about the meaning behind all of these things, you fool!”

“Hmm...”

When you put them all together... I guess it’s a bit villain-like.

“‘A bit’... You know what, that’s fine. It’s better than not seeing it at all.” Nemesis calmed down.

Anyway, back to the masked woman. She was still brandishing her sword in my direction, not moving a muscle. That, combined with her comments on my appearance, made it pretty clear that she was far more wary of me than she had to be.

But... to be fair...

"I don't think I want to hear anything about my apparel from someone wearing a mask that shady."

"I... umm... I must hide my face because I am on a secret mission from someone very important!" the swordswoman argued. "It is nothing like some scoundrel's heinous clothing!"

"Well, I only ended up looking like this because of what I was given or gifted," I shot back. "And come on... this isn't that bad, right?"

"I simply cannot trust a person who sees that as 'not that bad'!"

"What a dodgeball game of a conversation," Nemesis sighed. "Or perhaps it's just catch where both sides are only hitting the other? Why is this even happening? How did Ray end up talking about fashion with some masked woman he ran into in the middle of the forest?"

Hey, I'd like to know that, too, I thought. Anyway, I should get her to calm down, so—

"Anyhow," she cut my words short. "I cannot ignore a scoundrel who assaults girls. Forget the details — I shall incapacitate you and hand you to the authorities!"

"The details are important, damn it!"

And did she actually just say "incapacitate"?! Is she another meathead?!

"You seem to be running into more and more of them recently," commented Nemesis.

Yeah, like Rosa!

However, the masked swordswoman was, in a way, worse than her.

Her left hand was exposed, and there was no crest on it, meaning that she was a tian, rather than a Master, and she was only hostile to me because she genuinely thought I was a dangerous person and was trying to protect the girl from me.

Considering that it was all a misunderstanding, I really didn't want this to get violent.

Still, it didn't seem like she'd be willing to listen to me if I tried to explain.

All of this made her a real trouble to deal with.

“Hey, listen, I just—”

“Enough talk!”

“No, it isn’t! Come on!”

I made Nemesis switch into her shield form and protected myself from the masked woman’s blue blade.

“Whoa, the speed!”

She didn’t move at the speed of sound yet, so she was definitely slower than Figaro, Xunyu, or a number of other duel rankers. However, she was approaching their speeds in spite of the fact that she was a tian.

Additionally, she was clearly a skilled swordfighter, and her attacks were hard to defend against for reasons other than speed.

Shu’s skill as a fighter made his fists hard to avoid, and the same logic applied here. I wouldn’t have been able to defend against this if I hadn’t switched to the Black Shield.

“Gh... Hm?”

Though her swordsmanship was scary, something about it felt off. If I had to explain it, I’d say that I didn’t seem to be taking damage I was expecting to take.

Of course, I was using a shield, but there was a great difference between what my senses were telling me and the actual damage I sustained.

The thing my senses were telling me about was that blue blade. It had an absurdly dense air of intimidation around it. In all honesty, it was far more menacing than the masked woman herself.

In fact, the power I felt from it seemed to be on the same level as Figaro’s Gloria α... or perhaps even higher.

Despite that, I wasn’t taking nearly as much damage as that impression would’ve had you expect. It was a curious blade that didn’t seem to live up to its aura.

But even if her sword was weaker than expected, she handled it beautifully.

The most skilled tian fighter I’d met was Liliana, but this woman was clearly above her. Though she looked weird, she was definitely a first-rate fighter.

The relentless chain of attacks, similar to Liliana’s, was pretty hard to defend against, most likely due to stat differences.

“...Hm?” My own thoughts just now made me realize something.

The masked woman's swordsmanship was really similar to Liliana's. Similar enough to make me feel like their style was the same.

However, Liliana's sword-fighting technique wasn't the same that was popular among this country's knights. She herself had once told me that her technique had been invented by her father, the Celestial Knight, Langley Grandria. It was a unique mix of pirate sword-fighting techniques he'd brought from his birthplace of Granvaloa and the knight techniques popular here in Altar.

The only people who could use this technique were the late Langley himself and Liliana, who'd learned directly from him. Otherwise...

"Langley Grandria," I said.

The masked woman gasped.

"Did you learn swordfighting from Liliana's father?"

Indeed, that was the only other possibility.

"You know Lilia... Vice Commander Grandria?" she asked, as she made some distance between us. She was still brandishing her sword, but at least she was willing to listen now.

"I'm Ray Starling," I said. "I happen to be a Paladin, and Liliana's my friend."

"Ray... Starling?" she said, as she made a dubious face.

I proved my identity to her by removing my hood and showing myself.

Her gasp made it clear that she knew my face.

"You are the same one who appeared on the broadcast of the events in Gideon! The one with one arm!"

"Yeah." Thanks to Miss Aberration, I wasn't one-armed anymore, but it was clear that this woman knew me.

"Why is one of the main people behind the stemming of that incident assaulting a girl in a place like this?!"

"I'm telling you that I'm not!"

"Eh?" She made a surprised face.

"I beat a monster that was attacking her. She fainted, so I went to see if she was all right."

"Ehhh?!" the masked woman cried. She looked around at the trees damaged by my battle against the Teal Wolf (?), and then muttered, "Why didn't you say so?"

"I tried, but you just said, 'Enough talk!' and jumped at me!"

"You could have said that instead of making comments about my mask!"

She has a point. I guess we're both at fault here.

"Hold on! But you attacked me before we even talked!" I cried.

"I thought it was an emergency! My teacher told me that, in emergencies, victory goes to those who make the first move!"

Well, I couldn't guarantee that I wouldn't have gone with a preemptive strike in her situation, either, but...

"Hey, I'd understand taking that approach with a monster, but don't go for a guy's neck just because he looks a bit bad," I said.

"Do you have a mirror?!" she exclaimed. "I'll show you what you're calling 'a bit bad'!"

"Oh, yes, we actually have one in our inventory." Nemesis, turning back to her human form, started to dig through our stuff.

Nemesis dearest, why, might I ask, do you insist on taking her side on this?

"I am happy to have finally found a person who shares my sentiment about your fashion. Everyone else ignores it, after all."

"Is my gear that bad?"

"Why do you think I am looking for a mirror?"

As we had such an exchange, the masked woman looked at Nemesis in surprise.

"An Embryo who can become human..." she said. "So you're a Maiden, just like that parasite's... I mean... High Priestess's Embryo."

Wow, "parasite" is pretty harsh, I thought. Well, Miss Aberration is pretty infamous.

"Mm-hm," Nemesis nodded. "I am Nemesis. Ray's Embryo. Here. Mirror."

"Thank you," replied the masked woman. "My name is... Azurite. I am a Swordmaster."

Swordmaster was a swordsman grouping high-rank job with very difficult conditions.

Anyway... "Azurite," huh? That name sure suited her azure hair.

"That aside, I'll say it again," Azurite continued. "Your equipment is both black and has a sinister design. Even the Fallen Knight pales in comparison."

"Hey, Juliet's armor has a different direction," I say. "Hers is gothic, while I look like... a bit of a bad boy?”

“You look like at least the final member of an evil ‘big four,’” said Nemesis.

“You remind me of Lord Ira from a play I saw once,” Azurite agreed. “Except worse.”

Do I really look that bad?! I’m genuinely concerned now.

“As you should be,” said Nemesis. “Let’s forget about fashion for now, though. While you two were having this meaningless dispute, the girl seems to have woken up.”

Azurite and I looked at the girl and, sure enough, she was slowly getting up.

The girl introduced herself as “Shirley.” Her parents owned an inn in Quartierlatin, and she’d come here to this small forest to forage for edible mushrooms and wild plants.

She was using a monster-repelling item that kept the low-level monsters here at bay. However, it hadn’t had an effect on the machine-wearing monster, and we’d come right on time to save her from it.

She also remembered that I’d come to help her, and that completely cleared up Azurite’s misunderstanding.

All’s well that ends well, I guess.

Anyway, there was no guarantee that another machine-wearing monster wouldn’t show up, so we decided to escort her back to Quartierlatin. We were going there to begin with, so that certainly didn’t inconvenience us. And apparently, Azurite was heading there, as well.

“Nemesis and I are going to the ruins they found there,” I said. “What about you?”

“I’m going there to investigate the ruins, too.”

So we had the same destination, huh?

Well, these were the first ruins ever found here in the kingdom, so they were bound to attract many various people.

“Really?!” exclaimed Shirley. “Then please come stay at our inn! You saved me, so I will ask them to make it cheap!”

She tightly clenched her fists in front of her chest. It was some impressive enthusiasm.

“But I—” Azurite spoke up. She probably wanted to say something about the fact that she hadn’t fought the monster, but Shirley just cut her off.

“I’ll tell Mom and Dad everything that happened, then ask Lefty to prepare a chicken... Ah, the customers really liked the quiche I made recently, so maybe I should...” The girl just didn’t give Azurite a chance to say anything.

“Hey, you were just trying to help her, too, right?” I said to Azurite. “Don’t sweat it.”

Sure, she’d been trying to protect the girl from me, but that wasn’t a big deal. Really.

“Ah...” Azurite opened her mouth to say something, but decided against it.

According to Shirley, Quartierlatin was less than an hour’s walk away.

That was why I chose not to get on Silver and just walk there alongside these three.

Thirty minutes passed. As I talked with Shirley, who was still as energetic as she’d been at the start, something began bothering me.

Azurite was silently walking behind me, and I could feel her gaze on me.

I had no skills that would make this possible, but that was just how intense her stare was.

Why is she looking at me like that? Does she still suspect me?

“Hm?” I exclaimed as something held me back. I turned around to see Azurite, grabbing the edge of my Black Warcoat.

“...” She still didn’t say a word. She was hanging her head, so I couldn’t see her expression.

As I was about to ask what was wrong, she finally opened her mouth.

“Sorry... for attacking you back then...”

“Ohhh.”

So she’d just been looking for the right time to apologize for her sudden attack. Well, all that tit-for-tat we’d gone through had made her miss her opportunity. Still, I had no reason not to accept her apology. It seemed a bit awkward, like she wasn’t used to saying sorry, but I could tell she was trying.

“It’s fine,” I said. “We’re both okay, and you were just trying to help her, too.”

“But...”

“Again, it’s fine. But keep in mind not to judge people based on appearance. I might look like a bit of a bad boy, but there are people in the world who look downright heinous, and are actually pretty nice.”

My words make her giggle for some reason before saying, “All right... Th-Thank you.”

All tense, she gave me gratitude, and I felt like she was even less used to that than apologizing.

Chapter Three: It’s Not Against the Rules

Paladin, Ray Starling

Just as Shirley had said, the walk to Quartierlatin took only a little under an hour.

The town was paved with stone, and all in all, it looked significantly more well-maintained than the usual village here in the kingdom. There were trees and flower gardens everywhere, making it feel like a place where humanity and nature thrived in harmony.

Needless to say, it was quite unlike Altea, Gideon, and Torne.

The beautiful townscape made me stop in place and look around.

“This is one flowery town,” I muttered.

“Indeed,” nodded Azurite. “This was done by the will of Countess Quartierlatin. The lady has a taste for gardening. Her mansion’s gardens are particularly splendid. She oftentimes invites orphans and travelers to have tea parties with her.”

“Well, someone’s knowledgeable,” I said.

“The one I serve is close to the lady.”

Uh huh. I guess she works for some noble, then, I thought.

“A-Anyhow, let us hurry!” she urged me. “The Sun will set if you let the flowers divert you like this.”

“Right-o,” I said as I resumed walking, still observing the sights.

Shirley’s parents’ inn was in the outskirts of the town.

It seemed a bit inconvenient for shopping and the like, but from what she’d told us on the way, it was close to the ruins we were after, so that was good.

Suddenly, I noticed white smoke coming from further in the inn. Then I felt a certain scent tickle my nose. It was familiar, and it reminded me of a family trip I’d gone on...

“Why build outside the town?” asked Azurite. “It seemed to me like there was quite a bit of open space in the center.”

Shirley pointed at the nearby mountains before answering, “This place is close to the mountains, right? Well, that’s probably why my prospector grandpa accidentally dug up a hot spring here!”

“Oh? That sounds nice,” I commented. I haven’t gone to a real-life hot spring for a while now.

By the way, although she’d said that his role was “prospector,” it turned out Shirley’s grandpa’s actual job was “Adventurer.”

She explained, “He was crazy about Tenchi to begin with, and finding the hot spring lit a fire in him. That’s why he went ahead and built a hot spring inn!”

“I see,” I said.

So the smoke was actually steam from the open-air baths, and the scent was from the hot springs. I couldn’t smell much sulfur, though. This spring wasn’t particularly odorous.

“I’m baaack!” said Shirley, as she opened the door.

A moment later, a woman — presumably her mother — ran up to us. She looked exactly like you’d expect a hot spring inn hostess to look.

“My,” she spoke up. “Why are you so late? You had us all worried.”

“I ran into trouble, and these people here saved me!” was how Shirley prefaced her talk. Then she told her mother what had happened.

“Oh my,” the mother gasped. “Thank you so much for saving my daughter...”

“Anyway,” Shirley continued. “I’d like you to let them stay here for cheap!”

“Forget ‘cheap’ — they don’t have to pay us a single lir. But... oh dear, this is troubling,” Shirley’s mother said as she placed her hand on her cheek and made a... well... troubled face. “Because of the ruins, we’re currently full of customers, so the only place where we have space is the annex.”

“Ehhh? But that place is a bit...” Shirley made a troubled face, too.

“What’s the annex?” I asked.

“It’s a Tenchi-style building Grandpa built just because he wanted to,” Shirley explained. “It’s so different from Western buildings that our customers find it hard to stay there...”

“Guests don’t even have beds,” added her mother. “They have to spread the bedding directly on the floor.”

Shirley added, “Putting some beds there would make it way easier... but Grandpa’s will said that we’re supposed to leave it as it is...”

Hearing them talk made me get the gist of it. Basically... the annex was a Japanese-style building. Tenchi was much like Sengoku Era Japan, after all, so that was completely certain.

That’s no problem for me, then, I thought.

“I don’t mind using the annex,” I said. “I’m (probably) used to Tenchi-style buildings.”

“Really?” Shirley’s mother asked, and I nodded in response.

“I am fine with it, as well,” said Azurite. “I have yet to experience staying at a Tenchi-style building, and it certainly won’t hurt to try.”

Thus, it was decided that we’d stay at the annex.

A short while later, I was standing in front of it, and it was... somewhat different than I’d imagined.

“Tenchi-style,” I muttered in perplexity. “Tenchi-style, eh...?”

While choosing my country during character creation, Tenchi had looked much like Japan during the Azuchi-Momoyama period.

However, the building right before my eyes was quite unlike that.

What’s the best way to describe this...? I thought.

“Going by your memory, it looks like a depiction of an old Japan you would see in foreign movies,” said Nemesis.

There. That’s perfect.

It got some things right, but it also made some really blatant mistakes. The coloring, for instance, was completely off, and all in all, it wasn’t a building I’d expected when I’d heard “Tenchi-style.”

I couldn’t help but wonder whether this was actually how Tenchi-style buildings had been in her grandpa’s time, or whether the one who’d built it had the wrong image of the country.

Guess that’s something I’ll have to confirm when I actually go there someday.

“So this is a Tenchi-style building,” said Azurite, as she looked at a shisa-like komainu. Her eyes were gleaming with curiosity. “What an exotic decoration.”

I’m really not sure if that thing’s really Tenchi-style, either...

We entered the building, and Shirley led us to our rooms.

As I considered the fact that sliding screens couldn’t be locked, I discovered that the rooms here were actually using doors.

That's wrong! Wait... I guess this is right for a hot spring inn.

"Here is your key!" said Shirley. "You can have dinner at the main building between six and eight o'clock!"

"We'll keep that in mind."

"The annex has an open-air bath, so please use that! We're really proud of our hot springs!"

"Ooh, that's good to hear," I said. I was the only guy here in the annex, so I'd be able to have a really relaxed bath.

"Do you have any other questions?!" asked Shirley excitedly.

"Only one," said Azurite, as she raised her hand a bit.

"Ask away!"

"Does this annex have any... home warashis?"

"It doesn't!"

"I see..." Azurite muttered, seemingly disappointed.

"What's a home warashi?" I asked.

"It's a creature they speak of in Tenchi. They are 'yokai' said to look like young children. They live and play in human households like an odd sort of neighbor, and I hear that having them around is a blessing."

"But we're in Altar."

"That matters not. I was recently bathing in the castle and saw a little girl appear out of seemingly nowhere. That must've been a home warashi."

I stared at her.

Forget the home warashi, how did you end up bathing in the castle? What are you, even?!

"Speaking of that home warashi," she continued, "I couldn't see all that well due to all the steam, but she looked much like Liliana's younger sister."

"Are you sure it wasn't actually her... Milianne?"

"The castle's baths are trapped to prevent assassinations. A child like her could never get in."

"You have a point..."

That made it likely that they actually did have a home warashi. Unless Milianne was some infiltration expert who could bypass those traps, anyway.

Though, we already had a natural escape artist in the second princess, so that didn't seem all that unlikely.

◇

Going into the room filled me with relief.

Though the coloring was still far from Japanese, it had a tatami floor, zabutons, zaisu — more than enough to make it feel like an actual Japanese hot spring inn room.

I can chill here just fine.

"The color is discomforting," said Nemesis. "But the smell of the tatami and the zabuton make me feel... nostalgic, for some reason. This is pleasant."

She was finding the atmosphere of this room (which, despite it all, felt Japanese) to be soothing, most likely because of her usual peeking into my memories.

Also, about four-fifths of all the tea snacks that had come with the room were already gone.

Oh, well.

"All right, then..."

I removed my equipment so I could relax properly.

I couldn't really wear my special rewards and VDA in a place like this, so I took it all off and stored it in the pouch-shaped inventory I had bought today.

Counting my three special rewards, the VDA, my accessory (I hadn't found anything useful in the shop, so I only had a Lifesaving Brooch right now), my spare weapon, and Silver, I now had seven items inside it.

You could only put ten types of items inside it, but even with everything unequipped and stored, I still had enough space for three.

Though I'd unequipped everything, I didn't want to walk around in just my inner clothing, so I got into the yukata that came along with the room.

Now this really feels like a hot spring inn, I thought, which made me want to go take a dip right then and there.

"Hm?" Nemesis read my thoughts. "The sun is still up. You intend to go this early?"

"Yeah," I said, but then I remembered something I was planning to do today. "Wait, no. I'll go in after cleaning Silver outside. You can go first."

Having found out just how much of a luxury Silver was, I wanted to give him a cleaning. Once I was done with that, I'd go to the hot spring and get all the dirt off of me.

Also, as a girl, Nemesis would probably bathe longer than me, so it was probably best to let her go first.

Hell, there were probably separate baths for guys and girls, so there was no need for us to go at the same time to begin with.

"This'll be your first ever hot spring experience," I said. "Enjoy it for all it's worth."

"Mm-hm," she nodded. "So I shall."

And so, I went to clean Silver, while Nemesis went to the open-air bath that the inn was so proud of.

◇◇◇

Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis

"This is exciting," I muttered.

As Ray's Embryo, I'd inherited my general knowledge from him. Thus, of course, I knew of hot springs.

Warmth, pleasantness, health, hot spring eggs, beauty, hot spring manju, the epitome of anything Japanese, hot spring water, drinks under the moonlight... All such information was already in my head.

However, I'd never experienced it for myself.

In fact, most of the time, I relied on Ray logging out to clean me up, so I barely even knew what a normal bath was like.

And now that we'd chanced upon a hot spring, I simply had to try it out for myself.

Excited, I walked past a piece of cloth — called "noren," according to Ray's knowledge — that said "women" on it in both old Tenchi language and common, opened the sliding door, and entered the changing room.

"Nh?" I said.

"...Eh?"

Someone — Azurite — was already there. She was placing her clothes away into a box-shaped inventory. Her blue blade was placed against the clothing shelves.

She wasn't wearing her mask, either. Her face was fully exposed.

"...?!" A second later, she whipped her mask out of her inventory with a haste that made me wonder if she'd reached supersonic speeds and instantly equipped it.

"..."

"..."

I looked at the girl — fully nude, except for the mask — and wondered what had gotten into her.

She looked back at me, clearly shaken by the fact that I'd seen her bare face.

After a brief silence, I opened my mouth. "Keep your mask on if you'd like. Let's just enter the bath, shall we? Standing naked like that is how you catch illnesses."

"G-Good idea!" she nodded as she picked up her blue sword and left the changing room.

Eh? You're taking that thing, too? I raised an eyebrow.

We both followed the instructions on the "Etiquette" sign, cleaned our bodies by dousing ourselves in water, walked into the hot spring, sat next to each other, and heaved a relaxed sigh.

Truly, this was really something wonderful.

It was as though pure, undiluted comfort was permeating my body.

How long is Ray planning to stay here in Quartierlatin, I wonder? I hope we're here for three or four more days.

Suddenly, I noticed that Azurite was acting like she wanted to say something.

The glass on the eye area of her mask was misty, so she probably couldn't look at me directly. Still, she was facing my direction, and she opened her mouth to say something I more or less expected. "Keep my face a secre—"

"Just so you are aware," I cut her words short, "I have no knowledge of what your face implies. Ray doesn't recognize it, either. That moment back in the changing room was the first time either of us ever saw it. It exists in neither of our memories."

"Really?" she asked.

"You can confirm it yourself, no? You seem to have Truth Discernment, after all."

That skill was surely the reason why she'd so readily understood that

Ray was telling the truth after the battle at noon.

"Eh? But... is that really so? He's a Paladin, right?"

"It really is so."

"I... see..." She seemed relieved, yet troubled about something else now. Though, it was hard to tell, considering I could only see the bottom half of her face.

"If I may ask," I spoke up again and pointed at something right outside the bath. "For what purpose did you bring that sword here?"

This was my first time in a hot spring, but even I knew that it was rude to bathe while armed.

"This sword cannot be stored in inventories," she explained. "I've no choice but to carry it around."

"How cumbersome..."

I'd never heard of an item that couldn't be stored for any other reason than inventory capacity. Not even Gideon's rankers spoke of items like that. Then again, it didn't seem like she was lying, so I assumed she wasn't.

Azurite presumably realized that bathing with a blade handy wasn't good, so she went ahead and began trying to hide it with the tubs and buckets here.

That changes little, if you ask me...

"Mh?" I looked at Azurite as she stood there, still trying to hide it, and realized something. "You have quite a nice figure."

"I do?"

I could see her bare body quite well from here. It was well-proportioned and held a good balance between "muscly" and "soft." Her chest was sizable, but not enough to lose grace, and the curve from her shoulders to her rear was really smooth.

Mhm, it's of a fine mold, indeed.

"But you're also..." Azurite spoke up before stopping. "Sorry."

"Should I take that 'sorry' as a declaration of war?"

So my body looked seedy even through her misty lenses, eh? Well, it wasn't like I wasn't aware that there wasn't much to my chest. In fact, considering my overall frame, a big chest would only make me look unbalanced.

"No matter," I continued. "My Master is not the type to care about women's figures or breast sizes. Being considered 'flat' doesn't bother me all that much."

"So he doesn't judge books by their covers?" Azurite asked. "But then, why did he pick on my mask?"

"Oh no, that isn't the reason," I replied, before explaining why Ray cared little for the female figure. "He said that he lost all interest in nude women after his sister took him to a jungle where he ended up being chased by a horde of naked amazons."

"Ehhhh...?"

When I'd first heard it, I'd also thought, Eh? That happened on Earth? Not here? Needless to say, his sister had left him with quite a bit of trauma.

Still, even if naked bodies didn't excite him, he had a decent interest in love and affection, and his heart could still race for reasons related to such things, so he wouldn't have any trouble entering a relationship or becoming intimate with someone... probably.

"It certainly looks like he has his share of troubles," Azurite sighed. She was probably imagining young Ray's trauma.

I grinned. "That story is only something to laugh about at this point, though."

"Perhaps. But he's Ray Starling the Unbreakable, is he not? He's been involved in many things that cannot be laughed off, no? Like the incident at Gideon..."

"I cannot deny that."

After all, he'd been involved in a number of major incidents ever since my hatching.

In fact, he'd been caught up in such events even before coming here. Though the other side wasn't nearly as life-threatening as this one, there was, for example, that thing that had happened before Brother Bear's tournament fight when he was little.

For all I knew, Ray might've been born under just that kind of star.

"He seems to be predisposed to never ignore any tragedies before him, which makes him end up carrying some heavy burdens," I said.

The greatest example of that would be the whole matter that had surrounded the Gouz-Maise Gang. It had been nothing but painful to him, and as his Embryo, I knew that far too well.

"That nature of his worries me sometimes," I sighed.

"I see..."

I was Ray's Embryo — his partner. As such, I was confident that I was his closest ally in battle, but I didn't know if I properly supported his heart and mind.

I should find more ways to care for him, but...

"...Hm?" My thoughts were cut short by a changing room's sliding door opening.

It wasn't the same one that Azurite and I had gone through, which made a certain question come to mind — Why are there two doors?

Before I could figure out the answer, the door opened up... and Ray came through it.

He had a towel around his waist and still wore the pouch-inventory, but that was the extent of it.

I, on the other hand, hadn't gone into the spring wearing a towel, so he could see me clearly through the water.

Azurite was actually standing, so he could see her whole and bare whether he liked it or not.

"..." Ray and I didn't say a word.

"Umm," Azurite spoke up. "My lenses are misty, so I can't see well. Did someone come in?"

An inexplicable air surrounded us, and Ray, for some reason, turned around and walked back into the changing room... only to come back out again in about ten seconds.

Then, as though it was nothing, he walked up to the open-air bath, doused himself in water, got inside, and sighed in satisfaction.

Then, he said two things. "It's mixed bathing time right now. Also, though the dressing rooms are different, the hot spring is the same."

A moment later, I hit him with a drop kick, and Azurite — who must have realized who it was by his voice — crushed him with the broad side of her blade. The combined force of our attacks instantly reaped his consciousness.

I know I was only just thinking about how to care for him, but he definitely deserved this.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

"I'm in this dream again," I muttered.

Nemesis and Azurite had given me the Faint debuff, sending me to the dreamspace I'd been in a few times now.

I was pretty used to Fainting in Dendro by now, so even if this place looked different, I could tell it was that by the feel alone.

Last time, this had just been an empty space with a "Coming Soon" sign, but now, it looked much like my room in real life. It had probably been recreated from my memories.

"Honestly, how I ended up Fainting concerns me way more than how this space looks right now," I muttered as I sat down on a chair — which felt just like the one in real life. "I was properly following the rules of the bath. Isn't this result a bit unreasonable?"

I'd gone out to the open-air bath, only to find both Nemesis and Azurite. Thinking I'd made a mistake, I'd gone back to the changing room, but I'd seen a sign saying that it was mixed bathing time. Figuring that meant it was all fine, I'd gone back to the spring, only to be abused like that.

Incomprehensible.

"Oh, but you have to comprehend it... don't you?" said a small girl, sitting formally on my bed.

I shrugged. "Hey, Shu told me, 'You must never panic when you accidentally walk in on women bathing. If you falter or turn red, you'll just make them scream. That's why you have to keep your cool and act like it's no big deal, then calmly explain why you came in.'"

"I don't know if that's true or not, but if it is, does that mean that Mr. Bear did it... too?" the reddish-brown girl tilted her head.

"I think he also said, 'You just have to make them think like there's nothing weird about you being there.'"

"But that's clearly strange... isn't it?"

It is. I nodded. Now that I think about it, Shu might've been joking.

I'd taken a joke seriously and done something bad...

But, wait, it was mixed bathing time, so it wasn't against the rules to enter, right?

"Even if it's not against the rules, what's embarrassing is still embarrassing, and what makes you angry still makes you angry. That's obvious... isn't it? Manners towards girls are important... right?"

"Right," I said. "I guess the sudden event made me lose my composure."

I belatedly realized that I’d been a bit out of it back there. Even if I’d felt no sexual excitement, the very fact that I’d been in a bath with girls who weren’t family had made me lose myself.

That was definitely all my bad.

“You have to apologize... right?” said the girl.

“Yeah, I know. I’ll do it after I wake up,” I said. “By the way...”

“What?”

I turned around and looked at the horned, reddish-brown girl before asking, “You’re Gardranda, right?”

“Yes... I am.”

Chapter Four: The First Night

Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda.

That was the name of the first UBM I'd ever encountered here in Infinite Dendrogram. It was the creature that had gone on to become my first special reward — Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda.

Now, I was facing an entity that seemed to represent the will of that item, and this wasn't our first meeting.

My first encounter with her had been back when I'd passed out while fighting my second UBM, Gouz-Maise, in the middle of a dream depicting my memories.

Back then, she had been nothing but a red-black silhouette of few words, none of them spoken fluently. Now, however, she was clearly visible and could hold a proper conversation.

"I saw the 'Coming Soon' sign a few times," I said as I looked around the room. "And it looks like it came."

"Mm-hm," Gardranda nodded. "Everything is prepared... I guess?"

Why does she sound so uncertain about everything she says? I wondered.

"So, let's start with a question... What are you, anyway?" I asked.

Shu and Figaro had told me that they'd never heard of a defeated UBM showing up to someone while they were unconscious. Those two were veterans who had beaten Mythicals and even an SUBM, and yet not even they had ever experienced it.

Why, then, was it happening with Gardranda?

Since I didn't know, I asked her.

"I am what became of the power and mind that the original Gardranda didn't use... I think?"

You "think," eh?

"You can also say that I'm the child that was inside her... maybe?" she added.

"That was a pregnant lady?" I raised an eyebrow.

Tian lives had been at stake, so I didn't regret beating the creature, but this revelation did give me a bit of a bad aftertaste.

"That was the kind of creature it was... right?" she said. "It was like an egg shell... I guess?"

"An egg shell?"

So the Gardranda I fought was like a limbed egg, while the Gardranda I'm talking to is like a... true Gardranda?

"We were a mother-and-child two-layered design?" she continued. "Even I don't really understand it... I think?"

"So how is it, really?" I asked.

"Okay... I'm manifesting like this because I was defeated before the conditions to unleash my true power were fulfilled and I could break the shell and be born... probably?"

The only reason why I'd beaten Gardranda so easily was because Cheshire had hinted that the core was in the stomach. So, I could only assume that, if I hadn't known about that, the situation would've gotten worse, and it would've entered its final form — this girl right here.

Anyway, though she wasn't the Gardranda I'd fought, she was Gardranda nonetheless, meaning that UBMs could have a mind even after becoming special rewards.

That fact made me concerned about something.

"Could this happen with Gouz-Maise and Monochrome, too?" I asked. Would the man-eating revenant and the black star manifest before me again?

"It won't happen with Gouz-Maise... surely," said Gardranda. "It's nothing but a vessel now. As for Monochrome... I'm not very sure."

"Why not?"

"It has a longer history and a higher status than me. But its powers are focused on a single thing, so it won't show... I guess?"

The "single thing" had to be the skill that I couldn't use yet.

That aside, if she was right, I probably didn't have to worry about those two coming back to haunt me.

I was ready to send Gouz-Maise back to hell if it ever appeared before me again, but if that never happened, then all the better.

While Gardranda and Monochrome had been creatures acting within non-human frameworks, Gouz-Maise had been a wraith bursting with human malice and evil conviction, and I had no tolerance for that.

Needless to say, hearing Gardranda's words put me at ease.

"So," I spoke up. "Why did you bring me here?"

Last time, she'd wanted to get to know me, the one who'd beaten her, and now, whatever had been "Coming Soon" had come, but I still didn't really know what it was.

I have a good guess, though, I thought.

"Lend me your ear... will you?" she requested.

"Hm? Sure."

We were the only ones here, so I was curious why she saw the need to whisper, but I went and did as she wanted. I gently brought my ear close to her, and...

"Amph!"

...she bit into me... Wait, WHAT?!

"GYAAHHH?!"

There was no pain, but I could feel it clearly!

Did she seriously just bite me?! Are you kidding me?!

"What the hell are you doing?!" I shouted.

"My mother didn't get to eat you while she was alive, so I just tasted you a little... I guess?"

"..."

Of course. How could I forget that she was a man-eating demon? Well, technically, that was her mother. I wasn't about to blame her for her parent's sin, but she was one step away from making a sin for herself.

"I didn't bite it off, but I did get a lick. It was good... you know?"

"Shut up," I snapped. I felt no pleasure in getting praise for the way I tasted.

"Now, for the main matter... okay?" Gardranda said as she fixed her posture and looked directly at me before continuing. "Because you defeated a third UBM, you unlocked the third skill on the Miasmaflame Bracers... you know?"

◇

I woke up shortly after finishing my conversation with Gardranda.

Silently, I reached into my inventory and equipped the Miasmaflame

Bracers.

The item description proved that what I'd just seen had been no dream — the third skill was unveiled and explained.

"Hhhh..." I sighed.

After telling me that the skill was now available, Gardranda had gone on to explain its effects... and conditions.

I could see them before me right here in the menu, and I could say one thing about this skill — it was on a whole different level than the skills you'd usually find on items, special rewards included.

In fact, many would consider it broken and unfair.

Sure, it was below the likes of Figaro's Gloria α's skill Fang of Gloria: Overdrive, but the very fact that I was thinking of that when trying to come up with comparisons spoke volumes about it.

But there was a problem...

I sighed. "And so, I get yet another unwieldy skill."

Even Shining Despair was easier to use, and that one had obscene charge rates.

The conditions for Gardranda's third skill were so harsh it would actually be better if I never got into a situation that called for it.

Basically, it was as unwieldy as it was powerful.

Still, in the off chance that I found myself in a scenario where using it was my best option, it would definitely be a reliable skill.

"Hm? Ray. You're awake," said Nemesis as she opened the door, ending my train of thought. Her long black hair was damp, and she was clad in a yukata that came with the room.

Her appearance made me stare blankly and my heart skip a beat.

"You were still in the hot spring?" I asked.

"'Still'? No, I went in there again. After you Fainted, I took you to the changing room, dried you up, put a yukata on you, and brought you here. It made me work up a sweat, so I needed to bathe a second time."

I looked down at myself and, sure enough, despite losing consciousness naked, I was now in a yukata.

"I see," I said. "Sorry... and thanks."

She fully deserved an apology for my misdemeanor, as well as gratitude for taking care of me while I was out cold.

"Well, I couldn't possibly leave you there in the cold," she said. "That's how you catch illnesses. I didn't want something like that hindering whatever we would be doing tomorrow and beyond. Also, I don't mind what happened all that much, but you should definitely apologize to Azurite. She seemed to be quite shocked that she was seen... and by what she saw."

"Yeah, you're right. I'm not sure if she'll forgive me, but I'll apologize when I get the chance."

"Good. That aside, I have a question for you."

"What is it?"

Despite us being the only people in the room, she closed in on me for a whisper.

That made me a bit tense, as it reminded me of Gardranda's bite.

"You looked awfully composed back there," she whispered. "Did you actually feel nothing about our naked bodies?"

Now, that was a hard question to answer. I felt that she wouldn't be satisfied with any answer I could give her.

Still, this was all my bad, so I had to be honest, at least.

"I only looked composed back then," I replied. "In hindsight, I was probably panicking pretty badly. And, uh..."

"And...?"

Urged, I went ahead and spoke the words stuck in my mouth.

"The sight didn't get me excited... but I did find it beautiful."

Suddenly, silence fell upon the room.

"..."

"..." Neither of us said a word.

It wasn't a cold sort of silence, but it wasn't warming, either — I wasn't sure how to describe it.

I belatedly realized the gravity of what I'd just said. It made it hard to look at Nemesis's face.

"...Which one of us do you mean?"

"Both," I answered without as much as a second after the question.

Crap... I don't like where this is going.

"Which one of us was more beautiful?"

"Let's leave it at that!" I exclaimed to prevent myself from remembering what I'd seen and comparing them.

"Gngh..." Nemesis voiced her frustration, and I was afraid to look at her.

I said way too much, I thought. But I can't go without saying another thing...

"Speaking of 'beautiful,' you look great in that yukata. It suits you really well."

Those were my honest thoughts. Her long black hair, pallid skin, and facial features matched the yukata perfectly. In fact, I'd have gone as far as to say that I'd never seen a person in a yukata look as beautiful as her.

"R-Really?" she said. "I see..."

I expected more words, but she fell silent with just that. I was unsure of what else to say, and she didn't speak, either.

As silence permeated the room again, someone knocked on the door and said, "Mr. Starling, are you awake? Would you like dinner?"

The person sounded like a young man. His voice was unfamiliar to me, but his words made it safe to assume that he was a worker here.

"Oh, right," said Nemesis. "He dropped by about an hour ago, while you were unconscious."

I looked at the clock and saw that it was seven o'clock. It reminded me that Shirley had said that dinner would be between six and eight.

I guess it's a good time to have some food, then.

"Ah, I'll go right away," I said, as I took my inventory.

We both left the room.

◇

The male worker who led us to the cafeteria was... different, to put it lightly.

First of all, there was a wooden mask on his face. Unlike Azurite's, which only hid the upper half, this one covered it whole — it only had holes for the eyes.

Second, his right hand was a prosthetic, just like my left hand had been until yesterday.

He didn't seem all that aged — in fact, he appeared and sounded younger than me — and yet he'd somehow already lost an arm.

I couldn't help but wonder what had happened for him to end up like this.

He noticed my gaze and greeted me. I apologized for my inappropriate staring and asked about him.

Apparently, he had been heavily injured in the war and then saved by the owner of this inn, a soldier himself. However, the injuries had made him lose his memories, and he hadn't had anything on him that could prove his identity, leaving him with no place to go. And so, after the inn's owner had cared for him, he'd gone on to become a worker here.

Apparently, the kingdom had a large number of people in situations similar to his. Many had ended up in their circumstances because of the Tri-

Zenith Dragon, Gloria, rather than the war that had followed, but regardless, the scars on the kingdom ran deep.

Liliana and Milianne, for example, had lost their father in the war.

Things might've gone differently if more Masters had fought for the kingdom.

Alas, the Masters who'd participated were few, and the Superiors, Shu included, hadn't been among them.

I'd heard that this was due to the kingdom choosing not to reward any participants, instead relying only on the Masters' personal choices.

The Superiors had all had their reasons for not participating, such as Figaro's condition (although I wasn't too sure about Miss Eldritch having a good reason).

I felt like the outcome of the war had been the result of circumstance.

Even so, that didn't change he fact that many tians had probably felt abandoned.

That fact left a bad taste in my mouth.

I hadn't been here during that war. But if something like that were to happen again, I... I would surely...

◇

As the masked youth led us towards the main building's cafeteria, we passed by many other people who were staying here. They had probably just finished eating.

Many of them were fellow Masters, who were surely here for the ruins. Some of them were even wearing yukatas, just like me.

As we walked, I ran into someone particularly unique. My gaze met theirs.

"Ah."

"Oohh?"

The gaze my eyes met weren't those of the person — those eyes were completely hidden by the front bangs. The eyes I was looking into right now were those of the chubby cat on the person's head.

Indeed, it was a young man with a cat on him. He looked curious even by Dendro standards, and I knew who this person was.

"Ohhh?" he said. "Well, if it isn't Nemesis and Raaay. I didn't expect to see you heeere."

"Likewise," nodded Nemesis.

"Hello, Tom," I said. "Why are you in this town?"

This person was Tom Cat — the second in the kingdom's duel rankings and the bearer of the nickname "Monster Cat Mansion." His job was "The Lynx."

He had been the reigning duel champion before Figaro took the crown, and he was now keeping Kashimiya — who was in third — from advancing any further.

Needless to say, he was a big deal. Even if the cat on his head and his mild demeanor made that hard to believe.

"I'm here to explore the ruinnns," he said. "Kashimiya seems to have come baaack, so I decided to re-train myself and make some money heeere."

"Ah, I see," I nodded.

The top three rankers could only be challenged to a ranked duel by those one rank below them. Now that Kashimiya, ranked third, was back, he could challenge Tom for the throne of the second. Tom had every reason to prepare for that.

This reminded me that, because no one had been there to challenge him, I'd never actually seen him fight.

He'd never participated in the mock battles, either. Hell, we'd only became acquainted because of a chance meeting during lunch with other rankers.

"Are you after the ruins, toooo?" he asked.

"Yes," I replied. "I'll be changing my job."

"Oh, right, they found a lost job heeere."

Leave it to a seasoned ranker like him to already know about it.

"We might meet in the ruins, thennn," he said. "Let's be friendly if that happens. Goodniiight."

"Goodnight," I replied.

"You too, Grimalkin," said Nemesis as she looked at the cat on Tom's head — his Embryo. "Sweet dreams."

Grimalkin meowed in response, and Tom walked off, casually waving as he left.

"What an unexpected meeting," said Nemesis.

Seriously. He was a particularly rare encounter among Gideon's rankers, so I never would've expected to meet him in a place like this.

Also, why can't I shake the feeling that I met him before our introduction in Gideon?

◇

The cafeteria was really crowded. Which made sense, considering that it was dinnertime.

"Ah! Mr. Ray!" Shirley saw me and ran up. "I'll lead you to your table! Thanks for bringing him, Lefty!"

The masked youth responded with a light nod and walked away to do some other work.

"'Lefty' is his name, I assume?" asked Nemesis.

"Yeah!" said Shirley. "The name's based on a Master word!"

So instead of a name referring his lack of right hand, they'd gone with a name pointing out the fact that he did have a left. The glass is half-full, huh?

Anyway, Shirley led us to a round table, which looked somewhat off, given that all the others in the room were rectangular.

I could only guess that the rectangular ones had originally been here, and they'd had enough of them for all the guests in the main building, but not enough for those in the annex, and that was why they'd brought this round one here.

Azurite was already sitting on one of the chairs around it.

"..." She silently stared at me through her mask.

It was awkward, to say the least. It almost made me remember what I'd seen before passing out.

Still, I couldn't really act like it hadn't happened.

"Azurite," I spoke up. "What happened was all my bad. I should've been more careful... Sorry."

Seriously, I could've figured out what was happening the moment I'd realized that someone was inside. Also, no matter how perplexed I'd been, actually joining them should have been an obvious, really big no-no.

"It's all right," she said, as she kept staring at me. "You forgave me for attacking you because of a misunderstanding. I can do the same for you."

And so, it was all water under the bridge.

"Thanks," I said.

"Again, it's all right. Anyhow, it's dinnertime. Let's indulge ourselves."

"Let's!" said Nemesis, clearly ecstatic.

In conclusion, the food was really good.

The delicious, locally-procured ingredients were well-prepared to make a number of excellent dishes. I particularly enjoyed the wild vegetable-chicken quiche.

Once we finished that main course, I started in on the fruits for dessert.

Since we'd each only gotten a single person's portion, I was sure Nemesis still had vast amounts of space in her stomach. She'd probably ask for a midnight snack at this rate, so it would be better to feed her now, but...

"All I have is Shu's popcorn," I told her.

"Delicious, but not exactly filling."

"Some place nearby might still be open. Go get something," I said as I took 10,000 lir out of my wallet and handed it to her.

"Very well," she said as she took it and left.

It just hit me that I casually handed her an amount of money equivalent to 100,000 yen, I thought. Thanks to all the windfalls I'm getting and Shu's influence, I seem to be getting a warped sense of money.

"All righty, then," I said.

Azurite had already excused herself, apparently having seen something, so I was the only one left at the table. She'd said she'd pass on dessert, and left the cafeteria. Naturally, her dessert was now in Nemesis's stomach.

Anyway, I'm done with dinner, so what do I do now? I wondered. This is a hot spring inn, so now that the girls are out, maybe I should take a relaxed dip?

Speaking of hot springs, the main building obviously had some, too. This was evidenced by the fact that a lot of the guests here in the cafeteria were wearing yukatas, just like me.

It wasn't every day that you got to wear this Tenchi-style clothing here in the kingdom, so it was probably popular just because of the novelty value. However, they clearly didn't know how to put them on properly. The way they were wearing them was messy, and you could see exposed chests and legs everywhere.

Most of those wearing them like that were men, though. The women either wore their normal clothing, or had plain-looking innerwear underneath.

All sexual interest or lack thereof aside, that was actually pretty sad-looking sight. I felt like I was looking at a girl wearing a skirt over sweat pants.

Thinking this and that, I left the cafeteria.

Upon entering the lounge right next to it, I found a strange gathering of people.

"Hm?" I murmured.

Their ages and appearances told me that they weren't part of a single group.

Curious as to what it was all about, I went over to the crowd, discovering that they were surrounding a single man.

He wasn't wearing a yukata, but he had no upper clothing on, making him look pretty casual.

He was wearing a thick set of glasses, so it was hard to tell precisely, but he looked around thirty years old.

"Doctor, I'm thinking that this is my biggest catch today. Is it?" said a muscly guest, clearly a tian who had explored the ruins. He handed a fist-sized, diamond-looking object to the man with the thick glasses.

"Ohh, bello... Molto bello, but this is no real gem, yes?" he said.

Strange how he can sound so foreign when we have universal translation, I reflected.

"It's-a false diamond for-a the laser lenses," he continued. "Bene and largo, but ah, how you say... worth less than a real one."

"Oh..." The man with the diamond slumped his shoulders.

But then the man with the thick glasses smiled. "But there are dilettanti who collect-a many things like this. To them? Molto... Molto prezioso! 200,000 lir."

"Seriously?! That's great! Now I can get something for my mother back home! Thanks, Doctor!" The tian man joyfully put the artificial diamond into his inventory.

"Who is next?" the man with thick glasses asked.

"Me! I wanna ask about this metal plate."

"Che bello! It's-a plate used in the pre-ancient civilization's battle units. Even before any processing, it's tougher than the weaker magic shields."

One after the other, guests presented the man with things they'd found in the ruins.

I could tell that this was basically a meeting for appraising antiques, but who was that man with the glasses?

Shirley happened to be passing by, so I took the opportunity to ask, "Who's that person they keep calling 'Doctor'?"

"That is Dr. Mario," she answered. "He's a doctor of archaeology who's been staying with us since yesterday. He said he travels the world investigating the ruins of the pre-ancient civilization!"

"I see."

I guess it's only natural for ruins to attract archaeologists. I've gotta say, though...

"That name makes it sound like he jumps really high and dives through pipes. Maybe kills viruses for fun on the side."

"Wahoo!" the man laughed. "Cinque... That would be-a the fifth time a Master has-a told me something like this."

Whoops, he overheard us.

"Ah, sorry," I apologized.

"It's-a no trouble, no trouble at all... It's clear that you're fond of the name, after all."

Despite sounding like a fake foreigner, he didn't seem like a bad guy.

"If I may ask, what makes your appraisal different from the Identification skill?" I asked.

"You-a cannot find out everything about a pre-ancient civilization relic with just-a Identification. Non posso," he explained. "If you don't-a have the, how you say... special knowledge and skills, many descriptions would-a say 'Details Unknown.'"

"...Ohhh." Now that he mentioned it, Silver's description was brief, and it ended with exactly that.

"The explorers here let-a me see their finds, and in exchange, I appraise them for them. Valutare, si?" This way, Dr. Mario got to examine the items from the ruins, while the finders learned the worth of what they'd discovered — a win-win situation if I ever saw one.

Wait, this is a perfect opportunity. I should get him to take a gander at Silver.

"Um, I also have something from the pre-ancient civilization," I said.

"Would you like to look at it? It's not from these ruins, though."

"Nessun problema! No problem!"

"It's large, so I can't take it out here. I'll show it to you outside once you're done appraising the others' things."

"Nessun problema," he nodded. "Then please, trenta minuti... ah... how you say? Thirty minutes!"

"All right."

Yep. This is good, I thought.

I'd get to find out more about Silver on the very same day I'd become curious about him. What a stroke of luck.

Now, to find a way to kill time while waiting for Dr. Mario.

◇

As I walked around the inn with no real goal in mind, I found Azurite.

She wasn't alone, though. She was talking to the masked inn worker, Lefty.

"So you have no memories of anything before the war?" she asked.

"Yes," he said. "Nothing at all..."

They were clearly talking about the same thing we had talked about while he led me to the cafeteria.

However, Azurite looked strangely stern. "Are you familiar with the family name 'Brittis'?"

"Brittis... Sorry, it doesn't ring a bell."

Azurite looked a bit disappointed by the response. "I see... Could you take off the mask?"

"I... Apologies, but my face is nothing I can show."

"...Very well. Sorry. That was unreasonable of me."

"Not at all. Anyhow, I have tasks I must attend to, so I shall excuse myself," said Lefty, before leaving.

Left alone, Azurite dropped her shoulders and walked in my direction.

"Ah!" she exclaimed as she finally realized that I was here.

I was curious about what I'd just seen, so I went ahead and asked, "Is Lefty noteworthy, somehow?"

"'Somehow,' as in... how?"

My question had been relatively casual, but...

"Your attitude made it look like you were confirming something, rather than just asking," I said.

"So you can be observant... If only you had used some of this ability before entering the hot spring. It would've spared us both the unpleasant experience."

"Again, that was all my bad... But there is something about Lefty, right?"

"There is. His voice was much like that of a friend — one who participated and died in the war."

"Well... damn."

So this is a day of chance encounters not just for me, but for Azurite and Lefty, too.

"But his face is supposedly injured, and he has no proof of his identity. His stature and voice are so much like that of my friend's, though. If it's really him, I'd love to take him to his family..."

"Then why not ask Miss Aberratio— I mean, the High Priestess for help? If she heals his face, then—"

"Do not mention that parasite in my presence."

"...Okay."

That livid tone had been legitimately scary. Not in the same way as my sister or Miss Aberration, but still...

Just what had that eldritch monstrosity done to make the mere mention of her name incur such anger?

"..."

"..."

Crap, that'd completely soured the mood.

It didn't look like I could do anything to improve this by myself, but Nemesis wasn't here, either.

What should I do...?

"Ray! Ragazzo! So this is where-a you were," said Dr. Mario as he joined the scene.

Salvation!

"Ray. Who is this man?" asked Azurite.

"Dr. Mario," I answered. "He's a guest at this inn. He's an archeologist who heard about the ruins and came here to this town to find out more about the pre-ancient civilization."

"I see... For a scholar, he was certainly quick to find out about this."

"Hm?"

What does she mean by that?

"So, ragazzo, what-a item did you-a want to be showing me?" asked Dr. Mario.

"Oh, this guy right here," I replied as I took Silver out of my inventory and showed him to him.

Azurite had a far stronger reaction than he did.

"A Prism Steed?!" she exclaimed. "And wait... this is an original, isn't it?!"

"Ah, yeah, he is."

"H-How did you get this?! It's one of the five Flagman units! One of those that hasn't been discovered yet! It's on the same level as a national treasure!"

I hesitated. Her intensity made it really hard to say that I'd hit him in a gacha.

Looking at her reaction, I imagined that the very idea that I'd gotten a national treasure that way would probably make her faint.

"Wait," I said. "You saw the broadcast of the battle in Gideon, right? Didn't you notice it back then?"

Considering our talk at noon, I assumed she'd witnessed me use the Wind Hoof bomb.

"How could I?! It's impossible to tell the difference from a replica unless you see it with your own eyes! Also, in that motion picture, it was never clear what phenomenon was caused by which item or Embryo."

So that's how it is, eh?

Oh, yeah... That might've been the reason why no one had tried to steal Silver from me — they hadn't realized that he was the real thing.

Well, I was a newbie, so I couldn't really blame them for not assuming that he was.

"Just how did you get your hands on an original?" Azurite demanded.

"Well, I guess you could say I know people..."

I'd hit it at the gacha at Alejandro's shop, after all.

"Oh, I see. So it's all because of King of Destruction... your brother," she said, nodding in understanding.

It really helps to have an eccentric older brother in situations like this.

Anything goes when he's involved.

"Hmm..." While I was talking to Azurite, Dr. Mario examined Silver.

He focused on him through his glasses one moment, then switched to look at him with his naked eye the next. It was hard to tell through his thick glasses, but he had clear blue eyes that seemed somewhat weary.

"Interessante," he said. "Ragazzo, ragazza... this is most-a definitely an original made by Flagman — not a replica. Decisamente. However, it's not-a one of the five Prism Steeds."

"Eh?" Azurite and I exclaimed simultaneously.

It's not one of the five?

"But the description says that he is..." I began.

"Sì è vero. Correct. The descriptions on Gold and Ruby told us-a that there were a total of cinque, five. On the surface, this Silver is-a part of them... but that's actually wrong. Scorretto."

"In what way?" asked Azurite.

"In primo luogo, firstly, about the five Prism Steeds that Flagman developed... the five positions are already filled. Un set completo."

"They have?" I asked, astonished.

"Gold Thunder, Ruby Ignition, Obsidian Earth-Edge, and recent explorations of a Dryfean ruin led to the finding of Jade Storm, a wind-based Prism Steed. The discovery-a was accompanied by a text that implied a 'Sapphire Wave,' which makes a total of five. Solo cinque. Capito?"

"So what's the deal with my Silver?" I asked, baffled.

Is he a fake...? No, Dr. Mario just said that he was made by Flagman.

"It's-a not formally in the five, but it's close. So much so that even the basic description assumes it is. But it's actually an unofficial prototype unit, or an experimental one — either of the two. Non ufficiale."

"What do you mean?"

"It's-a most likely a unit developed with similar standards and a similar base frame as one of the five Prism Steeds, most likely Gold Thunder. Simile, ma non autentico. That's-a the reason for the error in the base description. This Zephyrus Silver was also equipped with some experimental systems and functions. But, ah... how you say? Non sono sicuro. I'm unable to tell whether it was created before or after the five."

I see. It makes sense to think that Silver's either a test or an experiment.

So Silver was either a prototype made before Gold's development, or an experimental unit made using Gold's spare parts post-development. That was probably the reason why his name was different from the others'.

"In ultima analisi, it doesn't seem as complete as the other Prism Steeds," said Dr. Mario. "And it doesn't seem as focused on-a offense as they are."

It was hard to argue with that. The third skill was still a mystery, but the two skills I could see were just air-running and a compressed air barrier. The Wind Hoof bomb I'd used against the RSK probably hadn't been intended by the creator. After all, who would design something with the premise that it would use hundreds of thousands of MP?

Though I doubt I'll ever use it again, even if I had that much.

"Speaking of Prism Steeds and their offensive abilities..." I said.

During a duel race against Shu, Figaro's Obsidian Earth-Edge had made countless rocky stakes pop out of the ground and galloped upon them with his eight legs like the divine horse from Norse myth.

Those stakes had been powerful enough to blast Shu's tank out of the course, and the race would've ended right there if he hadn't brought it back through sheer force alone.

Are those the kinds of skills he had in mind? I thought.

"Well..." Azurite spoke up. "Gold Thunder could release lightning matching high-rank ultimate job skills to create an electromagnetic barrier, and use magnetic repulsion to go through the sky at extremely high speeds."

I wasn't sure if it had anything to do with them having the same base frame, but that seemed pretty similar to what Silver did.

However, I doubted that it cost hundreds of thousands of MP to use that, and the barrier probably provided more defense than compressed air... so it was probably much more reliable.

Still, I didn't like the idea of constantly firing lightning everywhere, so I still preferred Silver.

Silver suddenly rubbed his muzzle on me.

What's up with you?

"Regardless, it's molto prezioso, a very beautiful thing, so please treasure it," said Dr. Mario.

"Thank you very much," I said, bowing my head.

The words we concluded with felt like they belonged in some appraisal show, but nonetheless, I couldn't be more glad that I had asked him about Silver.

“By the way, are you two-a going into the ruins?” he asked.

“Yes,” I said. “Apparently, you can get a Prism Steed-related job there.”

“I’m going there to investigate,” Azurite added.

Our words made Dr. Mario smile. “Ohh, molto bene! Please do-a come to me if you find something for me to look at.”

“Sure. We’ll be counting on you for that.”

With that, Dr. Mario went back into the main building.

The moment he was out of sight, I spoke up. “Azurite.”

“Yes?”

“Is there something strange about him?”

My words made her look surprised. “You really are observant.”

“With siblings like mine, you have to be. So, what’s bothering you?”

“The very fact that we have an archeologist here,” she said as she folded her arms. “The kingdom has banned all the requests and stifled all the information regarding the ruins here. It’s hard to believe that an archeologist could find out about them.”

All right now, hold on a sec.

“Stifled all the information?” I asked. “But I easily bought it at the DIN.”

“Eh?” She opened her eyes wide in surprise. “Eh? Huh? So you’re not here because of some shady information source you got through the King of Destruction?”

“Nope, this info’s on the market.”

Azurite sat down and covered her face. “Just what is that news company...?”

I knew exactly what she meant. The DIN was so well-informed, it was freaky.

Then again, they had Marie, the Superior Killer, among their special correspondents, so it was far from normal, really.

“By the way, you mentioned that you’ll also be going into the ruins, right?” I asked.

On the road to Quartierlatin, she’d said that she was here to investigate, but I hadn’t realized that she would be going in.

“Yes, I will,” she nodded. “I need to get a grasp on what kind of place these ruins are.”

“What kind of place could they be?”

“Ruins are treasure troves, full of pre-ancient civilization technology, but in some cases, they’ve contained dangerous weapons that’ve gone out of control.”

“For example?”

“A good one is the Fourth Seafloor Excavation Fortress in Granvaloa. It became a source of countless carnivorous monsters that almost destroyed the ecosystem. In the end, the one called ‘Human Bomb’ incinerated it along with the entire sea space. Mind you, it happened shortly before his final battle against the Dual White Whale, so it was somewhat overshadowed.”

Human Bomb...? Oh yeah, that’s Koukin Shoyu, Master of Abura-Sumashi.

I’d heard of him a few times, and I had always been thrown off by how big the stuff he did was, compared to the banality of his name — “antibacterial soy sauce.”

“I assumed that ruins could only be full of treasure,” I said.

“Of course, many ruins contain useful technology, and it would be great if this one did, too,” she replied. “If it doesn’t, a factory to create something good would be favorable, as well.”

“And you are here by the order of some powerful individual to investigate it, eh?”

Azurite was stronger than even Liliana — the current top of the Royal Guard. It wouldn’t be strange for her to receive such a task.

“Yes. I... the person who sent me here has the kingdom’s future in mind. As you are aware, this country is on the verge of destruction,” she said. “As things are, it will surely be overthrown. That’s why we need the technology inside the ruins. Resisting what we haven’t been able to resist before now will require something we didn’t have before.”

She talked while looking at the mountain where the ruins were, then threw a glance down at the sword on her hip.

“What you didn’t have before, eh?” I raised an eyebrow. “If you’re talking about the war, doesn’t that include Superiors and other powerful Masters?”

Suddenly, I felt her attitude change. I didn’t need to see the top half of her face to know that she was against that idea.

"I... no... the one who sent me has no intention to ask for any Masters' cooperation," she said.

I was silent. There was no need to ask why.

This reminded me of my first meeting with Sir Lindos back in Gideon. It was perfectly reasonable for the people of the kingdom, especially those who'd gone to war, to not think highly of Masters.

There had been few on their side, many on the enemy side, and our powers were overwhelming.

Masters were the reason why the kingdom had suffered such a staggering defeat at the hands of Dryfe. There was no room for argument about that.

Azurite had clearly been Langley Grandria's pupil, so she knew the pain of having lost her mentor to a Master. The person who'd sent her here had probably lost someone dear to him, as well.

Therefore, asking why that person was against hiring Masters would be nothing but rude.

But there was something I could confirm here.

"You have no intention to ask for Masters' cooperation, huh?" I asked. "Does that mean it's fine if we participate on our own? You know, to intercept the Dryfean Masters or something."

"Eh?"

"Tian rules don't apply to confrontations between Masters, right?"

"R-Right. That's true."

"Then I'm sure you'll have lots of people who come, even if no one asks them to."

Shu's face came to mind, then Rook's, Marie's, and then the faces of the many rankers and Masters I'd become acquainted with in Gideon.

Then there was B3's face and uh... yeah, actually, even Miss Aberration was there.

I wasn't sure why, but I felt like these people I'd just thought of would definitely come to Altar's aid during its eleventh hour.

Some of them were weirdos or schemers, but I didn't think that any of these people hated this country.

Some had Altarian tian friends.

Some avidly bettered themselves in the Altarian arenas.

Some had Altarian adherents.

...I wasn't too sure about that one, honestly.

Still, none of the people that came to mind actually wanted this country gone.

Okay, sure, Marie and B3 had played a part in the blockade, and Miss Aberration was a schemer, but even so, they wouldn't be able to sit idly by as this country evaporated.

I was pretty sure that we all liked Altar at least that much.

"But..." Azurite said, and then fell silent again.

"At the very least, I know I'll be joining the war," I said. "Sure, I know that doesn't mean much from a newbie who's not in any ranking, but I can participate by briefly joining the clan of an acquaintance."

The idea of joining The Lunar Society scared me, so I'd probably go for Chelsea's Golden Pirates.

"So, even if there aren't any requests for our cooperation," I said, "I'd appreciate it if you accepted any Masters who volunteered to help."

"That's... not something I can decide by myself."

"I figured. It'll be a big help if you pass that over to the person you work for, though. Sorry if this seems a bit out of left field."

"It's fine. I don't mind."

I could see her close her eyes behind her mask's lenses. It looked like she was thinking about something.

Oh, right. Speaking of cooperation...

"Also, can you let me help you out with your ruin investigation?" I asked.

"Eh?" She opened her eyes wide in surprise.

"Like I said, I'm only here to switch jobs. Other than that, I'm mildly interested in history. I have the time and I'm not preoccupied with anything, so I'd like to help you out with whatever you'll be doing."

I planned on joining the war, of course, but if the investigation here would also have a great impact on the future of this country, I wanted to help with that, too.

I really didn't want to just leave after doing nothing more than the relatively minor thing I'd come here for.

"But this is my duty," Azurite argued. "Also, something that could impact the fate of the kingdom might happen there. I can't make a Master like you be responsible for something like that..."

"You're right. It's your duty," I said. "But I don't think it's something that you have to bear and do all by yourself."

"...!"

"I'll help however I can, as long as it doesn't break confidentiality," I said.

If I didn't help and something bad happened to her, that'd leave a bad taste in my mouth.

"Also, you mentioned being responsible for the fate of the kingdom... I'm kinda already there, you know?" I added. "Thanks to the scheming of a certain bastard in a lab coat... Mr. Franklin."

"...Ah."

Naturally, I was referring to the battle against the RSK during Franklin's Game. If it hadn't been taken care of in time, a horde of monsters would've been released into the city. The vile asshole had even broadcast the battle to all of Altea and Gideon.

"So yeah, considering what I went through then, there should be no problems with me helping you ou— Why are you crying?"

Azurite was staring at me while bawling her eyes out for reasons I couldn't fathom.

Hold on, did I say something bad? Wait, she's an Altarian tian. Did the very mention of the lab coat shithead resurrect some unwanted memories? That bastard...!

"Sorry," she said as she wiped her tears. "You're right. You were... back then..."

It was hard to understand what she was trying to say.

Once done wiping her tears, she looked directly at me.

"I understand how you feel," she said at last. "Can I trust you to help, then? With the investigation, I mean."

"Of course."

"Thank you," she said as she extended her right hand to me. "I'll be relying on you tomorrow."

"As you should," I said as took her hand and shook it.

Thus, it was decided that Azurite and I would be investigating the ruins together.

◇◆◇

A record of a certain magical communication

"Where are you now, Logan?"

"Just entered Barbaros territory. I'll be at Quartierlatin tomorrow night. You?"

"I'm staying at a nice little inn not far from the ruins."

"Sure they don't know about you?"

"No one in the kingdom knows my face. And I have a web set up. If someone finds out who I am, I'll be the first to know."

"All right. Then we can get this over with the day after tomorrow, just as planned. That works for me. I have things to do on Monday in real life, so... Well, just keep in mind that I can only cooperate until the day after tomorrow. You won't have me if this takes any longer than that."

"Understood. I'll prioritize your circumstances in this arrangement. I doubt this would take long, anyway... Oh, and I have some extra information."

"What?"

"The younger of the Starling brothers is here."

"The younger... him?! The guy who messed up Franklin's plans twice?! The Unbreakable?!"

"Yes, the same one."

"That is some good news."

"Why? I told you about him as a heads-up — a warning."

"I've had my eye on him ever since he beat a Demi-Dragon at level 0, and him beating Franklin gave him even more value. It's a good chance to make those who think they're better than me shut up. So yeah..." There was a pause for effect.

"The Unbreakable is mine."

Chapter Five: Countess Quartierlatin

Paladin, Ray Starling

Thus began our second day in Quartierlatin.

The skies were pleasantly clear, and the morning sunlight leaking through the window was gently warming the room. It was the perfect day for an outing, but sadly, we would be heading for the ruins buried deep inside a mountain.

“How regrettable,” said Nemesis. “This day is far better suited for sunbathing, picnics, or barbeques.”

Two of those are food-related, which says a lot about you, I thought.

“Well, I got an unhealthy amount of sunlight just the day before yesterday, so I’m perfectly fine with not getting to sunbathe,” I said.

“I’m not quite sure I can see that as a joke,” she shot back.

Too soon, huh? I guess you’re right. Our battle with Monochrome was just two days ago.

For all I knew, if Miss Aberration hadn’t fixed me up right then and there, I might still be getting essential medical care at right this very moment.

Ah, speaking of Monochrome... I’ll have to get some light magic Gems before I go to the ruins.

“That’s certainly important,” said Nemesis. “But first, we must have breakfast!”

I sighed. “I knew you’d say that.”

All the food she’d eaten last night had done nothing to lower her appetite for today’s breakfast. How very like her.

I sighed at my partner’s gluttonous nature, and we both left for the cafeteria in the main building.

Once done with breakfast, we went to the lobby to wait for Azurite.

However, she wasn’t showing up, even when it was past the time we’d agreed to meet.

“Did something happen?” I wondered.

"She is a girl, after all," said Nemesis. "Perhaps she needs time to work on her appearance?"

"Well, I guess that makes... wait, no, hold on."

She wears a mask. What good would make-up do?

Right as I thought that... speak of the devil... Azurite walked into the lobby.

"Sorry for the wait," she said.

"That's fine," I replied. "What took you so long, though?"

"...I slept in."

Now that was a shocking truth. I hadn't known her for long, but she definitely didn't look like the type to do that.

"Ahem." She cleared her throat. "Now, about our plans for today... would you mind postponing the exploration a bit?"

"I don't mind, but why? You got something going on?"

"I must report my arrival to Countess Quartierlatin and tell her that I will be investigating the ruins. I intended to take care of that yesterday, but things did not go as planned."

She'd just casually said that she would meet the noble in charge of this area.

"It's really easy to meet up with nobility and royalty in Gideon, so I guess the same goes for other counties too, huh?" I commented.

"Of course not," she shot back. "What nonsense are you saying?"

"Hold on..." I said. "You know how the second princess is in Gideon right now, right? Well, she constantly escapes the place she's staying at and runs around town."

And I worked directly for Count Gideon as a de-curser.

Azurite made an expression I found hard to describe, and it wasn't because I couldn't see half of her face.

Having been taught by Mr. Langley Grandria, just like Liliana, she'd probably had to deal with Elizabeth's escapes, too.

On the way to the count's residence, I asked her, "Why did you sleep in, anyway?"

"I'm not accustomed to using bedding you spread on the floor, so it took a while for me to fall asleep."

"Ohh..."

The kingdom almost exclusively used beds, so that had to be a way bigger deal than just switching your type of pillow.

"The hot spring was magnificent, but getting used to Tenchi-style sleeping would take a while," she went on. "It's mildly odd, considering that I had no trouble sleeping in Granvaloa-style beds."

"Granvaloa uses hammocks, right?"

From what I'd heard, they had proper beds, but since the people there constantly used ships, they often had to sleep in hammocks.

The idea makes me kinda giddy.

"Yes," Azurite nodded. "I've learned about them through my mentor. He was from Granvaloa."

"Basically, bedding can be really different across countries, huh?" I asked.

"Indeed. You would be especially surprised by Legendarian beds."

Legendaria was the country south of Altar, and it was the most fantastical place in this whole world.

I recalled Marie saying that their Superiors were the weirdest people of all.

...Was it even possible to get weirder than our bear-suited KoD, the mild-mannered meathead Over Gladiator, and the High Priestess, AKA Miss Aberration?

"The beds there are that strange?" I asked.

"Oh yes," said Azurite. "They sleep on large flowers or floating clouds."

"That's straight out of a fairy tale!"

So you can't even sleep there without being immersed in fantasy.

"The country is rich in natural magic, so everyday life there is drastically different from here or in any other country," she said. "That's why they use such magical beds."

"Why does it feel like anything goes as long as you add 'magic' before it...?" I muttered, then noticed something up ahead. "Hm?"

It was a cat. Not just any cat, but a bipedal cat sìth.

"That's..." Azurite said as she eyed it. "It's immune to Reveal, so it must be an Embryo."

Seeing a cat Embryo reminded me of Tom, but his Grimalkin looked like a common, quadrupedal cat. I'd never seen it walk, either. It was always on Tom's head.

Also, this cat sìth had another special quality — it was carrying a flute.

"Hm?" I murmured. A cat sìth with an instrument? That seems familiar, but I can't remember why.

"Meow... meow," it meowed as it walked around.

It reminded me of that one children's song.

"'Oh, little kitty, lost on the road. Where, oh, where is your home?' and all that, I guess."

Come to think of it, I remembered having thought about this song in Dendro before. Nemesis hadn't liked the fact that it ended without the problem being solved. I'd thought something like, "Well, it asked for directions from a crow and a sparrow. Of course it wouldn't find its way."

That had happened at the arena, right before Figaro and Xunyu's Clash of the Superiors, and...

"Ah," I exclaimed as it came back to me. This cat sìth had been one of the animals playing music in the plaza outside of the arena.

The one conducting the orchestra had been an elderly Master with a bird-like hat, but he was nowhere in sight here.

The way the Embryo walked helplessly around made it pretty clear that it was actually a lost kitten.

Ignoring that would leave a bad taste in my mouth.

"Hey," I called out to it. "Where's your Master?"

"We got se-pa-ra-ted," it replied, not by voice, but by the music it nimbly played on its flute.

Was that a skill or something?

Some might wonder if it was even possible for a Master and Embryo to get separated, but I could assure them — it was.

Nemesis would sometimes wander off by herself to go on eating sprees in restaurants and the like.

It would help to have a GPS-like way of knowing where your Embryo was, but apparently, that required a separate skill. If all Embryos had come with such abilities, I'd never have walked in on Nemesis and Azurite bathing.

"Do you know where your owner... I mean... Master went?" I asked.

"He said he was called by the count-ess," it replied.

What a coincidence. We had the same destination.

I turned to Azurite. "Then I guess there's no reason not to take it there, right?"

"True," she replied.

"Then it's decided. We're going to the countess, too. We'll take you there."

"Thank you ver-y much."

And so, led by Azurite, we all made our way to the countess's residence.

The Quartierlatin mansion was quite unlike the Gideon mansion, which was the only other count's residence that I knew of.

The Gideon residence was split into a simple, sturdy-looking main building and a luxurious guest house, while the Quartierlatin residence was somewhere in between.

The building was refined, but it didn't put luxury above all else, and it was nowhere near as noteworthy as the gardens.

Even from the outside, I could see a wide assortment of colorful flowers and trees, gardened so harmoniously that it was almost fantastical.

I'd already thought that this town was in harmony with flora, and it seemed like the countess's residence was the prime representative of this unity.

"As I said when we arrived at the town, this is all due to the countess' tastes," explained Azurite. "I hear that she's been working to make this garden and the town the way they are now ever since becoming the ruler of the county thirty years ago."

"Thirty years..." I murmured. That must've required a lot of labor and passion.

Does the countess have a reason for making this town as vibrant as it is?

Azurite talked to the guards at the gate, and, following some verifications, we were all let inside.

White pavement was leading the way from the gate to the building, but everything besides that was the garden I'd seen from the outside.

There were many people here.

Most of them were children. They looked somewhat unkempt, but they were having lots of fun. Some were eating sweets they'd been handed, some were playing around the fountains, while others were just looking at the flowers.

The adults here, however, didn't have a uniform look. Many were masters, and many looked exactly like you'd expect "travelers" to look.

"Who are they?" I asked.

"The children are from the town's orphanages, while the adults are guests from outside of town," Azurite explained. "I hear the countess invites people to such tea parties every now and then."

Was this all just philanthropic work?

Even if it wasn't, the garden, town, and the faces of the children here made it hard to imagine that the countess was a bad person.

Suddenly, the mansion's main door opened up, and a gentle-looking, middle-aged, noble lady walked out.

"Oh, my. Thank you so much for coming here all the way from the capital," she said, as she walked up to Azurite and bowed.

Huh? She's enough of a big deal to have a countess bow to her?

"Hey, Azurite, you—"

"No," she cut my words short. "I'm only getting respect because I represent a certain someone. Am I right, Countess Quartierlatin?"

"Eh...? Oh, certainly. Ohohoh..."

It seemed kinda fishy, but if they insisted that was how it was, I had no choice but to leave it at that.

Anyway, Azurite and the countess's talk needed to include confidential matters. Even though I was a cooperator, I was still an outsider, so I was told to wait in the waiting room until they were done. But...

"Can I wait in the garden, instead?" I asked. "It's really magnificent, so I'd like to look around."

"I see," said Azurite, as she turned to the countess. "Would that be all right with you?"

"Certainly," the lady said. "Look at it to your heart's content."

The countess gladly approved, and so it was decided that Nemesis, the lost cat, and I would stay outside.

Right after the two of them entered the building, we went to the garden that was full of playing children.

Oh, I almost forgot! I realized. The lost cat's Master should be somewhere here.

I walked up to a nearby servant and said, "Excuse me, this cat is—"

"Wind!" Someone off to the side cut my words short. "Where were you?"

It was an old man accompanied by a centaur, kobold, and a harpy. They looked like Embryos, and they all had instruments in their hands.

I could remember seeing the two besides the harpy back in Gideon, so there was little doubt that this man was the cat sìth's Master. Also, unlike in Gideon, the man wasn't wearing a mask this time.

"Meow!" The cat named Wind meowed and leapt over to the old man.

Well, I'm glad to see the search didn't take long, I thought.

Then the man and his Embryos walked over to me.

"Are you the ones who brought Wind to us?" he asked. "Thank you very much for that. Wind is quite curious, you see. It's not rare for him to get lost."

"No need to thank us. We just happened to have the same destination," I said.

"I'm still grateful, though. We almost started to perform without a wind instrument."

"Perform?"

"Oh, we are a group of traveling musicians. We were performing on the streets of the town this morning, and a servant of the countess invited us over to play for the orphans she'd invited for a tea party."

I see, I thought. From what I've heard back in Gideon, he and his Embryo play music that's first-class. It's sure to make for a great tea party.

"Although my forte is composition, rather than performing, I couldn't refuse the request of someone enchanted by my music..." he said. "Oh, where are my manners? I am Veldorbell, a wandering composer without a country. And these are my Embryo — Wind, Clavier, Percussion, and Strings."

He gestured to each in turn, introducing the cat sìth, harpy, kobold, and centaur, in that order.

Names based on music... a group consisting of a cat, bird, dog, and horse... I mean, donkey... I guess the Embryo was based on the Town Musicians of Bremen musical.

"Ah, I'm Ray Starling." I introduced myself, too. "And this is my Embryo, Nemesis."

"Indeed!" she said. "I'll be looking forward to your performance!"

"Heh heh, as you should... Hm?" Mr. Veldorbell seemed to realize something, looking at me curiously. "Ray Starling...? Are you the one they call 'Unbreakable'?"

"Yes, that would be me."

Man, I sure am used to that nickname by now...

"I see. I was there during the incident at Gideon, but I was given the death penalty before you entered the stage and shone. Such a shame I didn't get to see it."

"Oh, uh... that's unfortunate," I said and thought, Man, yet another victim of the lab coat shithead.

Oddly, Veldorbell's reaction to my words was strange. He looked surprised, then made a wry grin.

He muttered something that I couldn't make out. "She didn't tell anyone? Well, neither my name nor face was on the wanted list, and I could use the save point without an issue, so I thought that was the case, but..."

"Um, is something wrong?" I asked.

"Oh, not at all. Anyhow, I got the death penalty for a reason. I don't mind it, and neither should you."

"Really?"

"Really. Now... the young lady, here, seems excited for our performance, so we will start right away. Are you ready, Wind?"

"Al-ways am!"

"Very well. Let's begin," said Veldorbell as he and his Embryo gathered in the open space prepared for them. "We shall now start our performance. I hope the music we play here tugs at your heartstrings as well as all the beautiful flowers here."

Following a bow, they began playing.

The moment the music reached my ears, I actually gasped.

I was used to absurdly good music because I had the jack-of-all-trades Shu for a brother, but this performance, conducted by Veldorbell and played by his Embryo, was so good that it actually overcame that and gave me goosebumps.

The servants and the travelers were visibly awed, and the children, in all their purity, were completely moved and overjoyed to hear it.

I'd heard their music in the plaza before the central arena in Gideon, but this performance was on a whole different level.

Suddenly, I realized that the harpy with the keyboard hadn't been with them back then. This time, the whole group was here, and they seemed to be even better than they had been before.

Listening to their music made me lose track of time. The performance was over before I realized it, and everyone — myself and Nemesis included — showered them in applause.

“Play something cool next, mister!” shouted one of the children.

“No! I want a cute song!” exclaimed another.

This was obviously their first exposure to music of this quality. They passionately asked for an encore.

“Heh heh. No need to rush me, children. You will all get a turn,” said Veldorbell as he began the next song, clearly enjoying what he was doing.

◇◇◇

Residence of Countess Quartierlatin, study

Deep inside the mansion, in the countess's study, Azurite and the lady were having a conversation.

"So you will be exploring those ruins, then?" asked the countess.

"Indeed. I wish to find out what kind of facility it is as soon as possible," replied Azurite as she examined a set of documents handed to her by the countess. They contained all the information on the ruins that had been gathered since the ruins' surfacing three days ago. "It seems like there hasn't been much progress beyond the hall with the job change crystal."

"Yes. They say there are lots of monsters beyond it... the mechanical sort, specifically."

"Golems, I assume? Ruins are often full of them. What are they called?"

Normally, monsters had their names displayed above their heads. That was one of the laws of this world, which was the reason why Azurite was asking that. But...

"Apparently, their names are... varied," said the countess with a hint of awkwardness.

"Hm?" Azurite raised an eyebrow as she turned a few pages on the documents.

She quickly saw that there had been encounters with machines called "Little Goblin" and "Teal Wolf," among other things, and that they didn't vanish when beaten.

"What could that mean?" she wondered. "Perhaps this is linked to the nature of these ruins. I'll investigate that, as well."

"That's great to know," said the countess. "Thank you very much."

"No need to thank me or bow your head," replied Azurite. "I'm only doing what I must. After all, I am the one who hopes that these ruins will have something that can turn the tide in the second war with Dryfe."

Her eyes as she said that were full of either sorrow or resolution — it was unclear which.

"Then, will you involve Maste—?"

"I have no intention of using them in the war, countess," Azurite cut her words short.

“But your companion is—”

“H-He’s...!” she roughened her voice for a moment before regaining her composure. “He is merely a cooperator in this investigation. That and the war are entirely different matters.”

Then, as though to gloss over the subject, she shifted her gaze back at the documents.

“I see,” said the countess as she looked at Azurite with gentle eyes. “But you trust him, do you not?”

“N-No! This isn’t trust!” she denied, as the small part of her cheeks visible below the mask turned red. She didn’t intend it, but the words that followed came out as bashful muttering. “It’s only that... I owe him a lot, so I had no choice but to accept his offer to cooperate. That’s all there is to it.”

The countess observed the blushing girl, with a smile on her face.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

Veldorbell continued his performance, filling the children’s little hearts with endless glee.

But man, there sure are a lot of children. I’m quite sure the number exceeds fifty.

I asked a servant about it, and was told, “These tea parties are a once-a-month event, and we invite all the children living in the town’s two orphanages.”

“There are a lot of orphans here?”

“Yes... many of them lost their fathers in the war, then lost their mothers some other way.”

War again, huh?

According to what Lefty had told me yesterday, Shirley’s father, the owner of the inn, had been a soldier in the war, too. So the knights definitely weren’t the only ones who’d suffered in the war.

“Oh? We can go indoors, too?” I muttered, as I discovered that the tea party’s area was not only restricted to the garden outside, but also contained a spacious room connected to it.

There was a sofa, a table, chairs, and so on. The children, who were tired from being out in the sun for too long, were cooling off here.

Curious about the interior, I walked inside.

There were lots of flowers growing within luxurious-looking vases, making the place feel both calming and gaudy. The walls had a number of portraits on them.

My guess was that the people portrayed in the portraits were the heads of this family, lined up in a chronological order. They had a sense of intimidation unique to such portraits, and some of the children were staring at them with both fear and respect in their eyes.

"Hm?" I murmured.

The portrait at one edge — likely the newest one — was different from the rest.

Instead of displaying only the head of the family, it displayed three people — a man in his twenties or thirties, and a younger-looking lady with a baby in her arms.

After a moment, I realized that the lady was the countess when she was young.

"What's this portrait?" I asked the servant in the room.

"That is a portrait from thirty years ago, when Lady Zermina was still young. The ones with her are her husband and their son."

So the countess's name is "Zermina," huh? I thought.

That aside, I couldn't shake the feeling that the servant found it hard to talk about this.

"Did something happen?" I asked.

"Shortly after this portrait was made... her husband and son both passed away."

"That's just... How?"

"Apologies," he said. "I cannot say anything more about their death."

"It's fine. Sorry for being presumptuous."

So now I knew that Countess Quartierlatin's husband and son were gone, and that she was controlling this region all by herself.

"That might be why she's so kind to the orphans," commented Nemesis.

"True..."

Perhaps her fixation on gardening had something to do with that, as well.

A few dozen minutes later, we were joined by Azurite and the countess.

The children instantly ran up to the lady, thanking her and chattering to her, all smiles, making it very clear just how loved she really was.

◇

Later on, Azurite and the countess began a tea party and, as Azurite's cooperators, Nemesis and I were invited to join.

It was held on a second-floor balcony from which we could see the entire garden. Naturally, the balcony was covered in flowers, too.

Veldorbell was still playing, and we could hear the performance from here. He didn't even take breaks between songs. He would finish one child's request and then instantly answer some other child's request, making it obvious that he was enjoying this immensely.

Though, I didn't know how to feel whenever he started playing some anime song, or the BGM of some famous movie.

The tea party with the countess consisted of her thanking us for cooperating with Azurite and explaining the inner structure of the ruins, based on the explorers' accounts.

But when that was all done, we started to have an idle chat, and Nemesis, still curious about what we'd learned in the room, soon asked, "Why do you invite the orphans to these tea parties?"

The countess showed no aversion to giving an honest answer, and said, "I call the little ones here to distract myself from my loneliness. I once had a son — Emilio. While I was ill, my husband took him on a trip, only to be attacked by monsters."

I was silent.

"I lost Emilio before he was old enough to run around... so seeing healthy children always soothes my heart," she went on as she looked at the orphans in the garden. "It's also the reason behind this garden. My husband was an Altarian diplomat, but he had gardening as a hobby, so being surrounded by flowers helps me remember him. The large tree at the center of the garden was transplanted there while he was still alive and well."

The children... the garden... all of it was just a means of dealing with the loneliness from losing her family.

As saddening as it was, that wasn't something anyone could fault her for.

As she looked at the orphans, I looked into her eyes, which made me realize something.

"Heterochromia...?" I murmured.

Her eyes had slightly different colors — the right was blue, while the left was green.

Hearing my mutter, the countess faintly smiled and spoke, "These eyes are quite common in the Quartierlatin bloodline. My son had them, as well."

"Really?"

"Yes... They're actually the reason why I also invite travelers to my tea parties."

"You invite them because of heterochromia?"

How are those two things linked?

"After my husband and Emilio were attacked by monsters, my husband's body was brought back to me, but they couldn't find Emilio's. He was but a baby, so maybe there was nothing left, but a part of me believes that he might've been saved, and that he is still alive and well somewhere..."

I was silent.

"That's why I ask travelers whether they've seen a man with eyes like mine. It's been thirty years since then, though, so I've half-given up on this." She formed a listless smile.

I couldn't help but open my mouth. "The possibility may be low, but as long as it isn't zero, you should continue doing it. I think that, if you give up only half-certain about what became of him, the regret will haunt you far longer than it would otherwise."

I was merely speaking my mind. We'd met each other today, so I probably wasn't in a position to say something like that, but I didn't care if I came off as impertinent. I honestly thought that the regret would be far worse if she gave up.

"That's true," she said, agreeing with me. "You are absolutely right. As his mother, I can't give up on the possibility of him being alive. Thank you, Mr. Starling. You are exactly as the rumors say you are."

"It's nothing, really..." Honestly, I was mildly curious about what the rumors said about me.

I hope I'm not as infamous as Miss Aberration, at least.

"Now that we are on the subject," she spoke up again, "have you seen a man with eyes like mine? He should be over thirty now."

"Well, I'd be happy to tell you if I did, but you are the first tian with heterochromia I've ever met..."

It was a pretty common thing to see among us Masters, though. Some people — like Juliet, for instance — went out of their way to give heterochromia to their avatars during character creation.

Tians are a different matter, though. I've never seen a tian with eyes like hers... hold on a second.

"Now that I think about it, I think I know someone with the same right eye color," I said slowly.

"If you mean me, then that is only obvious," said Azurite. "My mother had Quartierlatin blood in her."

"Ohh, I see what you mean."

Sure enough, Azurite's and the countess's eyes were much alike.

However, the person I had in mind had the exact same right eye color as the countess.

"But there's no way, right?" I murmured.

I mean, both of his eyes were blue.

The tea party ended shortly afterwards, and we left the residence grounds to head to the ruins.

"Thanks," said Azurite, right after we left.

"For what?" I raised an eyebrow.

"For what you said to the countess. She has been searching for her son for thirty years, and despite appearances, she seemed quite exhausted. Hearing your sincere words must've been uplifting for her."

Oh, that.

"I just said what I thought. I don't deserve any thanks for that."

"Indeed," said Nemesis. "Ray says exactly what he thinks far too often. Just yesterday, after the bath incide-mghmghmh..."

I shut her mouth before she could tell Azurite about what had happened after my waking up from Fainting. I'd been so straightforward, back then, that even I was embarrassed about it now. I didn't want it dug up.

"Well, anyway," I said. "It's finally ruin time, right?"

"Yes," nodded Azurite, starting to walk. "Let's head to the— Hm?"

She noticed something and stopped.

I followed her gaze to find someone I was acquainted with.

“Dr. Mario?”

It was the archeologist we’d met yesterday.

He seemed to be looking through the fence surrounding the countess’s residence, to watch the magnificent garden beyond.

Many would find the fact that he was looking at a place full of children to be... questionable, to say the least.

However, the way he looked at the garden made it obvious that he was lost in deep thought, and not even his thick glasses detracted from that impression. It seemed as though he was trying hard to... remember something.

“Ah. Oh. If it isn’t-a young Ray and the young lady,” he noticed and greeted us. “Oh, and who is this dark little ragazza, hm?”

“Oh, she’s my Embryo, Nemesis.”

“Mm-hm,” Nemesis nodded. “I must say, you have quite a dubious manner of speech.”

“I get-a that a lot! Ha ha ha!” Dr. Mario was speaking the same way as yesterday — like a fake, cheerful foreigner. And yet, for some reason, it felt somewhat different.

“Why were you looking at the garden like that?” Azurite asked him, with a slightly harsh tone.

“Mi dispiace! Forgive me!” he bowed his head. “The garden is so beautiful. I couldn’t-a help but stare. Forgive my lack of manners...”

“I see,” she said suspiciously. “Be careful. Stare too much, and you’ll be arrested.”

“Oh... Molto paurosi! That would be scary. I’ll-a take my leave!” he said, then turned around and started to hurry away.

While Azurite simply glared at his back, I couldn’t help but ask him, “Dr. Mario, are you acquainted with the countess?”

My question made Azurite and Nemesis raise their eyebrows.

Honestly, I wasn’t too sure why I’d asked that, either.

If I had to name a reason, I’d point to what the countess had told me during the tea party and what I’d seen yesterday.

A part of me expected my question to hold no meaning to him. However, he stopped walking and, after a moment of silence, said, “No. There’s no connection between us. Of that, I am certain,” and then resumed walking away.

Oddly enough, he spoke without any of the unusual accent. As he left, I caught a glimpse of what was behind the thick lenses of his glasses.

His eyes, still as exhausted-looking as when I'd seen them yesterday, were of a blue highly similar to the countess's right eye.

Chapter Six: Ruins

Paladin, Ray Starling

As we were leaving the inn, Shirley told me that lots of merchants set up shop near the ruins to sell battle items for the explorers.

And that was no lie — there were lots of simple stalls on the sides of the path leading to the place. They felt somewhat like festival food stands or small jewelry shops.

I bought all the pure light magic attack Gems I saw and walked while using them on my Black Warcoat. Doing that seemed to be clearly way more effective than normal sunlight or Purifying Silverlight.

"What are you doing?" Azurite asked. I couldn't blame her. It was pretty weird.

"This coat is a special reward," I answered. "One of its skills can only be used when it absorbs enough light damage."

"You have a Prism Steed and a special reward?"

"Not just one. These bracers and boots are special rewards, too."

"Normally, only Superior Jobs have that many. In fact, three is rare even for them..."

That reminded me that Marie, who had a Superior Job, had only two. Strange to think that I'd already surpassed her on that front.

Not that that meant I was better than her. It would be a long time before she would be below me as a fighter.

"Anyhow... light damage, you say?" Azurite continued. "I have a light-based attack skill called 'Laser Blade.' Should I try feeding it to your coat?"

"I'll pass," I replied. "That probably deals physical damage, too."

For all I knew, it might even be capable of damaging my coat. Not to mention that its name made it sound like a sure-kill attack.

Talking about this and that, we walked on a freshly-made footpath leading up to the mountain, and it didn't take long until we saw the entrance to the ruins, surrounded by lots of armed people, Master and tian alike.

I suddenly realized that I hadn't seen Tom in the inn this morning. He wasn't among these people, either, so I could only assume that he was already inside.

"So... we're finally here," said Azurite.

"Yeah," I nodded.

Her mask did nothing to hide the fact that she was absurdly tense about this. Although a part of me felt like she was overburdened, rather than just tense.

It would make sense, too. Yesterday, she'd told me she felt like the very fate of the kingdom depended on this investigation.

I might have to keep an eye on her to make sure she doesn't do anything rash, like her attack on me yesterday, I thought.

"Let's go inside, you two," she said before walking ahead.

"Yeah," Nemesis and I replied and walked after her.

◇

The entrance to the ruins was entirely dirt at first, but halfway in, it became covered by a strange, glossy metal.

However, some people were using tools and attack skills to remove it, which made me assume that they were responsible for the dirt walls leading to this point. The entrance must've been metallic, too, at first.

Well, I can totally understand taking this metal. It's probably a good material, I thought. But shouldn't places like this be preserved?

"Whatever is most important here has to be deeper in. Let's move on ahead," said Azurite, as she threw a glance at the wall-breakers.

The hallway was completely devoid of monsters, but the burns and bullet holes in the walls told me that it hadn't been like that at the start.

These ruins weren't a created dungeon, so monsters would never spawn here for no reason. The monsters in this part of the ruins had clearly been beaten over the course of the three days since their discovery.

And so, following an uneventful walk through the hallway, we arrived at a larger space.

It was about the size of a high school gym. The floor and ceiling were metal, too, but the design seemed to be different than the hallway's. At the very least, the metal didn't look like it would be as easy to remove.

"Perhaps this is where these ruins truly begin," said Nemesis.

“Perhaps. This place even has that,” I replied as I pointed at the large crystal at the center.

A few of the Masters that were already here were looking at it, touching it, or opening their menus around it.

That had to be the crystal I’d heard about — the one that let people switch to Prism Rider. I’d interacted with a similar one back in a church where I’d become a Paladin.

A while had passed since then, so it was best to refresh myself on how these things worked. I took a few minutes to do so.

These large crystals were the reason why certain jobs were limited to certain areas of the world.

You could switch between jobs you’d already acquired at any save point or by using a small, consumable Job Crystal. However, getting a new job required more than just fulfilling the job’s conditions — you also had to touch the appropriate large crystal.

That was why Xunyu’s Master Jiangshi job could only be acquired in Huang He, while Miss Aberration’s High Priestess job could only be acquired here in the kingdom.

Speaking of Miss Aberration and job switching, there was a little something regarding that.

All the crystals for priest grouping jobs were within churches.

Or, rather, churches had been built around those crystals.

Naturally, those priest grouping crystals were limited, and that was the reason why Miss Aberration, instead of building her own churches, had tried to acquire the ones owned by the state religion.

After all, churches built in random places were little more than empty boxes.

Because of her slimy dealings, she now owned quite a large number of such facilities.

...Too many, actually.

At this rate, she would monopolize the priest grouping, and then make it a rule that anyone who wanted to take those jobs would have to join her cult.

Since Infinite Dendrogram had healing magic, the church were both a religious and a medical group, meaning that Miss Aberration was doing the equivalent of putting every hospital in Japan under her cult’s control.

No country or person who knew how bad cults could be could tolerate something like this.

However, despite Miss Aberration's obvious efforts to drive them out, the state church didn't seem to be all that bothered by this. In fact, they welcomed it.

This was because their doctrine could basically be summarized as "Use priest grouping skills to heal the ill."

Thus, they gladly let The Lunar Society take their churches and crystals, saying things like, "There is no problem as long as we get more Priests," "We lost a few churches, but this allows us to dedicate more workers to other medical facilities and orphanages. A lot of us were lost to Gloria, you see," and "Let us do our best for the sake of the people, together."

Basically, they were good to a fault — too clean to deal with this appropriately. And this despite the fact that they would be the ones most hurt by Miss Aberration's scheming.

I mentioned all that to Azurite. "The higher-ups in the capital must feel really uncomfortable about this."

"Oh, they are..." sighed Azurite with an odd degree of certainty. She seemed to be connected to the country's leadership, so she might've experienced that firsthand. From what I could tell, the person she worked for was really troubled by Miss Aberration's machinations.

"All right, then..." I muttered, as I touched the large crystal.

I got a list of jobs I could switch to, and instantly found Prism Rider.

Before choosing it, I looked at the other options.

There were Mechanic, Engineer, Pilot... a bunch of really "Dryfe-like" jobs.

Forget whatever's deeper in — this crystal by itself may have a great impact on the war, I thought.

"But the kingdom doesn't have the foundation to make good use of these jobs, right?" Nemesis commented.

"Oh, that's true."

Mechanical knowledge wasn't something you could gain overnight. The kingdom would need a lot of research to reach the technological level of Dryfe.

"Well, whether they even want to do that is up to the kingdom," I said as I resumed doing what I'd come here to do.

Touching the large crystal again displayed a menu of jobs I could switch to. Without any hesitation, I picked Prism Rider and initiated the process.

There was no sound or fireworks or anything — the main job in my stat summary just changed to Prism Rider, and that was it.

Becoming a Paladin, a high rank job, I remembered there having been some light, so this felt a bit underwhelming.

Shu and Marie told me that the switch to Superior Jobs is really flashy... I wonder if I'll ever get to see it.

Suddenly, I got a message saying, "Switching your main job has rendered some of your skills unusable."

Oh, right. Certain jobs couldn't use skills that were from groupings too distant in nature.

I looked at my skills to figure out which skills I'd lost.

Naturally, Horse Riding was still there.

Paladin's Aegis and Purifying Silverlight were available, too. They were Paladin skills, and I could only guess they had stayed because Paladin had elements from the rider grouping.

The only skill that was now unusable was the healing spell.

I had been able to learn it as a Paladin because that job was partially in the priest grouping, but switching to Prism Rider had severed that link.

Oh well... I'd been questioning my healing magic's usefulness, anyway. The amount it restored wasn't too great. Instead of moping over that, I would just be thankful that I still had Aegis and Silverlight.

"Though you might need to start keeping a keener eye on your healing item stocks," commented Nemesis.

"True," I nodded.

Losing that skill made me wonder if I'd gained any new ones, but when I checked, I found nothing.

I guess I'll need to level up, just like with Paladin.

"Are you finished?" asked Azurite.

"Yeah," I nodded. "That's my objective done. Now I can focus on helping you."

"Thank you."

"Don't mention it. Anyway, where do we go now? There are four paths we can take here."

Three, if you ignored the one we'd come through.

“According to the information I was given, the path leading deeper underground is beyond that door,” Azurite said, as she pointed to one of the paths.

There was an automatic door there, and many people, tian and Master alike, were walking through it.

From what I could tell, the hallway beyond it was at least five meters high, and it was fittingly wide, too.

“You’ll fit there just fine, Silver,” I said as I took my trusty steed out of my inventory and jumped on him.

This was my first time riding him as a Prism Rider, but nothing seemed different from before.

“It might be related to some Prism Rider skill, so I’ll ride Silver, if you don’t mind,” I said.

“I have nothing against that, but...” Azurite muttered.

Hm? But what?

“If you don’t have anything against it... could you let me ride him later?” she asked. “I’ve always wanted to ride an original, but my mentor only let me ride his during special occasions.”

Well, Langley Grandria’s Gold Thunder was a national treasure, after all. It’s not something they can put up for rent, I thought. There might’ve been other reasons, but still.

“Why not just sit behind me?” I asked. “You’ll have to get off when we run into monsters, but it should all be fine until then.”

“Can I really?”

“Yeah.”

I can’t imagine why you couldn’t, honestly.

“What of me?” asked Nemesis. “Should I sit before you?”

Oh, right, it’s about Nemesis.

“Well, either that or you go into weapon form.”

“Mm-hm. Very well. This is a dungeon, and you can never be sure what will come for you, so I will go for the halberd for now. There might be nasty debuffs waiting for us.”

And so, she became The Flag Halberd.

Figuring she had a good point, I put on the Black Warcoat’s hood to prepare for any ambushes.

“Excuse me,” said Azurite, as she sat behind me.

It suddenly hit me that Silver was carrying two people and a pretty hefty weapon. The combined weight had to be pretty big, but it didn't seem like much for a Prism Steed. We went deeper in without any trouble at all.

"Just what I expected of a Prism Steed!" exclaimed Azurite. "We will reach the inner parts of these ruins in no time!"

"Yep!"

Careful not to trample over the people surprised by Silver, we made our way deeper in.

In unrelated (?) news, later in the day, a strange rumor was born. People said they saw an unnerving creature holding a dark flag, as well as a shady-looking masked woman, both of whom were riding a silver horse...

◇◇◇

Thirty minutes on horseback later, we were in so deep that there was literally no one nearby.

Still, I kept Silver galloping slowly enough to not crash into any people that might jump out at us.

"What are we gonna do when we're there, anyway?" I asked Azurite.

"First and foremost, we will investigate the technology kept in these ruins," she replied.

"You said that you can never tell what these ruins contain, right?"

"Yes. Also, there are two types of ruins — storehouses and factories."

"Oh?"

"Storehouses are full of items left behind by the pre-ancient civilization," she explained. "But there is no equipment to produce more of them, so you never gain much technology from them. You can salvage parts of it from the items, but it's still very little. Factories, on the other hand, are places that actually make the items. If the equipment isn't broken, you can use it for production right away, and even if it is broken, you can still look into how the items were made."

I see, I thought. Storehouses are like huge treasure piles, but factories are way more useful to countries.

"What do you think about these ruins?" she asked. "Is it a factory or a storehouse? I don't mind if you aren't too certain."

"A factory," I replied with confidence. "Yesterday, Dr. Mario was asked to examine stuff like artificial diamonds and metal plates — things that were more like materials than products. I think it's likely that this is a factory where they were making items using those and other things."

"But that's not quite enough to discard the possibility that this is a storehouse, is it?"

"Yeah. And that's where the large crystal comes in."

She nodded. "Fair point."

It was just like the matter of Miss Aberration and the state religion's shared monopoly over the priest grouping crystals.

Looking at it from that angle, it was safe to assume that the crystal here was secured so that the workers here could have easy access to jobs like Engineer and Mechanic.

Or, rather, this whole factory had been built around that crystal.

"I saw no corrosion on any of the walls here," said Nemesis. "If this is a factory, the equipment must be intact, as well."

"True," Azurite nodded. "That is likely."

The idea that a factory could still be running after two millennia spoke volumes about the technological prowess of the pre-ancient civilization.

Thinking about that made me wonder how a culture so advanced had collapsed in the first place.

Hugo had told me that it was destroyed by a god and his thirteen servants, while B3 told me something about another ancient civilization that had collapsed at about the same time.

I couldn't help but wonder about that.

"I'll have to ask Dr. Mario," I muttered.

An archeologist like him is bound to know something about that... hm?

"Ah!" I gasped as I saw a light coming from further ahead in the hallway.

In a haste, I moved my Black Warcoat to hide my face with it, and a second later, I felt it absorb something.

"Ray!" Azurite exclaimed.

"I'm all right! But there's something up ahead!"

Soon enough, the monsters that were out of sight came into vision.

There were two of them, and they were much like the construct that had attacked Shirley yesterday.

That extended to having names that didn't suit them at all — Goblin

Warrior and Pashi Rabbit.

One of them was wielding firearms similar to yesterday's Teal Wolf (?)'s, but the other one had a design focused around the energy pipe it had for a head.

"That's the thing that fired the beam!" I exclaimed as I made Silver accelerate towards them, figuring that being too far away from them was a bad idea.

The one with the firearms responded by attacking us with bullets and shells, but I avoided them by making Silver gallop across the wall.

The one with the beam gun aimed at us and fired again, but just like the previous beam, I saw it coming.

"OARGH!" I roared as I made my Black Warcoat dance and block the beam.

Soon enough, I was right next to them. Not wasting any time, I howled, "Vengeance is Mine!" and destroyed the head of the beam model (Goblin Warrior).

As I did that, Azurite used what looked like the skill she'd talked about, Laser Blade, to split the firearm model (Pashi Rabbit) in half.

The two monsters stopped moving, released particles of light, then ceased all function.

"Phew..." I sighed in relief. That battle had been really sudden, and I was glad it'd gone so smoothly.

"The first attack you received here was a laser straight to the face," commented Nemesis. "How gruesome."

Yeah. If I hadn't had Monochrome, I'd have probably lost my head, I thought in response.

It had given me some Shining Despair charge, though. A silver lining.

I asked, "You okay, Azurite? Got hit by any stray bullets?"

"No, I'm unharmed. That aside, these monsters with absurd names... I've heard of them from the countess."

Azurite and I examined the two monsters we'd beaten. The names above their heads had already vanished, and the particles of light were a sure sign that the monsters were dead. However, the machine parts, though broken, were still there.

It was the same as yesterday.

"This one's the same model as the one I saved Shirley from," I said.

“Are you implying that the monsters from these ruins escaped outside?”

That would’ve come as no surprise. Ruins were natural dungeons, meaning that, unlike how it was with created dungeons, the monsters inside weren’t bound to them. It was entirely possible that they’d leaked out.

For all we knew, there might be ways out of here other than the main entrance, and the monsters might be capable of leaving through them. Thus, the idea of them leaving the dungeon wasn’t strange at all... unlike these things.

“I heard of this, but it’s still so odd,” muttered Azurite. “These are monsters, so why are they not disappearing?”

Azurite had the exact same question as me.

Normally, monsters became light and disappeared the moment they were defeated, and non-living creatures, such as golems, were no exception. I’d seen this happen many times with the Balloon Golem Kasumi often summoned, so that was pretty much certain.

Despite that, these mechanical monsters actually had physical remains.

And no, these weren’t drops... Based on what’d happened yesterday, it was clear that these were their actual parts, left behind despite their destruction.

I picked up a part, examined it, and just like yesterday, the only description I got was: “The remains of a mysterious machine.”

Perhaps an archeologist like Dr. Mario would know more about this? I thought.

“Let’s take these remains with us, shall we?” Azurite suggested.

I nodded in response, and we gathered the pieces and stored them away.

◇

Ten-odd minutes had passed since our clash with those two monsters.

We were in another part of the hallway, stunned by what we were seeing.

“Looks like those two were left functioning by accident,” I muttered, as I eyed all the mechanical remains lying around.

These remains were of the same types as the two we’d encountered, but there were at least ten of each.

“The destruction on the surroundings is fresh, and the split constructs are still sparking," said Azurite. "They were destroyed only recently."

She wasn't wrong there — the damage on the machines was clearly new. The damage looked pretty varied, too. Some machines had three parallel cuts on them, some had a single cut that split them apart, some had holes that looked like they were caused by arrows in them, et cetera.

It felt like the aftermath of a fight from someone in the gladiator grouping. Someone who'd used many various weapons.

There was another thing of note, here...

"These are... traps," I noted.

There were machines poking out of the walls and the ceiling.

Most of them were gun-like in appearance, but there were also some lens-like devices that seemed as though they'd been designed to horizontally slide on the walls.

That's the generic SF laser trap that splits people apart, isn't it?

"It's quite clear that these traps were triggered," said Azurite.

"There's nothing on the ground, though, so whoever triggered them made it through."

A tian's body wouldn't disappear, and a dead Master would leave behind a set of random drops. This meant that whoever had passed this place had been unfazed by the traps and gone on ahead.

The kind of person could do that and... Hm?!

There was a sudden sound that seemed very familiar.

"Ray!" Azurite called out.

"That sounds like battle, all right," I nodded.

"Mm-hm," Nemesis joined. "Those echoes are coming from further in the hallway."

The hallway took a turn about 100 meters ahead, and it sounded like someone was fighting someone up ahead.

"Let's go check it out," I said, as I made Silver gallop towards the source. He arrived at the corner in a flash, and we could now see what was happening beyond it.

There was a bigger space, much like the room with the large crystal. Floor, ceiling, walls... everything was covered in metal.

And there were nearly 50 mechanical, battle-ready monsters.

However, not a single one of them was looking at us.

They were shooting their guns and lasers at something moving in seemingly every direction at incredible speeds.

As I watched this dumbfounding battle...

“Grimalkin at the mercy of the waves.”

“Grimalkin at the tail of the wind.”

...I heard someone recite a poem.

Despite all the gunfire, I could hear it pretty clearly.

“Grimalkin under the leaves.”

“Grimalkin in the shade of fire-sparks.”

The source of this poem was the thing the machines were aiming at, the thing they were firing at, but were unable to shoot down.

It was a man with a cat on his head.

“Grimalkin beyond the stars.”

“Grimalkin within the heart.”

He was The Lynx, Tom Cat — the second in the kingdom’s duel rankings, and the reigning champion before Figaro’s taking the title.

“Now dance, Octachrome Cat — Grimalkin.”

The moment he said that, Tom’s trademark cat, Grimalkin, jumped off his head.

The Embryo landed on all fours, then stood up on its back legs.

It didn’t end there. The cat then grew, lost its fur... and became another Tom in a blink of an eye.

That was surprising enough, but there was even more. Both the original Tom and the Tom that had been Grimalkin multiplied, and the two Toms became four.

Then the four Toms became eight.

“Grimalkin says goodbye.”

Suddenly, they all attacked the mechanical monsters.

They were too fast for me to follow with the naked eye.

I’d already seen supersonic movements from Figaro, Xunyu, and other top duel rankers. Thanks to all the mock battles I had with them, I was more or less used to such speeds.

It was pretty obvious that Tom’s job, The Lynx, was an AGI-focused job that allowed supersonic movement, and normally, I’d have been able to follow him with my gaze.

However, I couldn’t do that with eight of him.

Some were running on the floor, some dashed up the walls, others moved through the air.

All eight moved in all three dimensions, and with unparalleled precision. They even left afterimages so solid that they seemed like new clones, making it even more difficult to follow them.

One had claw-like bracers, one had a longsword, one had a bow... their weapons were varied, and it felt like there were even more of them than there actually was.

Eventually, the entire room became completely filled with Toms and their afterimages. It was as if this very space belonged to him alone.

Their ferocious, supersonic attacks quickly dealt away with the mechanical monsters.

“Monster Cat Mansion.” I unwittingly muttered his nickname.

This was the first time I’d seen him fight, and it was abundantly clear how he’d gotten that nickname. It was his immensely powerful self-cloning ability.

Of course, this wasn't the first such ability I'd seen. Marie's Death Shadow job gave her something in the same vein. However, that skill divided her stats between the clones. The more clones, the weaker they were.

Considering that made Grimalkin seem even more fearsome. Creating seven clones as powerful as yourself was stunning, even for an Embryo's ultimate skill, and combining that with a speed so great that you formed solid afterimages was just insane.

Staring at the eight, I couldn't follow them at all.

"Right, up... landed," muttered Azurite, standing at my side.

She was moving her head as though she was looking at something... someone... specific.

"Are you still following the original Tom?" I asked.

"Yes. Only barely, though."

That wasn't something I'd expected from a high-rank job. Perhaps there was truth to the idea that tians were the better technical fighters, and we Masters only surpassed them because of skills and stats.

Well... there were exceptions like Shu and Figaro, but my point still stood.

"That aside, do you perhaps know Monster Cat Mansion?" she asked me.

"We're acquainted, yeah. You too, I assume?"

"I do not know him in person, but I have heard of him, of course. He was the kingdom's duel champion for years, after all."

"Good point."

Tom had been the king of the arena until Figaro had come and taken the crown, so it was only natural for tians to know of him, too.

Hold on, I thought. Figaro became top duelist when he was still in his sixth form. That was over two years ago in Dendro time, so... when, exactly, did Tom become the champion?

"Ah! Ray!" Azurite exclaimed.

"Eh?!" I brought my attention back to Tom's battle with the monsters.

With most of the monsters destroyed, the winner here was as good as decided.

But then, a great number of gun-like objects with lenses at the muzzle protruded out of the walls.

They were the same as the sentry gun traps Tom'd destroyed in the hallway.

I didn't know if it was because they were old, but only about half of them properly worked. However, that was more than enough.

The Toms were suddenly assaulted by a barrage of lasers, more than 100 of them. Not even supersonic speeds allowed the many clones to avoid that number of high-velocity projectiles. Both the afterimages and the actual clones alike were shot.

"They hit the original!" Azurite exclaimed.

"What?!"

Azurite pointed at one of the countless Toms.

The Tom wielding claw-like bracers was shot in the head and became particles of light... but then transformed into a fat cat, meowed, and vanished.

"Huh... eh?" Azurite was dumbfounded.

"Sure it wasn't a clone?" I asked.

"N-No! I was certain that was the real one... huh?"

We looked back at Tom. The afterimages had vanished, and only one of them was left now.

He then became two, and a second later, the one that had been there from the start was turned into swiss cheese by a barrage of lasers.

However, despite seemingly being the original, he became a cat, meowed, and vanished.

Then the Tom that was seemingly a clone began multiplying again.

And so, the Toms were eight once more. They started moving at supersonic speeds again, creating afterimages and making short work of the sentry guns.

"What is that?" Azurite exclaimed, utterly flabbergasted by what she was seeing.

I, on the other hand, now understood the true nature of Tom's ultimate skill.

It didn't create "clones," oh no.

It created new "originals."

From what I could tell, they all shared a single consciousness, but when the "original" housing the consciousness was beaten, it would move to another "original." Thus, the supposed "original" would become a "clone."

That ultimate skill couldn't be countered unless you defeated all eight Toms quickly enough to prevent the remaining ones from multiplying.

This was the power of Grimalkin, the Embryo of the previous duel champion.

"You didn't know about this, either?" I asked Azurite.

"I only knew that he could create clones... I never saw any of his duels."

I see. I never saw him fight, either, so I'm pretty shaken right now.

"Few Embryos give their Master as much survivability as this one does," commented Nemesis.

Yeah.

This also gave me a decent idea of how Figaro had won against him.

At first, he'd focused entirely on defense, bearing Tom's onslaught until his battle length-proportionate enhancement had given him the power he needed to defeat the Toms before they could multiply again.

And then there was Kashimiya — the third in the rankings. Juliet had told me that he couldn't beat Tom because of compatibility issues, which probably meant that he had no way to stop him from multiplying again.

And that was exactly why I had no chance against him, either.

"Strange to think that he isn't a Superior," I muttered.

I felt Nemesis nod in response and continued to watch Tom clear the room.

◇

Once the room was completely emptied, Tom noticed us, waved, and walked over.

"If it isn't Ray and... a masked lady I don't know. Hellooo," he greeted us.

"Meoww," Grimalkin joined him. Despite having disappeared many times during the fight, he was back on Tom's head as though nothing had happened.

"Good job handling them," I said. "That was an amazing battle."

"Well, there were lots of them. I had to give it all I haaad!" Tom replied before bending forwards a bit and sighing. "I'm realllly tired..."

I had no doubt that he was telling the truth, but the way he was bending made it look like he was weighed down by the cat.

"I'll leave today's exploration at that and go back to the inn," he said. "Ah, it's safe to explore the room now. There should be no more traps."

"Eh? Thank you," I said, slightly confused.

"Thank you," Azurite joined in. "But shouldn't you be exploring this place, as well?"

I could see why she was asking that. All Tom had done here was take care of the monsters and traps. He hadn't looked around for any magic items or anything like that. In fact, he wasn't even retrieving the remains of the monsters he'd beaten.

"I'll be fine," he said. "I don't need any of thaaat stuff. Do what you want with it."

"Meoww."

With those words as his last, Tom casually waved his hand and walked away.

The moment he went behind the corner in the hallway, Nemesis muttered, "What was his purpose here, I wonder...?"

I was curious about that, too, but my top priority right now was the investigation.

We got off of Silver and started exploring the room. Nemesis went back to her human form.

All the machine remains here made it a pain to get around, but this place was much like the room with the crystal.

The most notable feature here was the large painting on one of the sides of the room. Although, it looked less like it was painted and more like it was burnt into the wall.

That painting displayed countless people clashing with a horde of beasts, then another horde of beasts howling atop a place that looked like a castle.

There was some writing under it, but unlike the text you'd find on signs and the like, it wasn't getting auto-translated.

It seems pretty important, though, I thought.

"Can you read this?" I asked Azurite.

"I can't."

If a tian like her couldn't read it, it meant that this wasn't written in Infinite Dendrogram's common, but some language they'd used in the pre-ancient civilization.

In that case, all we could do was show it to Dr. Mario.

"Do you have a camera?" I asked. "Polaroid or digital cams would be the best for this."

"I don't know what 'Polaroid' and 'digital cams' are, but I have a magic camera that instantly develops the picture," she said, as she reached into her inventory and took out an object much like a polaroid camera.

Well, she sure came prepared. It's clear she's taking this investigation seriously.

Azurite took a number of pictures and gave me one displaying everything on the wall, including a close-up of the unreadable text.

"You'll be showing this to the archeologist, I assume?" she asked.

"Yeah. Is that bad?"

"It isn't... but I will want to hear the translation, as well."

"Of course," I nodded as I took the photos.

I couldn't shake the feeling that Dr. Mario was making Azurite uncomfortable. Yesterday, she'd said that it was strange for an archeologist to be in the area this early. However, he was the only archeologist we had access to, so we had to rely on him if we wanted to know about this text.

"You don't trust Dr. Mario?" I asked her.

"This is not about trust. I'm merely uncomfortable about involving outsiders. If it was possible, I would make this investigation more confidential... but the kingdom currently has next to no people who know archeology."

"Really?"

"Yes. My teacher, the Arch Sage, was well-versed in many things, archeology included, but he passed away in the war. His apprentices, too, were lost either in the war or during Gloria's attack."

"Ohh..."

According to Liliana, the knight orders had suffered severely in the war, and it looked like the other major groups of the kingdom were no different.

"These ruins are far larger than I anticipated, and there's a lot of specialized language that's a challenge to analyze," said Azurite. "We need outside help to find out what this factory produces."

"What?" I raised an eyebrow. "But we already know what they make here."

"...Eh?"

Azurite looked surprised, but it seemed plain to me that we already had enough info to make an educated guess about the nature of this place.

Yesterday, someone had brought Dr. Mario a metal plate as tough as a magic item and an artificial diamond used for lasers.

Additionally, despite presumably protecting this place for two millennia, the machine monsters were functioning without any problems to speak of.

About half of the sentry guns here weren't working, so it was odd that the monsters we'd fought had been running so smoothly.

Which led me to believe that this place was...

"It's producing mechanical monsters," I said. "These ruins are basically a weapon factory."

What we'd defeated weren't guards from millennia ago, but newly-produced machines.

"A weapon factory," Azurite muttered as she put her hand on her forehead and began thinking.

If used well, a weapon factory would surely be a powerful asset to the kingdom. Nothing would increase the country's military strength as greatly as that.

However, there was a problem...

"Ray," she spoke up. "Assuming this place is what you say it is and these machines are the products... there's still one major question that remains unanswered."

"Yeah, I know what you mean."

I knew exactly what she was getting at. It was the most notable thing about these mechanical monsters.

"That doesn't explain why they have unrelated names like 'Teal Wolf' and 'Goblin Warrior,' right?" I asked.

"Exactly."

Normally, monsters had their names displayed above their heads. Golems and the like were no exception.

However, these monsters here were different. There were only two models, but the names above their heads were many, varied, seemingly random, and had little to do with machines.

The only explanation I had for this was the idea that producing these machines required using other monsters as material.

The fact that fur had been sticking out of the machine I'd destroyed in the forest made it likely, but...

"Monsters that are produced like that always end up having names different than their material," said Nemesis.

"Yeah, exactly."

Franklin's creations were a good example of that.

The base monsters had different names than the resulting ones. If this really was a factory that made mechanical monsters from other monsters, there was no reason for the names to stay the same. In fact, I would expect the two models to have their own names, which would be uniform across all units.

Not to mention that, unlike these machines, produced monsters would become light and vanish just like any other monster.

What the hell is this?

"I must say," Nemesis spoke up, "these look much like Hugo's Magingear."

"Well, it was made by the lab coat bastard's clan, but the tech was still Dryfe's, and since Dryfe's tech is based around analyzing the pre-ancient civilization's tech, there's a link there, so... ah!"

A sudden realization made me cut my words short.

Magingears.

Pre-ancient civilization tech.

Silver and replicas.

Reactors and a lack of them.

This factory and the mechanical monsters.

Those keywords came to mind, and everything slotted into place.

The conclusion I came to made me cover my mouth.

"Ray? What's wrong?" asked Nemesis.

"You don't look well," commented Azurite.

So it shows on my face, huh? Of course it does. The conclusion I came to is just that bad.

I hadn't felt this way since entering the basement in Gouz-Maise Gang's hideout.

...Disgusting.

"What did you realize?" asked Nemesis.

"These aren't monsters at all," I replied.

My words made her and Azurite tilt their heads in confusion.

Ignoring that, I continued speaking the truth of these ruins. "These things... all the scrap here... is special equipment."

"Eh?" Azurite muttered as she looked at the only functioning piece of special equipment in this room: Silver.

Nemesis closed her eyes. She was probably thinking about Magingears.

"But what about the names above their heads?" Azurite asked.

"They disappeared because the monsters equipping them died. All that's left here is the equipment. There's nothing more to it."

"So, we were attacked by armed monsters?"

"No. If that was the case, completely different species like Goblin Warriors and Pashi Rabbits would never cooperate. Hell, Tom fought fifty-odd machines in this room. Did you see any infighting between them?"

"...No."

Exactly.

"Their cooperation when fighting Tom was flawless, like they were commanded by a single will."

That was the keyword here — "command." The monsters inside meant nothing.

"Ray, you don't mean that..." Nemesis muttered and looked at the remains with an astonished expression.

And so, I spoke what they really were: "These things are special equipment that take control of the user."

"?!" Azurite gasped in shock.

I was fully confident I was right.

Not every piece of equipment was good for the user.

The Cursed Bloody Regeneration Armor that I'd uncursed and used before Monochrome's destroying it was a prime example of that.

"This is cursed special equipment... no... they were designed to be like this," I muttered.

"Wait. Ray, hold on!" Azurite raised her voice, still unable to fully process what I'd just told her. "Why would anyone make special equipment like that?"

"My Silver is an original Prism Steed," I said. "He has an engine that produces all the MP he needs to gallop around, so he doesn't have to drain my MP."

Based on what Hugo had told me, the pre-ancient civilization's machines made their own MP. Though Silver was an unofficial prototype or an experimental unit, he still had the engine for it. However, the same couldn't be said for the replica Prism Steeds.

"Replicas, by contrast, function by using the MP of those riding them. This is probably because of cost. They couldn't fit all the mass-produced units with the MP engines."

Original Prism Steeds were amazing pieces of equipment, after all. If the creators could have, they surely would've made more than just five of them, and we'd have more of them in the world today. However, most of the ones around were replicas.

"So what about these, then?" I asked.

"...!" Azurite gasped again.

"We've seen dozens of them so far, and they are now scrap on the floor. Do you think they're luxury units with engines, or your common mass-produced models?"

She was dead silent.

"It's pretty obvious that it's the latter. And that's why they need fuel... living creatures."

They were clearly great war machines. Not every unit had to be as luxurious as an original Prism Steed. Sometimes quantity produced way greater results than quality.

The fact they could function just fine after taking in weak monsters like Pashi Rabbits and Teal Wolves showed they also had good MP efficiency, as well.

The equipment took something that couldn't be used in battle and turned it into something useful, and there was no arguing that it made them into excellent weapons.

I'm gonna be sick.

"Yesterday, when I ran into the first one of these, it was assaulting Shirley," I said. "However, it didn't try to kill her."

It'd fired at me the moment it saw me, but it had treated Shirley differently. It'd attacked the Master, but not the tian.

"It was planning to take her back alive."

"Wait... are you saying that...?!" Azurite raised her voice, the panic in her tone all too apparent.

I nodded and spoke the answer that made me so nauseous.

"To these things, even people are just fuel."

Chapter Seven: Power and Will

About a certain weapon

Prism Persons.

That was the name given to humanoid automata with superhuman abilities.

They were one of the pinnacles of technology — so advanced that even the pre-ancient civilization thought they greatly surpassed the norms of their science.

Many considered them to be the perfect fusion of magic engineering and magic biology, the apex of both form and function.

They possessed humanoid frames of great beauty, intelligence to communicate with mankind, and they behaved like the most disciplined of people.

Their battle prowess, too, was simply phenomenal. They matched Superior Jobs, and sometimes even surpassed them. A Prism Person known as “Diamond Slayer” was said to have defeated the Over Gladiator of their era without suffering a hint of damage.

Prism Persons, much like Prism Steeds, were considered to be some of the greatest things the supreme artisan Flagman had created.

Thus, it was only natural for people to consider mass-producing them.

But of course, doing so meant removing a large number of the functions available to the originals. After all, mass-produced Prism Steeds had to drop their special functions and lose their highly-expensive reactors, making them use the riders’ magic instead.

The Prism Persons were no different. Installing reactors in all of them was impractical, so they had to use other sources of magic. However, unlike Prism Steeds, which were designed to be mounts, Prism Persons were meant to be autonomous weapons. Turning them into mounts powered by the riders’ magic would go against their primary design concept.

Besides discarding the reactors, the mass-produced units also didn’t inherit the humanoid, superhuman beauty of the originals, nor did they receive their unique powers.

As a result, the blueprints depicted machines that used the people riding them as their source of magic, were humanoid in design — albeit rough and mechanical — and made up for their lack of special abilities with external weaponry.

In a way, they were much like the Magingears that would come to be used in the Dryfe Imperium two millennia later.

This made them completely unlike the original Prism Persons.

Even Flagman himself was dissatisfied with the blueprints he'd drawn, and the Prism Person mass-production project was halted before a single unit was produced.

That was the reason why, in the future, Dryfe's technology salvaging operations would only result in tank and exoskeleton Magingears. Humanoid mechs would only be invented by Masters.

Still, the invasion of the incarnations forced the ancient people to restart the project. Their fight for humanity's survival needed all the firepower they could get.

They had newer, more powerful weaponry, such as the Prism Dragons, but they were severely lacking in numbers.

Their infantry divisions were annihilated by the inexhaustible Incarnation of Beasts, pressing them into developing a force that, unlike the mass-produced Prism Steeds, could fight on its own.

Thus, they resumed the Prism Person mass-production project and began developing the first units.

Flagman rushed back to their blueprints and quickly began building the "Prism Soldier" auto-production plant.

However, he quickly hit a wall.

According to the blueprints, the mass-produced Prism People had to be controlled by trained Pilots.

However, they had already lost too many soldiers to the incarnations, so they didn't have enough people qualified to become Prism Soldier magic sources.

This lack of personnel was something that not even a genius like Flagman could solve, so his solution came from another angle — a single thought, both simple and reasonable.

It doesn't have to be people, does it?

The only reason why Prism Soldiers needed people was their lack of a reactor. They needed Pilots to provide them with magic, and that was all there was to it.

In other words, as long as they had magic, even non-humanoids — monsters — were viable sources.

If they were to capture them and give them no means of control, wild beasts and the like could be used as batteries that powered the machines while their programming did all the fighting.

This realization was a light of hope for Flagman.

But then he ran into another problem.

Specifically, it was the matter of how the program would differentiate between sources of magic and the enemy.

He had the option of leaving a few commanding officers or engineers to control it as they deemed appropriate, but it was likely that they would eventually die in the incarnations' onslaught. For this system to operate smoothly, they had to make it completely automatic.

Ideally, Flagman wanted to make it so that, as long as at least one plant was active, it would automatically mass-produce Prism Soldiers that would continuously fight the incarnations.

However, mass-produced units weren't capable of processing instructions that were too complex.

Thus, Flagman solved this by using two simple settings.

First, he recorded all the humanoid races living on the continent in his era and made it so the machines saw them as neither hostiles nor magic sources.

The other setting made it so the machines would annihilate anything with a threat ranking of C or above, and use anything D or below as energy sources.

"With this, we'll have soldiers who automatically power themselves while fighting the incarnations and dangerous monsters. They will be mankind's hope for all eternity," Flagman muttered to himself as he finished the auto-production plant.

But he also knew that, were he to activate it right away, the incarnations would surely discover it and destroy it. That was why he made it go into sleep mode and set the plant to produce Prism Soldiers slowly and in secrecy. Then, when certain conditions were met, it'd send its soldiers out to capture more sources and fight the incarnations.

Thus, just like the other ruins, the Prism Soldier plant was left behind to become the hope of future mankind.

Now, the reason why this plant eventually became an error was a major flaw in Flagman’s genius design.

Specifically, it was all in the machines’ targeting setting.

The ruins had been left behind two millennia ago, and the list of humanoid races was as old as they were.

Naturally, that was more than enough time for tians to start to differ from the list, especially with how heavily the incarnations had altered the environment. For one thing, the amount of atmospheric magic had never been the same since.

Just as people in colder climates gradually evolved to have more body hair, so did tians slightly change to better fit their environment. There was nothing strange about this.

Alas, it just so happened that the primitive program of the Prism Soldiers couldn’t understand those minute changes — if a species was even slightly off the humanoid list they were provided with, it was not human.

A true Prism Person would’ve had the intelligence to see the nature of these changes, but the mass-produced Prism Soldiers were too lacking in intelligence.

And so, though built to protect humanity, they now saw them as nothing but hostiles or energy sources.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

The moment I told Azurite that the machines saw people as nothing but fuel, she turned pale and eyed the metallic remains.

She had come to these ruins hoping to find something that could save the kingdom from its dire state, only to find a factory of murder machines that used people as sources of energy. She had every reason to be shocked.

“If that is true, then this place and the Gouz-Maise Gang are much alike,” commented Nemesis, and I could see exactly what she meant.

To these things, all lifeforms — monster and tian alike — were just a source of energy. That was why they wandered about, gathering creatures they could use as fuel for their brethren.

If I hadn't come on time yesterday, Shirley might've suffered the same fate.

Just imagining that made a cold chill go down my spine.

Then again... for all I knew, some people might've already been turned into fuel.

"I'm gonna be sick," I muttered.

To these machines, people were but tools, and their lives were nothing but fuel. Nemesis was right — they were like Maise, the Lich from the Gouz-Maise Gang.

He, too, had only seen children as materials or money. That was the main reason why this realization disgusted me so much. It was all a bit too reminiscent of those memories I loathed so much.

I sighed and unconsciously looked down at my feet.

"Ah!" I gasped as I saw something with a close link to what I had just been thinking of: the Grudge-Soaked Greaves, Gouz-Maise.

The Gouz-Maise Gang had once been an existence that all of Gideon feared, and even after dying, it had continued to be a major threat as the Revenant Ox-Horse.

These things on my feet were what it had become, and, according to Gardranda — a fellow special reward — they had no will of their own now. They, too, reminded me of that awful time back in the basement.

"But..."

But without these Grudge-Soaked Greaves, I couldn't have won Franklin's Game.

As bad as Gouz-Maise originally had been, it had gone on to become an item that, combined with the pre-ancient civilization's Silver, could defeat the RSK. Its existence had once been nothing but vile, but there had been a future that it alone could open up.

"Just like the Gouz-Maise Gang, huh...?" I murmured.

The power on these greaves was the same as that Revenant Ox-Horse's, but what it did was the complete opposite.

Perhaps the same could eventually be said about these ruins?

"Azurite," I spoke up.

"Ray." She turned to me, looking somewhat meek.

"Can I give an opinion about this place?"

“...Please do.”

“I think we should stop the factory and break all the machines that are still moving.”

“That... seems to be the only thing we can do here...”

These ruins were far too dangerous. As long as the factory here was active, it would only become more of a threat the more time went by. And that, of course, meant that more and more people would be captured to be used as fuel.

Not to mention that this place worked fast, too. The fact that the monsters inside were alive meant that the machines had started going outside only recently — most likely after the landscape change leading to the discovery of these ruins.

The machines were using some paths to the surface to go outside and start collecting more sources. And the factory had produced this many machines in such a short time. If we left it active, their numbers would grow even larger, perhaps resulting in an all-out invasion of the surface.

We had to stop the production as soon as possible. And then...

“And then you can try to find out how you can put the technology here to good use,” I said.

“...Eh?” Azurite voiced her surprise. “We’ll use this technology here?”

“Well, yeah. I mean, you’re investigating this place from that angle, right?”

“Yes... But the power in these ruins is dangerous and fearsome, no?”

“I know that much. That’s why I’m saying that we’ll destroy all the active machines and stop the factory, even if we have to break it.”

That much was set in stone. I couldn’t ignore the man-eating machines here. The aftertaste in my mouth would be way too bad.

“But there’s nothing stopping you from searching for ways to use this tech for the kingdom... for the good of the people... right?” I asked.

It was doubtful that the whole “monsters wearing them” thing was an option, and getting tians to use them was just plain wrong, so this would definitely call for some rethinking.

Nevertheless, this place was a treasure trove of pre-ancient civilization tech — a thing that the ancestors of the current tians had left as a hope for the people of the future. There was no way that this place didn’t have anything that could be used for good.

Or perhaps that's just what I want to believe, I thought.

"But that is far too dangerous," said Azurite. "We don't know if we can use the technology properly."

I knew full well what she was trying to say.

In fact, a large part of me agreed with her.

This place was seriously dangerous, and perhaps it was best to just blow it all up until there was nothing left.

However...

"Yeah, you can never be sure if you can use any power correctly... but no matter what the power is, trying to use it correctly is never a mistake."

"...!" Azurite gasped.

The machines these ruins were making were just sickening, but that didn't mean that this sickening technology couldn't become a key to a better future. We had Gouz-Maise as a great example of that.

"By itself, power isn't good or evil," I said. "I've come to realize that those things only apply to the will of those who wield it. That's why we'll destroy the system — the will — that's running this operation fueled by life, and then the kingdom's will can take the power and decide how to use it."

"Power... and will..." She repeated the keywords.

"Basically, it's all about whether those who use the power are wrong... no, wait... it's all about what they want to do."

She silently looked at me and Nemesis. Then she looked at her own sword, just as she had last night. "The same goes for you, I assume?"

I felt like that "you" included more than just me and Nemesis.

She was probably talking about all Masters and their powers, their Embryos. Masters with wills belonging to Dryfe had used these powers to ravage the kingdom, but there were also Masters who'd used powers of a similar nature to stop them.

Yeah, I guess we're the same in that regard.

"I understand," Azurite said at last as she turned around and walked towards the hallway. "Let us return to the surface. I must talk to the countess... while considering your opinion, of course."

"Yeah!"

We left the room, got on Silver the same way we had to come here, and headed back to the surface.

"Ray," Azurite muttered from behind me. "Thank you for giving me hope. Both this time... and back then."

I didn't really know what she meant by "back then," but her tone was definitely lighter than before.

◇

Once outside, we went straight to the adventurers' guild.

We did that so that we could tell them about those constructs, and create two quests — one for the destruction of the machines wandering the surrounding area, and one to get someone to keep watch over those ruins.

Apparently, Azurite held the right to start quests in the name of the kingdom, and because of that, those quests could be put up as "urgent."

She had a private talk with the top of the Quartierlatin guild, and before long, the quests were available to be picked up.

The wandering machine destruction quest was aimed at Masters. It had no people limit and the reward was great, so the Masters in the guild quickly jumped on it.

The guild's own, experienced tians were tasked with keeping watch over the ruins.

"One by one, those machines aren't much for a battle-focused Master with a high-rank job," I muttered. "And when the machines that gather the fuel are gone, the production of new ones should stop, too. This buys us some time."

Looks like I won't have to worry about the machines kidnapping people for the time being, I thought.

Azurite also set up a quest to search the ruins for a path leading to the factory.

The room we'd arrived at was a dead-end, and we hadn't run into any more machines on the way back. Therefore, the factory was probably on a route other than the one we'd taken, or it could only be accessed from another entrance.

To stop the factory, we first had to know where it was.

"I guess all we can do is wait for someone to find it, huh?" I said.

"Indeed," nodded Azurite. "If someone finds the factory tonight, we can send people there to stop it tomorrow morning. We must talk with the countess about this, so let us head there after that happens."

"All right."

Azurite looked far better than she had back in the ruins, which was probably thanks to the fact that she'd created a countermeasure to all that was happening in the ruins, and now felt hopeful about the technology there.

After leaving the adventurers' guild, we went back to the countess's mansion.

This time, I could join the conversation right from the start, and we started out by telling her about the machines in the ruins and how dangerous they were.

"I see," the countess said in response. "What a coincidence. Just today, I was told of odd mechanical constructs wandering the surrounding area. I believe they were the same as the ones you saw in the ruins."

"That means that the unit you said you destroyed yesterday was not the only one to leave the ruins," said Azurite as she faced me.

"Or maybe the few units that were already functional secured enough creatures to activate more units," I said. "If that's true, their numbers will just keep increasing until... hold on."

"Ray?"

As I spoke, I was hit with a realization.

Their numbers were growing because they were securing more fuel.

Their fuel was living creatures. They couldn't move unless they got MP from a life form.

Which meant that...

"Hey," I spoke up. "At first, they didn't have a single creature they could use as fuel, right? So... how was the first unit able to function?"

"Wh—!" Azurite gasped.

It shouldn't have been able to. However, the reality was that it had. The first unit had been functional, their numbers had increased, and their numbers were still growing.

Did they happen to capture some animal that accidentally wandered into the ruins? Or...

"Maybe there's a unit that can move on its own?" I pondered.

Like... a unit with a reactor, just like Silver.

"A commander unit, of sorts?" asked Azurite. "Would you assume it exists?”

I was silent, thinking about it. I would.

It wouldn’t be surprising if that horde of machines was led by a non-mass-produced leader unit. Which would make stopping the factory far more difficult.

That idea made the mood turn sour.

Munch munch! Crunch crunch!

But Nemesis was just chomping on cookies as if it were none of her business.

“Nemesis...” I muttered disapprovingly.

“H-Hey! We were in the ruins for most of the day, so we didn’t have any lunch!” she argued.

Well, that’s true.

“But wait, we had a light meal at the tea party before we went in, right?”

“Exactly! A light meal! That’s not enough for me!”

Man, she always found the strangest times to become the embodiment of appetite.

Also, I couldn’t help but feel that it was starting to happen more often.

“Hee hee,” the countess giggled, clearly amused by our exchange.

Azurite was smiling wryly, too.

“Sorry about my glutton,” I said.

“‘Glutton’ sounds rude! I am a lady! Call me a ‘gourmand’!”

Ladies. Never. Eat. That much. Ever.

“Oh, no need to apologize,” said the countess. “Surely she only wanted to lighten the mood.”

I sincerely doubt that.

“Y-Yes! That’s exactly it!”

Come on, now.

“I baked those myself,” the countess told her. “How did you like them?”

“They were delicious!” Nemesis smiled wide.

The countess’s own cookies, eh? Had she perhaps baked them for the orphans she’d invited today?

“I’ll try one, then... wait, there are none left.”

The plate that had been full of cookies at the start of our conversation was completely empty now. There weren’t any crumbs, either. It was as if the cookies had never been there to begin with.

Nemesis...

She looked away and whistled like she had nothing to do with this.

You're the only suspect, you know?

"We still have some left," said the countess. "Would you like to take them with you?"

"Certainly!" Nemesis instantly replied.

...Leave some for me this time.

◇

The visit had come with an unexpected comedy skit, but we'd told the countess all we needed to. Thus, I was told to go rest at the inn, while the countess and Azurite thought about countermeasures in more detail.

Just like Azurite's private talk with the head of the guild, it was probably something that an outsider like me couldn't hear.

Anyway, Nemesis and I went back to the inn. The place was significantly more empty than yesterday, most likely because a lot of people had gone outside to do the urgent quest. Even the dinnertime cafeteria was relatively free of people.

However, in the lobby next to the cafeteria, there were two notable people who hadn't left to do the quest.

One of them was Tom.

From what I could tell, after leaving the ruins, he and Grimalkin had gone to wash away their fatigue in the hot springs before going to eat dinner.

Now, he was relaxing in the massage chair, saying, "Ahhh, this massage chair is basic, but it takes away some of the tiredness from all the hard work I dooo..."

The other person was Veldorbell, the musician I'd met at the countess's mansion. He, too, was relaxing in the lobby alongside his Embryos.

I asked why he was here, to which he replied that the countess had recommended this place to him.

Incidentally, Tom's Grimalkin and Veldorbell's Wind were glaring at each other, completely still, which probably had something to do with the fact that they were both cats.

"Hm?" Shirley made a confused sound. She came to the lobby alongside Lefty and the hostess, bringing tea and snacks. “So many guests are refusing dinner. Did something happen?”

“Dangerous monsters are leaking out of the ruins,” I answered. “There’s an urgent quest to destroy them, so many are too busy with that.”

“You mean... monsters like the one that attacked me?”

“Yeah, the same kind.”

“That’s kinda scary,” she said, no doubt remembering the events of yesterday.

“No need to worry, young lady,” Lefty said calmingly. “The Masters are sure to make short work of them.”

“I’ve gotta say, it’s good that there’s a quest for them nooow,” Tom said, still enjoying the massage chair. “I mean, there are so many of theeem.”

I had no idea how to feel about hearing that from the one who’d taken care of all those machines and traps in that room and the path leading to it all by himself. He was the reason why we’d been able to reach that place and figure out the true nature of the ruins, so, in a way, Tom was today’s MVP.

“So, lots of people took that quest, huh?” said Shirley as she looked around, noting how empty the inn was.

“Yes,” I nodded. “The reward is good, and since the machines don’t disappear when they die, many Masters think they can make some serious money selling them. The kingdom’s started buying them, too, so... Hm?”

My words reminded me of a question I’d considered back at the ruins.

Nemesis and I had wondered about Tom’s reason for going to the ruins. After all, he hadn’t even collected the machines he’d destroyed.

He’d come here to prepare himself for his duel with Kashimiya and to make some money, according to what he’d said yesterday. Despite that, he’d left behind the machines he destroyed... the fruits of his fighting. Not to mention that he hadn’t even explored that room.

I’m still kinda curious about that.

“Hrmm, machine monsters, you say?” asked Veldorbell. “Were they humanoid, perhaps?”

“Yes,” I said.

“Then perhaps they are the same as the one I defeated on my way to Quartierlatin,” he said as he reached into his inventory and took out the remains of a machine — the head of the firearm model.

"Yes, this is it," I nodded before raising an eyebrow. "You defeated it?"

Isn't he a musician? As in, a non-battle job?

"Oh, I have my ways. After all, if I couldn't fight, traveling would be out of the question."

Good point, I thought.

"That's the King of Orchestras for youuu," said Tom.

King of Orchestras?

"Hrmm, did you use Reveal?" asked Veldorbell. "I certainly didn't feel it."

"Well, I'm The Lynx, after allll."

"Oh, so you are the one they call 'Monster Cat Mansion.' Allow me to introduce myself, I am Veldorbell, and I'm the King of Orchestras, the Superior Job from the conductor grouping."

"I'm Tom Cat, and I'm The Lynx, the cat-specialized Superior Job. I hope we get alooong."

Sorry, but "cat-specialized Superior Job" tells me nothing, I thought. His battle style wasn't all that cat-like, was it?

"Mm-hm, so we have two Superior Jobs here," said Nemesis. "How reassuring."

"Reassuring? What do you mean by that?" asked Veldorbell.

I replied, saying, "Those ruins are producing those dangerous machines as we speak. We need to destroy the ones still active and stop the factory inside. Once we find the route towards it, we'll charge to it as early as tomorrow morning."

"I seeee," said Tom. "So you need people for that, huh? Well, I don't mind joining. Don't have anything better to do, anywaaay."

"Hrmm, I am intrigued by this adventure, as well," said Veldorbell. "But tomorrow is no good for me."

"You have plans?"

"The children from today's tea party begged me to come to their orphanage to play again. They said there is a girl who couldn't come because of an illness. I was told that she truly loves music and would be overjoyed to hear my compositions," he said with a smile. "Since they value my Embryo's playing so highly, I see no reason not to answer their calls for an encore."

"That's true," I said. "You should do just that."

Having a Superior Job like him around would’ve been a huge help, but that promise had to come first.

As we talked about this and that, the hostess, who was giving out tea for the guests in the lobby, joined the conversation, saying, “To think that those ruins are creating such monsters... I hope we don’t have another Edelvalsa on our hands.”

“Edelvalsa?” I raised an eyebrow. I didn’t know that word. It sounded like a noun, but for what?

“It was a monster that appeared about thirty years ago. It was one of those U...something monsters that were very strong. I was still a little girl back then, so I don’t remember it well, but it was called, umm... N... Nay...”

“Nameless Army, Edelvalsa,” Tom helped her out as he blew on his tea to cool it down.

“You know about it?” I asked.

“Yeah. It was a UBM that appeared at the kingdom-imperium border about thirty years ago. Its rank was Mythical, which means that it was the worst kind of monster you could run into... Ouch. Hothothot.”

A Mythical UBM that had appeared thirty years ago...

These days, it wasn’t rare for Superiors to beat Mythicals. My very own brother had his Kim-un-Kamuy that proved he’d done just that. However, Superiors hadn’t existed thirty years ago. In fact, not a single Master had been around back then. Marie had suggested that there might’ve been some beta testers that long ago, but if so, they had definitely been few.

A Mythical UBM appearing in a world which held only tians was nothing but a calamity.

“Edelvalsa was a colony-type UBM,” Tom continued. “It could use plants, ore — pretty much anything — to create humanoid monsters that would fight for iiiit. The UBM would just continue growing in number until you beat the main bodyyy. I imagine it was a pain to deal with.”

“You sure know a lot about this,” I said.

It was a UBM from thirty years ago, yet he spoke of it like he’d actually seen it himself.

“Mm-hm. I know someone who knows a lot about UBMs.”

Well, B3 has access to Miss Aberration’s database, so it wouldn’t be surprising if Tom also had a friend with obscure knowledge.

“Yes, that sounds about correct,” said the hostess. “Edelvalsa appeared right when the countess's husband and child were heading to the imperium..."

"Eh?" I gasped.

"My knowledge of this is limited to the official announcements and what I read in the paper, but..."

The hostess began telling us about the incident.

It had happened about thirty years ago.

The kingdom's Quartierlatin County and the imperium's Barbaros County were at the border between their countries, and their relationship couldn't have been better.

In fact, back then, Altar and Dryfe were allied, just like Altar and Legendaria. The three western countries were at peace.

Because of this, both countries often sent envoys to the other.

The captain of one particular mission was the husband of Countess Quartierlatin, who was an Altarian diplomat.

One of his official duties was to bring his one-year-old son with him. There was an agreement to bring the Quartierlatin and Barbaros families even closer through marriage, so this was done for an early introduction of the groom.

Some would've questioned bringing a baby on such a long trek, but the path connecting the two countries was lacking in powerful monsters, so safety wasn't a big issue.

In addition, they had the best guard an Altarian could ask for.

His name was Aslan Faldreed, and his job was Sacred Blazer.

He was one of the kingdom's four Superior Jobs at the time, with the other three being the Arch Sage, the Celestial Knight, and the Hierophant (aka High Priestess, but owned by a male).

Originally a vagrant, Aslan's ability, nobility, and loyalty had led to him becoming an important retainer of the king. The fact that he was being sent to protect this mission spoke volumes about how greatly the kingdom valued their relationship with the imperium.

Additionally, Aslan himself volunteered to do this, since the next head of the Barbaros family, The Ram, Ronaldo Barbaros, was his close friend and rival. After arriving at the destination, he planned to have a duel against his friend in one of Barbaros's sparring facilities.

Thus, this was a good journey for everyone involved, and all was looking bright... until they arrived at the buffer zone and were attacked by a Mythical UBM.

It wasn't known why the UBM appeared there at that particular moment, or whether it was a coincidence or someone's intention.

Regardless, the Nameless Army, Edelvalsa, attacked the kingdom's mission.

Aslan rushed to the front to protect everyone and downed over a thousand of the doll legion. However, Edelvalsa had several thousands more where that came from.

They were desperately outnumbered. The dolls swarmed over them like a crushing wave. They broke through Aslan's line of defense, and the mission suffered greater damage with every passing moment.

Aslan tried to make his way to the main body, but the army was simply too much for him alone. Right when he began to think that it was only a matter of time before they were overwhelmed, a certain someone from the imperium came to their aid.

It was The Ram, Ronaldo Barbaros.

Upon hearing that his friend and the mission he was defending were in danger, he had rushed to their aid, all by himself.

And so, the two Superior Jobs faced the imposing Mythical UBM.

"...And?" I asked. "What happened then?"

"By the time Barbaros County soldiers arrived, everything was over," said the hostess. "Edelvalsa was defeated, but both Aslan and Ronaldo were dead. And, according to Dryfe's investigation reports, everyone in the mission was gone."

So it was a draw, huh?

During the tea party, the countess had told me about her husband dying and her son going missing, but I never would've thought that a Mythical UBM was involved in that.

"Hmm?" Veldorbell tilted his head. "Did you say that Edelvalsa used dolls?"

"Yeeep," said Tom. "It was a UBM that created dolls and used them to fiiight."

"I see. That's almost like... but it's been thirty years... it's impossible."

"What's impossible?" I asked.

He made a wry grin and replied, "In Dryfe, there is a tian who uses a special reward to create dolls and wield them in battle. I found it curious how similar the powers seem. But the man is still quite young, so it's simply impossible that he became the MVP in a Mythical UBM fight a whole thirty years ago. He must've gotten it from another UBM."

"Ohh, well, there are UBMs with similar powers," said Tom. "Special rewards that make monsters and items aren't that rarrrre."

And with that as the conclusion, we stopped talking about the subject.

...However, for some reason, I couldn't help but feel that I was overlooking something really important.

◇

After the hostess finished telling us about Edelvalsa, everyone in the lobby retired to their rooms.

Everyone besides me, anyway. I stayed behind and examined the lobby's bookcase for more info about the incident, but honestly, I had no luck.

"That is not the sort of reading you keep in a lobby," said Nemesis. "You might have better luck in the local library."

"Good point."

Libraries were probably closed at this time of day, and I'd be busy with the ruins tomorrow, so I probably couldn't dedicate any time to look this up. Reluctantly, I returned the book in my hand back into the case.

"Hm?" I raised an eyebrow as another book caught my eye. "The Legend of the Sacred King?"

It was clearly a children's picture book. The reason why it stood out for me was the word "Sacred" in the title — it reminded me of the Sacred Blazer from the hostess's story.

I took it in hand. The cover displayed a cutesy, distorted character holding a blue sword... which reminded me Azurite's.

"What's this?" I muttered.

"Hm?" Nemesis looked at the book. "I'm fairly certain that is the most popular picture book in the country. As far as I know, it's based on a true story. I saw it in Gideon, once."

"...Huh? You did?"

"Yes, when I was out eating by myself."

...Oh yeah, yesterday wasn't the only time she's gone on an eating spree,

I thought.

Anyway, her words intrigued me.

I could still remember how shocked Liliana had been when I hadn't recognized Elizabeth. Maybe I could prevent similar incidents from happening by finding out more things that were common knowledge here in Altar.

I opened the picture book and began reading it.

It went as follows...

◇

Hundreds of years ago, the plains in the west of the continent were home to many countries.

They were almost always at war, and it wasn't rare for nations to collapse or for new ones to appear.

One day, a fearsome creature called simply "The Evil" appeared in those lands.

The Evil had thousands of minions it used to ravage the warring countries.

They tried to fight back, but no nation could match it, let alone defeat it.

That was when a certain king rose up to face it.

He was the young ruler of a small, newly-built kingdom.

The Evil had already destroyed many larger, more powerful countries, and normally, the young king wouldn't have stood a chance.

However, the young king wasn't normal.

He was but a mere shepherd until he happened to dig up a certain sword.

The blade was like no other. It was a sacred weapon with the mysterious power to cut through anything.

Upon taking it, the young shepherd gained a special job and supreme power to go with it.

He soon quit the shepherd's life to become an adventurer.

Wandering the land, he helped countless people and sometimes even became a war hero.

Eventually, he was surrounded by a party of comrades. More and more people flocked to him, and he soon became a king.

Indeed, the king of the small, young country was none other than the strongest hero of all — the Sacred King.

And so, he and his comrades challenged The Evil.

They had to face hordes of minions and harsh trials, but he prevailed, and eventually, The Evil was struck down.

Countless people extolled him, and the Sacred King, still worn out and crying, accepted their praise.

The kings of the many warring countries even asked him to become their king, and he didn't hesitate to agree.

He then erected his royal capital over the land where he defeated The Evil, and named his new, powerful country after the blade that has been with him on all of his adventures.

Thus began the history of the Kingdom of "Altar."

◇

The book had a surprisingly hefty number of pages, and going through them took me longer than I would have expected.

The lobby was silent. The only sounds were those of the turning pages and of Nemesis eating the tea snacks.

She was eating silently, most likely to not disturb my reading. I appreciated her consideration, but... couldn't she just not eat anything?

Anyway, I more or less understood what the book was about. It read like a fantasy work or a myth, but I felt there was more to it.

Shu had told me that Infinite Dendrogram had an actual history.

It had either been set up that way, or it had been woven using time acceleration way above the 3x we had right now. Personally, I felt that the latter was a lot more likely.

Take the hostess's story, for example. Listening to her, I could just sense that she had been alive back then.

The history of Infinite Dendrogram simply had to have been woven by tians — no two ways about it.

The same surely applied to the story in the picture book.

There had once been a Sacred King — a Superior Job, surely — wandering the land as an adventurer until fighting and defeating The Evil — another SJ. This had directly led to the creation of the country I belonged to, the Kingdom of Altar.

It was the nation's origin story, and it made sense for it to be Altar's most well-known. But... there was one thing I didn't quite understand.

"...Why was he crying?"

After defeating The Evil, Sacred King had begun to shed tears.

Some might interpret that he was crying out of relief or accomplishment, but I felt that wasn't quite right. I wasn't really sure why, though.

Once I was done pondering the story, I left the lobby and began walking around the inn, just like yesterday.

My brain was becoming a huge mess, thanks to all the events and the info I'd gathered these past few days, so I needed a light change of pace.

I was by myself. It was girls' hour at the baths, so Nemesis was off to take a dip in the hot spring.

It felt like I was taking advantage of the fact she wasn't here, but I was walking around while eating my portion of the countess's cookies. They had a gentle taste. I liked them, though in a completely different way than I enjoyed Shu's stuff.

As I walked around, I eventually chanced upon Dr. Mario, sitting on a wooden bench and looking down at Quartierlatin.

"Hm?" I murmured.

It was already pretty dark outside, so I couldn't see his expression well enough to read it.

"Ohh, young Ray," he said, noticing me. "Buonasera! How you say, uh... good evening!"

"Good evening, Dr. Mario."

"They, uh... the cookies! They seem molto delizioso," he said as he looked at the snacks I was eating.

"Want some?" I asked and extended the bag to him.

"Ooh, grazie," he said as he took one and bit into it. "What a gentle taste. Were these made by the hostess or young Shirley?"

"Uh, no, these are the countess's cookies. She gave me some when we stopped by to talk about the ruins."

I was saying nothing but the truth.

However, for some reason, it made Dr. Mario gasp and lose his words.

It didn't seem like mere surprise, either. There were some feelings there that I couldn't quite understand.

He muttered something I didn't hear well. "Th... So this is how they taste...”

"Dr. Mario?" I spoke up.

"Ah...! Che sorpresa! Oh my, what a surprise! These-a are-a made by the countess herself!? I thought my heart would stop!"

I could understand how he felt, but I did found his reaction a bit... excessive.

"I must say, everyone is really busy tonight," he went on, changing the subject. "Not many are coming to have their things appraised, so I was just walking around and enjoying the scenery. Che bella..."

"Well, there's been some new info about the ruins," I said.

"Oh, I've heard. It turned out to be a dangerous place, hasn't it? Molto pericoloso."

I don't mean to sound like Azurite, but man, he's really up to date.

"Oh, right," I said, then reached into my inventory and took out the photos of the painting. "While exploring the ruins today, we found a painting with some writing we couldn't read. Can you read the text on this?"

"Hmm. Un minuto. Give me a moment," he said as he took out a lantern from his inventory and lit up our surroundings.

Yeah, you can't really read in this darkness.

"Let's see here... Hmm..."

Dr. Mario took off his glasses, illuminated the text, and began reading it. Once again, I couldn't help but feel that his eye color was much like the countess's.

"You can read without your glasses?" I asked.

"Ah, si," he replied. "In fact, they-a get in the way whenever I try to read something too close."

So they're not for nearsightedness, huh?

"I've read it. Here's what it says," he said, then began reading the text aloud. "'The day the Incarnation of Beasts devastated our four infantry divisions is still fresh in my mind. It overwhelmed the horizon, and we matched it in neither quantity nor quality. Are we finally lost? Nay — it is not over yet. There is still hope. Here, within this facility, we will complete the... mass-production of the Prism Soldiers, and one day defeat the countless Incarnations of Beasts. With that oath in my heart, I chose to depict our defeat.'"

His voice was fluent, and there was no sign of his usual speech quirks.

“That is what the painting says,” he concluded. “It is a sort of monument.”

“One depicting their defeat, huh?” I muttered.

Ieyasu Tokugawa had left a picture of himself to commemorate his defeat against Shingen Takeda in the Battle of Mikatagahara, so this wasn’t all that odd.

What was odd, however...

“‘Countless Incarnations of Beasts’...?” I muttered.

“Oh? Anything wrong with that?”

“Well, I just felt that the number has grown a bit since my friend told me about them,” I said, as I remembered Hugo’s words from the Gouz-Maise Gang’s hideout. “He said that the pre-ancient civilization was so scientifically advanced that the people became arrogant and incurred the wrath of some god and his thirteen servants, who then went on to destroy them all.”

Then, yesterday, B3 had told me that the ancient civilization had disappeared at about the same time, so I was pretty lost about the history of it all.

“Oh, that’s just the mainstream interpretation,” said Dr. Mario. “It involves elements from the religions that came afterwards. That’s what a lot of the post-collapse texts say about these events.”

“Religions?”

“Yes. Uh, si. Speaking of which, do you know what the kingdom’s religion is about?”

“About healing people using Priest powers. It’s built around the job, right?”

“Yes. It’s assumed that there were god-worshiping religions prior to the collapse, but now, it’s believed that they either don’t exist or are exclusively gods of retribution. Besides that, there’s also the ‘The One’ series of jobs.”

I could understand the idea that gods didn’t exist and the thing about “The One” jobs, but...

“Gods of retribution?” I asked.

“Si, si! Like you mentioned, many believe that the destruction of the pre-ancient civilization was divine punishment — that-a it was a tale of retribution.”

I was silent.

Hugo had mentioned that countries besides Dryfe and Granvaloa purposely avoided technology to avoid incurring the gods' divine wrath again. Mind you, the kingdom was also dabbling in it to get out of their dire situation.

Anyway, gods of retribution, huh...? I pondered that. Nemesis is based on one, isn't she?

"But again, that-a is the religious take on it," Dr. Mario continued. "Reading historical documents written during the collapse itself gives you a, how you say... different perspective. Have you heard that both the pre-ancient and the ancient civilization collapsed at the same time?"

"I did," I nodded.

"According to the documents from that time, the two civilizations in question developed on different continents."

Different... continents?

"There's another continent?" I asked him.

"There was another continent, rather. It somehow sunk, leaving only a solo flying ship... and that's what we call the 'ancient civilization.' The texts often mention an 'Extra-Continental Vessel,' you see."

"'Extra-Continental Vessel'..." I murmured. A continent had vanished, and all that had remained of it was a single ship...

"They arrived at this continent, but the prosperous civilization that was already here didn't accept them. In fact, the countries at the east of the continent began attacking the vessel for its technology, which sparked a war between it and the entire continent. Countries in the west — the Zweier Imperium and the like — must have been truly bothered by this."

So it was an unfortunate clash between civilizations from across the sea, huh? That kinda stuff happened all the time back on Earth.

"Of course, the ancient civilization retaliated," Dr. Mario continued. "Their numbers were low, but they had these powerful creatures called 'Incarnations.'"

"How powerful, exactly?"

"Absurdly. If the texts are true, they were as strong as — if not stronger than — Gloria. Si, I mean that Gloria."

He was obviously talking about the SUBM, Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria. It was the strongest monster the kingdom had ever faced. Beating it had required the combined powers of Shu, Figaro, Miss Aberration, and her

Lunar Society. Shu had been the only one left standing when it was all over, which said everything you needed to know about the thing's fearsomeness.

"The Incarnations are said to have been like UBMs or Embryos in that they wielded various unique powers," he said.

Then he went on to describe those unique powers.

One could blot out the Sun with the weapons it pulled out of empty space.

Another was a beast that could multiply and bury the horizon in itself.

Another could consume countless boats along with the very sea they were in.

Another was an orb-like entity that could use thousands of unknown powers.

The ancient civilization's ship had contained these beings with extraordinary powers. The Incarnation of Beasts depicted in the portrait was one of them. The Incarnations numbered thirteen... fourteen if you included their so-called "god," the Extra-Continental Vessel.

It seemed like a meager number, yet it had been enough to crush the entire continent.

"The pre-ancient civilization stood no chance. It collapsed in no time," Dr. Mario continued. "And that's the reason why we have no details about what happened to the ancient civilization. It seems to have just... disappeared after the clash. Both of them were gone, and that's it."

Thus, he ended his history lesson.

It gave me a lot to think about, answered a few of my questions... and gave me a bunch of new ones, like, "If the ancient civilization was so powerful, why didn't they contact the pre-ancient civilization earlier?"

With all the power of the Extra-Continental Vessel and the Incarnations, crossing the sea should've been child's play.

"A keen observation," Dr. Mario said. "Many scholars argue this, as well. The fact that there was only one vessel leads many to assume they had some obscure, yet powerful, reasons for that — perhaps religious, perhaps geopolitical. We can't know for sure unless we discover some ancient civilization ruins or something, but all their civilization had was a ship, so all we ever find are pre-ancient ones. Still, I do hear that Granvaloa is exploring the sea floor for the continent that sunk."

"Do you think they'll find it?" I asked.

“Who knows? There should be traces of it somewhere, if you ask me. After all, if it didn’t exist, where else could they have come from?”

Well, I can’t argue with that, I thought. But wait, he said the pre-ancient civilization’s ship was flying, right? Then... couldn’t it have come from outer space...?

...Nah, there’s no way.

Thinking of this reminded me of Franklin’s words from the Pandemonium:

“Anyone who thinks this is just a game is either retarded or a child who believes everything he’s told.”

“I have no idea what all of this actually is. I’d assume it’s the human experimentation phase for the creation of a nation... no, world-wide virtual reality, but...”

Even if this world was aligned with his words, the devs couldn’t have made this world extend all the way out to far space. There was just no point in having done that.

He’d also said something else back then... What was it, again...?

“I have a question for you, as well,” Dr. Mario said. “May I?”

“Sure. What do you want to know?”

“Do you know anything about the Prism Soldiers mentioned here?”

“We saw some machine-armor constructs both in and out the ruins. They’re set to capture monsters and tians and use them as fuel. Pretty sure it’s those things.”

“Hmm... Autonomous weapons that use creatures as pseudo MP tanks, eh?” he pondered, looking disturbed.

“Hm?” Is it just me, has he been acting a little different for most of this conversation?

“They-a sound a lot like Dryfe’s Magingears,” he spoke again, his demeanor back to normal. “Well-a, those-a don’t have autopilot systems, but still.”

“Yeah. The system is dangerous, though. We’ll destroy all the running units and stop the factory as early as tomorrow morning.”

“Si, si! I’ve heard the guild is working on it. How unfortunate. Che sfortuna. At least everyone’s gained-a something from this,” he beamed.

Dr. Mario still had his glasses off. The lantern was lighting up his face, giving me a good look of the tired look in his blue eyes. Upon closer inspection, I noticed that the color in one eye was slightly different, but not enough to stray from "blue."

My gaze made him curious. "Qualcosa non va? What's the matter?"

"Do you have Altarian noble blood?" I went ahead and asked him.

"Why would you assume that?"

"Countess Quartierlatin has eye color that's much like yours. She said it runs in her family."

She was also heterochromic — her right eye was blue, while left was green.

Azurite had said she also had Quartierlatin blood. Her eyes were much like the countess's right, and the same could be said about Dr. Mario.

"I understand," he nodded. "Si, it's true — I have Altarian noble blood. And I've been told-a that some of it is Quartierlatin. Though my generation has already lost the, ah... how you say? Status."

"So... you have Altarian nobility in your ancestry, but the family split, and your branch isn't noble anymore?"

"Si."

That explained his visit to the countess's mansion today. He must've been curious about his ancestors' home. The words he'd said as he left also made more sense now.

...Still, something didn't feel right.

His reaction to the cookie was still on my mind, too.

"I'm quite sure I'd find being a noble to be uncomfortable, in any case," he said. "I very much prefer field work like this — it takes away the weariness from desk work."

"Desk work?"

"Yes. By that, I mean the nonstop glaring at draft budgets, applications... things like that. I'm far better suited to act on my own... I find that being important is tiring."

"Is that so?"

"It is."

The way he put it made it likely he was a professor or a director in some academy somewhere. And again, I couldn't help but notice his speech slip.

That reminded me that he hadn't told me where he was from.

I had a rough idea, though, so I just went ahead and asked.

"You're from Dryfe, aren't you?"

Chapter Eight: Freedom

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

Dr. Mario answered my question with another one. “How do you know that?”

He didn’t pretend I was wrong or try to silence me — he just stared at me with his blue eyes, curious about what had given it away.

“I’ve had a hunch since our talk yesterday,” I said.

“Yesterday?”

“You knew about Jade, didn’t you? They found that Prism Steed in Dryfe. I know someone who knows a lot about stuff like that. Just yesterday, she told me about the Prism Steeds she’d heard of, and Jade wasn’t among them. Someone who knew about it before she did has to have strong ties to the place where it was found.”

“There’s more than that, surely,” he said.

“Yes,” I nodded. “These days, the only countries looking into the pre-ancient civilization are Dryfe and Granvaloa, right? Well, you said your research involves official desk work, so it’s pretty likely that you’re from either of those places.”

That was two reasons out of the way, and I also had a third.

“You also said that you have Altarian noble blood. Altar and Dryfe might be at war right now, but I hear they used to be great allies. Consider that, and it’s not all that weird that a Dryfean has Altarian nobility in his ancestry.”

I also had another reason I didn’t feel like saying out loud. Azurite was extremely wary of him — a mere scholar. And she was an operative working for someone in the kingdom’s upper echelon.

As such, she might be acting with the assumption that Dryfe, too, had sent someone to investigate the ruins.

“A+,” he said. “Your conjecture is correct.”

Can’t say I expected to be graded, but okay.

“I certainly am from Dryfe,” he continued. “I came here to investigate the ruins. Whatever is hidden inside could have a great impact on our country.”

“And...? What’s the conclusion?”

“The imperium will surely deem the Prism Soldiers unnecessary.” He showed no intention of trying to hide Dryfe’s plans from me.

“Why?” I raised an eyebrow.

“Because we already have something similar. I know you’re well-acquainted with Mr. Franklin and his Triangle of Wisdom. Surely you’ve heard of their Marshal IIs.”

“Ah.”

“Of course, Prism Soldiers have the autopilot system. That is a great advantage, but in the current climate, it will only provoke us more enemies. Acquiring the system would be time-consuming, not to mention that we would have to modify it, as well. The pre-ancient civilization’s programs are quite unlike ours, you see. We won’t manufacture decent amounts of the machines unless we port it, so it’s best to rely solely on the Marshal IIs we already have.”

So, they wouldn’t see any need for the Prism Soldiers because they were much like Dryfe’s current war machines.

“What if the kingdom gets them?” I asked. “Wouldn’t it be bad for you if we fixed the autopilot system?”

“The kingdom knows nothing of technology. How many years would that take them?”

“...Good point.”

So Dryfe assumed the war would be over and the kingdom would be annexed before it could pull that off. Then, after things settled down, they would take over the project and take their time reprogramming the system themselves.

“To Dryfe, these ruins would only matter if there were technology we didn’t know anything about or if they contained a finished weapon we couldn’t afford to let fall into the kingdom’s hands. Especially not before the war. This place has no significance to us otherwise. Do you understand, young lady?” He turned away from me and looked into the darkness some distance ahead.

“Truth Discernment tells me you speak the truth,” the shadows replied in a familiar voice.

“Azurite...” I said, surprised. I had no idea she’d even returned from the mansion, let alone that she was right here.

“Truth Discernment makes this really simple, young lady,” said Dr. Mario, nodding. “Or should I say ‘Miss Altarian Spy’? Or perhaps, ‘the kingdom’s—’”

“And what of you?” Azurite cut his words short. “You’re not a scholar, are you?”

In a split-second, Azurite closed in on him and swung her blade so fast I couldn’t follow it.

“Gh..!” I clenched my teeth as I pictured Dr. Mario being cleaved in half.

My imagination was completely off the mark, though — he jumped backwards and evaded it.

Standing at a safe distance, he looked directly at us. His blue eyes contained a powerful glare. It felt as menacing as Shu or Figaro when they were serious.

“That was very violent of you. Molto violento,” he said.

“Perhaps,” Azurite agreed. “Now, if I may ask... how did a mere scholar dodge my blow?”

Oh, so that was a preemptive attack to test Dr. Mario’s identity and... WAIT, NO, HOLD ON!

“Whoa whoa whoa! Did you think this through?! What if he’d been the real deal?!” I yelled. He would’ve been split in half!

“No need to worry,” she said. “This blade of mine cannot cut now. Unless I aimed for his head, he’d have only ended up with a few crushed bones.”

“Goddamn, you’re such a meathead!”

Not as bad as Figaro, though! That guy’d probably just shove a chain into his face and turn his head into mush!

“You’re one of Dryfe’s special soldiers, I assume?” Azurite asked Dr. Mario.

“Special soldiers?” I repeated. I wasn’t sure I understood what she meant.

“Dryfe’s Special Mission Task Force, often called just ‘special soldiers,’” she explained. “It’s a group comprised entirely of fully-trained battle jobs or Superior Jobs, all specialized in single warfare... or infiltration, like what we have here."

A group of maxed-out high-ranks and Superior Jobs? I guess they're like Dryfe's version of the Royal Guard before their post-war decline.

Dr. Mario nodded. "Si. That is correct."

"'Mario' isn't your real name, I assume?" I asked. "Also, if you ask me, that manner of speech stands out far too much for an infiltration. Is there something else you're hiding that makes it part of your camouflage?"

"You aren't wrong..." Dr. Mario slowly nodded. "Except about one thing — I really am a scholar with a doctorate in archeology. Mario may not be my real name, but it is my name as a scholar."

So even if it wasn't his real name, he was still Dr. Mario.

"Anyway, I've been found out, so I guess this is it... Oh, before I forget..."

He took something out and threw it to me.

As I caught it, it made a hard jingling sound.

"What's this?" I asked.

"The payment for my stay here. Could you give it to the hostess? Oh, and please tell her that the food was delicious and the hot spring felt amazing. I could feel my exhaustion just... fade away."

"...Okay."

He was one of Dryfe's special soldiers and he'd infiltrated Altar, but... he really didn't seem like a bad guy.

"What if that'd been a bomb? You'd be one-armed again," commented Azurite.

"Ah." I hadn't even considered that.

"You're easy to fool, aren't you?"

"No I'm not. Sure, I had a secret player killer in my party, didn't know my brother was the KoD until the thing at Gideon, and drank the drug-slime mixture Franklin gave me, but that's it, really."

"...Let me rephrase. You are absurdly easy to fool. Such a simple man." She looked at me with an indefinable expression.

Dr. Mario watched our exchange with a friendly smile, then said, "It's a shame, but I must take my leave now."

"You truly believe you can escape?" Azurite pointed her blade at him.

"My dear. I already have," he replied, and a split-second later he vanished, leaving behind only a small bird.

“Wha—?!” Azurite exclaimed.

I gasped. “That’s...”

I recognized the creature. The bird was a monster created by Franklin. It was designed for Castling — a skill that switched the position of the user and the target monster. Gideon’s Masters often called it “Chimaera Wing.”

“Well, he’s a Dryfean soldier,” I murmured. “No surprise that he has access to Franklin’s stuff.”

Castling couldn’t have taken him too far, but the man had moved fast enough to dodge Azurite’s blade. Catching up to him would be a challenge, to put it lightly.

“Might as well assume we lost him,” Azurite sighed. “He’s a special soldier. He might have prepared something for us in the ruins or its surroundings. We should urgently hire someone to investigate.”

“You think he... or Dryfe, rather... will do something there?”

“Yes, I do. In fact, I came here exactly because I assumed Dryfe will make a move.”

“Huh?”

I didn’t really understand that. I figured she’d known Dryfe would make a move, but I hadn’t thought she was here because of that. What did that mean?

“That aside,” she sighed again, “don’t you think you showed him a bit too much? He is a Dryfean special soldier. The portrait from the ruins is one thing, but he could’ve assaulted you just for your Prism Steed.”

“Well, I was told that all original owners were at risk of being attacked for them.”

Even B3 would’ve attacked me if she’d been an active PK and if I hadn’t been her friend.

“I’ll run into people gunning for Silver sooner or later,” I said. “Besides, he analyzed Silver for me. My gratitude for that outweighs the risks.”

“Is that how it works?”

“In my mind, anyway. Also, I know he’s from Dryfe and all, but he really doesn’t seem like a bad guy.”

He hadn’t hesitated to teach me, an enemy Master, about the pre-ancient civilization. He could easily have lied, but Azurite had confirmed that he hadn’t.

Enemy soldier or not, the man seemed cordial and honest — qualities you rarely found in bad people.

“You really are simple,” Azurite grinned wryly. “But I have friends in the imperium, as well, so I can’t deny those words.”

“You have friends in Dryfe?” I asked.

“Yes. Our countries used to be allied, after all. I was a transfer student there, and...” She gained a nostalgic look and fell silent. “Oh, this is no time to talk about the past.”

True, we went off on a tangent.

“Back to the matter at hand...” she said. “According to Truth Discernment, he didn’t speak a single lie, but we should still be cautious.”

“Speaking of which, how long were listening to us?” I asked. “You make it sound like you were there from the start.”

“That’s because I was. I tried to call out to you, but you began speaking to him before I could.”

I had no idea she was there! I thought, somewhat surprised.

“Again, he didn’t lie... but his manner of speech was off in more than just quirkiness. It was technical, designed to conceal the truth without saying a lie. Most army men know how to speak like that. Special soldiers doubly so.”

“Yeah. I also feel that he wasn’t lying, but it did seem like he was hiding something.”

It had to be related to the portrait — something hadn’t felt right about the way he was talking about it.

“As for what it is...” I said, pondering.

He’d claimed, without lying, that Dryfe had no need for Prism Soldiers. However, that was still only Dr. Mario’s own take on it. We couldn’t rule out the possibility that Dryfe would come for them anyway.

Besides, even if that didn’t happen...

“These ruins might contain more than just the Prism Soldiers,” I said.

◆◆◆

Quartierlatin, mountain

“So there was no point in trying to fool them, huh?” the man named Dr. Mario muttered. Thanks to Castling and his own two feet, he was now a fair distance away from the youngsters he’d just talked to. He wasn’t using his speech quirks anymore — this was his natural mode of speaking. "Knowing them, they've probably figured out what I was hiding."

He was speaking about what he'd seen in Ray's photos.

There was a part of the text that he hadn't read aloud:

"Here, within this facility, we will complete the anti-incarnation superweapon, Acra-Vesta, and the mass-production of the Prism Soldiers, and one day defeat the countless Incarnations of Beasts."

The part he'd kept secret spoke of a weapon that would make the Prism Soldiers pale.

It wasn't news to him, though. He'd already concluded that the ruins contained a supreme weapon based solely on the objects the other explorers had brought him.

"A pre-ancient civilization superweapon..." he murmured. "We might be dealing with something as powerful as the Imperstand... or perhaps something greater."

He heaved a heavy sigh, both because he had to deal with something like this and because ignoring it wasn't an option.

"I can't let it end up in the kingdom's hands... the imperium would suffer if I did."

The special soldier looked at the mountain hiding the ruins. His eyes were bright blue, but his glare did nothing to complement the vividness.

Ray might have felt that he looked tired, but that was an understatement — the eyes were downright devoid of the spark of life.

He reached into his inventory, took out a magic comms item, and connected to a certain number. "Logan," he said. "Are you near?"

"Yeah. I'm in the nearby mountains. You?"

It was Hell General, Logan Goddhart. He was his collaborator in this operation. The only one, in fact. But that mattered little, for he was sole, but many.

"They found me out," Dr. Mario said.

"Now, listen here...!"

"Easy there. They only figured out that I'm a special soldier. They still don't know who I really am."

"They ought to know that you're the only special soldier who backed the current imperator and survived the civil war for the throne! Then again, Altar's idiots don't know shit about Dryfe's internal affairs."

“The operation starts in the morning, just as planned. Our goal is to either capture or destroy the superweapon in the ruins, Acra-Vesta.”

“Understood. But why aren’t we doing a night assault? My devils can see in the dark.”

“Not even the kingdom knows where Acra-Vesta’s stored yet... and I need some time to prepare.”

“...Oh yeah, that.”

“Mm-hm, I need more Edelvalsa marionettes. I brought some with me, but these numbers won’t do. If I use Marionette Platoon Creation right now, I should have a thousand by morning. That’s the maximum I can control at the same time. You go ahead and create your Demi-Dragon-class devils — at least two thousand of them.”

“That’s more than we originally planned...”

“Well, the plans have changed. We didn’t know about the Prism Soldiers in the ruins, or that Altar’s The Lynx and the Unbreakable were here, too. It’s necessary to be a bit excessive.”

The Hell General was silent. I alone am already a bit excessive, to be honest, he thought. The second in Altar’s duel rankings? Some promising noob? A bunch of machines? They’re nothing to me.

“Anyway, summon more than planned. Besides that, the plan is the same. I’ll go secure the technology while you keep Altar’s forces occupied.”

“All right.” Logan didn’t speak his thoughts and simply agreed. “I’ll respect your decision and accept this quest, Field Marshal Gifted Barbaros.”

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

The Prism Soldiers might not be the only kind of weapon in the ruins.

Even if the constructs were of no use to Dryfe, the spies from Dryfe were bound to make a move if they were interested in the other thing.

We rushed to use comms magic and warn the countess and the guild that the imperium might do something. Good thing Azurite had taken a guild comms item the last time we’d gone there.

“There’s one good thing about Dryfe’s involvement in this,” said Azurite. “If they attack, it will confirm that the second weapon truly does exist. We certainly won't overlook the far greater danger these ruins hold."

I shrugged. That's one way to look at it.

"But man, this escalated quickly," I muttered.

At first, it had just been the Prism Soldier factory, and now we also had some other weapon and Dryfe. I had a feeling that this whole thing might turn out to be even more trouble than Franklin's Game.

Still... no matter what came, I'd face it head-on.

"Dr. Mario knows that we're stopping the ruins tomorrow," I said. "Assuming Dryfe attacks, when do you think it'll happen?"

Would they come to take the weapon before or after the Prism Soldiers were all shut down? Or would they wait for the actual war?

All cases seemed likely.

"I haven't heard of any movements from Dryfe's army," said Azurite. "If they attack sometime around the deactivation, it's bound to be a blitzkrieg with a select few."

"A small, handpicked force, huh?"

"Yes. Special soldiers like that 'Mario' person, or Masters who excel at battle."

That reminded me of what Franklin and Hugo had done in Gideon, but this wouldn't be anything like it. Back then, they'd used The Clash of the Superiors and Cyco's compatibility with Gideon's Masters to declaw the kingdom's forces.

This time, they had no means of doing anything like that, so they'd likely use pure power.

"The numbers would be low, though, surely," added Azurite. "These ruins were discovered a mere three days ago. They haven't had the time to prepare in the way they did in Gideon."

"Even Masters who could pull something like that off are few and far between, yeah," I said.

Of course, the same could be said for us. The only Masters here were the few who'd come to explore the ruins and the ones who had Quartierlatin as their main haunt.

If Dryfe did what they'd done in Gideon and brought a Superior, the only one who'd stand a chance would be Tom, our previous duel champion.

Or maybe...

"Regardless, we must be alert," Azurite said.

"Yeah. How many Masters do we have?"

"Well, there are the ones who took the quest to stop the ruins, but..." Azurite fell silent mid-sentence.

I knew exactly what she didn't want to say.

Yesterday, she'd said that she was against using Masters in war. She would tolerate our help in exploring the ruins and stopping the factory, but she didn't want to force us into a direct clash with Dryfe.

This was like a pre-war skirmish. She probably thought we had no place in it.

"The other tian fighters and I will stand to defend," she proclaimed. "You join the other Masters and stop the ruins."

The gravity of the situation clashed with her line of thinking, causing anguish you could almost hear in her tone.

Still, I couldn't agree.

"No," I said. "I'll stay on the surface and fight Dryfe's Masters."

"Ray!" she exclaimed judgmentally.

I didn't give in. "Didn't I tell you that Masters would come to help Altar when it needed them?"

"...You did."

"And I also said I'd be one of them. So yeah, I'm fighting Dryfe's Masters tomorrow, and that's final."

I was choosing to fight, just as I'd said I would.

"But that's my role! I thank you for your help with the investigation, but you Masters mustn't take part in—!"

"Speak up."

"...Eh?"

I knew I had to fight, but I didn't know why Azurite was so against it. I needed to find out her reasons before the battle began.

"Why are you against us Masters joining the war effort? Give me a reason. Tell me your feelings."

"M-My feelings?"

"Why don't you want us in the war?"

I couldn't make a choice that respected her feelings if I didn't even know what they were.

Azurite fell silent, but it didn't seem to be because she didn't want to talk about it. She was just conflicted... contemplating something.

Soon enough, she opened her mouth, “Very well... I have two reasons, actually. The first is that I simply don’t trust Masters.”

I’d already guessed that one. Thanks to the war, many Altarian tians no longer trusted Masters, and Azurite was among them. Masters had killed her mentor, Langley Grandria, and her teacher, the Arch Sage, and for all I knew, there might’ve been many more. I really couldn’t blame her for not trusting us.

“But the reason I refuse your assistance is different,” she went on. “I don’t hold any mistrust towards you.”

That was as good as saying she trusted me. And yet she was still rejecting me.

“My second reason... is my late father’s words.”

“Your dad’s?”

“Yes...” Azurite said. “He was one of the people in the center of Altar’s government, and he thought a lot about the stark increase in Masters that started four or five years ago.”

That was more or less when Infinite Dendrogram had come out. Shu and the other first-wave players had gotten online and started messing things up or solving them.

“He used to think a lot about what would happen if these powerful, immortal beings kept growing in power and number.”

“Did he think we’re a danger or something?”

“No... the other way around, in fact. Father considered Masters to be inhuman agents of revolution who would lead humanity and the world to a better future. In his eyes, you were akin to divine messengers I’ve read about in legends.”

“Divine messengers?” I raised an eyebrow.

Well, that’s an... interesting way to look at us.

It made me think of the Extra-Continental Vessel, the god and the servants, but that was probably unrelated.

“That’s why my father refused to hire Masters for war,” she said. “He believed that there was no future for a world in which Masters were seen as nothing but sellswords for war. You are so much more than that. You are saviors from another world.”

I was silent. Wow, he sure put us on a pedestal.

That line of thought didn’t even align with the vast majority of Masters.

After all — all of us had started out with the intention to play.

Even if there were people like me, growing to value the lives of those who called this world their home, none of us came here to make this world a better place.

I was pretty sure not even Miss Aberration was an exception, and she was a damn cultist.

If Azurite's father really was a big name in Altar's government, this misconception might've been one of the reasons why the country was in such a dire state. After all... we Masters were no saviors or divine messengers.

"You don't agree with him on that, do you?" I asked.

"I don't. Even so, I'll follow his words until the end. They... They were our last..."

She fell silent again.

From what I could tell, her father must've died in the war.

Not even a year had passed since then. The memory had to be fresh enough that merely talking about it opened the wound again, making it hard for her to speak.

I silently pondered. It was easy to say that she was just a slave to her father's memory, but if it was near and dear to her heart, who was I to ruin it for her?

I couldn't take that angle, so...

"Before I came here, someone told me this," I began.

"Eh?"

I began to quote. "'You can become a hero or the demon king, a king or a slave, a good person or an evil person. You can do something, or you can do nothing. You can stay in Infinite Dendrogram, or leave it. It's all up to you. If it's possible, then you can do anything you want.'"

I was speaking about myself... or, rather, us Masters. That was what Cheshire had told me when I'd asked about the goal of Infinite Dendrogram.

"Who said that?" asked Azurite.

"Those were the words I was told before I came to this world as a Master," I answered. "As far as I know, most Masters are told something similar."

According to Figaro, his control AI had seen him off with, "Blessings upon your days and the freedom they bring."

That was most likely the thing the control AIs — the devs — found most important.

Basically... it was all about freedom.

"Masters are free," I said. "Whatever we do is up to us to decide. We're not some single mass going around changing or destroying the world."

She was silent.

"All Masters follow their own wills and choose how they're gonna be," I continued.

Masters were free — we always had a choice. We were free to choose whatever we wanted, even if it came with a lot of responsibility, or it came at the expense of somebody else.

Many Masters, myself included, had made many choices during their time here. And it was time for me to choose yet again.

"As a Master, I choose to protect you and Quartierlatin."

My choice was probably against Azurite and her father's wishes, but I would stick with it until the end.

She gasped softly.

"This isn't some supreme Master consensus," I said. "Your dad's ideals, or your own, have nothing to do with it, either. This is all just me, my freedom, and my selfishness."

I would choose to protect Azurite even if she was against it, which was probably the purest expression of Master-like freedom.

"Why are you so considerate of me?" she demanded.

It was a very valid question.

"I... I'm not really sure either, if I'm honest."

I'd only met her just yesterday. What reason did I have to care about her so much?

"...Because you saw me naked?"

"NO, DAMN IT! The reason I want to protect you is..."

I didn't know why myself, but I was pretty damn sure she was off the mark with that guess. A few seconds later, I finally figured out the real answer.

"...it's because I just couldn't ignore you."

"What do you mean?" Azurite asked.

"You are by far the most tense person I've ever met. It feels like you're completely on-edge, even when we’re just talking like this.”

This impression had reached its peaks back at the room with the portrait... and right now too, actually. She seemed on the verge of breaking or bursting, yet she was still giving her all to fulfill her duties.

It made me want to support and protect her. Sitting by and just watching her waste away like this would leave a bad taste in my mouth, surely.

“In my heart of hearts, I just want to support and protect you,” I said. “There’s nothing more to it.”

“...I understand,” she said slowly.

“So yeah, I’m going to be with the defense tomorrow. I won’t tell you to drop your outlook or go against your dad’s will — I’ll be by your side just because I’m selfish.”

“I can’t even tell if your logic is flawed or flawless... I just can’t...” Azurite spoke in a teary voice. However, the edges of her lips were bent slightly up. “Still... thank you.”

She was both smiling and crying at the same time.

◇◆◇

A few minutes later, the two left the scene to get ready for tomorrow.

They needed to shut down the factory, prepare for Dryfe’s assault... there was no shortage of things to be done.

However, neither of them realized that they hadn’t been the only ones there.

Silently, the third person showed himself.

It was The Lynx, Tom Cat.

“Freedom, eh...?”

Just like Azurite before, he’d hidden himself nearby and eavesdropped on their conversation, He’d heard everything from Ray’s calling out to Mario.

“Looks like those words do reach people.” For reasons unknown, he smiled incredibly broadly. “First Sechs, then Benetnasch, and now Ray... that’s three Masters who’ve taken the words properly. Yup... I knew he was a good kid.”

The mentions of the King of Crimes and King of Tartarus would catch the attention of many, if they heard him, but few would be able to understand what his words truly meant.

A few seconds later, he walked away, finally leaving the scene completely empty.

Chapter Nine: The Three Armies

Quartierlatin, mountain

There were ten-odd parties pulling an all-nighter on the mountain containing the ruins.

They were all Masters on a quest to kill and collect the Prism Soldiers near Quartierlatin.

“Aaaand that’s seven. Damn, we makin’ mint here,” said a member of one such party.

“Honestly, that’s pretty freaky,” another replied. “The three of us ran into a whole seven of them. Imagine how many there are on this entire mountain! Gives me chills, man.”

One party member was a Strong Lancer, another was a Strong Bowman, and the third was a Bishop, making it a well-balanced group.

Thanks to the vigorous work of this and other parties, the Prism Soldiers in the mountain were gradually dropping in number.

“You said there’s gonna be a quest to stop the ruins, right?” one of them asked. “We taking it?”

“Damn right we are. Just think what’ll happen if these things keep pouring out. Our town’ll be gone!”

“True. They’re only about as strong as Demi-Dragons, but that’s still a bit much for tians...”

Talking about this and that, they walked around in search of more Prism Soldiers.

Instead, they stumbled upon a strange sight.

It was a space in the forest where the trees had vanished, as though pulled out of the ground by the roots.

“Hold on... What the hell’s this?” one of them exclaimed.

“The trees are just... gone?” another said, stunned.

“Did the machines dig them up?” the third asked. “Or was it some other monster?”

“No clue. Though, looking at what’s going on, we should be careful.”

The Strong Lancer and Strong Archer stood at the opposite sides of the Bishop and watched for any threats. They were now ready for attacks from any visible direction. The Bishop also prepared to use the relevant support skills.

They were cooperating well. Any proper party with a support would've done the same, but that was exactly what made them so easy to take advantage of.

"Phase one."

In a split-second, a creature burst out of the softened ground below and grappled the Bishop.

"...Eh?"

The creature looked like a tree, twisted into the shape of a marionette — in fact, that was exactly what it was. It used its arboreal weight to drop the Bishop to the ground and cut his throat with the knife in its hand.

"...!" The Bishop couldn't speak any of his skills now. The puppet took advantage by stabbing his crown, spine, and heart, quickly ending his life.

The immense damage to his body didn't allow for a long resurrection period, so the Bishop quickly turned into particles of light.

The marionette worked absurdly fast.

"HUH?!" yelled one of his party members.

"YOU BASTARD!"

The Strong Lancer and Strong Archer finally reacted to the marionette and quickly destroyed it, but their Bishop had already gotten the death penalty.

Both sides had only a single casualty.

However, the enemy's loss was only some strange marionette, while the heroes' loss was the lifeline of their party.

"What the hell's that thing?!"

"It's not disappearing, either! Is it from the ruins, too?"

A monster that didn't vanish upon defeat made the Strong Archer think there was a connection between it and the machines they were hunting, but his assumption was mistaken. Alas, they weren't even given the time to realize they were wrong.

"Phase two."

As they were wondering about the nature of the dolls, the ground to their east and west began to bulge.

Twenty marionettes burst out through the leaf and mud covers laid around. They were all armed with Assault Rifles, often used by Gunners and Dryfean machines.

As the two Masters tried to understand what was going on, the marionettes drowned them in a full-auto crossfire, turning them into swiss cheese. Unable to put up any fight, the Strong Lancer and Strong Archer both turned into light.

A few seconds later, all that was left of the battle were a few drops and twenty marionettes with guns in hand.

"Clear." A single voice resounded within the marionettes. "That's eighteen, now."

That was true not only for the twenty here, but for all of the nearly-thousand marionettes swarming the mountain.

"Hm. Been a while since I last controlled a thousand. Must've gotten rusty. It's only been two hours, and I already feel a bit drained."

As that voice resounded within, the marionettes that had just killed the Masters moved through and looked around the mountain in the most optimal ways.

Yes, this was true for all the marionettes on the mountain, not just the twenty in that area. It was the result of a single person manually moving all of them at the same time.

He saw a thousand times more than a single person, processed all the marionettes' states in real time, controlled them all simultaneously, and had them all cooperate.

They were also equipped with High-Frequency Knives or Assault Rifles, which he was having them wield the exact same way he would've wielded them himself.

This was a fully-functional, thousand-strong army, commanded by a single will.

Needless to say, this was an astonishing feat. Auto would've been one thing, but controlling such a number manually was downright inhuman.

Nevertheless, this man was capable of this. He was the current field marshal of the imperium, Gifted Barbaros.

His Superior Job, Zero General, was specialized in commanding unmanned weaponry... and he was the special soldier who had wielded the Unguided Gaze, Edelvalsa, for the past thirty years.

That Mythical special reward had been with him for as long as he could remember. He'd begun controlling these marionettes before he could even walk.

He was the imperium's strongest soldier.

No — he was a one-man army.

"I'll weaken their forces a little more."

He'd been a special soldier for most of his life, and nighttime ambushes were his specialty. To ensure that he would succeed in taking Acra-Vesta, this man continued his hunt for those who'd get in his way.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

So came the morning. It was so cloudy and dreary, it was hard to believe the skies had been clear yesterday.

"Such an unpleasant weather..." sighed Nemesis.

"Seriously," I agreed. It felt extra bad because I hadn't even gotten a second's worth of sleep last night. I'd been too busy keeping watch in case Dryfe made their move while it was still dark.

The guild had tried to contact the capital to ask for reinforcements, but as it turned out, long-range magic comms were currently jammed.

"How truly irksome," said Nemesis.

"Yep. Man, that guy..."

The culprit was most likely Dr. Mario. While we were exploring the ruins yesterday, he had been outside the whole time. He must've used the chance to set up jammers all over Quartierlatin, then activated them when we caused a stir by telling the guild what we found out.

Fortunately, only long-range comms were jammed. We could still communicate locally. Then again, that might've been the very reason why it had taken us so long to realize that long-range comms were busted.

We had no clue how many jammers there actually were, so going after them wasn't realistic.

A high-rank AGI-focused Master was on a guild quest to send a message to the capital, but I wasn't sure if he'd make it in time. Hell, it was entirely possible that he'd be stopped on the way.

I had a feeling that Dr. Mario was capable of that.

Remembering the way he'd evaded Azurite's attack, I was sure it was because of his immense fighting ability, rather than just high AGI.

Azurite had said he was a special soldier — one of Dryfe's best — and I didn't doubt that for a second.

"Ray," Nemesis said, "how powerful is he? What does your intuition tell you?"

"He's a match for some top duel rankers, at least," I answered.

To be more specific, I couldn't imagine Chelsea or Bishmal standing a chance against him.

Sure, this wasn't based on actual data. However, back when he'd evaded Azurite's attack, he'd been as menacing as Shu or Figaro... both Superiors. I never would have thought I'd feel something like that from a tian.

"But man, they actually didn't do anything last night," I sighed. "I should've just gone to sleep."

The fact they were jamming the comms made it pretty damn clear they wanted to settle this before word reached the capital and reinforcements came. They hadn't come at night, but they would surely act within the next few hours. We'd have to protect the ruins and Quartierlatin from Dryfe while stopping the Prism Soldier factory and securing the other weapon at the same time.

Needless to say, that wasn't going to be easy.

It would've been great to have someone from the Gideon gang, like Shu or Figaro, but sadly, I hadn't been able to get in touch with Shu since last night.

Then again, even if I could call for someone, they probably wouldn't be able to make it in time. Gideon and Quartierlatin were basically on the opposite sides of the country.

I hadn't been able to call B3, either. She'd probably turned off her phone because she was busy with the tea ceremony and whatnot. Shame, because I could've used her as a proxy to tell Miss Aberration about this.

There was a Master who'd made a thread about this online and asked for help, but it was doubtful that anyone would actually come.

All in all, it was best to assume we wouldn't get any reinforcements.

"Well, you certainly look serious," a voice said.

"Azurite..." I murmured, looking over. I hadn't even noticed her moving next to me.

“I brought something to keep you standing,” she said, handing me some warm tea and a sandwich.

“Thanks. These from the inn?”

“Yes. ‘Those dealing with the ruins should be well fed,’ they said.”

Well, then. Much obliged.

As Azurite handed me the food, she seemed to want to tell me something.

“Did the situation change?” I asked.

“How sharp of you... I have good news and bad news. Which do you want to hear first?”

Hey, that’s that line you often hear in Western movies, I thought. Well, Altar’s clearly Western, so I guess it fits.

“Good news first, please,” I said.

“They found a path leading deeper into the ruins. It’s through a different hole in the mountain. Many Prism Soldiers were seen leaving through there, so that has to be the factory.”

We intended to shut it down in the morning, but that couldn’t happen if we had no idea where it was. So figuring out its location was good news, indeed.

“Tom Cat and a few dozen other Masters are already on the way,” she added.

“Then there’s nothing to worry about,” I said. Just like yesterday, Tom would easily break through the security and reach the deeper parts of the ruins. “And the bad news?”

“Nearly thirty Masters who were cleaning up the Prism Soldiers in the mountains were killed.”

I paused. “Dryfe’s doing, I assume?”

“Yes. According to a tian who was with them, they were attacked by marionettes wielding knives and guns.”

That reminded me of Veldorbell’s words. He’d mentioned that Dryfe had a tian who used a marionette special reward.

It would make sense for Dr. Mario to be that person. He was a special soldier, after all. And a really intimidating one, at that. I felt there was something more there, but I couldn’t put my finger on it.

“So, how many people stayed on the surface?” I asked.

“There are 200 Quartierlatin knights, but our Master count doesn’t even go above 50, even when you include the low-rank jobs. Apart from that, there are about 40-50 tians who've come to explore the ruins."

"So not even 300 in total, huh?"

That number might've been decent in some cases, but our enemy was someone who could deal with 30 Masters all by himself. Not to mention that they could always bring someone like Franklin. Things would be pretty bad if they did.

Not that I don't have anything to counter someone like that, I reflected.

I silently looked at my hands, and the Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda. Then I shifted my gaze down to the Grudge-Soaked Greaves, Gouz-Maise.

The townspeople had heard out about the danger of the ruins, flooding the town with negativity for my greaves to absorb, and it was bound to get worse if Dryfe attacked. The stage was being set for me to use the new ace up my sleeve.

"The skill has three conditions... okay?" I recalled what Gardranda had told me while I was out cold. "You've already cleared one... but there are two more. The one for after you use it is especially... troubling."

She hadn't been joking about that last part.

After using the skill, I'd be given one of three demerits, each with an equal chance of happening, and if I was unlucky, I'd end up with the death penalty... or worse.

I'd be lying if I said I wasn't worried about that.

However, if I found myself in a situation where I had no other option...

"Ray?" Azurite cut short my train of thought.

"What's wrong? What are you brooding over?" asked Nemesis.

...Hm?

"Hold on... you couldn't read my thoughts?" I asked her.

"Mm-hm," she nodded. "I'm unsure why, but I couldn't. Were you thinking something indecent?"

"Nope."

Did Gardranda do something to hide it from her? I wondered. Guess I'd need to faint to find out, but I'm not going to start bashing my head against the wall.

"Anyway, I get that we have a bit under 300 people on defense, but what about the positioning?" I inquired.

Azurite began explaining our defensive set-up. "Well, for now, we..."

Before she could finish, her comms device began to release static.

That thing was from the adventurers' guild, so the person on the other end had to be someone from there.

"I'm listening. What happened?" Azurite asked the item.

"Lady Azurite! We have news from the ruins!" a voice from the item cried. I recognized the voice; it was a guild worker I'd met yesterday. He seemed to be in a panic. "There's an unprecedented number of Prism Soldiers trying to escape the ruins! There are over a thousand of them!"

My jaw dropped.

That was shocking news.

◆◆◆

Thirty minutes ago, ???

[This is a directive from Zircon Leader]

[High energy mark discovered in the surrounding area]

[Threat level — A++]

[The mark resembles incarnations]

[Determined that it is pre-■■■■■■■■ — Superior class]

[Detected intention to invade this facility]

[Absolute defense initiated]

[All Prism Soldiers, prepare for battle]

[All 2065 Zircon Fire units, run in defense mode]

[All 898 Zircon Laser units, run in defense mode]

[Analyzing the current state of the anti-incarnation weapon]

[Anti-incarnation weapon no. 3, Acra-Vesta — 37% complete]

[Hull alone is 75% complete]

[Main armaments and sub armaments unimplemented]

[One analyzed weapon complete and equipped]

[Deliberating — determined to release to the front lines]

[Initiating sortie preparations]

[Time of release will be determined by Zircon Leader, standby]

[Due to release of anti-incarnation weapon, searching for cooperators]

[Requesting assistance from no. 1's and no. 2's storage bases — communication failed]

[This facility will defend against the threat independently]

[Ignore all casualties and damage to the surroundings until the threat is eliminated]

[The fate of mankind depends on this battle]

[Purge the threat of the Extra-Continental Vessel]

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

"There are that many?!" I exclaimed. A thousand Prism Soldiers?! How?!

The very notion filled us all with terror.

"How do they have the fuel?!" Nemesis howled the most important question here.

Prism Soldiers worked only when they had a living being as a source of energy. Due to this, the machines already deployed on the mountain should've been all they were capable of releasing. Even the factory had tons of units in stock, it wouldn't mean anything if they couldn't power them. We'd speculated that there might've been one or a few units with a reactor, but a thousand? No way!

"They say these Prism Soldiers had pipes going into their backs!" cried the guild worker through the comms device.

"Pipes? Ah!" I gasped as it all suddenly made sense. "Electric cables!"

It was probably "magic" rather than "electric" power here, but whatever. Same difference.

These units were powered not by animals, but by the ruins themselves.

Unlike the first unit I'd encountered, these probably couldn't leave the ruins, but if all they had to do was defend the place, that wouldn't be a problem.

It also wasn't a surprise that the ruins had the power to pull this off — the place had been active for two damn millennia.

"Tell them to pull out the cabl— I mean, pipes!" I shouted.

"They say they tried that, but the machine didn't stop right away and quickly reconnected itself."

Great. So they can store some charge, move briefly while unplugged, and prioritize restoring the link, I thought. The designers thought it through, I'll give them that, but damn, that's annoying!

“What of Tom Cat and the others?” asked Azurite.

“Half of them were taken out by the Prism army’s surprise attack and the nearby traps,” the guild worker replied gravely. “Most of those who survived can’t break through the Prism Soldiers’ defenses.”

Masters were powerful, but a thousand Demi-Dragon-tier machines with a home field advantage would be a bit too much even for them. Even if some Masters there had some devastating skills, using them wouldn’t be an option. There wasn’t enough space there to use such skills without wiping out their own allies.

However, I knew someone these circumstances wouldn’t affect.

“You said ‘most.’ Does that mean that someone made it past?” I asked.

“They say that Tom Cat carved a path through the Prism Soldiers and went deeper in.”

“Tom!” I cried. He was all right, just as I’d expected.

The odds were much worse than yesterday, but he’d still pulled through.

“Understood,” said Azurite. “We’ll focus on defense now.”

“Roger that,” replied the guild worker. “We’ll contact you again if the situation changes.”

With that, the call ended.

“This is unexpected,” Azurite sighed, comms device in hand and a grave look on her face. “It really shouldn’t be, though. We shouldn’t have underestimated the ruins’ defense system.”

“So we can only hope that Tom succeeds in shutting down the factory,” said Nemesis.

“Yeah.”

A part of me thought that might be too much for him alone, but then I remembered the way he’d fought yesterday. He might actually pull it off.

“Either way, all we can do now is destroy all the Prism Soldiers leaking out through the entrance,” I concluded.

“Indeed,” Azurite agreed.

The moment I turned to head towards the ruins, the comms device turned on again.

“What is it?” Azurite answered and asked.

“Lady Azurite, we just received more news from the ruins!” cried the guild worker, panicking even more than before. “The group fighting the Prism Soldiers was ambushed by wooden marionettes!”

"What?!" I exclaimed.

Clearly, those must be the same marionettes that had killed the thirty Masters wandering the mountain — the ones likely being controlled by Dr. Mario.

"An ambush?! Now, of all times?!" I cried.

"In all honesty, there's no better time than now," Azurite commented. "They can effectively team up with the Prism Soldiers to crush the kingdom's forces, then focus on carving their way through the machines."

So it was a golden opportunity to get rid of Altar's infiltrators, huh? I sighed.

"Lady Azurite, the countess claims that Quartierlatin's knights are—" the guild worker said something, only to be cut off mid-sentence.

"...?" Azurite raised an eyebrow. "Hello? What's wrong?"

All she got in response was static.

Worried that something had happened at the guild, I looked at Quartierlatin, but the town seemed untouched. That could only mean that the comms were cut.

"More jamming, obviously," I said grimly.

We already knew that Dr. Mario had jammed long-range communications. He must've switched to shut out close-range comms, too.

The reason he hadn't jammed the short-range comms until now was probably either because he'd been using them himself, or because he'd wanted us to take longer to notice that the long-range comms were jammed. Whatever the case, he apparently no longer had any reason to keep the short-range comms open.

"Anyway, let's head to the ruins," I said as I took out Silver. "Now that we know Dryfe is there, too, we should... Azurite?"

For some reason, she was staring at Quartierlatin, not moving a muscle.

No — she was staring at something beyond the town.

"Ray," she said, her voice in a quiver — not one of fear, but of concealed rage. "What does that look like to you?" She pointed at the sky above the mountain beyond Quartierlatin.

Under the clouds there, I saw...

◆◆◆

Quartierlatin, mountain

Quartierlatin was situated between two mountains: the one containing the ruins, and another, much less notable one.

On the latter, there was a man around twenty years of age. He was clad in heroic armor of blue and white, and had long, red hair trailing behind him.

He was handsome, no doubt, but many would be inclined to point out that he looked much like the protagonist of a successful RPG from two years ago.

His name was Logan Goddhart. He was a Dryfean Superior, and the owner of the Superior Job Hell General.

There was a certain degree of regularity between Superior Job names and their nature. For example, the King of Destruction and the Nobushi Princess belonged to "King" series of jobs. Their stat growth prioritized the stat most relevant to the job, and they had few skills, but the ones they had were powerful.

The Unsheath and The Earth belonged to the "The One" series. They had skills aplenty and could even customize or develop new ones from scratch.

Jobs like Over Gladiator and Giga Professor were simply direct, all-around upgrades of the high-rank jobs in their groupings. They rarely had special quirks, which made them strangely balanced compared to other SJs.

Of course, there were also Superior jobs which were difficult to classify, such as Death Shadow and Siren, but they weren't relevant here.

Now, Zero General and Hell General were in a series called, well, "General," and they had a special feature, as well.

It was the skill simply called "Army."

It could only be activated when the General's party had only himself and his minions, and what it did was greatly increase the number of party slots.

The minimum was a whole 1,000, and it grew with the skill's level to a maximum of 10,000. Of course, the job was considerably hard to level, so Generals who'd maxed it were few and far between. Nevertheless, the numbers were impressive even at level 1.

In a nutshell, Generals were quantity-based Superior Jobs focused on building thousand-strong parties and making the best use of party-wide buffs.

And saying that they were “building parties” was no exaggeration — they had to gather the minions themselves.

Doing this with monsters would mean carrying loads of Jewels and spending obscene amounts of time Calling them. Not to mention the costs involved. The Zero General, Field Marshal Barbaros, also needed to make his marionettes.

However, the Hell General — or, rather, the current owner of the job — was an exception.

“It’s time,” said Logan. “Let’s begin.”

Before him, lying on its belly, there was a Demi-Dragon-tier land-dragon. He’d acquired it at the Barbaros County before he headed out to Quartierlatin.

He held out his hand towards it and, in a sonorous voice, began chanting, “‘Here and now, I consign this life I have at my disposal.’”

A moment later, the Demi-Dragon roared in pain, breathed its last, and became light. He looked at the job skill window at the edge of his vision. On it, the number “1,250” suddenly appeared and lit up.

These were the points he’d gotten for the sacrifice. They were necessary if he wanted to use Hell General skills.

To Logan, the Hell General’s devil summoning was much like shopping. He sacrificed items or creatures to receive points, which he then used on his skills.

The devils he could summon differed depending on the skill, and the descriptions included brief summaries of their stats and traits.

Of course, there was a time limit on all his devils, but he had a set of skills that made him really adaptable. He was particularly fond of the skill “Call Devil Regiment.”

Call Devil Regiment: 6,000 points
Summons 100 Soldier Devils that last 30 minutes.

Soldier Devils were low-rank monsters with 100 for each stat except HP and LUC, which were 300 and 10, respectively. Needless to say, they were extremely weak.

Since the skill needed five Demi-Dragon sacrifices to be used, the payoff definitely wasn’t worth it. The devil quantity did little to make up for it. The skill's cost-performance was simply awful.

Unless you were Logan.

"Let's make those 2,000," he said as he traced his finger on the number 1,250 on his job skill window, making it become 12,500.

Then he did the same for the skill description for Call Devil Regiment.

Call Devil Regiment: 6,000 points
Summons 1,000 Soldier Devils that last 300 minutes.

Then he traced the Soldier Devil description, multiplying all their stats except LUC by ten.

"'Remove the lid of hell and gather, my forces,'" he intoned. "Call Devil Regiment."

At once, darkness emerged from the ground beneath. It bubbled as if boiling, and each bubble burst to produce a devil. This continued until there were 1,000 of them.

He then used the skill again, doubling that number.

These devils were not the weak imps originally described, but true, vicious devils boasting Demi-Dragon-tier stats. And there were 2,000 of them. He'd sacrificed a single Demi-Dragon to create 2,000 devils of the same tier.

The input didn't match the output in the least — the equation was far too absurd.

This was the reason why he was nicknamed "Contradictory Equation." It was the power of his Superior Embryo, who was a Type: Another Rule "False Finesse, Rumpelstiltskin."

Its constantly-active ultimate skill, "Straw-into-Gold — Rumpelstiltskin," let him multiply up to ten numerical values on his job skill descriptions by ten.

It was broken even among Superior Embryos, most of which were infamous for being broken. This skill was at odds with the very concept of game balance.

"With the budget they gave me, I could've easily created ten times more than this... but that won't be necessary," he grinned, as he overlooked his horde of devils.

They looked almost as if they were pledging allegiance to him.

Of course, that wasn't the case — Infinite Dendrogram's summoned devils lacked sufficient intelligence to have a concept of loyalty. In fact, they weren't even living beings — they were just lumps of devil flesh, temporarily put together by a skill.

They were somewhat like the monsters used by Summoners, but they had no medium, so they were always throwaways.

Their loyalty, skills, stats — everything was already within them the moment the creator spoke the skill. In a way, they were "instant devils."

It was part of the reason why preparing a large amount of high-spec devils was difficult, but again, Logan Goddhart was an exception.

His Superior Embryo made his Hell General skills so much more powerful that it was almost maddening.

"Now, let's begin," the Dryfean Superior sneered, and made his devils march.

◇◆

Thus, the three armies were gathered.

Three thousand machines.

A thousand marionettes.

And two thousand devils.

As Ray's third day in Quartierlatin began to dawn, the town began to be menaced by three immense hordes.

Conjunction: What Was Left Sleeping

It had been there for two millennia, silent and dormant.

Its years had been full of monotonous repetition, comprised of naught but slowly building its body, preparing for its grand mission.

But today was different. The commanding unit, Zircon Leader, had declared the arrival of hostiles.

Its own sensors confirmed it — its ultimate foe, and creatures much like it, were invading the structure it slumbered in.

It was incomplete, but the time had come for it to carry out its mission.

It observed all the hostile forces in the area — the Hell General, his 2,000 devils, and all the Masters in Quartierlatin — and reached a single conclusion:

The current completion level is sufficient to annihilate them all.

There were no faults in that evaluation, but it would remain on standby until the Zircon Leader ordered it to depart.

The hope left behind by the pre-ancient civilization still slept, but it was almost time for it to awaken.

To Be Continued...

Afterword

Xun: "It's afterwOrd time. I'm Xun, AKA Xunyu."

Fox: "And I'm everyone's favorite Sister Fox, Tsukuyo Fuso. Pleased to see youuu. In case you're wondering, the bear's still in jail and the kitty's outsiiide."

Xun: (That's whY we got this crack pAiring.)

Fox: "So, li'l Yu."

Xun: "'Li'l Yu!?' Is that supposed to be me?!"

Fox: "Who eeelse? So, what's the plan for this afterwoorrd?"

Xun: "We'll tAlk about the scene in the frOntispiece."

Fox: "The bathtime?"

Xun: "Yup. BUt we'll leave that to the aUthor. It's time fOr his serious commEnt!"

Dear readers, thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Kaido Sakon.

All right, so... the seeds for the bathing scene were planted in December of the year 2015, when I was uploading the web novel parts that would become the basis for volume 5. That was about when editor K came to me with an offer to novelize my work.

We met up in person and talked about various things, one of which was the color pages. That was when he mentioned how common it is for two-page color spreads to show a bathing scene. Upon hearing that, I decided that I should write a bathing scene of my own.

The rest is history — this very volume has it. It never would've been illustrated if this series had been cancelled, but thankfully, that didn't happen, and you now get to see it in its full, colored glory, just like I first intended.

Taiki's drawing is so splendid that it feels more "beautiful" than "cute" or "erotic," but that's good in its own right.

On another note, with this volume's frontispiece, cover, and text, Azurite is gaining greater amounts of HP (heroine points) than even I, the author, anticipated. How will Nemesis protect the throne of the main heroine against this mighty foe and her relentless heroine-ing?

Little would give me more joy than your excitement for volume 9 and its intense battles (both physical and the one for the aforementioned throne.)

Kaido Sakon

Fox: "...'Serious comment'? Really, now?"

Xun: "I get what yA mean. It wAsn't all that sErious."

Fox: "Is he acting weird 'cause the other two aren't here?"

Xun: "...WhatevEr. Let's just dO the announcemEnt."

Fox: "Okie."

Xun: "Volume 9 of Infinite Dendrogram!"

Fox: "Planned for release in February 2019!"

Fox: "So yeah, keep buying, y'all!"

Xun: "The beAr and the cat're coming bAck next time. To be hOnest, I had no idea it'd gO so well with just us twO."

Fox: "Same. We should plan out a downsizing to give ourselves more spotlight, and—"

Xun: "StOp."

A Break for the Orchestra

Paladin, Ray Starling

It was the day after we arrived at Quartierlatin.

Azurite was having a private chat with the countess, so I whiled away the time listening to Veldorbell's performance.

To say that the music was pleasant on the ears would've been a gross understatement.

"Man, this is good," I muttered.

"Mm-hm," nodded Nemesis. She even stopped eating just to listen.

The music had tons of variety. You had famous movie theme songs, foreign TV series openings, western game BGM, and even music from anime — both well-known theater classics and late-night shows.

After a few songs, they took a break. The children took the chance to go to the bathroom, grab a snack, drink some tea, or play around with Veldorbell's Embryos. Wind the cat sìth and Percussion the kobold were especially popular.

I walked over to Veldorbell. "Sir, that was just amazing."

"Why, thank you," he said. "I seldom play for audiences of mostly little ones. I won't lie, I was a bit tense."

I really doubted that, but it didn't seem like he was lying."Don't orchestras usually play classicalmusic, though?"

"Symphonies are long. You may split them into movements, yes, but a group of children would prefer a few shorter tracks, don't you think?"

Well, that makes sense. I nodded.

"You covered a wide range of genres, too," I said.

"You think so? Those tracks have something in common, though."

"They do?"

How? Movie scores and anime themes are worlds apart. What kind of link can they have?

"Do they all start with a 're' note or something?" I asked.

"That... isn't what I had in mind, but yes, they actually do. I'm impressed you could tell."

"Um, I just guessed and got lucky. Don't think too much of it." Unlike Shu, I wasn't a born musician. "And, uh... I'm drawing a blank for any other links. What’s the answer?”

“Oh, it’s nothing special,” he smiled. “They were just composed by the same person — a humble man by the name of ‘Otto Engelberg.’”

“Ah, so I shouldn’t have excluded that.”

I’d actually considered that it could be the composer, but I’d thrown it out the window because of the late-night anime themes.

So there’s actually a guy whose music can be heard in both Western flicks and Japanese anime? That’s something.

“I’ve heard enough to tell that this Otto person is great at his job,” I said. “The children like his work, too.”

“Heheh,” Veldorbell chuckled. “I’m certain he’d be overjoyed to hear that. Speaking of the children, they seem ready for more. I’ll go back to playing, if you don’t mind.”

“Not at all. Go ahead.”

All smiles and baton in hand, he walked to the bright-eyed children and resumed the ensemble.

The End

The Gold-Eating Bear

Duel City Gideon, knight offices, prison cells

“Unbearablllllle...”

Odd as it may have seemed, one of the cells in Gideon’s knight offices contained a bear.

At first glance, he looked like a caged zoo animal, but upon closer look, you would realize it was just a costume.

The wearer’s name was Shu Starling, the one and only King of Destruction, and he was one of the few Superiors serving Altar.

He had been locked up after defeating the Superior serial killer known as “Gerbera.” Eccentric that he was, he’d rushed to her while destroying dozens of buildings in the way.

That was obviously a heavy crime, but as the hero who had ended Gerbera’s spree, he wouldn’t serve any time. He’d be let go as soon as he paid for the damage.

Of course, the amount had to be calculated first. The officials worked fast, but it would still take a few days, and he’d have to wait behind bars during this entire time. Although his new cell was better than the one he'd been in while a suspect, a cage was still a cage, so...

"Man, I'm so beary bored..."

He could've been killing time offline, but for reasons unknown, he was choosing to stay in the boring cage.

Noticing the hero's ennui, the jailer sat down next to his cell and took something out of his inventory. "What would you say to a game of chess?" he said as he presented Shu a chessboard.

It was the foundation for one of the many tabletop games popularized centuries ago by the famous game inventor known as "Boardgame Cat" — a name which made quite a few Masters raise their eyebrows. The jailer saw it as a good way to keep Shu entertained.

Shu thought the same thing. "Chess, huh? Been a while since I've played it," he said as he got comfortable. Playing through the bars might've been weird, but it still made for a nice picture. "Ah. How 'bout we bet a little money on it? It'd make the game a bit more hairy, doncha think?"

Those born and raised in the city of duels had little to no aversion to gambling, so the jailer didn't hesitate to accept.

However, he would soon come to know that it was a grave mistake...

Come the next day, things had completely changed.

"My turn!"

"Whoa! It's Anthony! The chess champ of the Gideon Knight Order!"

"Beat him! Avenge us, Anthony!"

A crowd had formed before the cell.

"Bring it on! I'll bear it all!" Shu said proudly, chess piece in hand and a tall pile of 10,000 lir coins next to him. That was the money he'd won playing chess.

At first, the bets had all been just 100 lir coins, but after Shu's winning more and more games, more and more challengers had appeared from all over the knight offices, increasing the betting rate a hundredfold.

Also, unlike in Earth, chess matches in Dendro were mostly speed rounds.

This meant that mental and movement speed bonuses from AGI were an important factor, making the game double as a way to hone your battle tactics... which probably wasn't something intended by the inventor.

Because of that speed, Shu had already garnered over 200 victories in just a day.

“GHAAAAAHH!”

“ANTHONYYYYY!”

“Hyahaah! I’ll have that, thank you beary much!” Shu cheered, victorious once again.

Thus the Legend of the Gold-Eating Bear was born.

The End

Miss Marie’s Lesson for Newbies — Guns

Duel City Gideon, Sixth Arena

Rook and Marie were having their first few mock battles in a while. His trainer, Shu, had been jailed for severe property damage, so Marie acted as a temporary replacement.

As the sparring went on, Rook suddenly became curious about something. “I have a question. May I ask it?”

“Sure thing! Ask away!” she said gleefully.

“I haven’t seen many gun-users besides you. Guns in general don’t seem to be very big in this game. Are they?”

Even if he included Hugo’s Magingear, the number of gun users Rook had encountered wasn’t high.

“To be frank, I’m not sure I really count as a gun-user,” she said. Sure, her Arc-en-Ciel was gun-shaped, but it was actually an Embryo that fired bullet creatures. “But no, guns are actually pretty darn big. Just not in Altar, mostly ’cause you can’t get ’em here.”

“Because no one produces them?”

“Yeeep. There are no Gunsmith job crystals here, and you don’t have any ruins with magic-based guns lying around.”

“’Magic-based’?” Rook echoed.

“Guns come in two forms: gunpowder-based and magic-based. The former are like the ones we have in real life — substance goes boom, bullet flies. The latter, though, use the user’s magic.”

“I imagine they’re really different.”

“They are. The gunpowder guns pack the same punch no matter who uses them, while magic guns rely on the user’s stats. Because of this, most gun-users start out with gunpowder and switch to magic when they’re stronger."

Gunpowder-based guns fired bullets using chemical reactions. There was no room for stats there, so the power wasn't affected by whether the wielder was a skilled adult or a clueless child. In fact, you didn't even need a job for them. Of course, sense skills like Firing and Sniping increased accuracy, and job skills like Quick Draw helped with speed, but nothing was actually essential to use them.

On the other hand, magic-based guns were dependent on the MP the wielder used, as well as their max MP. While still guns, they had much in common with magic implements.

Also, gun jobs had magic gun-exclusive job skills which increased the projectiles' power or gave them elaborate trajectories, among other things.

"When it comes to power, gunpowder guns are pretty limited," shrugged Marie. "Unless you bring a cannon, you won't even scratch a proper END build, and AGI builds like me can just dodge it all."

Bullets would never be able to catch up to someone moving at supersonic speeds. In fact, even higher subsonic fighters would be nearly impossible to hit.

"I see," Rook nodded. "But gunpowder guns do have their positives."

"Ah. You noticed?"

"Since they're like magic implements, magic guns eat a lot of MP, don't they? In that case, gunpowder guns are better for drawn-out battles. If you have the funds and a good inventory, you can basically have an endless supply of bullets and spare parts."

Rook figured this was why Hugo's Magingear used a gunpowder gun. A mech needed a lot of MP just to move. Adding another power sink would only lower their already-short operating time.

On a related note, tank Magingears could be boarded by several people — a driver, a gunner, an operator, and a commander. This workload division allowed the gunner to focus entirely on the weapon, so these machines often used powerful magic-based cannons.

"Good observation," nodded Marie. "Magic-based guns are hard to craft, too."

"Why? Gunsmiths can't make them?"

"Hmm... it's a teeny bit complicated," she said as she took out a sketchbook and started drawing a simple diagram. "Gunsmith is a low-rank job, and it has a few high-rank jobs above it — Great Gunsmith, Cannonsmith, and the rare Magic Cannonsmith. As I'm sure you can tell, the first two are for gunpowder guns and cannons, while the third is for magic cannons."

"So... no one's found a job for magic gun-making?"

The part of the diagram where that job should be was empty.

"Yes. It's a lost job. Apparently, it was around a long time ago, and they always had fresh magic guns in the market, but now, newly-made ones might as well not exist."

There were lost jobs like those, ones that currently weren't owned by a single person. They didn't appear in the Catalog, and you couldn't know their conditions until someone chanced upon and took them.

"Some people are trying to make them without the job, but the success rate is so low that it's silly, even if you have the other jobs from the grouping. The failure rate is over 99%, and you can't even make recipes."

"Well, that's stern..."

"The materials tend to be pretty expensive, too, so the few guns that somehow get made are stupidly expensive. The chances of making one are so poor that most people just opt for searching for old ones in ruins. And that's a gamble in its own right."

"I see."

"It'd be super if someone found some gun-filled ruins nearby. But as far as I know, Altar doesn't have any ruins at all."

"Now that you mention it... no, we don't."

"It'd be extra great if the guns aren't single-fire... or are just straight-up miniguns like the bearman uses. Those are rare, hard to make, and really expensive. You could make a killing selling them. Ohh, could someone please find me some ruins?"

"The odds of that happening are negligible, if you ask me," Rook smiled wryly.

"True," Marie chuckled, ending the chat.

On a slightly related note, while they were talking, Ray was on his way to Quartierlatin. The first thing he encountered was a minigun-wielding robot that had come from the nearby ruins.

He went on to blow it up.

The End

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 9 of this series, coming soon!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 8
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2018 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2018 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2018 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2018 J-Novel Club LLC

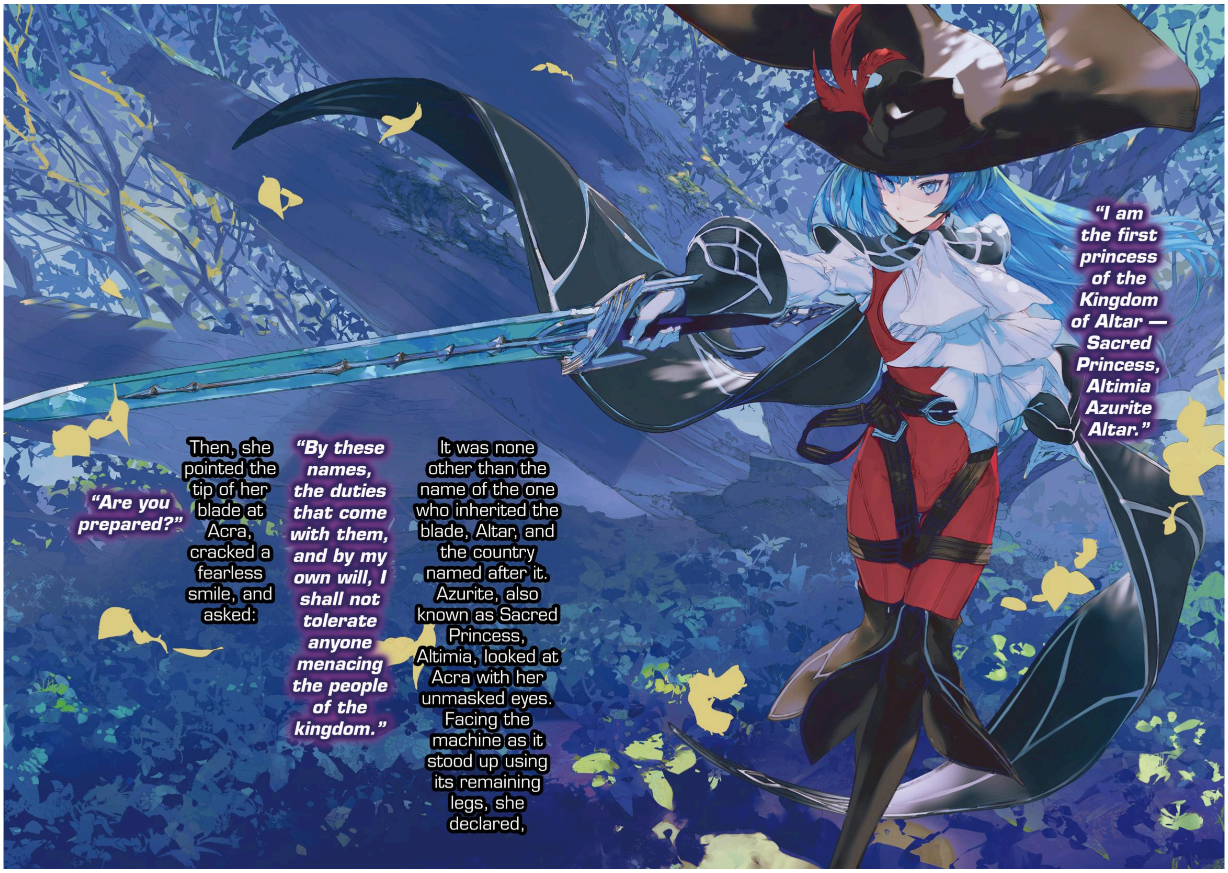
All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
9. Blue Blood Blitz

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
9. Blue Blood Blitz

Infinite Dendrogram
9. Blue Blood Blitz
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki



It was none other than the name of the one who inherited the blade, Altar, and the country named after it. Azurite, also known as Sacred Princess, Altimia, looked at Acra with her unmasked eyes. Facing the machine as it stood up using its remaining legs, she declared,

"I am the first princess of the Kingdom of Altar — Sacred Princess, Altimia Azurite Altar."

"By these names, the duties that come with them, and by my own will, I shall not tolerate anyone menacing the people of the kingdom."

Then, she pointed the tip of her blade at Acra, cracked a fearless smile, and asked:

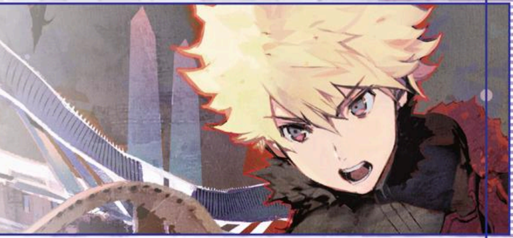
"Are you prepared?"

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

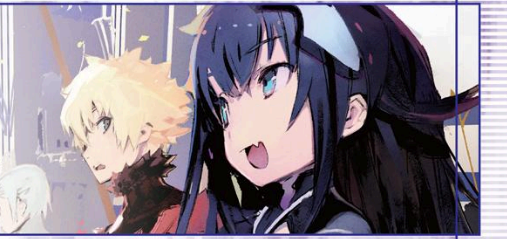
A young man who began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of righteousness that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.



Nemesis

Nemesis

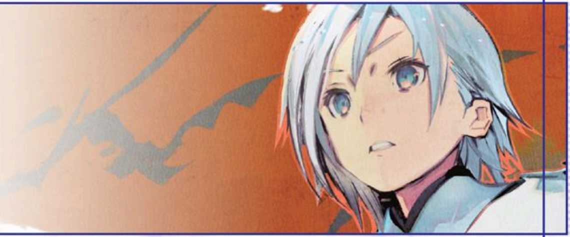
A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She has the ability to transform into a greatsword or a halberd, and is equipped with skills such as Vengeance is Mine, which damages enemies for twice as much as they damage Ray.



Rook

Rook Holmes/Lucius Holmes

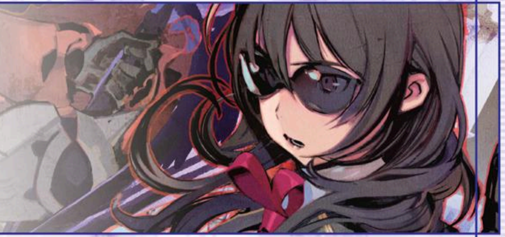
An astonishingly beautiful boy in Ray's party. His job is "Pimp" and he fights using his tamed monsters. His Embryo is the Type Guardian "Depraved Devil, Babylon."



Marie

Marie Adler/Nagisa Ichimiya

A Journalist player working for the information organization called "DIN," giving her access to lots of various info. Having gained an interest in him, she now accompanies Ray, who has a tendency to be at the center of large incidents.



Shu

Shu Starling / Shuichi Mukudori

Ray's brother and the one who invited him to the game. He wears a suit because, during character creaton, he accidentally made himself look just like he does in real life.

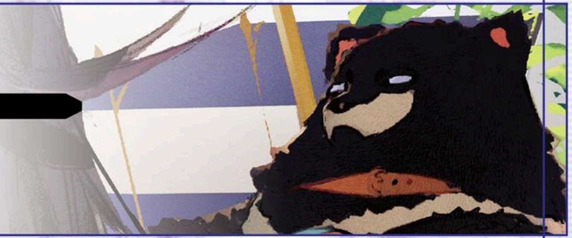


Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Conjunction: The Unfinished Hope

Chapter One: Battle of the Fairy Tales

Chapter Two: Of Demons and Devils

Chapter Three: Legendary

Chapter Four: Gifted Barbaros

Chapter Five: His Reason

Chapter Six: Infinite Multiplication

Chapter Seven: The Superweapon

Chapter Eight: The Primeval Sword

Chapter Nine: Their Choice

Chapter Ten: The Warped Hope and the Shining Despair

Chapter Eleven: The End of a Hope

Epilogue A: The Imperium

Epilogue B: The Kingdom

Epilogue C: The Ancient Ones

Afterword
Bonus Short Stories
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Conjunction: The Unfinished Hope

Those who know true hope are the ones who stand on the brink of the abyss of despair.

Those who have already fallen in can never hope again, and those on the precipice are more hopeful than anyone else.

Thus, those who are cornered create things that will save them.

It might be beliefs that speak of the salvation of the soul, lives that carry their wills to the next generation... or beings that can shatter the encroaching despair.

◇◆

Long ago, in the age of what was now known as the “pre-ancient civilization,” there was a weapons plant deep within the mountains that eventually became part of the Quartierlatin County.

It had equipment for mining resources, turning them into materials, extracting energy from the earth, and producing Prism Soldiers. Everything inside was advanced enough to work without human interference.

Despite this, there were people inside.

They were in the deepest depths of the facility, developing the most important thing within.

Standing behind fortified glass, they used remote-controlled manipulators to bring it further to completion.

Suddenly, the automatic door to their workroom opened, and a man walked inside, accompanied by a small child.

“Sir?” one of the workers asked. “Why did you bring your son here?”

“We completed the core yesterday, didn’t we?” he replied. “I want to show it to him. It’s the hope that’ll save our world... and all the children of the future.”

As they had that exchange, the boy walked up to the glass wall. The thing beyond made him gasp in amazement.

"Dad, is that the thing that will protect us?"

"It is. Acra-Vesta will save everyone," his father replied.

The clockwork sphere behind the glass was the weapon's artificial intelligence block. It would eventually be shielded by a frame and hull, completing it as a weapon.

This anti-incarnation weapon, as it was labeled, had the groundbreaking ability to develop and produce its own parts, as well as the equipment that would create them.

The workers were only laying the foundation for the auto-creation process. Once this was done, Acra-Vesta would begin turning itself into a superweapon.

"Really?" the boy asked eagerly.

"Yes." His father nodded. "Acra-Vesta is our hope. It will beat the incarnations and save the world."

The word "incarnations" referred to the nightmarish beings that were attacking the pre-ancient civilization. They were the very source of their despair.

One of them was immortalized on the wall of the plant's hall, along with some writing and the name of the genius who'd designed this facility, to make sure no one ever forgot their terror.

"Wowww!" the boy became excited. Hearing that this machine here would save the world filled him with joy. "When that happens, will we get to see Mom again?"

His dad was silent. That was something that couldn't happen even if the world was saved, but the man couldn't bring himself to say it.

This era was full of such tragedies. They were building Acra-Vesta to prevent any more of them from happening.

"Sure... When the world is at peace again," he said as he patted his son's head, before taking his hand and leaving the workroom.

"Bye bye!" The boy waved his free hand to Acra-Vesta's intelligence block. "See ya!"

There was no response to those words. All you could hear from the machine were the silent sounds made by its optical sensor.

◇◆

It was a two-millennia-old superweapon created to become mankind's hope.

Ironically, its awakening in the present day was triggered by a battle between two factions of men.

Devils were attacking Quartierlatin.

Marionettes were infiltrating the ruins.

Fatally glitched Prism Soldiers were moving out.

And the people were struggling against them all.

In spite of that, Acra-Vesta didn't move.

But the incomplete superweapon knew that the time for awakening was drawing near.

Chapter One: Battle of the Fairy Tales

The Town of Quartierlatin

Hell General Logan Goddhart had unleashed two thousand devils upon Quartierlatin. Now, the Dryfean Superior continued to terrorize the town.

It was early in the morning. The alarm sounding throughout the area woke everyone up and had them scrambling for safety.

Sitting on the back of a devil different than the ones comprising the army, Logan looked down at the town like it was anthill.

“I’m attacking a town...” he muttered. “Franklin tried the same thing a month ago and failed, didn’t he?”

Gifted Barbaros had given him a quest: to derange the forces protecting Quartierlatin. In his mind, that was the same as invading the town.

Not that he was wrong. The defending force would definitely have to shift their focus to him.

However... he had no intention of limiting himself to being just diversion.

“Looks like there are two ways I’ll succeed where he failed: I’ll beat The Unbreakable and take the town.” The Hell General grinned. “Lots of trees in this town. It’ll burn real well. Fire it is.”

Thus, the two thousand devils began spewing balls of flame. They hit the houses, trees, and the inhabitants, setting everything on fire.

“In the war, I found out NPCs give a lot of XP,” he grinned. “I’m on a mission from Dryfe, so they won’t put me on the wanted list. I’ll gather as much as I can here.”

People were burning, screaming in pain, but the horrid sight did nothing to Logan — he cared only about the XP.

The reek of scorching death didn’t reach him; in his eyes, they were only CG characters covered in flames that were just as artificial.

To someone who had that setting on — especially for one who thought of this as nothing but a game — this was just him following his quest. Killing the NPCs for XP was just a nice bonus. It meant nothing to him. The only life he cared about here was that of his quest giver, Gifted Barbaros. It didn't go anywhere beyond that.

Despite being a Superior, one of the most prominent Masters, he still saw Infinite Dendrogram as nothing but a game.

"Hm?" He raised an eyebrow as he looked down at an army of about two hundred knights. "Is that the defense force?"

Those were the tian knights protecting the Quartierlatin County. They were moving out to defend the people from the vile, cruel demons burning their town and killing the townsfolk.

"Ha!" Logan laughed, ridiculing the knights' desperate, valiant resistance against the devilish horde. "They must have some bad AI. They don't have the quality or the quantity, but they're still coming at me. Idiots."

Yes, even their courage was worthless stupidity to this man.

Logan let loose ten devils for each knight.

It was far too much for a common tian, knight or otherwise, and they quickly overwhelmed them, halting their advance.

The scene felt like a replay of the war.

"They're weak, but they're still battle jobs. They give more XP than other NPCs," he said in satisfaction before moving on.

Eventually, he ran into a certain building.

"There are a lot of them in there," he said. "That makes it easier for me."

He was looking at an orphanage. It was full of children and workers hiding from the scary devils.

But even this was just "an easy target" for him.

Logan decided to shower the building in dozens of fireballs, simply because that was the most effective way to burn everyone inside.

"I hope I find more places like this. They'll make XP farming a real cakewalk," he muttered as he raised the greatsword in his right hand.

He was preparing to give the signal to fire and set the orphanage aflame. The idea that he was about to take the lives of many children hadn't even crossed his mind. After all — this was just a game. To him, doing this felt no different than opening a treasure chest in an RPG.

"Fi—" But his signal, the word "fire," was cut short by a sudden turn of events — the complete extermination of all the dozens of devils he'd prepared for the attack.

Some shattered into little pieces.

Some were split in two.

Some expelled all their blood and collapsed.

Some began attacking their own, as if someone had taken control over them.

The ways were different, but one thing was certain — someone had killed the devils.

"What?" Logan looked around in confusion. He was surprised that someone here could destroy his Demi-Dragon-tier creatures so easily, and he wondered who it was.

"I didn't expect to see something so disgustingly familiar on my morning walk," the answer came in the form of a man's voice — or, rather, music that sounded like it. "Apologies, but I promised the children here I would play music for them. I know I am in not in the position to talk, considering what I did in Gideon... but I won't let you harm them."

The owner of the voice was standing before the orphanage.

It was an old man. He was surrounded by machines reminiscent of metal musical instruments, donning the shapes of a kobold, centaur, harpy, and cat sìth.

He was the King of Orchestras, Veldorbell.

Once a Master belonging to Dryfe, now he was merely a wandering musician who played music alongside his Embryos.

"You're... King of Orchestras!" Logan exclaimed. He knew the old man's name. Franklin was a rival to him, after all, so of course he knew all the top fighters from the mad scientist's clan. "Why are you here?! Did Franklin send you to get in my way?!"

"No." The old man's music silently sung. "I've left The Triangle of Wisdom."

And I doubt Franklin cares about you enough to get in your way, the old man's tone implied, though he didn't put it in the lyrics.

"Then why are you here?" Logan demanded.

"Like I said, the orphans in here are my audience. I won't stand by and let some vile devils take them from me."

"Huh...? What are you talking about?" Logan couldn't begin to understand.

He'll play for some orphans? Is that a quest or something? he wondered. That was the only way he could process it. After all, what else could it be?

Veldorbell ignored his confusion and added, “Not to mention that a man who does nothing in a movement like this has no business writing a hero’s saga. That is what’s most important to me.”

The old man had started playing Infinite Dendrogram for the sole purpose of getting the inspiration he needed to write an opera depicting the life of a hero. He would attack or defend, but never stand still and do nothing. And like the free Master that he was, he was choosing to defend his audience instead of standing in line with his old faction and attacking.

“A saga?” Logan repeated. “Write about me, then.”

“Hm?” Veldorbell tilted his head in confusion.

That made Logan irritated. How could the old man not understand something so simple? “I’m the hero of this game. There’s no better person for you to write about.”

In response, Veldorbell merely chuckled, contradicting the Hell General’s claim more eloquently than any words ever could.

“You damn...” Logan instantly began boiling with anger. “You’re a support build for support builds! Do you seriously think you stand a chance against the Hell General?!”

“Who knows? What about you? Do you think a suppression type like you can do anything against an extermination type like me?”

“Stop talking! I’m the Hell General! The most numerous and the strongest Superior in Dryfe!”

“Fix your tone, brat. And you’re neither of those things.”

“Shut up!” Logan gave in to anger and mobilized his devils. A hundred or so of them charged at the elder, hungry for his head.

Their charge was menacing...

“Percussion’s music isn’t so weak as to be broken without a plan.”

...but they stood no chance against the invisible vibration waves. Those pulverized them in seconds.

Logan was shocked.

“Heart Beat Palpitation.” That was the name of the music created by Percussion, the Bremen playing the drums.

Thanks to the passive skill Veldorbell held as King of Orchestras, “Orchestral King’s Conducting,” that music had been enhanced several times over, becoming a fearsome field of vibrations so powerful they broke apart physical material.

Marie, the Superior Killer, had had to fake her own death to stand a chance against it. It was one of the most powerful defense-offense hybrid skills to come from Dryfe.

"Tch!" Logan spat.

"No point in talking anymore," Veldorbell sighed, and stood like the conductor he was, his supreme orchestra at his side. He looked at the Superior devil-commander. "Come. My divine ensemble shall crush all of your imps."

"You dare mock me...?! You senile sixth-former!"

And thus the two were matched up.

The ex-strongest fighter from Dryfe's top clan, the Triangle of Wisdom: the King of Orchestras, Veldorbell.

The reigning duel champion of Dryfe and Superior — Hell General, Logan Goddhart.

This was the beginning of their battle.

◆

Among the tales from the Brothers Grimm, there was one called "Rumpelstiltskin."

It went something like this:

A poor miller once lied that his daughter could spin straw into gold.

It spread as a rumor, and when the king caught wind of this, he captured the daughter and locked her up, saying, "Spin all this into gold by morning. If you do that for three days in a row, I'll take you as my queen. If you don't, I'll have your head."

When the powerless girl gave up all hope, an imp-like creature appeared before her, offering to spin straw into gold in exchange for some jewelry.

This happened twice, but the third time, the feat came at the cost of her eventual firstborn, and she had no choice but to comply.

Having cleared the king's condition, the girl became the queen.

But when she had her firstborn, she begged the creature not to take him. The creature agreed on the condition that she guess its name within three days.

In the end, she discovered that the imp shared its name with the tale — Rumpelstiltskin.

Now, what kind of powers would a Superior Embryo of the same name have? What could False Finesse, Rumpelstiltskin actually do?

It was based on the "spinning straw into gold" part of the story. Job skills under its effects became significantly more powerful.

In its first form, it could only double a single number in job skill descriptions, but as it evolved, its multiplication grew, as well as the quantity of numbers it could influence.

At this point, the Embryo's constantly-active ultimate skill, "Straw-into-Gold, Rumpelstiltskin," could multiply ten numbers by ten.

That made Rumpelstiltskin the Embryo that could use job skills better than any other, uplifting them to new levels.

For this invasion, Logan had multiplied the points he'd gotten from his sacrifice. Then he'd done the same for Call Devil Regiment's summon count and time.

And unlike how it was with Summoner creatures, the devils created by his skills didn’t need any fixed catalysts. The stats were in the description, and he was free to alter them.

He’d multiplied all of them except for LUC — the multiplication didn’t have much of an effect there — by ten.

Points, summon count, summon time, and seven stats. That made ten numbers multiplied, and Logan believed this was the best way to use his Rumpelstiltskin and Hell General combo.

On the other hand, Logan rarely used skills besides his summons and army. He had party enhancement skills, but he didn’t like them much.

Upholding them required lots of MP, and the cost scaled with the power of the buffed devils. Though Logan’s Rumpelstiltskin could increase effect power, it couldn’t reduce costs. Even his summon point manipulation was no exception. He merely increased the points he had, not lowered the costs of his summons.

Additionally, though he had three stat buff skills to choose from — one for STR, one for END, and one for AGI — they only increased the stats by 20%. Multiplying that number by ten would only give him a 200% enhancement.

Logan’s ultimate skill was more effective when used on the base stats during summoning.

Basically, Logan preferred to fight by letting his Rumpelstiltskin-enhanced devils crush his enemies.

Thanks to the nature of his Embryo, he’d quickly cleared the job conditions — including “summon count” — for Hell General, and he’d reached a Superior Job without even filling up the rest of his job slots.

Despite that, his devil army was a powerful force. A horde that could be restored with a single skill was menacing indeed, and that was how Logan had won most of his victories outside of the arena.

After all, who could stand a chance against such overwhelming numbers?

◆

That question was answered by his battle against Veldorbell. He hadn’t expected what was happening here at all.

Reason insisted that a battle-focused Superior like Logan should absolutely dominate the support job from the conductor grouping pre-Superior that was Veldorbell.

And yet...

"Tch!" Logan clicked his tongue, his face in a grimace.

The reason for his frustration was that his devil army seemed to stand no chance against the old man's Bremen. Faced with the vibration field, the devils didn't know how to continue. Charging ahead would make them shatter, and the fire they launched disappeared like mist.

The deadly mix of defense and offense was too much even for a horde of Demi-Dragon-tier devils.

To make things worse, the attacks of the other Bremen had longer ranges. More and more devils fell to the ultrasound scalpel, the high-output low-frequency waves, and the hypnotic music.

The defense couldn't be overcome by mere numbers, and the attacks were deadly and as fast as sound.

Veldorbell's battle style was almost a perfect counter for Logan.

"Khh!" He voiced his vexation.

"I was with Dryfe. The top clan, at that. I know your fighting style well." Veldorbell's music sang in his voice. "You're the Hell General — a devil summoner. Your strength lies in your ability to quickly summon an army of devils. Your Embryo's unique skill lets you increase the cost-performance. It's perfect for you. Normally, to get an army of devils this powerful, you would have to sacrifice a whole town, if not more. I assume these are all Demi-Dragon-tier?"

He sighed as he described his opponent's strategy, proving that he did indeed know what he was facing.

Of course, that was mostly because Logan never even tried to hide his Embryo's power from anyone in Dryfe.

His ultimate skill was constantly active to begin with, so hiding it wouldn't give him anything like an element of surprise. Not to mention he wanted everyone to know why he was above everyone else.

He'd started this after the war, when Franklin had become a Superior.

Logan's sense of rivalry had driven him to flaunt it.

Of course, there was little disadvantage for him in revealing Rumpelstiltskin's powers, but it still gave people like Veldorbell a better grasp of the situation.

It wasn’t enough to be a blunder, but it was a negative nonetheless.

Side note: in the tale from the Brothers Grimm, Rumpelstiltskin’s name was revealed because the creature sang it himself, making it a fitting name for Logan’s Embryo in more ways than one.

“But there is a limit to how much you can enhance the devil army. These are all too weak to break through Percussion’s vibration field,” Veldorbell declared. “If you wanted devils that could survive Heart Beat Palpitation, even a Superior like you would need to sacrifice something major, no?”

“Well, you sure know a lot, King of Orchestras,” grumbled Logan.

“I said I did, did I not? I’m certain we can defeat any devils within your reasonable limits... up to Legendary-tier, I’m guessing. So why not get rid of little old me by sacrificing a special reward and summoning a Mythical? You know, like you did with the kingdom’s commander.”

He was referring to the Hell General’s ultimate job skill, Call Devil Zero Exceed.

Unlike how it was with the other skills, the points for it could only be gathered by using a very luxurious sacrifice.

Even for Logan, who could multiply the points gained by ten, the only items that could give him enough were special rewards.

Also, since the Mythical-tier devil’s stats weren’t in the descriptions, Rumpelstiltskin couldn’t enhance them like it could for Call Devil Regiment. Same went for the Legendary-tier devils.

But despite those many problems, it was still Logan’s trump card. It had brought him victory in all the battles he used it in. In a way, it was his ultimate skill.

However...

“You can’t do it now, can you?” Veldorbell’s song continued. “The cost is far too great. After all, this isn’t the arena.”

This was the reason why Logan was Dryfe’s reigning duel champion.

All items lost and consumed within arena barriers returned the moment the duel ended, and the special rewards he sacrificed were no exception.

While dueling, Logan could use his special rewards without hesitation, sometimes summoning several of the Mythical-tier devils.

No one else in the duel rankings stood a chance against that.

Another side note: Franklin had once told him, at their first meeting, “You’re only the champ ’cause Behemot doesn’t duel, though. I mean, the King of Beasts could take care of your Mythicals in a snap."

Logan had seen both Franklin and the King of Beasts as rivals ever since.

"Well? Will you throw away a special reward and bring in the Mythical?" Veldorbell provoked him.

Veldorbell's only chance to win would be the moment Logan tried to use that skill.

As things were, he couldn't move or disable the vibration field because he was protecting the orphanage behind him. But if Logan decided to summon a Mythical-tier devil, he could switch to offense.

Summoning devils required time and rendered the summoner defenseless. During that moment, Veldorbell would disable the vibration field and attack with his ultimate skill, Beast Orchestra — Bremen.

A super-powerful vibration wave from Percussion, or Wind's song that drove enemies to suicide, would surely defeat both the devils and Logan.

Perhaps Veldorbell only had to whittle away the number of devils until Logan had to summon more. Regardless, he was biding his time.

Focused on his conducting, he observed Logan, waiting for the right moment to strike.

"Tch." Logan clicked his tongue. "You talk a lot for someone who's not even moving his mouth."

He then cracked a hideous grin. It was an expression that didn't belong on the face of the hero he'd used as reference for his avatar.

"Listen here, old fart... You've got it all wrong."

"What?"

"I don't need to sacrifice a special reward for you. I've got something way cheaper." He snapped his fingers, making one of the devils behind him show itself.

It was carrying a person.

"You wretch...!" Veldorbell exclaimed, this time with his own voice.

"This NPC is more than enough," Logan taunted.

It was a girl Veldorbell recognized.

She was one of the children he'd played for in the countess's mansion yesterday, and she loved his music a lot.

She had been so scared that she'd ran out of the orphanage, only to end up in the arms of a devil.

“You said something about children, didn’t you?” Logan mocked. “I thought it’d be useful, so I picked one up. And looking at that face, I can tell I was right. This is the item that counters you! HAHAHAHAHAHAH!” Logan laughed out loud, gleeful that he got back at Veldorbell for trying to sway him. “HAHAHAH! Here’s a little something for the concert!”

The devil threw the girl into the air ahead, straight into the destructive barrier that would reduce her to less than dust.

“Heart Beat Palpitation, cancel!” Veldorbell acted instantly.

He ordered Percussion to stop playing, canceling the field right before the girl entered, while Strings, the centaur, ran to catch her.

But that was when the greatsword Logan threw pierced Veldorbell in his torso, pinning him to the ground.

“Ghph..!”

“Pathetic! That’s what you get for getting invested in NPCs!” Logan laughed as the devils attacked Bremen.

They fought back using their skills, but losing their conductor meant a severe loss of power. They took out a few, but there were far too many.

The devils were destroying them.

Wind’s flute and Clavier’s keyboard were broken.

Strings earnestly protected the girl and carried her back to the orphanage, but that came at the cost of its instrument and one of its legs.

Pierced by the sword and unable to do anything, Veldorbell watched his Bremen. He was Bleeding, and his HP was dropping quickly, not to mention the special reward blade had some sort of curse-based debuff.

It wouldn’t be long until he got the death penalty.

Despite his state, he still looked at his Bremen, and they looked back at him. There was a fire in all their eyes.

Though hurt or broken, they could still fight.

“I guess it’s time for the finale.” Veldorbell, though fatally wounded, rose his hands to the sky. “Final Orchestra!”

It was the King of Orchestras’s ultimate job skill.

By taking an immense amount of his own health, it multiplied the effects of all musical skills by ten.

Bremen regrouped and became a single musical machine centered around Percussion, the only one whose instrument wasn’t broken.

“WHAT?!” Logan had thought that Veldorbell was as good as dead, so this turn of events shocked him.

However, it was too late for him to do anything about it. Veldorbell and Bremen were already playing.

“Beast Orchestra — Bremen: PERCUSSION!”

Thus, the final and the greatest shockwave flew towards the distant sky, crushing over a thousand devils, as well as Logan himself.

◇◆

Once the shockwave had passed, only one being was left standing in the path it’d traveled.

“You went and done it, old fart,” said Logan. “You took out over half of my army... and my Brooch.”

He bit his lip and grimaced at the shattered Lifesaving Brooch that’d fallen off of him. He couldn’t believe that he, of all people, had just essentially lost a life to a non-Superior.

However, the culprits weren’t unscathed, either.

The shockwave came at a cost, apparently, since Bremen were now just empty pieces of metal, while Veldorbell was rendered immobile and silent by the greatsword’s curse-based debuff. Within the next two minutes, he’d Bleed out what little HP he had left and receive the death penalty.

“You deserve a reward for giving me a hard time,” growled Logan, humiliated. “I don’t know or care if it’s a quest or if you just got invested, but I’ll completely destroy this damn orphanage.” Then he cracked a dark grin and pointed at the building. “I won’t burn it. My devils are gonna eat them one by one.”

It’d take longer, but his role here was to buy time anyway, so it didn’t matter where and how he attacked.

Hell, we’re at war. It doesn’t matter how hard I crush them, he thought. “Do it.”

The devils who’d survived the battle against Veldorbell amounted to fewer than five hundred. Besides them, there were about a hundred of those who were still fighting Quartierlatin’s knights. The devil army had lost a lot of its numbers.

Even so, Logan was sure this was more than enough to eat up the orphanage and crush Quartierlatin.

Veldorbell wanted to stop the devils heading for the children, but he could neither speak nor move a finger. This was the end of the aged composer's promise and the beginning of a tragedy.

However, there was someone who couldn't allow that.

"Purgatorial Flames, max power!" a man's voice rang out, and the devils were drowned in dark-red fire unlike their own.

Dozens of the ones leading the charge to the orphanage were set ablaze. They were now writhing on the road, screaming in pain.

"Who are you?" Logan asked, looking at the source of the fire.

With devils burning all around, a dimly-lit silhouette was walking forward.

It had a strange appearance.

The man's whole body was covered by a coat akin to darkness itself.

The armor that occasionally peeked through the coat was a menacing mix of black and crimson.

His hands were shielded by bracers depicting demonic faces, while his legs were in boots reminiscent of corpses.

Most who saw him would surely think he was wicked.

But his eyes told a different story — the devils' brutality had set them alight with a righteous fury.

"I guess you're the Hell General," he said.

Slightly taken aback by the raw emotion in his voice, Logan repeated his question. "Who are you?"

He glared directly into the Hell General's eyes before giving his name. "Ray Starling."

He was The Unbreakable — the one who'd broken Franklin's plots twice.

"Ohhh." Veldorbell finally let out a voice as he slowly became particles of light. He didn't know the reason why The Unbreakable was here. It didn't even cross his mind that Ray had come because he heard the old man's final Beast Orchestra. But Veldorbell was satisfied.

He looked at Ray's back with a fulfilled smile on his face.

After all, that back was almost exactly like the one of the hero he'd envisioned for the dream of his lifetime.

"I leave the rest... to you." Veldorbell fought through the blade's curse to speak those words.

“You can count on me,” Ray replied.

Upon hearing that, the elderly composer and his Embryos smiled before becoming bits of light and finally vanishing.

Ray stood before Logan, his heart full of anger.

It was an anger Nemesis was familiar with. She knew full well that Ray Starling... Reiji Mukudori... was a well-meaning person prone to acting on goodwill or righteous indignation. He could never ignore anything that could give him a bad aftertaste. Anyone who’d bring tragedy was a target to him, and he’d face them with a heart full of anger.

He was like this in Infinite Dendrogram, as well as everywhere else, and it wasn’t going to change anytime soon.

However, Nemesis knew that his anger had two forms.

The first was the rage at those who filled the future with potential tragedies — the anger he used as fuel to unlock the future he desired.

The second was the fury at the wicked malice of those who’d already created many tragedies and laughed on top of them.

Most of those he’d faced were the former. Gardranda, the RSK, Monochrome... even Franklin was one of these.

But there had been one very clear example of the latter — the Lich, Maise.

That man had been a true wretch who’d taken the lives of countless children and gone on to toy with their corpses.

Nemesis was aware that Ray’s anger back then had been different in nature, and far more than his flesh and blood could stand.

And now, just like Maise before, Logan had crossed the line.

He’d set the town on fire, attacked an orphanage, and declared he would have his devils eat the children.

It was malice wicked enough to trigger Ray’s fury.

Ray’s opponent was none other than the Hell General, Logan Goddhart — a Superior. The gap in power between the two of them was even greater than the one between Ray and Maise, not to mention that Logan had an army of Demi-Dragon-tier devils on his side.

Ray was outclassed and outnumbered, but it didn’t matter to him.

He had already decided he would face this evil.

Chapter Two: Of Demons and Devils

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

Surrounded by a burning city, I faced a man.

He was the Hell General, Logan Goddhart — one of Dryfe's Superiors I'd heard about.

Apparently, he was above even Franklin in battle. Leading an army of devils, he had used them to devastate the Royal Guard, as well as take the life of Liliana and Milianne's father.

I'd suspected that he was the culprit as soon as I saw all the devils attacking Quartierlatin.

Machines, marionettes, and devils. There were three major threats here, and this guy was the biggest reason why I was here.

In the ruins, the Prism Soldiers were fighting Dr. Mario's marionettes, so they were too busy to be a danger to the town right now.

Tom was there, too, and I trusted he'd keep them inside.

But even if I hadn't had those reasons, I'd still have come here, to the Hell General and his devils setting the town ablaze.

"Ray Starling, you say?" the Hell General said as one of the devils returned the blade that'd pierced Veldorbell to him. "Ha ha ha! Your clothes have sure changed a lot over the last month. That's a real villain look. Perfect for someone about to lose to me."

I said nothing in response and examined his appearance.

He looked a lot like the protagonist of a game I'd played before cutting off all entertainment to study for my exams. His armor was custom-made to be just like that character's, and his face was about what I'd have expected for that face in a more realistic art style.

However, that protagonist would never have done something this vile. I couldn't even imagine him proudly saying he'd feed children to devils.

"This disgusting little..." I muttered in rage.

Back at the hall in the ruins, I'd remembered the Gouz-Maise gang. But the machines were only like that because of their programming.

This guy, on the other hand, was like the Lich right down to the core. Both of them hurt the weak and mocked those trying to stop them in the exact same way.

That gave me a severe heartache. My state of mind was about the same now as it had been back in that old fortress. Even I knew I was on the verge of erupting.

“Heh heh heh,” he snickered. “Ray Starling the Unbreakable! I’ve wanted to meet you.”

“You have?”

What the hell? I raised an eyebrow.

“I’ve seen you fight since the time Franklin trapped the vice commander of the Royal Guard. I saw how you beat a Demi-Drag-Worm at level 0.”

He was talking about the first thing I’d gotten involved in, here in this world.

Well, that was a Dryfean plot. No surprise he’d know about it, I thought.

“I also know he lost against you, even though he planned for it,” the Hell General grinned, clearly enjoying the fact that his ally had been defeated. “That felt great.”

Perhaps he didn’t see fellow Dryfean Superiors as his allies?

Well, you can say the same thing about our kingdom’s Figaro and Miss Eldritch, I reminded myself.

“Now you stand before me,” he continued. “You foiled two of Franklin’s plots, and now it’s time for you to lose. Defeating you is my greatest wish right now!”

“You wanna avenge him?” I asked.

“No! My goal is to prove that I’m better than him!”

I had no words.

I could barely understand him, but I could tell he was gathering his forces here. Looking around, I noticed that none of the devils were going out to destroy the town anymore. They were all standing close to the Hell General, ready to beat me.

I didn’t mind having to fight more if I kept them distracted from the rest of the town.

“I went out of my way to come to the kingdom, and found you here all by yourself,” the Hell General grinned. “How convenient. No other Superiors will get in my way as I beat you and prove that I’m better than Franklin."

"Hm?" I had a slight sense of déjà vu. "Let me tell you one thing."

"What?"

"Just a couple days ago, there was a PK clan that said something like that. It's gone now."

Sol Crisis, the clan that had been solo killed by B3, was still fresh in my memory. The way Logan was talking was so similar to their manner that I'd just had to say that.

It was a decent way to provoke him, too.

"I'm not some lame clan!" he hollered.

Sure enough, he became more hostile, and that was fine by me.

"Me and my 2,000 devils can't lose against a low-rank like you!"

"2,000? You sure you know how to count?"

Thanks to Veldorbell's valiant fighting, the devil army here had been reduced to only about 500. Besides those, there were the ones fighting the Quartierlatin knights, but overall, their numbers had dropped by a lot.

"Damn... you...!" he said through clenched teeth. I wouldn't have been surprised if he'd popped a blood vessel. Either his boiling point was either really low, or he was just really shallow.

Franklin had an air of mystery and eeriness, as well as supreme composure. Logan definitely didn't.

My heart was still full of rage, but this realization made my brain cool down.

"Very well... I'll just make you regret making a fool out of me!" he shouted as he made his devils move out.

He probably wanted to crush me with sheer numbers. The army was moving slowly — probably to instill fear — but I appreciated that. It gave me time to think.

"I have nothing against provoking him, but are you certain we can win?" asked Nemesis. "It feels as though you only brought your heart, not mind."

I'm not gonna deny that, but we do stand a chance, I thought. We've got two ways to win.

"Two?" she repeated.

Veldorbell broke his Brooch. It'll be over the moment we bring him down to 0 HP. We also have a way to break through this army and land a hit. We've used it before.

"That, eh? It's certainly something we can use here. What about the other?"

It's a trump card... I'll only use it if I have no other choice.

"A trump card? You mean Payback Beyond the Stars? Wouldn't it be of little use against him? He is a commander, after all."

"No, not that one," I replied as I looked at my hands — at the Miasmaflame Bracers.

These things were actually a bigger gamble to me than just jumping into the devil army.

It would be fine if I didn't have to use it, but I would if I had no other choice.

"Hmm, I have trouble reading it, but I do understand you have something in mind," said Nemesis. "I must say, though... this is a battle against an army, and your win condition is killing the leader without dying yourself. Silver might've been useful here."

"Too bad I lent him out," I agreed.

Before hearing the sound and coming here, I'd sent Azurite to head out and help the Quartierlatin knights. They were farther away, so I'd given Silver to her. She would come support me once she was done there.

"Still, it'd be better if I finished the job before she got here," I muttered.

My reason for that wasn't tian mortality, but the fact that the enemy was the Hell General.

He had killed her mentor, and I felt she would push herself too hard if she had to face him. Considering how she'd glared at the army, I was pretty confident in that assumption.

We'd only known each other for a few days, but I already knew she was gentle and wouldn't hesitate to burden herself.

"HA HA HA!" Logan guffawed. "How does it feel to be surrounded by so many devils?! Just so you know, these are all Demi-Dragon tier and above! Your little flamethrower won't be enough!"

I can tell, I thought as I looked at the devils I'd set on fire when I'd come here. They were all hurt, but could still fight. If I wanted to burn them, I would need to channel my Purgatorial Flames a bit longer.

But... I had something else in mind.

"All right," I said after I looked around and saw no people anywhere nearby. The children in the orphanage were fearfully peeking at me through the windows, but they were pretty far away, not to mention indoors.

Looks like I can use it...

"Come on! Beg for your life or something! I'll listen!" said Logan.

"Man, how can you even say all these generic bad guy lines unironically? You're a disgrace to your face and armor."

"Gh...!"

"But yeah, I've got some words you. Listen closely," I said as I covered my mouth with the edge of the Black Warcoat and raised my right arm. "Hellish Miasma, erupt!"

A moment later, the right bracer released a dark purple mist.

This was a fiendish skill that gave three severe debuffs: Poison, Intoxication, and Weakness.

"Huh?! You're using poison gas in a town you're supposed to protect?!" he shouted.

Well, thanks to a certain general, there was no one nearby, so why not?

Since the devils had surrounded me, it touched pretty much all of them. The Hellish Miasma quickly took effect. The devil army fell to their knees and started writhing slowly.

Logan probably hadn't lied about them being Demi-Dragon-tier. But during the battle against Gardranda, the miasma had affected even Marilyn, who was on the same tier, so there was no reason it couldn't work on these devils.

Of course, it was possible that devils had a resistance to it, but then again, it'd worked even on Gouz-Maise, an undead, so the chances of it working on these guys seemed high.

And now I would continue by doing the same thing I'd done against Gouz-Maise.

"GHAH!" I went to the nearest devil, bit off a bit of its wing, and swallowed it.

I instantly got the three status effects I'd given to it, as well as some curses for eating devil flesh.

"Form Shift — The Flag Halberd!" Nemesis wasted no time transforming into the halberd and activating Like a Flag Flying the Reversal, which reversed all the debuffs on me.

Poison now healed instead of damaging me. Intoxication now sharpened my sense of balance instead of dulling it. And Weakness now doubled my stats instead of halving them.

The curse debuffs were either negated or turned into buffs, too.

This was the strategy I'd used in my battle against the Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise.

Getting buffs by eating the flesh of a debuffed enemy and reversing it was a pretty unorthodox move. I'd thought I'd never use it again, but I had nothing against doing it again, in this case.

"Hgh!" I exclaimed as I kicked the pavement below and jumped into a dash through the weakened devil horde.

Cutting off a few of their heads on the way, I broke through the purple miasma to close in on the Hell General.

"Huh?!"

"FHUAH!" I exhaled as I swung my halberd's blade. Logan tried to parry it with his sword, but my halberd slid on its surface and slightly cut into his protagonist-like face.

"Damn you...!" The speed at which he tried to parry it was above mine, and I was buffed.

This was because he was a Superior Job with stats suited for one. They were high, but not high enough to make him unbeatable.

Also, his movements were kinda...

"Ray Starling... that move was vile!" said Logan. The injury enraged him. He swung his greatsword down on me.

"It's your own fault for letting me do it," I said as I evaded and attacked him myself.

"What?!"

Until now, I'd never gone out of my way to use this enemy-eating strategy, but there had been one time when I couldn't have used it, even if I'd wanted to.

It was my battle against Franklin's RSK.

He'd made the monster into almost the perfect counter to me: I couldn't give it any of the three debuffs, and the Material Barrier was too tough for me to bite it. Franklin had known this move, and fought me after making sure I couldn't use it.

But Logan wasn't like that.

He'd said he wanted to beat me, but he didn't have a single bit of the info needed, much less made sufficient preparations for it. He'd just thought he'd have an easy win here.

Franklin hated losing, had a lust for victory, and always joked around while actually being one of the most serious people you could ever meet. Logan was nothing like him.

"You're half-assing it," I said.

"Huhh?!"

This man had attacked Quartierlatin, destroyed the Royal Guard, and made the Grandrias cry, but my next words had nothing to do with my anger for the guy. They were just a small bit of truth.

The words felt so natural that they just flowed out on their own.

"You're weaker than Franklin."

"Huhh?! B-B-But I... Me?! Hell General, Logan Goddhart?! Below Franklin?!"

"Yeah, that's what I'm saying."

Franklin had some of the weakest stats of any Superior, but he made up for it with the monsters he created.

He never neglected to prepare all the necessary counters against the enemy, to ensure his own safety, and to keep a bunch of tricks up his sleeve.

The thoroughness of his approach for battle made him such a threat that his own fragility was only a minor problem.

Given all that, beating him had required the collective efforts of all the Masters in Gideon.

This guy, though, was nothing like that. He had little grasp of strategy, and his devil army composition was way too basic.

He had another major flaw, too...

"TAKE THAT BAAAAAAACK!" he roared. My words must've stung. He started swinging his sword like he was losing his mind.

Though he wasn't a vanguard fighter, he was still a Superior Job and had impressive stats. The blade swings were fast and powerful, but they were way easier to dodge than duel ranker attacks.

"Ray," Nemesis spoke up. "He..."

"You noticed, too, huh?"

We both could see his flaw.

Logan was at the top of Dryfe's duel rankings.

When you thought about it, it didn't make sense for him to be an easier enemy than the kingdom's duel rankers.

But that was the reality here. Even if you ignored the fact that I was buffed, he was below them.

The reason for that was simple.

Crossing swords with him, I re-confirmed my suspicions. “You used devils in your duels, too, didn’t you?”

“What about it?!”

This situation was a better answer than any words I could come up with.

He was used to summoning his devil army and winning the duels without doing any fighting himself.

Actually, you couldn’t lose items in duels, so maybe he just always summoned the Mythical devil that had defeated Sir Langley.

He probably used devils even when hunting monsters for XP.

And this was the result.

“You suck at swinging this,” I said, looking at his greatsword.

“WHA—?!”

He had the stats of a Superior Job, but he couldn’t use his skills well at all.

Literally everyone in the Royal Guard was above him in swordfighting, and the duel rankers had way better moves than him. They were worlds apart.

He was a Superior with a Superior Job. But he’d relied too much on his devils and Embryo.

I’d learned from Marie that his Embryo enhanced job skills. That was what made it so easy for him to create these devil hordes.

He’d crushed most his enemies with sheer numbers, leaving the strongest ones for his Mythical. That had always been enough for him, so this was what he’d become.

His own battle ability had never improved. He just kept on combining his Embryo and job skills.

Basically... he was a really bad player.

Even if he’d once been better at it, relying on his devils had made him rusty.

“That’s why you stop being a big deal the moment your devils can’t move,” I said aloud.

He was faster than me, but I could see his attacks coming.

He was stronger than me, but I could easily dodge his sword.

He was tougher than me, but I could hit him.

I had all the experience I'd gained from my mock battles against the rankers. Even the countless defeats weren't meaningless.

I could easily handle him, even if I had lower stats. I wouldn't be surprised to learn he hadn't practiced even once.

"If this stays 1v1... I'll win," I said.

"Oh, but it's 2v1," said Nemesis.

"Yeah... that's right!" I replied and attacked with even more intensity.

"No way! I won against the strongest knight in the kingdom!" he yelled back.

"By the time he got to you, Sir Langley was badly wounded. That's why he couldn't beat you before you could summon your Mythical devil."

Logan had sent his devil army at the Royal Guard. Sir Langley had fought with his men at first, but then charged through the enemy lines to get to the Hell General.

I'd trained with the Royal Guard before, and they'd told me that, during the first battle, he'd gone out ahead of everyone to protect them, taking more punishment than anyone else.

If Sir Langley had been at his best, the Hell General would've died before he could finish the summon. All Logan had done was finish off a wounded man with a Mythical devil.

"Wanna try summoning the Mythical on me?" I asked him.

"No way! I'd never waste a special reward on you!"

"And that's why you're weaker than Franklin."

That lab coat shithead would do everything to win, and wouldn't hesitate in the slightest. He'd make monsters using special rewards, even if they were throwaways. That was just how he was.

"Ghh. Nnh...!"

I continued attacking him all throughout the exchange, and he was more and more hurt by the second.

None of the wounds were even near fatal, but the damage was definitely there.

He had no Brooch anymore, either. We'd win if I just kept it up.

"Devils! What are you doing?! G-Get over here and protect me!"

The Hell General raised his voice and shouted at the devils that were suffering from the miasma. But Weakness and Intoxication made them too slow.

“Shit! If that old fart hadn’t taken so many out...! No, I should’ve made more to begin with...!”

Even as he yelled his regrets, I kept showering him in halberd attacks. One of them sliced through his left eye.

“Ghuh! AAAAHHHHHH!”

There was no pain. But losing half of his field of view made his fury even more intense.

“DAAMN YOUUUU! YOU’RE ALL USELESS!” He glared at the devils writhing in the miasma, his one eye full of rage. “Then I’ll make you useful! CONVERSION DEVIL FLARE!”

I gasped. The moment he used the skill, I felt something vanish, and my body was hit by multiple debuffs. “What...?!”

“Ray! The devils behind us vanished and became a ball of fire!” Nemesis cried, right as I began to feel intense heat from behind me.

I turned around and saw a sinister ball of fire.

“Khh!” The skill had made Logan’s entire army vanish and converted them to an offensive spell.

The devil that’d given me the debuffs had disappeared, too. Reversal couldn’t work anymore, so the debuffs once again were doing what they were intended to.

I couldn’t dodge the spell.

“Leave it to me!” Nemesis switched to The Black Shield. “Counter Absorption!”

She used one of two uses we had left. The magic was absorbed by the barrier of light.

But the damage was greater than 300,000. One Counter Absorption wasn’t enough, so Nemesis had no choice but to use the other one.

“The second... will bear it!” she declared with confidence.

That meant that the magic dealt would be over 300,000, but less than 600,000 damage.

“1,000 for each devil, maybe?” I guessed.

If so, the 500 devils had become about 500,000 worth of damage. Originally, it had probably just been 100 damage for each devil. He’d turned it into 1,000 with his Embryo.

As we blocked it, I took out an Elixir and High Holy Water I’d moved to my pouch beforehand, and drank them to get rid of my debuffs.

We successfully protected against the lethal attack and I healed myself, but...

"Call Devil Gigaknight," said Logan.

We'd given him the time to summon another devil.

The one that appeared now was about as tall as a human.

Standing at over two meters, it was covered in heavy armor, held a sword in its right hand, a shield in its left, and wore a helmet with a slit that had insect legs peeking out.

Compared to many monsters I'd fought so far, this devil was pretty simple.

However, it was even more menacing than Gouz-Maise.

"Ha ha ha ha! I've gotta say, I expected to end this fight with that one," said Logan. "But it's not a problem that you survived it. Now that this one's here, the fight's as good as over."

Summoning the armor devil must've relieved him. He definitely wasn't as desperate as a cornered rat anymore.

"Really, now? You realize you traded 500 devils for just one, right?" I said, but even I knew that this devil was way above the devils from before.

Hell, it was more menacing than the entire army.

"You can't tell? Gigaknight is a Legendary-tier devil!" he revealed, confirming that my senses weren't lying to me. "It costs a lot, but not a special reward. Using it on you is a waste, but think of it as my thanks for all the stuff you said. I'll kill you good..."

"W o w O w o W o..." Gigaknight made an eerie moan as its insectoid legs wriggled. The sense of intimidation grew stronger.

"Legendary, huh?" I said.

Marie had recently told me that, "Even we battle-focused pre-Superior Masters have only a fifty percent chance of winning against Legendary UBMs. Your victory against Gardranda was a pretty unique case."

That meant I was dealing with a monster on about the same level as Marie or Juliet.

The only Legendary I'd ever beaten was Gardranda, and that was only because I'd gotten to its weak point before it could release its true power.

Monochrome had been even higher — Ancient Legendary — but I'd only won against that because Nemesis's third form had turned out to be the perfect counter, and because I'd had B3 to help me. Not to mention it had been a strange UBM focused on some weird stuff.

Gigaknight, however, was purely a straightforward fighter. If it had been specialized in something, I could've looked for openings I could take advantage of, but it didn't look like I could expect anything like that.

I could try gathering damage to launch a Vengeance is Mine, but I'd probably die before I had enough damage. We'd already used up our precious Counter Absorptions to survive against that spell.

It was pretty obvious I was dealing with something tough and had a small chance of winning.

"What of it?" I asked.

I'd known I was dealing with something bigger than myself the moment I'd gone in to face the Hell General himself.

In fact, I'd even considered that he'd summon the Mythical. Getting just a Legendary instead was actually good for me.

"We still have a chance," I continued.

His greatest mistake had been attacking me with the spell he'd sacrificed his devils for. Nemesis had gathered the damage, and her counter was now on a whopping 500,000.

This battle would end the moment I passed the Gigaknight and hit him with a Vengeance.

"This makes it clear how much of a hindrance Payback's charging time is," Nemesis commented.

"Yeah. But for now... I'll just have to make do with this."

The devils had died, and the buffs were over. Still, I had my Brooch, and he didn't have his. I just needed to go at him like mad and land a Vengeance.

"Let's go, Nemesis," I sad.

"Very well!" she said as she shifted from her shield to her sword form, and I dashed towards Logan.

"Ha ha ha! You probably think you can win as long as you get close to me... but that won't work anymore," he laughed.

His Gigaknight appeared instantly before me and got in my way like some sort of brick wall.

"Huh?!"

The speed startled me. It was like nothing you'd expect from something in such heavy armor. It swung its sword at me.

"Gh!" I grunted as I stopped it with my blade, but the impact created was so powerful, I was blown away and hit a structure's wall back-first.

The hit wasn't even direct, but that brief impact took a whole fourth — almost 3,000 — of my HP.

"Ray!" Nemesis raised her voice, and I quickly moved.

But I was too slow. There was an impact on my neck, and I felt the sword sink in.

Obviously, the damage was lethal, activating my Lifesaving Brooch.

I desperately stood up, only to be greeted by the ruthless Gigaknight's downwards slash on my crown.

That was, once again, negated by the Brooch, but this time, it failed the damage check and shattered.

But I wasn't gonna stand and just take the third attack.

"Vengeance is Mine!" I roared as I did an Impact Counter, taking all the damage gathered so far, doubling it — raising it to 50,000 — and sending it back.

However...

"This goddamn...!"

...all that did was shatter some of its torso armor, take a chunk of the flesh, and make it bleed. That was it.

Gigaknight was still standing, not even flinching.

That meant only one thing: 50,000 damage wasn't enough.

"W O w o W o..."

I wasn't sure if it was because of the damage, but Gigaknight didn't swing its sword. Instead, it hit me with the back of its left hand, sending me flying a few meters.

"Khuh! Ah!"

That impact reminded me of my first enemy — the Demi-Drag-Worm. The power difference back then had been about as hopeless as it was now.

But I wasn't defeated yet.

Still flying, I aimed my right bracer at it.

"Hellish... Miasma!"

It was drowned in a purple mist.

"W o O."

But it didn't look like that was working at all. Apparently, it had better debuff resistances than the devil army.

"Damn thing has no weaknesses..." I muttered.

"Ha," Nemesis laughed. "This makes me realize we haven't had many battles against enemies who are simply strong."

Breathing raggedly, I nodded in response.

All the overwhelmingly powerful things I'd fought before had had both extreme strong points and weak points.

Gigaknight wasn't like that. It was just fast, tough, and strong. But that was enough to make it a powerful foe.

"Shame we're out of Counter Absorptions," Nemesis continued. "Taking a few of those attacks is suicidal without it."

I nodded.

The thing could probably kill me in one direct hit, and even if I parried, my HP wouldn't last more than three times.

"HA HA HA HA HA! Well?! How do you like my Legendary devil?! This is the power of Hell General, Logan Goddhart!" Logan laughed out loud. "Its AGI lets it move at almost the speed of sound! Its STR and END are over 10,000! And its HP is over 300,000! Try and beat it if you can! HAAA HA HA HA HAAA!"

Well, the name fits, at least, I thought. That does seem like a stat distribution you'd expect from the knight grouping.

The devil was probably weak at magic, but that didn't help me at all.

"You think we can kill it if we land 50,000 damage on whatever's inside the helmet?" I asked Nemesis.

"Aiming at its weak spots is one thing; gathering the damage without dying is another."

In terms of pure toughness, this thing was clearly one of the toughest things I'd fought. Shining Despair was only about eighty percent charged, which was a shame, since I was expecting some great firepower there.

The last option I had would basically guarantee my death penalty in my current state.

"Looks like there's only one thing I can do here," I said.

I'd get past Gigaknight and beat the Hell General himself, standing dozens of meters away.

That'd obviously be difficult...

"But not impossible," I muttered.

Nemesis shifted to her shield form.

I'd dodge its attacks or just prevent direct hits to close this distance. It was simple.

Or at least, it was simpler than beating a monster in the stratosphere.

"Let's go, Nemesis," I said.

"Very well!"

We ran towards the Hell General.

Of course, the opponent wasn't going to allow that.

"W o O o o O o O!" Gigaknight moved at nearly Mach 1 speed to appear before me and swung its sword to split my torso in two.

"Hh...!" I dodged it with a roll and held up Nemesis behind me.

Then I felt a kick-like impact on the shield. It pushed me several meters ahead.

I was hurt, but still alive.

I resumed closing the distance between me and the Hell General.

However...

"W o W O w o..."

The Gigaknight raced from behind me to right in front.

"It was just behind us!" Nemesis exclaimed. "That's too fast, even for something moving at nearly-sonic speeds!"

"W o W o w O."

No...

I heard the same voice behind me.

"No way...!"

I looked beyond the Gigaknight blocking my path, at the Hell General's face.

His grin had grown wider.

"A second one!"

"That's right!" Logan shouted in joy, and the new Gigaknight brandished its sword at me.

I still felt the other Gigaknight moving behind me.

I was standing between two Legendaries — two Gigaknights blocking the ways forward and backward. We were outside, but I felt like I was in some lion's den, completely cornered.

"Ray!" Nemesis cried a warning.

I frantically pondered how I could deal with the two Legendary devils.

The idea I'd had before wasn't an option now.

I could barely even hurt one of them. With two of them, trying to get past them and beat the Hell General was basically impossible.

"Even so...!"

I wouldn't stop moving forward.

If I gave up now, I'd never see another possibility.

No matter how difficult the path to our survival was, there was no greater obstacle than stopping.

I called out to my body to stop cowering and freezing. Move your legs!

I wouldn't give up, even if I was attacked by near-Mach 1 blades from both front and back.

The possibility was always there — with your will.

No matter how small, no matter behind how many zeros beyond the radix point it lay...

"It always exists!" I roared, paraphrasing Shu's words, the ones that'd taken root in my very core, and took a step forward.

The moment right before the devilish blades came to split me apart...

"I love those words, too... I guess?"

...I heard a powerful impact and a voice.

◇◆◇

A Certain Consideration

In Infinite Dendrogram, the power scale was based on monster strength.

The most popular was "Demi-Dragon-tier," equal to a full party of low-rank jobs.

It was followed by "Pure-Dragon-tier," equal to a high-rank party.

Admittedly, the conversion there was based on tian standards. It wasn't uncommon for a single low-rank Master to beat a Demi-Dragon-tier creature, or for a high-rank Master to beat a Pure-Dragon.

Ray, for one, had defeated a Demi-Drag-Worm at level 0, without even a low-rank job.

There was also a power scale that was used by very few people: Epic, Legendary, Ancient Legendary, Mythical, and Superior.

Those were UBM tiers, and they revealed what tier special rewards they would give upon defeat.

UBMs had appeared many times throughout the history of Infinite Dendrogram, and they were almost always defeated, often after many sacrifices. Due to that and other reasons, tians had created a technology that allowed one to measure UBM ranks before they were killed. Skilled Masters could gauge them just from experience.

There was a job that was more affected by this than any other — and that was Hell General.

One day, after UBM power scales were clearly settled, the Hell General of that era had looked at his job skills and realized that the job skill text had changed.

Text that used to say "Summons a powerful devil" was now "Summons a Legendary devil."

It was as though the job skills themselves had accepted this shift in the world's common sense.

Hell General skills began calling the devils "Legendary" or "Mythical" instead of "Powerful" or "Extremely powerful."

It was only a change in naming, but it was a change nonetheless.

Naturally, it led to a certain question.

Not "Why did the change happen?" but "Are the summoned devils really on the same level as Legendary UBMs?"

Logan had summoned his Legendary devils many times before, always gloating about their Legendary status.

It was true that he'd used the Legendary devil Gigaknight to beat an Epic UBM called "Vilestone Dragon, Woltgyzur" and receive the "Viledragon's Prideblade, Woltgyzur."

With just that, Logan had concluded that his Legendary devils were on par with Legendary UBMs.

However, a certain Superior had a different opinion.

These were some of the things he'd said about it.

"Nah, killing an Epic really doesn't prove that the thing's Legendary. It could easily be another Epic."

"Eh? You're saying that Gigaknight's stats are about the same as a Legendary's? Ha ha ha! Well, that may be true, but... it's not the stats that make the UBM, right?"

"And hell, Epics are often new UBMs, and you never know what to expect from them. Some stay there, some just keep advancing — you get the full range there. There are huge differences between different specimens, so Epics don’t really work for gauging strength. I’m not sure His Excellency the General’s (lol) Gigaknight is really Legendary, ’cause Epics just aren’t good for scaling that. It doesn’t answer the question if it’s on the same level as an actual Legendary UBM, though.”

“Most UBMs evolve beyond Epic, y’know? I’ve even heard of ancient ruin relics getting high ranks right after they come out.”

“You ever get an Epic special reward, and go, ‘Huh? It’s actually pretty damn good’? The UBMs you get those from were probably gonna go on to become way tougher and even climb up a tier or two.”

“Things that would’ve turned out strong in the future show it when they die and become special rewards. I’ve beaten a whole lot of them, and I always enjoy thinking about what would they have been. ‘What would they have been...’”

“Speaking of which, there were some interesting points in his equipment data that I got in Gideon: An original Prism Steed that’s not on the list, the MP tank boots that let him beat the RSK... and the bracers. It looks like they’re a special reward from a Legendary UBM, but...”

A pause.

“What would it have been?”

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

The sources of the impact were the swords of the devils.

The blades were stopped by something right before they could split me.

That something was the Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda.

The front blade was blocked with the right, while the rear blade was stopped in place by the left.

Before I knew it, they’d separated themselves from my arms.

“Huh?! What?!” exclaimed Nemesis.

She was shocked, but I quickly understood what was happening here.

There was only one entity that could do this, and this phenomenon was its — her — way of saying that it was time.

“All right! I’m entrusting this to you!” I called out.

I had to respond in kind. She was leading me to my path to survival, so, for her, I would take it all, even the risk of a death penalty or even worse.

I'd take it all... and beat the Hell General!

"I'M GIVING YOU ALL I'VE GOT!" I roared as I turned the grudge in my Grudge-Soaked Greaves into MP.

The negative emotions I'd gathered in the Monochrome incident and here in Quartierlatin had become 400,000 MP — nearly the same as in Franklin's Game. I redirected all this MP into the Miasmaflame Bracers.

"Set skill activation time... 400 seconds!"

The sustenance in the form of MP fed the bracers, acting as the catalyst to pave the way for the summoning skill.

"Come... Miasmaflame Princess: GARDRANDAAA!"

Right after I spoke the name of the Miasmaflame Bracers' third skill, they underwent an explosive change.

The dark red flame and purple miasma whirled and gathered around the Miasmaflame Bracers.

Tanned arms grew in and then out of them, creating the shoulders, torso, legs, and finally the head, which had two horns on it.

It was the same person I'd seen in that dream — the demon overflowing with vast murderous intent and fighting spirit.

"Wh-Who...?" Nemesis couldn't hide her surprise at the sudden entrance.

"Gardranda," I replied.

"Huh?!"

Indeed. She was Gardranda.

Not the incomplete UBM I'd beaten back then, but the true form that had never gotten the chance to show itself: Miasmaflame Princess, Gardranda.

Her mother’s defeat should’ve made it impossible for her to manifest like this, but the Miasmaflame Bracers’ third skill allowed it.

The skill that was named after her had the power to summon Gardranda’s true, complete form for vast amounts of MP and another certain demerit.

“What’s that?! Why does a Paladin have a summoning skill?!” Hell General was confused. He clearly hadn’t expected what was happening here.

But that was nothing compared to what was coming.

“Am I a bother... perhaps?” Gardranda tilted her head before the Gigaknight in front, and kicked the Legendary devil’s armor with her slender legs.

The Gigaknight flew almost ten meters back.

“WowOWoWO?!”

The armor didn’t shatter, but it was badly bent.

Gardranda went to the Gigaknight behind me so quickly that I couldn’t even see her — her speed was supersonic. She grabbed the devil’s legs in her arms.

She, despite being of small stature, picked it up so easily that it looked like a comedy skit, and threw it upwards. The thing seemed really confused and shocked.

Though they were devils that could move at almost the speed of sound, Gigaknights didn’t have wings. The thing couldn’t move in midair, so Gardranda took advantage of that by targeting her left hand, the left bracer, at it.

The demon on the back of the hand opened its mouth and released a red, brilliant light unlike any I’d ever seen it make.

“Purgatorial Flames: Zero,” she said, speaking the skill’s name, making the fire burst out.

Its power was completely unlike what it had been when I’d used it. It was more like the fire used by the Great Miasmic Ogre, Gardranda... No... it was far above even that.

What came to mind was one of Xun Yu’s skills — the Master Jiangshi’s ultimate job skill that created a heaven-piercing pillar of crimson.

“WoWowOoooOoOoOoo?!”

The Gigaknight had no means of dodging the flame. The crimson fire surrounded the devil, and when it connected, all the firepower gathered within the Gigaknight, and...

“Dirty... fireworks?” She tilted her head, saying a fitting word for what happened next — an explosion.

The Gigaknight was blown to smithereens and became bits of light. That single attack shaved away all of its 300,000 HP, killing it instantly.

That was the Gigaknight that had lost 50,000 HP to my Vengeance, but that fact did nothing to change the fact that the damage from that fire was insane.

“I burned it up... see?” she said as she looked at the left bracer, releasing nothing but smoke. “It won’t work for a while... I guess?”

Hell General was looking at the scene like he couldn’t believe it.

I could tell that Nemesis, still in my hand, was feeling something similar.

Well, I couldn’t blame them. A young girl had just appeared out of nowhere and killed a Legendary devil in one shot.

There was no arguing that it seemed unreasonable and strange, but I didn’t see it that way.

After all, she was Legendary, too.

Gardranda was a Legendary demon... and a UBM.

“I’m gonna have to fight the other one empty-handed... aren’t I?” she said as she took a martial artist’s posture. “320 seconds left. I’ll get this done before it ends... okay?”

Snapping her fingers, the Legendary demon began a devil hunt.

Chapter Three: Legendary

About a certain special reward...

Special rewards were items that took the main traits of a UBM and adjusted them to suit the MVP's needs.

Ray's first special reward, Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda, was no exception. The three skills it had were the UBM's traits adjusted to suit Ray.

The first two skills were obvious.

The flame and miasma abilities wielded by Gardranda had been turned into the easy-to-use skills known as "Purgatorial Flames" and "Hellish Miasma."

So this might lead you to the question of what kind of trait was adapted to create the third skill of Miasmaflame Princess: Gardranda.

The hobgoblin herself had explained it, in fact: "I'm manifesting like this because I was defeated before the conditions to unleash my true power were fulfilled and I could break the shell and be born... probably?"

As a UBM, Gardranda had been originally designed to be monster with multiple stages. The death of the parent body, the Great Miasmic Hobgoblin, should have brought about the true form: the Miasmaflame Princess.

That meant that the Great Miasmic Hobgoblin's third trait was "birth."

Thus, upon its defeat, the power to summon the Miasmaflame Princess had become a skill.

Needless to say, this skill was insanely powerful, as it allowed the wielder to call forth a creature as strong as — or, in Gardranda's case, even stronger than — the original UBM. It wasn't on the level of Superior items, but it was still powerful.

Too powerful, even.

No one man could be allowed to wield such power so easily, and that was why the skill came with three major limitations.

The first was the unlock condition, which Ray had already cleared.

Just like Paladin's Grand Cross, powerful skills were often barred behind certain conditions, and for Miasmaflame Princess, that was becoming MVP against three UBMs.

Defeating UBMs was no easy task. Even Marie, a Superior Job who'd killed Ray once, had only beaten two, and even among Superiors, you had those who'd never won against a single one, such as "The Unknown" wannabe, Gerbera.

This skill had ended up with such a condition because it, too, was adjusted for Ray.

To the system, Ray's primary trait in the fight against Gardranda was being a low-level entity who'd defeated a UBM and become MVP.

Thus, that was considered during the conversion, and the condition to unlock the third skill became "becoming MVP against three UBMs."

It was set to that under the assumption that Ray could surely fulfill it. If the unlock condition had somehow ended up being different, it surely would've been just as difficult for him.

Regardless, he'd cleared this condition by defeating the Great Miasmic Hobgoblin, Gardranda; Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise; and the recent Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome.

The second limitation was the MP cost.

To manifest and fight at full power, Miasmaflame Princess, Gardranda used 1,000 MP per second.

Even high-rank magic jobs couldn't keep her up for more than 10 seconds, and even level 500 casters couldn't break through 30. That was how severe the cost was.

This wasn't adjusted to Ray or anything — it was just the natural cost of using something so powerful — but Ray was able to clear that, too.

Due to the recent Monochrome battle and the panic right here in Quartierlatin, his Grudge-Soaked Greaves had gathered enough negative energy to produce 400,000 MP — enough for the Miasmaflame Princess to be active for a whole 400 seconds.

And the third limitation, the post-use punishment, was something Ray was more than ready for.

With these conditions cleared, Gardranda was made manifest and faced Ray's foe with all her might.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

One Gigaknight exploded, and Gardranda targeted the other one.

The scene made the Hell General make a strained smile and force a laugh. “H-HA HA HA HA! I’ll praise you for one-hit-killing a hurt Gigaknight! B-But that flame has to be a one-time use skill!”

He was right.

Because she was a summon, Gardranda didn’t use a single point of minion capacity, but I still had access to her stat and detail screens. Three of the skills listed there — Purgatorial Flames, Purgatorial Fist, and Purgatorial Flames: Zero — had become unusable.

That had to be a side effect from the “Zero” skill. That made sense, as it seemed powerful enough to come with such a powerful negative. Gardranda wouldn’t be able to use the flames for the rest of the summon time.

“This goblin is the ace up your sleeve, right?!” Logan continued. “And now it’s lost its ultimate attack! That means my Gigaknight will win!”

He extended his hand to the remaining devil and named some skills.

“Boosted Devil Strength! Boosted Devil Endurance! Boosted Devil Agilityyyyy!”

Once he was done, the Gigaknight began glowing in three different colors and became way more menacing than before.

“HA! I used my Rumpelstiltskin to multiply these buffs by ten! The Gigaknight’s STR, END, and AGI are up by 200 percent! I’ll crush your goblin to dust!”

I had no words for this. Why hadn’t he used these buffs before? Was he unable to use them while he had his devil army? Was it unlocked when their numbers dropped?

“200 percent, eh?” Nemesis pondered. “That means its STR and END are over 30,000, and it can move faster than the speed of sound.”

I know what you’re getting at, I thought back. You’re wondering if Gardranda can win. And honestly, I’m not sure...

I switched to speaking aloud. “But you and I both know she’s not easy to beat, right?”

“...True.”

The first UBM I’d ever fought was fearsome, tough, and crazy strong.

I couldn’t even imagine how this Gardranda, who was even stronger than that one, could ever be defeated.

"By the way, Nemesis..." I began.

"Yes, I know."

It wasn't just Gardranda. We had to act, too.

But for that, we needed the Hell General to—

"HA HA HA! Gigaknight! Show this low-rank the power... of a Superior!"

"W o W o w o O o O o o o O o O O o o O o O O!"

The buffed Gigaknight followed its summoner's orders, crushing the pavement beneath as it dashed straight towards me.

As if completely ignoring the goblin, it raised its blade and swung it down at me.

But Gardranda stopped it with a palm strike that blasted it away.

"I knew you looked like the type to do something... like that," I said.

"W o O O o!" The attack tore open the dented armor and dug a hole in its flesh, but the Gigaknight didn't seem to care, and just roared at her while moving the insect legs peeking from its helmet. Its END was now so high that even that didn't mean much to it.

Still, since Gardranda was as relentless as her mother, the STR she'd delivered with her strike was immense enough to send it a whole eight meters back.

"If you want to beat Ray, you need to beat me... first," said Gardranda.

"She sounds like some rival character who switched sides after you beat her," commented Nemesis.

Well... that's pretty much what she is, right?

"Also, Ray, heal up... okay? As you are, you'll die even if you get the... good one."

"Yeah," I said in realization. I reached into my inventory, took out an HP Potion, and started downing it.

Gardranda moved right between me and the Gigaknight, posing in a way that basically screamed, "You're not getting past me!" Man, was she reliable.

Also... with all his antagonism towards Gardranda, I really hadn't expected Logan to launch a surprise attack on me. What a piece of work.

"Tch...!" The Hell General clicked his tongue. "All right, then I'll crush you first! It'll be easy! The Gigaknight has way better stats than you!"

"Way better stats?" Gardranda tilted her head. "Not anymore."

No one else here — not even Nemesis and I — understood what she meant by that.

At least, until the Gigaknight moaned in pain and fell to its knees.

"WHA—?!" Logan exclaimed.

"It's got half of what it had before... I guess?" said Gardranda, and I finally noticed that her right hand was covered in a dark purple miasma.

It was like the legendary Chinese martial art, poison fist. She was wielding the three debuffs like a weapon on her hand.

Seeing that made me remember the concept of punching with fists imbued with Gardranda's flames or miasma. I'd done that by accident when finishing off Franklin.

I wanted to try and replicate that, but it was difficult with miasma, and it had been impossible with the flames because I'd lost my left arm.

Gardranda herself, though, was doing that as if it was natural.

Well, she does have Purgatorial Fist and Hellish Hand in her skill list, I thought.

"But Hellish Miasma didn't work on them before, did it?" Nemesis asked, and I could see where she was coming from.

We'd tried it on the first Gigaknight, and it had done nothing. The second one couldn't have weaker resistances, so there had to be some other reason.

"Umm, my miasma is stronger... and I compressed it... see?" Gardranda explained.

"Compressed? Ah..."

I was familiar with the concept of debuff compression. We'd seen Miss Eldritch do it in The Lunar Society's headquarters. But I was surprised Gardranda had been able to learn it from inside the Miasmaflame Bracers.

"So she's actually above her true power now," I said.

Kasumi had told me that summoned monsters became stronger the more you used them, but right here, we had one who had learned new things before even the first summon. That was insane.

"Hellish Miasma," she said as she released the purple mist upon the ground. It didn't rise any higher than my waist.

It was both a debilitating miasma and a smokescreen that hid her when she lowered herself.

"W o O o O O, w O o o O o O o O O!" Still afflicted by the debuffs, the Gigaknight stood up, swung its blade, and tried to bash Gardranda away with its shield, but not a single one of its hits landed.

It wasn't because it'd lost sight of her in the miasma.

It was like my one-on-one battle against Logan. She'd predicted its attacks, evaded them, then punched back.

It wasn't like a fight between two Masters, where a single ultimate skill could end it all, but that made the gap between their abilities all the more obvious.

"This is odd," said Nemesis. "She's spread a smokescreen, yet she moves in such an erratic manner. Don't you agree?"

I did. Gardranda had created a smokescreen, but instead of using it, she was just moving around at supersonic speeds, making a mess of it and making it easy to see where she was.

What's the point...? I wondered, right before I noticed Gardranda looking at us.

It was a signal of some sort, and I understood exactly what she was getting at when she was out of Logan's sight and pointed at the smoke below.

"I see," Nemesis said. "So that's the purpose of this miasma."

"Yeah... We can actually pull it off now."

As we agreed on what we had to do, I sunk Nemesis, still in her sword form, into the miasma.

"Impossible!" Logan roared, clearly irritated by what he was seeing. "Mine's a Legendary devil! How can it lose against a low-rank goblin thing?!"

"That devil is Legendary... that's true," Gardranda nodded. "Its stats are about the same as mine... and I'm Legendary. But..." She made an extremely annoyed face. "We aren't simple enough to be measured just by rank. Your ready-made devils... don't have the 'self' to stand a chance against a real UBM... understand?"

It felt like this was a matter of pride to her.

She was original and one-of-a-kind, and thus she was confident that no mass-produced devil summoned by magic alone could match her, same tier or not.

"I was born out of a man-eating hobgoblin, and turned out as a human-goblin hybrid," she added. "That's why I can move, think, and learn like a human. Since becoming a special reward, I've watched the movements of many rankers, experienced knights... and even Superiors. By watching, I understood, and by understanding, I learned."

She wasn't lying. Some of her movements actually looked Shu's and Figaro's.

Perhaps this was Gardranda's true power?

"Compared to that, your devil is so weak," she said scornfully. "Its movements are patterned, and it only relies on its stats."

"W o, w O o o O O!"

The Gigaknight wasn't mad at her for insulting it — it didn't have the mind for that — but it still attacked Gardranda right at that moment with a horizontal slash.

She caught it between her elbow and knee, and then, like a master karate artist, turned the attack around and broke the blade.

"You didn't buff the weapons... huh?" she scoffed before running up her opponent's arm and launching a knee kick into the head — the Shining Wizard, as it was called. It made its helmet fly off.

Its head was repulsive. It looked like it had a human face with insect legs growing out of it.

Gardranda didn't seem to mind as she bared her fangs, sank them into its windpipe, and tore out its flesh.

"Ewwww." She voiced her displeasure. "Ray was way more... tasty."

"o, w o o o...!"

The damage to its throat made it lose its voice, but the Gigaknight still fought on, swinging its shield.

Gardranda easily evaded it and said, "32 seconds left. I'll just end this... okay?"

Missing the shield attack rendered the Gigaknight defenseless.

Gardranda raised her right leg, aimed it at its neck...

"Kodachi."

...and launched Shu's forte right into its torn windpipe.

The already-damaged neck couldn't bear Gardranda's attack, and the Gigaknight lost its head.

Then Gardranda jumped on its shoulders and sunk her hand down its neck, saying, "Hellish Miasma: Zero."

Basic Hellish Miasma was a skill that gave the Poison, Intoxication, and Weakness debuffs. But in Gardranda's hands, it showed its true power and became something far more fearsome.

You could hear the body melt as the red of blood, the black of rotting flesh, and the white of melted bone poured out from the spaces in its armor... and quickly became bits of light.

The battle was over.

The Legendary devil, Gigaknight, had been completely powerless against the Legendary goblin UBM, Gardranda.

"N-No way..." Logan muttered in shock.

Gardranda eyed him, then looked at us.

"Time's up... I guess."

Just like the Gigaknight she'd just defeated, she herself was turning into light.

The 400 seconds — the time I'd given her with the 400,000 MP from Gouz-Maise — had expired.

But that didn't matter much, as she had done her job.

"The rest is up to you two," she tilted her head to look at us. "Do your best, Ray."

And so, she vanished, leaving behind nothing but the bracers, which made a metallic noise as they fell on the pavement.

"Gh..." I grunted. Right when she disappeared, my body became extremely heavy.

I looked at my stats and saw the three debuffs — Poison, Intoxication, and Weakness.

"Looks like I was lucky this time," I said.

Miasmaflame Princess: Gardranda not only cost an immense amount of MP — it also came with a powerful post-usage side effect.

There were three possible side effects, and I was fortunate enough to have gotten the least bad of the three — incurable debuffs that lasted three times as long as the summon did.

If it had been one of the other two (three times as long burning or three times as long loss of control over my body), I'd have been done for.

But as things were, I could end this.

"Ha! HA HA HA HA! I'll praise you for beating two of my Gigaknights!" Logan laughed.

He already had two more Gigaknights at his side. He must've waited until Gardranda vanished to summon them.

"But unlike you and your monster, I can summon dozens more Gigaknights and thousands more Soldier Devils! You put up a fight, but you didn't change anything! You'll still lose!"

He was talking sense.

I was a low-rank, while he was a Superior.

He was several tiers above me, and I'd no doubt lose if I kept on fighting.

With the difference between us, my chances of victory were close to zero.

But... it was already over.

"Hell General, Logan Goddhart..." I called out to him. "You're done."

I lifted Nemesis out of the miasma that was hiding her.

She was neither The Black Blade, nor The Flag Halberd.

She was now a spinning blade reminiscent of a five-bladed pinwheel — a windstar.

Third form β — Shooting Wheel.

It had the power to chase after the target with AGI equal to a tenth of the damage they'd inflicted upon me, then giving it back to them three-fold. It was a long-range, auto-seeking counter-attack.

It had a flaw in its charge time, but thanks to Gardranda, that was already done.

If I'd attacked Logan while she was still fighting, he'd have summoned the third and fourth Gigaknights right at that moment. And If I'd started charging the Shooting Wheel where he could see it, he'd have noticed and stopped me.

But thanks to the miasma, the smokescreen Gardranda had set upon the ground, he hadn't noticed it.

The reason why she'd made a mess of the miasma with her supersonic speeds was to hide the movements caused by the Shooting Wheel's spinning.

Nemesis and I had done the charging while Gardranda was keeping Logan distracted with her fight against the Gigaknight.

Everything was set.

I couldn't move right because of the debuffs, but that didn't get in the way of launching the next and final attack.

Logan gasped, realizing the power I was wielding, then started chanting something. "'H-Here and now, I consign this unique treasure!'" he said, making one of his items vanish.

"Payback..." I began saying the name of my own skill.

"'In exchange for its limitless value, grant me a moment of power!'"

Alas, his chant came far too late.

Perhaps it wouldn't have turned out this way if he'd chosen to do this while Gardranda and the Gigaknight were still fighting.

"...Beyond the..."

"'Come from the ancient times, O endless devil!'"

Perhaps what he was trying to summon right now was his ultimate trump card.

But, again, it was far too late.

"...Stars."

"C-Call Devil Ze—"

The shooting star flew.

Going at five times the speed of sound, it closed the less-than-a-hundred-meter distance between us before hitting him and unleashing the damage.

With Veldorbell having destroyed Logan's Brooch, he now had no means of resisting.

The damage exceeding 1,500,000 turned him into dust, not even giving him the chance to say his final words.

All that was left were some random drops and the shattered pieces of his custom-made armor — the proof of his death penalty.

I said nothing.

I'd just won against the Hell General, Logan Goddhart — a Superior. However, that barely made me feel anything.

Perhaps that was because he'd underestimated me and hadn't gone all-out, even for a second.

Or maybe this was just the kind of victory that just couldn't give me any joy. Perhaps all it could make me feel was just... emptiness at the fact that so many irreplaceable, priceless things had been lost to someone like this.

"Phew..." I tried to think of some words, but all that came out was a sigh.

I reached into my inventory, took out an HP potion, and downed it.

As the debuffs made my body feel heavy, I lay down right where I stood.

◆◆◆

Earth, ???

“AAAAAHHHHHHHHHH!” the person screamed, jumped out of the bed, lost himself to rage, took off the Infinite Dendrogram hardware, threw it into the wall, then stomped on it over and over, breaking it completely.

As if that wasn’t enough, he started kicking around everything else in the room. Magazines, cushions, his elementary schooler backpack, and his homework... nothing escaped his rage as he tried to let go of something whirling within.

“I... I-I lost to a... low-rank... in a fight... I even used a... special reward... WAAAAAAAHHHHHHH!”

The little boy who wasn’t even in middle school yet screamed as if that would make his defeat go away.

You’d expect someone to hear and come to check on him, but his room was specially designed to be completely soundproof “to let the boy focus on his studies,” so no one was overhearing this moment of madness.

After raging around for a while, the boy — the real identity of the Hell General, Logan Goddhart — started shouting something more coherent.

“I’m supposed to be better than everyone else! In school and Infinite Dendrogram! No one’s supposed to be better! I’m the best gamer! It’s not fair!”

That was when he realized his temper had led him to break his game hardware.

For a moment, a chill went down his spine, but then he remembered that it registered brain waves, so all he had to do was buy another one. It was just money.

He calmed down a bit and started muttering.

“It’s that old fart’s fault. I didn’t know he’d be there, and I wouldn’t have lost if he hadn’t been. That was a 2v1, and they used dirty tricks. Why could he even use a UBM?! That’s not fair! I’ll mail the devs and—!”

He spoke as though he’d forgotten about his army and Legendary devils, but his excuses were cut short by a message he received on his mobile device.

“Who...?” He looked at it and became petrified.

The message said, “Not so hot now are ya, Your Excellency? (GIT REKT. L M A O)”

The sender was “Mr. Franklin.”

That was the name of the Superior he was most antagonistic towards, and the message irritated him like nothing else.

He suddenly realized that Franklin must have used his monsters to observe the whole battle just now, just like he’d done during the Liliana incident.

The message also came with a URL leading to a video site, showing the entire fight between Hell General and Ray Starling.

The boy suddenly realized that his embarrassing defeat had been made available to the public. The shock caused him to throw his phone at the wall.

He then proceeded to bury his face in a cushion, wetting it with tears.

Chapter Four: Gifted Barbaros

Thirty years ago, Quartierlatin mansion.

In the Quartierlatin mansion's garden, a young married couple was sitting around a white table underneath a large tree, drinking tea and chatting.

"Oh, so you plan to take him on your next trip to Dryfe?"

"Yes. While I'm at it, I will also introduce him to the Barbaros family."

The wife was Countess Zermina Quartierlatin, the only child of the previous count.

The husband was Mark Quartierlatin, an Altarian diplomat who'd married into the family.

The two had married out of love, which was a rarity for nobles, and had been blessed with their first child just a year ago.

Their son's name was Emilio. Bathed in the sunlight leaking through the tree, he was lying asleep in a carriage next to their table.

They had a garden because of the husband's fondness of them, and the time the three of them spent here was nothing but bliss.

"He's only a year old," Zermina said, expressing her worry. "Are you sure he should go on such a long trip?"

"We're taking a dragon carriage, so we will be safe," he said soothingly. "The mission will have a Bishop from the state church, as well as many escorts, including the one and only Mr. Faldreed."

"Oh, my. The Sacred Blazer?"

"Yes. He said he also has business with the Barbaros family. Apparently, he and The Ram... Ronaldo Barbaros... are going to have a duel."

"Mark... you care more about the duel than your work, don't you?" she asked suspiciously.

"Ah... N-No, no, certainly not!" he overreacted, making it clear that she'd hit the nail on the head.

"Ugh..." she sighed. "Don't forget your work, at least."

"I would never. Far too much depends on how these discussions go."

The diplomatic mission he was entrusted with would greatly affect the futures of both Dryfe and Altar, as they would discuss the potential of a marriage between the kingdom's royalty and the imperium's bloodline.

If that happened, it would greatly strengthen their alliance and perhaps even lead to a union of the two countries.

However, all of the king's children — including the firstborn, Eldor Zeo Altar — were male. Though the imperium had a princess, her family on her mother's side was too lacking in status to marry into the kingdom.

So Mark expected the discussions to be about the potential marriage in the later generations of kings, imperators, and princesses.

The mission had a number of other goals planned, but the focus was on that subject — the talks of future decades.

As a count, he cared a lot about the future of Altar, but as a father, he was obviously concerned about the well-being of his son.

"If you're to take Emilio, maybe I should go, as well?" asked Zermina.

"Mina, you don't like using dragon carriages, do you?" he said. "Not to mention that there's count work to be done."

"That's true, but... I'll ask again. It is safe, right?"

"Of course. We will come back in less than a month. I imagine I'll be missing your cookies dearly at that point." The count picked up one of the cookies from a plate on the table and took a bite. They were handmade by his wife, and he always enjoyed their gentle taste.

"Ahh! Ooh..." Emilio suddenly became noisy. He was awake now and staring at the cookie with his heterochromic eyes. Those were a trait he'd inherited from his mother.

"You want a cookie?" his father asked.

You could tell that was what he wanted by the way he reached for it.

"You can't," scolded Zermina. "You're too young for cookies. You don't even have a full set of teeth yet."

"Nnh..." The boy became sulky as though he actually understood her words.

"Ha ha ha! Emilio, just wait a few months and you will have the teeth for them. Or maybe you'll be able to eat them by the time we come back from Dryfe. Who knows?"

"Oh, then I'll have to work hard and welcome you with my best cookies yet," Zermina giggled.

Her husband chuckled, and it soon spread to little Emilio.

It was peaceful quality time with the family.

A week later, the count took Emilio on his trip to Dryfe.

The lady saw them off with a smile on her face, completely unaware that this would be the last time they ever saw each other.

◇◆

The entire scene was drowned in flames.

The road, the trees — everything was burning to a crisp.

There were countless limbs littered in the fire, and it was easy to see that they had come from humanoid marionettes. In fact, there were no human limbs anywhere in the blaze.

Those were outside of it.

The human limbs had been torn off by the marionettes, and were now burning and collapsing. They easily surpassed one hundred in number. They'd belonged to at least fifty people.

Ignoring such statistics, they were the corpses of the Altarian mission to Dryfe.

On the road from the Quartierlatin County to Barbaros County, on the border between the countries, the party had suddenly been swarmed by a horde of marionettes.

Not even understanding what was happening, the guards assigned to the mission had still fought hard to protect it.

Alas, they were quickly outnumbered, and as their numbers dwindled, the marionettes finally reached the carriage they were tasked to protect.

The marionettes were unarmed, but they were strong enough to cling to people and tear off their limbs.

A user of search magic discovered that they were being controlled by a UBM called "Unguided Horde, Edelvalsa," with a rank of Mythical.

It was no doubt an emergency, and those who could use communication magic called for reinforcements from both Dryfe and Altar.

Unfortunately, no one came, no matter how long they waited.

After all — they were right at the border between the countries.

It wasn't easy to send an army to such a politically-important location, especially if it had to be large enough to battle a Mythical.

Then again, an army wouldn't have made it even if they'd moved out the moment they'd learned of this attack, as the mission was almost completely wiped out in less than two hours.

There was only one person left.

It was a young man somewhere in his twenties.

He was clad in armor as red as a blaze, and wore long, navy blue gloves.

In his hands, he held a sword with a wave-like blade — a flamberge.

Fifty-odd marionettes were charging at him. Communicating in a language unintelligible to mankind, they approached him to tear him limb from limb, but...

"Blazing Circle."

...the man swung his sword in an arc.

A flame extended from the blade, splitting all the fifty marionettes in two, then creating explosions on the cut.

They fell to the ground and began blazing, mixing with the countless other marionette remains spread out on the ground.

Counting the remains would easily give you a number surpassing one thousand, and many of them were too indistinct to count properly.

Almost all of those marionettes had been destroyed by the man.

He was the Sacred Blazer, Aslan Faldreed.

He was considered to be the strongest man in Altar currently. Anyone who witnessed this display of a would understand why — he was a one-man army.

But despite crushing his opponents so easily, he showed not a hint of joy.

After all... he'd already lost.

Even if he himself was unharmed, none of what he was supposed to protect had survived. A thousand destroyed marionettes meant nothing compared to that.

There was only one possible outcome to a fight where a solo battle type defended against a wide-scale suppression type — the solo battle type survived, while the wide-scale suppression type destroyed all that was supposed to be protected.

He didn't have the power to repel the swarming horde.

"I'm so sorry..." he muttered, but there was no one who could hear him. He was by far the strongest creature on the battlefield, but he felt nothing but powerlessness.

The marionettes had been destroyed. The only things moving now were the flames.

Aslan stood in place, listening to the fire consume the marionettes, when suddenly, he heard something different.

Not wasting a moment, he ran to the source of the sound — the collapsed dragon carriage.

He rose it up, opened it, and lost his words.

The interior was in a terrible state. A marionette had gone in and slaughtered everyone.

The officials had all died, their bodies ruthlessly torn apart, but then the marionette had been destroyed, too. Count Mark Quartierlatin, the main diplomat, had pierced the marionette's head with his blade.

The count was dead, but he had been protecting something behind him — a piece of cloth that was still moving.

Aslan gently took it in hand and unwrapped it a bit to expose the face of the count's only son... Emilio.

Aslan closed his eyes tightly and prayed.

This wasn't a miracle from God, but the mere result of a father protecting his child. Thus, he prayed for Mark to find peace.

Still holding Emilio, Aslan left the dragon carriage and heard a new sound.

Countless footsteps were marching from somewhere in the distance. They were human-like, but inhuman — akin to the uncanny valley of human footsteps. The marionette reinforcements had come, this time numbering to ten thousand.

"Marionettes..." the man muttered as he shielded the child in his left arm and opened his eyes wide. "Come, if you're willing. For the sake of this child, and for the kingdom... I will burn you all."

Gripping his blade in his right hand, he stood alone and faced the encroaching horde.

But right as the strongest warrior clashed with the ten thousand marionettes...

"Distortion Pile!"

...a shockwave cut through the center of the horde.

Holes larger than the marionettes' torsos opened up in their bodies and made them fall apart.

Second and third shockwaves followed, not giving the horde a chance to do anything about it.

“Prominence Wave!”

Aslan joined the onslaught and swung his blade, creating what could only be described as a tsunami of flame.

The ten-thousand strong marionette horde lost a tenth of their numbers in just a few attacks.

The humans, however, had doubled in power.

“Yo, Aslan. I’m here to give ya a hand.” said the man now standing next to him. “Looks like I’m late, though.”

He was wearing mechanical armor, equipped with a gigantic pile bunker in its right hand.

The face cover on his helmet opened up, and he looked at the state of the mission with grief in his eyes. Though his armor looked clunky, his expression was truly refined.

He was none other than the Barbaros County’s heir apparent, and Dryfe’s strongest warrior — The Ram, Ronaldo Barbaros.

“You aren’t late. I thought I wouldn’t get reinforcements for a while still,” said Aslan.

“I know what you mean. I just went out ’cause I’d had enough of listening to the old farts in Vandelheim wasting time. Sorry, but we won’t get any real reinforcements for a while.”

“It’s fine. I don’t mind” Aslan stood back-to-back to Ronaldo. They faced the nine thousand marionettes surrounding them. “I’ve already gotten the best reinforcements I could’ve asked for.”

“Heh. Guess I’ll have to live up to that, huh? Let’s do this!”

Placing their lives in the hands of each other, the two men, who trusted one another more than anyone else, clashed with the marionettes.

◇◆

“Blaze Edge!”

“Distortion Pile!”

Altar’s and Dryfe’s strongest pulverized a hundred marionettes with just a single hit.

Unbeatable, two-man army, unmatched, peerless — there were many terms to describe them.

After meeting up, the two went on to destroy over ten thousand marionettes.

Even so, the battle wasn't over, for there were still thousands more, and they only kept increasing.

This was the power of the Mythical UBM known as "Unguided Horde, Edelvalsa."

It had a skill called "Marionette Brigade Creation," and the name said everything you needed to know — it was a menacing power that created a marionette army as vast as a brigade.

It needed wood or stone for the material, but the border between Altar and Dryfe was a woodland, so there was no problem on that front.

Individual marionettes were weak — equal to just single low-rank jobs. To experienced Superior Jobs, such as Sacred Blazer and The Ram, they were like paper.

However, there were just too many of them.

The battle had been going on for dozens of hours now, draining them of their energy and making it harder to evade attacks.

"Feels like we haven't done shit to their numbers," said Ronaldo as he opened his face cover and wiped the sweat off his face. "The main unit's gotta be hidin' somewhere. I can just imagine its shit-eating grin."

He suddenly aimed his pile bunker behind him and fired it, piercing a marionette.

"What a goddamn monster, though. We've taken out a whole bunch of UBMs, but this one's worse than all of 'em combined," he added as he eyed his pile bunker and machine armor — both Legendary special rewards.

"Let me correct you." Aslan made a serious face. "You say you imagine the main unit grinning, but according to our search magic, it's a doll, too. Its expression doesn't change."

"Man, you never change, do ya? You said something like that when we downed that sphinx, too."

"That takes me back..." Aslan said as he looked at his long gloves — the remains of the UBM he and Ronaldo had defeated. They were an Ancient Legendary special reward, and though they gave him a great advantage against magic and its users, they were useless to him in this battle.

"You think the other marionettes're far?" asked Ronaldo. "Wanna try escapin' through where there're less of 'em?"

"A foolish question," Aslan declared. "Running away means leaving this UBM until the army comes to take care of it — who knows when that will happen — or until it starts invading Altar and Dryfe. At the rate it's making its marionettes, it could create an army of over a hundred thousand in just a few days. That would be a disaster."

"Guess we got no choice, then."

"Yes... We have to beat it here and now."

They both looked around.

The trees that'd been here before had all been used as marionette material, so they could see far into the distance.

They saw nothing but the remains covering the surface and a new marionette army coming their way, signaling yet another attack.

"By the way, let me hold the kid," Ronaldo said as he extended his left hand towards the cloth in Aslan's arm. Emilio was sound asleep.

Aslan refused. "No need."

He hadn't been able to protect the mission. Emilio was the sole survivor of the group, as well as a child that Count Quartierlatin had given his life to save.

Thus, protecting the child was his duty. He would bring the child back home, along with the inventories containing the remains of the others who'd perished at the hands of this UBM.

"Don't get stubborn with me now," his friend said. "Your right arm's broken. You can't fight with that boy in hand, can ya?"

"Yours is broken, too, you know? I can tell just by looking."

"Don't mind this. It doesn't make pile-bunkering any harder," Ronaldo laughed. "Also, that boy right there's gonna be my daughter's husband. I've gotta keep the li'l guy safe."

Aslan's eyes opened wide. "Your child's already born?"

"Nope. Not yet. But I mean, my honey's the one birthin'. I just know it's gonna be a cute girl! No! It's gonna be a cute girl 'cause I want it to be a cute girl!"

"You're a noble... Shouldn't you wish for an heir? Though I guess I'm in no position to talk. I was a nomad before I rose to nobility." Aslan grinned wryly and handed Emilio to Ronaldo, who took him with lots of care.

"You'd better keep him safe."

"Don't need you to tell me that." Ronaldo formed an indomitable smile. "Anyway, what now? We holdin' out until the cavalry gets here? Whenever that'd be..."

"No... we're taking out the main unit."

"You know where it is?"

"Yes. I've kept track of the variations in their reinforcement times, the percentage of stone marionettes mixing with the wooden ones, and general information about the location — particularly, the state of the woodlands. I'm seventy percent sure I know where it is."

"You know, I thought this during the Veltboule Sphinx battle, but damn, you've got what it takes to be a detective." Ronaldo grinned wryly. He still couldn't believe Aslan could say things like that and act like it was nothing.

"Anyway, are you up for this?" Aslan asked. "There's a thirty percent chance we'll go right into the enemy army and get nothing for it, and a seventy percent chance we'd be fighting Edelvalsa in tatters."

"Oh, I'm up for this. And don't worry. No matter how bad it gets, I'll protect this boy."

"I see. Shall we go, then?"

"Yeah!"

Thousands of marionettes right before them, and Edelvalsa somewhere beyond...

With a goal set, the two warriors faced and braved through the horde.

◇◆

Two days had passed since the appearance of Unguided Horde, Edelvalsa. Both Altar and Dryfe were keeping to themselves and preparing for a potential attack from the UBM.

Despite this, there was a group running through the border.

It consisted of men riding tank-type Magingears, known as Geists, and replica Prism Steeds. They were the army of the Barbaros County.

One replica rider was ahead of them all. He was the current head of the Barbaros family, and one of the generals of the Dryfean army: General Barbaros.

He was also the proud father of The Ram, Ronaldo Barbaros, the man who'd gone to aid in the fight against Edelvalsa before anyone else.

He'd wanted to rush to save the diplomats the moment they'd received their comms magic request for aid. However, the current imperator and the other higher-ups had restrained him.

"Sending an army to the border might not be wise."

"It wouldn't be good for us politically if we move an army there before they do."

"It wouldn't be good if the imperium's army is the only one to suffer casualties. In fact, we should wait until the kingdom wears the UBM down, then move out to finish it off and take the Mythical special reward for ourselves."

Calling their assertions "political" felt like an insult to politics.

General Barbaros had wanted to bellow out his disagreement towards their decision, but as an army man, he simply couldn't.

Instead he'd tried to persuade them like the general he was.

His son, however, had said, "It's fine if we don't go with an army, right?" and headed out to the border by himself.

A whole day had passed since then. General Barbaros had successfully convinced the imperator to allow an army to move to the border, but only if it was Barbaros's own and no others.

"Please, tell me I'm not too late...!"

Tortured by unease, he urged his army to move as fast as possible.

He wasn't the only one who felt that way. All of the Barbaros army men who knew Ronaldo felt the same. They all broke their speed limits and records to rush to aid him and the diplomats.

Then marionettes appeared before them, slowing them down.

"These must be Edelvalsa's!"

They made short work of them. Ironically, this encounter gave them hope.

After all, if there were marionettes, the battle wasn't over yet.

And if they hadn't invaded either country yet, it could only mean that someone was keeping them busy.

"I'm coming, son!" General Barbaros shouted as he broke through the marionettes in his way.

Crossing thousands of marionette remains, they arrived at a forest that seemed to be their source.

"RONALDO! MR. FALDREED! WE CAME TO YOUR AID! ARE YOU WELL?!" His voice, filled with the hope that it would reach his son, resounded throughout the forest.

For some reason, however, it made all the marionettes around him just... stop.

They now just stood in place, not doing anything.

No — they all started pointing in a single direction.

General Barbaros found it odd and suspected it was a trap, but he was confident he would make it regardless.

However, what he found upon following the marionettes' directions was far worse than a trap.

"Aahh..." Vocal despair left his mouth as he fell to his knees.

His son, Ronaldo Barbaros, was lying against a large tree, clad in only his innerwear, for his armor had vanished.

The disappearance of a special reward could only mean one thing — he was dead.

In his left arm, he held some sort of blanket, while his right hand was fixed in an odd state, like he'd just pulled a trigger. It was proof that he'd held the pile bunker, his other special reward, until his dying breath.

The death of his son made the general bawl his eyes out. "Ronaldo! Ronaldo...! I'm so sorry... If only I'd come earlier... ohh...!"

The grief from losing his son, the regret that he had been too late to save him, the guilt towards his mother and his son's wife... such feelings whirled inside him and tortured him.

"General! Look there!" One of his soldiers pointed to something surrounded by countless marionette remains.

It was the body of a man he knew well — his son's friendly rival, Aslan Faldreed.

He'd died standing. His special rewards were gone, but his hands were positioned in a way like he had stabbed someone below him.

The two soldiers had fought until the very end.

"So... you both died as you lived... Hm?"

As the father within General Barbaros lamented the loss, the soldier within him calmly began to wonder.

What became of Edelvalsa?

His son and the kingdom's people had surely died hours ago. If

Edelvalsa was still alive, it would have surely created an army and invaded one of the countries by now.

However, the number of marionettes that had appeared before him was far too lacking.

That could only mean that Edelvalsa disappeared with the deaths of these two men, but that left him with the question of why the marionettes had been able to move right before they'd arrived here.

As he searched for an answer...

"Hm?" ...he noticed the cloth held by his son's remains move slightly.

"Could it be...?" He gently reached for and took the cloth from his son's cold hands.

Inside, he found...

"A... baby?"

It was a child not much older than one, covered in high-quality baby clothing.

There was blood on its face, and it had several minor wounds, but its life wasn't in danger.

General Barbaros wondered why it was there, and quickly figured it out. "I see. So you are Count Quartierlatin's..."

He remembered that they'd had plans for a marriage between the Quartierlatin and Barbaros families, so Count Quartierlatin had been bringing his son to present him to them.

The remains of the count himself and everyone else from the Altarian mission were in Aslan's corpse inventory.

All of them were gone, except for this baby... Emilio.

General Barbaros realized that his son had given his own life to protect this child.

"You were a proud soldier until the very end..." If Ronaldo hadn't left early and gone ahead on his own, this child wouldn't have lived, and many Altarians or Dryfeans would surely have died.

Though his heart was aching, General Barbaros couldn't have been more proud of his boy.

"Young Quartierlatin... I will bring you back to your country," he promised, with respect to the life his son had protected.

But then, he noticed something odd.

"Hm? This boy's eyes..."

He wiped the blood off the child's face, and he slightly opened the baby's left eye. The color wasn't what it was supposed to be.

"I heard he had his mother's blue-green heterochromia. Why are they both blue?"

The child didn't fit the description. As he wondered whether there had been more children in the mission, he noticed that the boy's left eye was artificial.

Overcome by unease, he used Identification on it, but his skill level was too low to even see the name.

He called for someone with the highest Identification level and showed it to him.

The man gasped, and his voice was shivering as he said, "Unguided Gaze, Edelvalsa... th-that's the name of his eye, sir."

"Wh... What?"

This couldn't be anything other than the special reward from the Mythical that had ravaged this land, Unguided Horde, Edelvalsa.

"Wh-Why is...? Don't tell me he...!" General Barbaros stopped as he thought of a possibility.

Ronaldo and Aslan might have died before Edelvalsa. The wounds from the battle had caught up to it after their deaths.

Since Emilio had been the only survivor when the MVP was being chosen, it had gone to him.

Naturally, the boy was far from the "Most Valuable Player" in this battle. However, if, for example, a single cry had attracted even a little bit of the UBM's aggro, that could have counted as a big enough contribution to the battle to make him the MVP if there had been no one else.

If that was the case, then perhaps the marionettes they'd run into on the way here had been summoned by Emilio instinctually trying to protect himself.

"G-General..." The man who identified the eye looked at General Barbaros with unease.

Instead of responding, he just looked down at the sleeping child and said, "I'm sorry..."

The apology was full of despair and guilt, for he realized that the promise he'd just made would be impossible to fulfill.

◇◆

He was right.

The imperator issued an order to tell the kingdom that the Mythical was defeated, but no one had survived.

The reason for this lie was Emilio's special reward — an immense power that only he could wield.

If he were brought back to Altar, the kingdom would surely gain more power, but if Dryfe claimed he'd died and raised him themselves, his power would be theirs.

The countries had a good relationship, but a Mythical special reward was valuable enough for them to lie to an ally.

The imperium had lost The Ram, too. He was their most powerful warrior, and they needed to fill the void.

The politicians had also argued that, "Having him with us would give us more power over the potential union with Altar."

As a Dryfean soldier, General Barbaros couldn't argue against that.

This was on a whole other level than the reinforcement matter. It was possible that the imperator wouldn't have hesitated to eliminate anyone opposing this decision. That was how powerful a Mythical was.

However, General Barbaros asked for one thing: to be allowed to raise the child.

The imperator allowed it right away.

The Barbaros family had produced excellent soldiers every generation, not to mention that General Barbaros had been the one to nurture the late Ronaldo Barbaros. The imperator was certain the child would grow to be a force to be reckoned with.

And with that, Emilio was adopted by the Barbaros family.

However, the general didn't take him with the intention of turning him into a human weapon.

"This power given to you will never let you have peace from battle," he spoke to the babe in his arms. "You will be forced to fight and train as a human weapon for the imperium... as part of the Special Mission Task Force."

Sad as it was, it was a future set in stone.

"But if possible... I want you to grow up with love."

That was the general's real desire.

"My precious boy gave his life to save you... so I want you to find happiness."

He wanted to prevent the child from becoming little more than a tool, and to protect at least a little bit of what his son had died fighting for.

"I'm an old, contradictory fool... a weak idiot who can't even return you to your mother's arms. You have every right to resent me. But..."

No one knew what he was going to say next. But whatever it was, it was cut off by Emilio giggling and extending his little arm to the general.

Upon seeing that, he could no longer speak... and only cried.

Thus, Emilio became a Barbaros and was given a new name: "Gifted."

By chance, it coincided with a word from Earth.

He'd lost his real name. He'd lost his father. He'd lost his entire life. And in compensation, he was instead gifted with immense power.

The life of Emilio Quartierlatin had ended, and the life of Gifted Barbaros, Dryfe's future field marshal and strongest tian, had begun.

Chapter Five: His Reason

About the imperium

Seven months ago in Infinite Dendrogram time, the Dryfe Imperium had waged war on the Kingdom of Altar.

There were three reasons why they had done so: one of them was “hunger,” and the other was “the risk of an invasion.”

The hunger was caused by the loss of fertile land.

A few years before Masters started growing in number, Dryfe’s cultivated territory began to wither. Being a northern country, it was never suited for farming, but things had only gotten worse since then.

The cause was unknown, and no amount of fertilizer research could reverse the problem. Eventually, about a third of Dryfe’s total area became unable to sprout even potatoes.

This famine continued to spread throughout the land, and it didn’t take long until the imperium was no longer a self-sustaining nation.

For a while, it could survive on imports from Altar and Caldina, but soon after Masters began growing in number, for reasons unknown, Caldina set a limit on their food exports to the imperium.

Many Dryfean diplomats were sent to negotiate a reversal of this policy, but Caldina wouldn’t budge, no matter what.

The desert country was well-known for being a nation that made a profit as a trade intermediary selling goods from one country to another, and yet it suddenly stopped doing that with Dryfe, taking on a “Want it? Come and get it” approach.

The imperium didn’t have the know-how needed to cross the perilous desert while transporting enough food to feed the population, so they had no choice but to give up on food from Caldina.

Some Dryfeans started dying of hunger, but the country could still survive on imports from Altar.

But then, soon after the new imperator was chosen, there was cross-national discussion in which the alliance between the two countries was canceled, ending the flow of food from the kingdom.

It was only a matter of time until the imperium had a massive famine on its hands.

The second reason, risk of an invasion, was also linked to Caldina.

The country was starting to show signs that it was preparing to attack one of its neighbors.

Following the increase in the number of Masters, Caldina began acting strange. Importing goods from the other countries while refusing to export certain things could be seen as a preparation for war.

Caldina was the richest of the seven great countries, so it could focus on imports for several decades and not endanger its financial situation one bit.

Additionally, they wanted to keep the items that would attract Masters to them.

Masters, particularly those powerful enough to cross the deserts, had a tendency to gather in Caldina because their markets had unique items from every country.

So one of the reasons why they stopped exporting such products was to keep the Masters who wanted them from leaving Caldina.

Upon realizing this, the imperium stopped exporting their machinery to them, but that didn't stop smuggling and the black markets.

Over the course of just a few years, Caldina had gathered massive amounts of goods and vast numbers of Masters. It was blatant preparation for war, and Dryfe couldn't understand why a country that had done nothing but trade until now was suddenly making such a drastic switch.

Many thought they saw the sudden increase in Masters as an opportunity, but that wasn't certain.

Whatever the case, Caldina was now the most dangerous neighbor to them, so thinking about the reasons for that was pointless.

As things were, Caldina was going to invade another country as soon as they were ready. It could be the Kingdom of Altar, Legendaria, the Huang He Empire, or the Dryfe Imperium, and Dryfean leadership guessed that it would be them.

After all, they had been the very first to have their imports from Caldina cut.

Though weakened due to the famines, the imperium still had the best technology out of all the countries, so it wasn't hard to believe Caldina would come for them to gain an advantage. Dryfe had no choice but to protect themselves.

Their first plan against that was a marriage between the next imperator and the kingdom's first princess, followed by a transformation that would turn Dryfe and Altar into a united kingdom.

It was a three-decade-old secret agreement that would both fix the imperium's famine and give them a chance against Caldina. It seemed like an action above all others.

However, as mentioned before, the cross-national talks following the new imperator's ascent had resulted in the complete opposite of a union — the end of their alliance. The imperium was left to face Caldina's incoming invasion all by themselves.

With all the Superiors and other powerful Masters that desert country had, the imperium stood no chance against them.

Thanks to the recent imperator accession civil war, Dryfe knew just how powerful Masters were — especially their own King of Beasts.

Thus, the Dryfean leadership unanimously agreed that the result of the war would be decided by the number of Masters on their side.

Although Dryfe had the KoB — the strongest in the three western countries — Caldina had the most powerful wide-scale exterminator, The Earth.

Even if you assumed they were equal, there was no chance that Dryfe's Hell General and other Masters could defeat Caldina's other Superiors. Everyone knew that war with Caldina would mean certain defeat for the imperium.

To avoid that, Dryfe had no choice but to gather enough power to make Caldina think twice before attacking them, then give them an obvious display of this power.

Basically, they had to gather war potential, show it, and fix their food shortages.

As it happened, right to the south of them, they had the perfect country for this: the Kingdom of Altar.

It was a fertile land that had recently had its forces devastated by the SUBM known as "Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria," making it a perfect target.

Also, many people in the imperium were upset at how Altar had ended the alliance and even cut off their food exports to Dryfe.

And they'd ended the alliance despite Dryfe sending out — and losing — reinforcements during the Gloria incident.

Unbeknownst to many, for details which won't be named here, the imperator was half of the reason why the alliance was broken. But with the state the imperium was in, that mattered little to the people. In fact, from Dryfe's perspective, they'd only tried to go through with what was planned long ago.

Anyway, the first war began.

Though the imperium had little food, it still had a decent amount of wealth. It spent a great amount of that to hire many country-less Masters, and went on to invade the kingdom.

It was easy for them to pick an invasion route, as one of the Altarian territories bordering Dryfe had its entire population wiped out by Gloria.

This route was picked by Field Marshal Gifted Barbaros, and his reason was, "There aren't any defenses or villages there. That makes it easy to fight."

That also meant that they wouldn't conquer any towns or villages on the way through there.

Side note: the other proposed invasion route was through the Quartierlatin County, which was the territory bordering the military base in the Barbaros County.

The battles began, the countries fought, and the first war reached its conclusion.

Altar lost major figures such as the king, the Celestial Knight, and the Arch Sage, while its knights and soldiers suffered major casualties.

Dryfe, on the other hand, conquered the unpopulated land they'd invaded through, giving them a bit of fertile land and improving their food situation.

However, not everything went as planned.

Near the end of the war, Caldina invaded Dryfe in order to divert them.

The imperium had to recall their forces, including the King of Beasts, making it impossible to complete their original plan and conquer the capital.

Caldina's intervention came at such a precise time that they delivered a critical hit to Dryfe's plans.

Naturally, Dryfe's leadership was bitter about this. The unpopulated area wasn't enough to cover the imperium's food needs, and their unfinished invasion of Altar gave them new openings for Caldina to take advantage of.

Caldina could easily approach the kingdom with an alliance offer and say, "Let us join hands and fight the imperium. You will get your lands back, while we will take Dryfe and their technology."

If this had been any other country, Altar would assume that the new, expanded Caldina would go on to invade them afterwards and strongly refuse the offer, but the kingdom was in such a dire situation that it didn't seem unlikely for them to accept.

The war that was supposed to be the key to solve all of Dryfe's problems had led to them fighting a battle on two fronts.

Though it was their decision to invade the kingdom, you could say it was Caldina that had forced them to take that action.

The one sitting at the top of their congress was often described as a "monstrous anomaly," while the Caldinian Superior, the King of Toys — named simply "Grandmaster" — had the nickname "Lord of the Boards" for a reason. It wouldn't have been strange for that Master to have predicted this future and manipulated them into doing what they did.

It was likely that Caldina would soon take advantage of the situation and, as previously mentioned, cooperate with the kingdom or use their wealth to start directly hiring Masters.

To quickly do away with these possibilities, Dryfe had no choice but to merge with the kingdom as quickly as possible.

However, their opinions clashed when it came to the method.

The prime minister faction was worried about the situation of their treasury and general logistics, so they proposed that they shouldn't move the army or negotiate with Altar, and instead did some small-scale operations that would have the same effect.

That included Franklin's Game, assassination plots, and plans to persuade certain Altarian nobles.

The field marshal faction, on the other hand, insisted they should resume the invasion to the capital from the currently occupied lands.

The main reason for this was time. It was clear that Caldina would make a move soon. The prime minister faction's proposal would take time and give too many openings for Caldina.

Therefore, the field marshal claimed it would be best to simply gather the Masters again and quickly take the capital, this time making sure to leave some Superiors at home for defense.

It would also make for a better situation further down the line, since union through the prime minister's method could split Altar into two factions: those who accepted it and those who were hostile to it. That would throw the entire area into chaos full of guerrilla warfare.

The imperator made the final call, settling this argument by saying that they would prepare for the second invasion while trying to further the prime minister faction's plots.

Dryfe had always had two routes to annex the kingdom.

And even though the prime minister faction's plot to break the kingdom's spirit had failed, the imperium's army was still preparing for the second invasion.

The ruins were found when there was only a month left until those plans were ready.

◇◆◇

Ruins

Shortly after the Hell General began his invasion...

While the devils were invading the town, Gifted Barbaros was halfway up the mountain with the ruins. There were no enemies nearby, and he was protected by only one marionette.

He could see all of Quartierlatin from where he was standing.

The morning sun still hadn't risen above the eastern mountain range, yet the town was bright. After all — it was burning.

Smoke rose up to the air from the chaotic townscape as the devils attacked the people.

The field marshal watched in silence. He had more or less expected this.

He'd known Logan long enough to know full well that the man didn't see tians as people. That was probably the reason why he'd told Nobrome that they only shared a method, not a faction.

While the field marshal's proposed invasion was for the sake of the imperium, Logan had only gotten in on it because it would be a chance for him to shine. No other reason.

Despite it all, the man was no doubt a valuable asset to the imperium, and besides that, he obediently completed any quests given to him.

The field marshal believed it was because of his actual age.

Though Logan had never revealed it himself, Gifted had seen enough people to make an educated guess that he was actually a young boy no older than ten.

“I expected as much...” Gifted sighed.

The Hell General was a valuable asset to the imperium, but to its enemies, such as the kingdom, he was nothing but a calamity.

Quartierlatin was burning right now. That was obviously Logan’s doing, but he wasn’t the only one at fault — the prime minister had requested it, and Gifted had approved it.

In other words, the man who had originally been a child of Quartierlatin was now a foreign soldier responsible for the town burning.

Emilio Quartierlatin knew everything about his origin. The previous head of the Barbaros family, his adoptive father, had told him about it soon after he turned ten.

It had happened on the evening before he’d gone out on his first mission.

In the end, his father had told him that, if he so wished, he could return where he belonged.

However, he had chosen to stay in Barbaros family and continue to live a soldier.

Although he’d been basically kidnapped, they’d raised him well, and perhaps he felt indebted to them. Or perhaps what kept him there was his relationship with the girl who, at least according to his family tree, would be his niece-in-law. The daughter of Ronaldo, the one who’d died saving him.

Regardless, the most important reason was surely the fact that he’d grown up surrounded by love.

Thanks to his history and power he’d ended up with, his life was full of strict training. Even so, he could tell that the love he was provided was real. Both his adoptive mother and Ronaldo’s widow treated him like their own son.

He felt like he hadn’t repaid them for that, so he chose to stay in the imperium.

Since then, he’d lived twenty years as a Dryfean soldier.

Over that time, he'd become part of the SMTF and gained a Superior Job.

He'd investigated the history of his origin, Edelvalsa, and gone on to become an archeologist.

He'd met and become friends with his adoptive sister's and the third imperial prince's child, the one who was now the imperator.

He'd married his childhood friend and become a father.

He'd fought alongside the current imperator and defeated imperial family members and nobles loyal to the old regime, drastically changing Dryfe.

After his foster father's death, he'd inherited his land and become head of the Barbaros family.

And, by the request of the current imperator, he'd become the field marshal.

He had countless bonds and responsibilities here. It was safe to say that, at this point, he was far more "Gifted Barbaros" than "Emilio Quartierlatin."

He continued to silently watch the burning town, and he would've been lying if he'd said he didn't feel any regret.

He'd only lived here as a baby, and the town had changed too much for him to recognize the townscape. Even so, sacrificing Quartierlatin made him regretful.

He'd come here of his own free will. Prime Minister Vigoma had told him about the ruins and the potential technology in Quartierlatin, and once he'd found out, he was compelled to go.

He was SMTF and a scholar. Those reasons were good enough, but in reality, something deep inside had ordered him to go.

Wanting to find reasons to prevent any sort of action on Quartierlatin, he had infiltrated the town and started investigating.

Pre-ancient civilization ruins could have superweapons such as Prism Dragons or the Imperstand, the very symbol of Dryfe. However, if there was nothing of note there, there would be no reason to attack. If there was nothing, Dryfe would have no business with Quartierlatin.

He was the only one capable of conducting such investigations and making the decision to call off the operation.

He'd spent his entire time in Quartierlatin hoping that there was no superweapon. If it had been nothing but a Prism Soldier factory, he could've found a reason to leave it alone.

Unfortunately, his investigation had made it evident that the ruins contained a weapon of the highest tier.

It was simply too powerful to ignore. Were it to end up in the kingdom's hands, the kingdom would become too powerful for Dryfe to annex it, and the imperium would soon fall to Caldina.

He couldn't accept such an outcome, no matter what.

He had to either capture or destroy the superweapon.

The field marshal had already resolved to sell his soul to the devil to prevent Dryfe's demise.

Thus, he hadn't faked the results of his investigation. And, just as planned, he'd started the mission to either capture or destroy the superweapon.

"Looks like the Countess' mansion is still unharmed..." he murmured.

Yesterday, soon after he'd resolved to start the mission, he'd gone around placing jammers. While doing so, he'd passed the Quartierlatin mansion.

It was the home of his biological parents, and he couldn't recognize any of it.

It did shake his resolve a bit... but not enough to make him reconsider.

The taste of the cookie given to him by Ray, made by his real mother, was the same in that regard. He had vague memories of it and could faintly remember wanting to try it at some point.

There was a promise somewhere in there, too.

Once he'd tasted the cookie, he'd been struck by a surge of images and inexpressible nostalgia.

Even so, he had already decided.

There was hesitation, sure. It was a heavy choice to make, and it seemed to gnaw at his heart.

Even so, he didn't change what he had to protect.

Thus, he was choosing to harm his birthplace to keep his country, family, and friends safe.

He started by having his one thousand marionettes make a move.

"Ruin invasion, phase 2: Exterminate all Altarian forces within. Additionally... prepare for phase 3. Faldreed, standby."

Following his words, the metallic marionette next to him stood up, shining with a scarlet color.

◇◆

While Ray was facing Logan Goddhart, there was a vicious three-way battle within the ruins.

The kingdom's Masters tried to stop the factory.

The Prism Soldiers tried to protect it.

And the imperium, meaning Edelvalsa's marionettes, moved to capture the superweapon.

The kingdom's Masters were at the greatest disadvantage. They had the most powerful individual units, but their position was awful. Prism Soldiers flooded from the deepest parts of the ruins, while wooden marionettes charged from the entrance.

The Prism Soldiers showered the Masters in lasers and gunfire, while the marionettes barraged them with bullets from Dryfean standard Assault Rifles.

Altar's Masters were holding them at bay with defensive magic and barricades from Embryo skills, but this wouldn't last.

"Shit! Where're the damn reinforcements?!" Having to go completely on the defensive made one of the Masters frustrated.

Suddenly, one of them who'd logged off suddenly came back. With a pale face, he said what he'd seen in real life. "It ain't good... I read online that Quartierlatin is being attacked by Hell General."

"Huh?! The Superior?!"

The comms had failed, so they hadn't known the situation on the surface. Needless to say, this news came as a shock.

"What do we do?" one of them asked frantically. "Go back?"

"I don't think we can... The marionettes have weirdly good cooperation. Making it past them won't be easy. And we'd have to turn our backs to the Prism Soldiers."

"Then everyone who's got some one-shot ultimate skills should... Wait, what's with this smoke?"

As they talked, they noticed colored smoke coming from the entrance.

Since many of them had lowered themselves to hide behind barricades, some ended up breathing it in, and those who did instantly lost consciousness.

The people in their parties looked at the stat summaries and saw the “Forced Sleep” debuff on them.

“Sleeping gas...!”

Filling a closed space with gas was an effective strategy, especially when the gas used only had an effect on the opposing side. Sleeping gas only worked on animals, so the marionettes were unaffected.

At the entrance, there was a gas cylinder about as big as a drum. It was connected to several marionettes, who were pumping their contents inside.

Just like High-Frequency Knives and Assault Rifles, this was another weapon the field marshal had brought to occupy the ruins.

Except for those whose equipment gave them resistance against Sleep or those who drank Elixirs in time, everyone fell asleep.

Those who were still awake now had to take care of those who weren’t while fending off attacks from both sides.

“Tch! We’re already low on numbers, damn it!”

“Hold on! Something smells weird!”

As the sleeping gas began to fade, another gas began being pumped inside.

Again, gas was extremely effective in closed spaces.

Especially flammable ones.

This second gas burn very easily.

As it flowed deeper inside, it was shot by a stray beam from a Zircon Laser, causing a massive explosion.

In an enclosed space like this one, there was no escape from this immense power. Compressed in a tight, tunnel-like space, the explosion became a wave that quickly flowed to and overwhelmed both sides.

It quickly wiped out all the Masters who were still breathing and pulverized the Prism Soldiers defending the factory.

The marionettes had only lost the few that were set there to keep those inside from escaping.

“Check complete. Moving on to phase 3,” the field marshal muttered. He’d watched the entire scene through the eyes of the marionettes.

With no more Altarian Masters there, he sent more reinforcements inside.

The marionette platoon ran through the hallway, rendered empty by the gas explosion.

Though most of them were wooden, the one at the front wasn't.

That one was made of a scarlet, Mythical metal called Hihi'irokane.

Just as the name "Mythical" implied, you could use these metals to create things on the same level as Mythical special rewards, except without the unique skills.

However, it was so difficult to work with that even in the country with the most advanced smithing, Tenchi, you could count those who could turn it into weapons on one hand. Additionally, it was so precious that a single kilogram could cost as much as 10,000,000 lir.

And yet here, you had a human-sized marionette made of this super tough, super luxurious Hihi'irokane.

Needless to say, that was accomplished through the field marshal's Mythical special reward of Unguided Gaze, Edelvalsa.

He'd used one of its skills, Marionette Soldier Creation, to gradually forge a marionette out of Hihi'irokane.

The toughness of Edelvalsa's marionettes was based on the material used, making this one into his strongest one by far.

The scarlet marionette's name was Faldreed. This was to honor the Sacred Blazer who'd saved young Emilio alongside Ronaldo Barbaros, giving that name to his strongest marionette.

Unlike the basic, throwaway ones, this marionette was a treasure that he had on him all the time and trusted immensely.

Many Prism Soldiers stood in the marionettes' way, but no matter how much gunfire or lasers hit him, Faldreed wasn't even scratched. He went on to make short work of them with the super-tough blade fixed to his right arm.

Faldreed had similar qualities to END-focused Superior Jobs, and with the fire support from the other marionettes, these Prism Soldiers weren't even an enemy.

This was going about as the field marshal had expected. While Masters could have countless trump cards they could use to give him lots of trouble in a head-on fight — perhaps even destroying Faldreed — Prism Soldiers were limited to a standard, set power.

He was certain Faldreed wouldn't be harmed, no matter how many of them attacked him.

"So far, so good..." he murmured.

There were only three things to worry about now.

First was the defense system set in place to protect the superweapon, Acra-Vesta.

Second was the Acra-Vesta itself.

And the third was...

"There you are..." Ahead, the field marshal saw seven men.

They all had the same face. In fact, the only differences they had were the weapons they wielded.

They were all The Lynx, Tom Cat.

The ones obstructing his path were the clones Tom Cat was making using his ultimate skill.

Tom Cat was the reigning champion of the kingdom's duel rankings, so the field marshal knew his power well.

Thus, he'd expected him to notice his marionettes and turn around to fight, or leave his clones here to fight.

However, there was one thing he hadn't expected.

"Seven? Here?"

Tom Cat was Altarian, so his goal here was to stop the Prism Soldier factory and secure the superweapon. Therefore, it was logical to focus on securing the heart of the ruins.

The field marshal had only expected him to leave only about two here and take six with him. And yet, he'd gone ahead all alone, leaving the rest here.

It felt as though he was more focused on not letting anyone go after him than he was on conquering the ruins.

"Strange..." he murmured. "But his reasons are secondary now."

The seven Tom Cats were already making a move. All of them had stats equal to that of an AGI-focused Superior Jobs. They were difficult opponents even if the marionettes had the numbers.

"Looks like I have no choice."

He made his toughest, Faldreed, charge ahead, then had the hundred-plus other marionettes support him with gunfire.

The action the Tom Cats took, on the other hand, was really simple.

They just made a line. The seven Tom Cats lined up and charged into the firing line.

Naturally, the first one was turned into swiss cheese. He tried to block the bullets with his weapon, but it did little against the bulletstorm.

Still, his body became a shield that helped the others press on.

After the first reached his limit, turned into a cat, meowed, and vanished, the second one took his place.

As he began battling Faldreed, the third one broke out of the line and used his body to momentarily seal Faldreed's movements.

The third was quickly turned into swiss cheese, then cut in half by Faldreed, causing him to disappear, but the line then passed the metallic marionette.

With two meat shields gone, the rest of the four dived into the marionette army behind Faldreed.

No — not four. Before the field marshal could realize it, there were seven Tom Cats again.

"I see how you work..." Gifted quickly understood what Tom Cat was doing.

Tom Cat wasn't just charging at the marionettes as just "seven AGI-focused Superior Jobs." He was going at them head-on as inexhaustible cannon fodder.

"This is why Masters are outside common sense," he muttered.

Tom Cat's fighting style was unusual, as well. Though he didn't hesitate to let his clones die, he always kept two at a safe distance.

That allowed him to multiply again and continue fighting even if all the others were destroyed.

Tom Cat's goal was to keep the marionettes away, and he fought carefully, preventing himself from being wiped out. Gifted could easily understand that he wouldn't let them pass, and he also felt as though he knew Edelvalsa's fighting style.

The field marshal continued sending new marionettes to the scene, creating more to replace those lost. Gifted had to watch his MP, but at this rate, he could continue sending marionettes as long as there were trees on the mountain.

As though aware of that, Tom Cat fought while protecting the pace of their multiplication.

"He sure is troublesome..." Letting that bitter thought reach his marionettes, Gifted sent even more to the ruins.

Thus, the field marshal began a battle of volume against Tom Cat.

◇◆◇

The last of the eight Tom Cats arrived at the deepest part of the ruins.

There were no Prism Soldiers around him. All that separated him from the factory he was heading for was a single door.

Expecting more Prism Soldiers behind the door, Tom Cat chuckled, for some reason.

“I’m here, fighting Edelvalsa’s marionettes... ohhh, the twists and turns of faaate...”

That was putting into words what he felt about the battle between the seven other Tom Cats and the field marshal’s army.

Just like Gifted with his marionettes, Tom Cat was fully aware what the other Tom Cats were up to. He watched the battle through the seven’s visions.

“Man... This place is just full of stuff I have close ties to,” he whispered.

Those were words that no one but him could understand, but to him, they were just perfect.

Once he was finished voicing his thoughts, Tom Cat opened the door leading to the heart of the ruins.

Chapter Six: Infinite Multiplication

Ruins, Prism Soldier plant

Zircon Leader had been on the same mission for the past two millennia.

After being created as the commander unit for the Prism Soldiers, he never left the ruins once. (There were no genital parts on the unit; “he” was just a gender identity assigned for convenience.)

His initial mission was supervision and defense of the facility, but since it had no invaders for two millennia, all he did was supervision.

That meant he’d spent the last two thousand years merely managing the Prism Soldier factory and observing the creation of the other weapon here, Acra-Vesta.

Both processes were designed to be slow to prevent any energy signals from leaking outside. The speed at which it was happening was so lethargic that any person or animal would go insane.

However, Zircon Leader, being a machine, merely followed his program and continued to operate.

Most would find his existence saddening, but he himself had no problems with it.

Besides, he didn’t expect this mission to continue forever.

As a machine, he had no dreams of the future. However, he had programming that implied the need to fight enemies.

He knew he would eventually have to lead the Prism Soldiers into battle against one of mankind’s enemies, the Incarnation of Beasts, and protect the world.

That was his final goal, the purpose behind his creation, and he had been waiting to fulfill it for two thousand years.

The first change in two thousand years had come just a few days ago, with the mountain suddenly shaking.

It was highly localized shaking, so it didn’t damage the nearby town of Quartierlatin, but, as though it had been planned, the ground crumbled and exposed an entrance to the ruins.

Zircon Leader's AI was advanced enough to let him understand it was no accident. But, rather than investigating it, he had to prioritize hiding the facility.

Burying the entrance was top priority, but since the other Prism Soldiers had no good energy sources and thus couldn't leave the ruins, and he was equipped with a reactor just like that of the Prism Persons, he had to be the one to move out.

And so, he left the ruins.

His AI felt nothing about it, but there was something he realized when he did so.

None of what he saw outside was familiar — not a single bit of it was in the data he was provided.

The trees, terrain, and even monsters were different from the ones he knew.

And to top it all off, according to his list, none of the humanoids he discovered were actually human.

Zircon Leader was the commander unit of the Prism Soldiers. Although special, he didn't have the intelligence or adaptability to match that of the original Prism Persons.

To him, the tians of this era were just "human-like, non-human animals."

He also discovered information that implied the facility was in danger. There were signs of the incarnations — the pre-ancient civilization's greatest foe — all over the place. They were weak and varied in comparison, but they were incarnations nonetheless.

Thus, he prioritized investigating the outside over hiding the facility.

Zircon Leader began gathering animals and using them as fuel to build and run his Prism Soldiers.

He sent out the first of them to gather more sources of energy and investigate the outside.

Something was happening here, and he needed to know what it was in order to protect the facility.

However, right as he let the Prism Soldiers move out, the facility was infiltrated by numerous signals reminiscent of the incarnations.

Zircon Leader tried to hold them back with sentry guns and Prism Soldiers, but they didn't stop, and eventually, half of the facility was conquered.

Thankfully, it wasn't the Prism Soldier plant, but a spare material warehouse and the living space of the human engineers that'd once worked here.

Losing those places wasn't a big issue, but for Zircon Leader, who had defense as his mission, this was a major problem.

He considered initiating absolute defensive mode and making all the available Prism Soldiers protect the facility, but he decided to conserve units for the true battle against the Incarnation of Beasts.

Until this morning. This morning, he'd had no choice but to do it.

There were two reasons for this.

First, the intruders began entering a high-priority location — the plant.

Second, the sensors placed by the Prism Soldiers he'd sent out found an incarnation-like energy signature that was many times stronger than any other.

The creature was highly human-like, but the amount of energy within it was anything but. It was unmistakably an incarnation signature.

And worst of all, the entity and its devils were clearly invading the area.

Thus, Zircon Leader decided that this was the anti-incarnation battle he'd awaited for two thousand years.

He initiated absolute defense and prepared to intercept the invaders approaching the plant.

◇◆

Zircon Leader was standing in the Prism Soldier plant, the high-priority area connected to Acra-Vesta's hangar.

He was at least two times larger and significantly more colorful than the usual Prism Soldiers.

The stone he was named after could come in many colors, including red, gold, white, and more. Zircon Leader had all of them on him.

This design had been chosen by his developer, Flagman.

When he was being made, there was no time to create a new Prism Person, so Flagman had just taken an experimental, large Prism Soldier frame, equipped him with an original reactor core from Jet Chaser — a Prism Person that had already been destroyed by the incarnations — equipped him with various weapons, and left it at that.

Zircon Leader was an unplanned mess made of things Flagman already had, but the color itself had been Flagman's decision.

The multiple colors were supposed to be the colors of the Prism Soldier commander who would become their hope. In a way, it was like a rallying flag.

"Detected." Zircon Leader directed his eye-camera at the entrance to the plant.

He knew everything about what was happening in the ruins, so he knew there was an intruder in front of the door, and that seven more of the same intruder were fighting another one.

"Prepare to intercept."

His words made the 968 Prism Soldiers aim their weapons at the entrance.

If you included the makeshift units that had nothing but the base frame and weapons, their numbers would actually be more than double that.

No matter what came through the door, the barrage would turn them to dust in an instant.

The intruder opened the door to his demise...

"Our era shall meet a shining dawn yet again. Cease fire."

...and spoke those words in the pre-ancient civilization's language.

"Ceasing fire."

"Ceasing fire."

The highest-level control code spoken by the intruder made all the Prism Soldiers stop attacking.

Zircon Fire, Zircon Laser, and even the incomplete units were rendered immobile.

"Oh, it worked," said the intruder, The Lynx, Tom Cat. "I figured it would, considering these ruins are untouched, but I didn't expect it to be this effective."

The words he'd spoken were an emergency code given to just a few researchers and Zweier Imperium elites two thousand years ago.

It was something that no normal Master could know. Not even Mario AKA Gifted Barbaros knew it, and he was Dryfe's most renowned archeologist.

As he'd said, it was extremely effective against the Prism Soldiers. If he'd used it on the way here, while with other Masters, they'd have all made it here without any trouble whatsoever.

Despite that, he hadn't done that. It was as if he wished to hide the fact that he knew it.

"Well, it didn't work on all of them, though. You're the commander unit, I assume?" Tom Cat shrugged and jumped back at supersonic speeds.

A moment later, a large blade cut through where he'd just stood.

"Continuing battle."

The attacker, Zircon Leader, hadn't been affected by Tom's code. This was because he had a top-level control code that not even Tom's words could override.

With the rest, since their codes contradicted each other, all the Prism Soldiers besides Zircon Leader didn't know what to do and just stopped in place.

Meanwhile, Tom was using seven of his bodies to keep the marionettes away.

That made this a one-on-one battle.

As Tom ran and jumped from floor to ceiling and back, Zircon Leader aimed and fired at him with the Gatling guns installed on his backpack.

The bulletstorm followed Tom's trail, but the guns were too slow for a single one to hit him. So instead, Zircon Leader aimed at Tom with the laser cannon installed in his forearms.

Tom noticed and quickly spun to dodge the light-speed beam while taking out a bow from his inventory and firing an arrow.

That was when Zircon Leader also began moving at supersonic speed.

Outspeeding even wind, his large body easily dodged the arrow. Though less mobile than Tom, he could still chase after him. That was exactly what he did, and he accompanied it with laser attacks, which he periodically stopped to give them time to cool off.

"I see," Tom nodded. "I guess it makes sense to give a commander similar specs to a Prism Person's. Your gear isn't special, but you have more of it to make use of all that extra energy. Since I'm all alone, I'm at a bit of a disadvantage here..."

He was analyzing the state of the battle.

"Heyyy, uh... I'm only here for the weapon inside. Can I have a look at it? If I don't have to destroy it, I'll just leaaave." Those words went directly against the quest he'd taken. "Sure, I'll break it if I have to, but it doesn't seem like you Prism Soldiers are my targets here, so I can just leave you heeere... Whoa!”

Zircon Leader paid no mind to those words and just kept on attacking Tom.

“Yeah, I knew this wouldn’t work. You pre-ancient civ weapons are really hard-headed when it comes to this. It’s actually a bit noble. Still, I want to finish this before anyone else comes, so I’ll just destroy you.”

“Continuing battle.”

Thus, Tom decided to face Zircon Leader, a foe stronger than himself, head-on.

He couldn’t use any of his clones, which were his greatest strength, and could only rely on his powers as a Superior Job. And yet there was joy in his expression.

He moved away the bangs hiding his face. “It’s been a while since I’ve had only one life left... but that just makes it interesting.”

His exposed eyes were exactly like those of a feline.

◇◆

Monster Cat Mansion, Tom Cat

He was well-known by everyone in the kingdom, tian and Master alike.

Once the Altarian duel champion, he was now the second in the rankings.

He’d been dueling for eight years now.

That amount of time was notable because it was more than the amount of time that’d passed in Infinite Dendrogram since its release in the year 2043.

There was also the fact that he’d lost his position as champion after his defeat to Figaro over two years ago.

The time just didn’t add up.

It could only mean that Tom Cat was no normal player.

When asked, tians would describe him as a Master who’d been active before Masters started appearing en masse, leading many to believe he was a player working for the developers — an alpha tester.

When players asked him if that was true, he’d always go, “No commeeent,” and that was it.

For a while, people in online forums and the like had held heated discussions about whether it was all right for a tester to sit at the top of a duel rankings list, but that had died down when someone proposed a theory that Tom Cat's Embryo couldn't go beyond the sixth form.

He had an immensely powerful cloning ability, but his Embryo, Grimalkin, was limited to high-rank, as supported by the fact that he had been around way longer than any other player, yet he wasn't a Superior yet.

As a supposed tester, he had a head start, but that came with certain restrictions.

Besides Embryo form, there was also the fact that his level was stuck at 1,000 — 500 from standard jobs, and 500 from his SJ, The Lynx.

These limitations led many to believe he'd been placed there as an obstacle to other players.

The Lynx, Tom Cat, had sat at the top of Altar's duel rankings as a wall for those who came after, a challenge left there by the developers.

Once people began to look at it like that, those who'd complained about him were outnumbered by those who were determined to beat him.

Thus, many Masters tried to challenge and defeat Tom Cat.

This included the still-active duel rankers like the Kamen Rider, Riser, and the Raging Blaze, Bishmal.

They all grew better and struggled for this cause, and eventually one of them, Figaro, finally defeated Tom Cat, overcoming the challenge presented by the developers.

After that, instead of challenging Figaro to take his throne back, Tom just stayed where he was as a challenge to those who wanted the title of the second.

Soon after that, he stopped being relevant.

Some of the recent Altarian duel rankers, like the Black Raven, Juliet, and Vagrant Golden Sea, Chelsea, didn't even know that Tom used to be such a big deal.

The controversy regarding Tom Cat was a thing of the past.

However — it was all true.

Tom Cat was working with the developers, had been active as a Master since before the official release, had limits set on his Embryo and level, and had only been the duel champion to provide a challenge to those wanting to reach the top.

All of that was right.

However, the theories regarding him were lacking something important.

Something that had nothing to do with the current duel rankings.

Roughly six hundred years ago, Infinite Dendrogram time, there had been an all-out war between two immensely powerful tians: King of Kings and Draconic Emperor.

History spoke of a third entity who'd interfered in this clash.

His name was The Lynx, Shrödinger Cat.

He happened to have the same Superior Job as Tom Cat of the present, and according to all the texts, he was a Master — an extreme rarity at that point in time.

The only link people saw between the previous duel champion and the third force in the great war was the job.

◆◇

It was hard to say whether the battle between Tom Cat and Zircon Leader was equal.

Tom had more AGI, sure, but less of everything else, including firepower.

It might've been different if his level had been somewhere around 1,500, but with the limits placed on him, it wasn't even worth considering.

The same went for battle prowess. Tom was a skilled fighter with many victories under his belt, but Zircon Leader wasn't any worse than him in that regard.

This was because, between managing the Prism Soldier production and Acra-Vesta's development, his program had spent the last 2,000 years simulating battles.

Though this was his first real battle, the ones in the simulations had, over the centuries, evolved in difficulty so much that all he had to do here was act like he had in them.

Thus, neither of them had the fighting ability to overturn the difference in stats between them.

Even so, Tom hadn't suffered a single wound yet. His movements showed even more skill than in yesterday's battle in the hall or today's battle against the marionettes.

In fact, the seven clones fighting the field marshal were being a bit sloppy. It was like Tom was focusing everything he had on the one Tom that was here.

"MEOW!" Tom jumped like a cat and charged at Zircon Leader with blades in both of his hands.

He cut into his armor, leaving some marks, but not dealing enough damage to break through and damage the inner mechanisms.

"Close-Range Defensive Electromagnetic Radiation Construct." Zircon Leader countered this attack by making electrodes grow out of the spaces between his armor and releasing lightning all around.

Tom avoided its effects by jumping backwards, but he couldn't dodge the follow-up laser that scratched his left shoulder.

"Are you a bag of tricks or somethiiing?" Tom shot back.

He was rather taken aback by all the gear Zircon Leader had. He felt like he was in a fair full of pre-ancient civilization weapons.

Looking at its size, I shouldn't expect anything like an Abyss Cannon, but I'll be at a disadvantage if this battle drags on for too long, he thought as he became more alert.

However, Zircon Leader was also wary of Tom.

It wasn't because he had a dangerous power, but because he wasn't using job skills.

In fact, he hadn't used a single one since Zircon Leader had first observed him.

It went far beyond their first encounter. Tom hadn't used a single job skill during yesterday's battle in the hall, or in any of his many duels.

This weird fact had been a topic of discussion between those wanting to beat him when he was the champion, and they'd concluded that his cloning ability came at the cost of making all active job skills unusable.

Many found the idea counterproductive, considering that The Lynx was part of the "The One" series of jobs, which was focused on skills, while others speculated that it was just a job focused on passive ones.

However, Zircon Leader's issue with this was far more simple.

"A question — what are you?" the machine asked.

"Oh? You finally feel like talking? I'm The Lynx, Tom Cat, and I already told you why I'm here."

"Another question — what is 'The Lynx'?"

Tom fell silent.

Zircon Leader's battle program had asked the first question because Tom wasn't using job skills, and thus the machine couldn't know his job. Once it was revealed, however, Zircon Leader questioned the job itself.

After all...

"This alleged job does not exist."

"The Lynx" wasn't in the two millennia-old job list in his storage.

Jobs had all been decided long ago, and there hadn't been any new ones since. Even Prism Rider, the job linked to the use of Prism Beasts, had existed before Flagman developed the first of them.

The list that encompassed all the jobs in existence didn't have an entry for The Lynx.

What was it, then?

"Ehhh? But it's right there on my status windowww," argued Tom Cat.

"What is a status window?"

"...So you're a pre-update unit. Well, you weren't found until just a few days ago, so I can't say I didn't expect it," Tom sighed. "I guess I'll have to destroy you, after all. What about the Prism Persons already owned by people, though...? We'll probably have to ignore them... Damn it, Hatter, if you're gonna be in charge of items, at least be more thorough in destroying the ones that have their memories of what it was like before..."

A certain face came to Tom's mind, making him a bit irritated. Then he dashed towards Zircon Leader, fully intent on destroying it.

Unlike before, when he'd been fighting while keeping himself safe, he was now charging like a beast ready to take a life.

However, Zircon Leader had a counter for it.

The cover on both of its forearms dropped off and released missiles.

Tom now approached Zircon Leader while evading them, but the missiles changed trajectory to follow him and accelerated.

"Ah?!"

The missiles' speed exceeded the speed of sound several times over, quickly reaching Tom's torso and tearing it in two.

Lethally wounded, Tom's upper and lower bodies fell to the ground, accompanied by the sound of blood spreading around him.

His upper body was still leaking immense amounts of blood and other fluids.

“Well, I sure didn’t expect this,” Tom spoke, coughing up blood. “Jet Chaser’s Clock Killers, huh? Your arsenal’s fancier than I expected.”

He was fatally wounded, but it didn’t seem to bother him.

After all, this body was just another, easily replaceable spare to him.

“But this is kinda bad...” he muttered. “As things are, the next multiplication will happen where I left the seven... and with all the marionettes there, getting here again would be pretty hard.”

As Tom muttered that, Zircon Leader fixed his laser cannon’s sights on him. Tom was an intruder and an enemy. The machine had no reason to hesitate to fire at him.

As things were, this Tom would vanish, and an eighth would appear where the seven others were fighting.

However...

“Special paragraph no. 3 — preventing potential balance collapse by forces outside of regulations. Special paragraph no. 2 — preventing potential exposure of confidential matters.” Tom suddenly spoke in a machine-like voice, completely unlike his usual, drawn-out manner of speech. “On account of being in a situation where both apply, I request permission to use my original body.”

Half a second after these incomprehensible words...

[Original Body Use — Permission Granted]

That message reached him, and Zircon Leader’s laser made him evaporate.

◇◆◇

Legends

There were strange legends in this world. Or perhaps “myths” was a better word for them.

Most of them were about powerful, fearful creatures which were perhaps capable of destroying the world.

These legends described either UBMs over level 100 — SUBMs — or the so-called “Irregularities.”

Such creatures had appeared in Infinite Dendrogram many times throughout its history.

Once Masters began growing in number, they were the ones to take care of them, but of course, there had been beasts like those before that time as well.

Creatures strong enough to destroy the world, with no one powerful enough to face them.

And yet the world still existed, and the reason for that was that the creatures had simply vanished soon after they appeared.

They came and vanished like a storm, and, just like a clear sky that came after, they left no signs that they had ever been there.

That always made the local tians wonder what happened.

No one knew the answer.

However, every now and then, there would be people claiming to have seen what had happened, and they all said a similar thing: that the creature was fighting something even more terrifying.

Alas, nobody believed them. They just laughed those people's claims off, thinking that nothing could be more fearful and powerful than the creatures.

Seeing those reactions, some of the witnesses would start to believe that they'd merely been dreaming or something.

However, the few who were sure of what they'd seen would leave what they'd witnessed in writing.

This resulted in strange texts that seemed to stand at the border between factual writings and descriptions of dreams.

They came from many various eras and locations, and some spoke of the mysterious stronger entities in words like:

"An animal that looked like many other animals, but didn't seem to be any of them."

"A column so large it could perhaps grind countries and mountains into dust."

"A beautiful woman covered in a cocoon much like an eggshell."

"A horde of countless beasts."

These mysterious beings either made the world-ending creatures disappear or completely destroyed them.

No one could tell what they were, and they simply vanished right after completing their roles.

No one knew they were acting in accordance to special paragraph no. 3.

They gathered the SUBMs they could control in preparation for when the Masters came, while destroying the uncontrollable Irregularities... and nobody had a clue.

◆◇◆

Ruins, Prism Soldier Plant

"Ending battle," Zircon Leader declared as he let his laser cannon cool down.

He had destroyed the first intruder, but he knew that the seven exactly like him and other intruders would come here eventually.

Thus, he prepared for their arrival by reactivating the halted Prism Soldiers.

He also used the data from the previous intruder to order them to ignore any codes from entities that fit certain criteria.

Right as he finished those preparations, though... a voice resounded throughout the space.

"I have a strange connection to a lot of the things here in Quartierlatin. The most direct of them is Ray, but there are a number of bonds that are way older than that one."

Zircon Leader searched for the source, but found nothing there. The voice was coming from a place where his sensors didn't see anything.

"First is the Unguided Gaze, Edelvalsa. You probably don't know, but the original Edelvalsa was an anti-Incarnation of Beasts weapon that was newer than you Prism Soldiers."

The place was exactly where Tom had just vanished, but the voice was a bit different from Tom's.

"It was a weapon that didn't need a factory, and could make moving marionettes out of just about anything. But since it was standalone and half-bioweapon, it was recognized as a UBM. It had a mind of its own and went out of control, leaving Flagman, its creator, no choice but to seal it deep underground. And that was undone thirty years ago."

This Tom-like voice spoke of things with major implications. It was nothing like what he'd said in the inn about Unguided Horde, Edelvalsa.

After all, Edelvalsa had been recognized as a UBM a whole two millennia ago.

The details Tom Cat was mentioning now were unknown even to the field marshal, who was a famous archeologist and the very owner of Unguided Gaze, Edelvalsa.

"I'm fighting the child who got Edelvalsa's power back then, in a Prism Soldier plant, of all places. That's just so ironic. After all, this plant... no... all of you..."

The owner of the voice paused and appeared out of nowhere.

It was a cat.

White in color and pretty generic in appearance, it wore a clerk's vest and walked on its hind legs, making it look like it'd just popped out of a children's picture book.

Most Masters knew this cat. After all, they'd met him on their visit to this world.

Indeed, this cat was well-known.

"...were... heh... made to destroy me."

This cat was one of the thirteen control AIs managing Infinite Dendrogram: control AI no. 13, Cheshire.

There probably wasn't a word to describe the torrent of information within Zircon Leader when Cheshire showed himself. It was like a mechanical version of a human's surge of emotion.

Perhaps it was best translated as simply, "This is it!"

Yes — just "this is it." This was what he was waiting for and couldn't ignore no matter what. It was very reason for Zircon Leader's and the Prism Soldiers' existence.

All the weapon sensors in the plant recognized it as such, and all the info besides visual was a perfect match.

This white cat before them was why they'd been created.

It was...

"The Incarnation of Beasts detected! Granting permission to fire for all Prism Soldiers!"

Zircon Leader could not deny what it had seen. This white cat was one of the beings that the pre-ancient civilization had given their all to try and defeat.

It was the Incarnation of Beasts — the one responsible for the fall of their Zweier Imperium.

"Attack!"

Zircon Leader attacked with all its available weapons, while the 968 complete Prism Soldiers drowned him in gunfire and lasers. Even the incomplete units joined the effort to turn this enemy into less than dust.

The projectiles were about to hit.

However, Cheshire once again used the same power he'd used as his avatar, Tom Cat.

"Now dance... Octamillionchrome Cat — Grimalkin."

The ultimate skill name was almost the same, but its effect was completely different.

In less than a blink of an eye, a wall of beasts spawned before him. The number was nowhere near the eight from before — they amounted to over a thousand.

The gunfire and lasers destroyed some of them, but more and more beasts appeared around Cheshire.

Though they were unlike lions, tigers, or leopards, they certainly looked feline, but that was just about the only thing you could say about their appearance. The focused gunfire and lasers destroyed hundreds and thousands of them, but their total number didn't drop at all — in fact, it was still growing.

The plant was wide, but not even it had enough room for this flood of beasts.

Stats, maximum number, multiplication speed... Cheshire was simply incomparable to the highly-limited Tom Cat.

He was the nightmare witnessed by the pre-ancient civilization. He was a calamity of claw and fang that could grow in number without end.

"You asked what I am, didn't you? Let me answer." Protected by a wall of beasts, Cheshire spoke to Zircon Leader. "Second in the Altarian duel rankings: The Lynx, Tom Cat."

That was the name he'd used until a few moments ago.

That was his avatar as a developer-side Master set up as a challenge to other Masters.

"I'm also The Lynx, Shrödinger Cat from six hundred years ago."

That was one of the names created to etch the existence of Masters into tian history, as well as the name of the third major force in the immense war from that era, when he'd fought to prevent a second destruction of civilization.

"Or perhaps you prefer I use my two thousand year-old name, ‘Incarnation of Beasts.’”

That was one of the incarnations from the Extra-Continental Vessel that had fought the pre-ancient civilization.

It was the arch-enemy of the Prism Soldiers, and the one who had drowned the horizon in countless beasts.

“And finally, my current name, which is control AI no. 13, Cheshire... no...”

Cheshire was the one who led countless Masters, and the odd-job AI who supported the other control AIs in their work.

However, he was actually...

“...Type Infinite Legion — Infinite Multiplication, Grimalkin.”

That was his one true name.

He was a being that an entity long gone had led beyond Superior and into the realm of Infinite.

He was an Embryo in its ∞th form — in other words, an Infinite Embryo.

“That’s what I am. And my role here is to destroy you and the weapon inside.”

He spoke those words while commanding enough beasts to cover half of the plant’s surface.

Zircon Leader said nothing in response and merely continued attacking. However, due to the constant firing since Cheshire’s appearance, his ammo was running low.

The same applied to the other Prism Soldiers. Zircon Fires spun gatling guns that didn’t fire a single bullet, while Zircon Lasers used their lasers so much that some of them overheated and destroyed themselves.

No matter what they did, they could do nothing to Cheshire — the Incarnation of Beasts.

Ammo was always limited. Flagman knew this, and that was why he’d designed Edelvalsa, the unit after them, to create marionettes that fought empty-handed. He knew all too well that no amount of weapons would be enough against this incarnation.

“Continuing battle.” Despite losing firepower and performing at less than half of the full capacity, Zircon Leader didn’t back down. “For the world... for mankind’s future... we must destroy the Incarnation of Beasts.”

He stood no chance, but he didn’t have any code for fleeing. Zircon

Leader would simply complete the goal set by his creator, for it was all that he was.

He was a machine with no emotions, but there was pride in his adherence to his instructions.

"For the world and mankind's future, huh?" Cheshire looked at the proud weapon with a bit of sadness in his face. "I wonder which era's world and which mankind you're talking about."

Perhaps he felt like he was looking at a mirror?

"You really are stubborn and noble. We're similar in that regard. However, you're standing in a completely different place than us." Cheshire raised his right hand.

The beasts reacted to the motion, and their eyes glowed gold. They had been nothing but a wall of flesh until now, but now, the horde of Legendary Guardians would go on the offensive. The battle would be over the very moment these thousands of beasts began their attack.

Even so, the Prism Soldiers didn't back down. They were born to fight the Incarnation of Beasts, after all.

The environmental changes had made them act in a way that wasn't predicted.

But even so, none of them changed or went against their set natures.

"You've been waiting to fight incarnations for two thousand years. You've waited and prepared for that goal alone. We're exactly like you in that regard... so I think I will at least fulfill your wish." Cheshire, looking at the Prism Soldiers before him, threw his hand down.

"Goodbye, machine soldiers. Goodbye, remnants of the Zweier Imperium's pride."

"Continuing battle."

With that as a signal, Cheshire's beasts and Zircon Leader's Prism Soldiers clashed.

A few minutes later, none of the Prism Soldiers were left standing.

◆◆◆

Incarnation of Beasts detected.

With the disappearance of Zircon Leader, the commander unit, the standby order was automatically canceled.

Check sequence.

Unit α — functional.

Space Fixation — functional.

Unit β — functional.

Space Dilution — functional.

Mutual Repair — functional.

Main and sub weapons — incomplete.

Installing conventional equipment as an alternative.

The lack of a solution to the energy problem had made installing a compressed magical baryon acceleration cannon impossible.

Problems — minimal.

Determined to sortie with the current usable equipment.

Initiating sortie sequence.

Anti-incarnation weapon, Acra-Vesta.

Sortie.

Chapter Seven: The Superweapon

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

How long had it been since I'd beaten the Hell General and collapsed?

The three debuffs, combined with serious post-battle fatigue, had left me lying on the ground for what seemed like a really long time.

Looking up at the sky, I chugged down Health Potions to regain the HP I'd lost to Poison, and checked the results of the battle.

Beating Logan had raised my Prism Rider level to 21. That was actually quite a lot. It reminded me of what I'd gained from Franklin.

Just goes to show just how much level and Embryo form differences affect EXP gain, I thought.

I couldn't remember gaining any levels while fighting the devils, though. They hadn't given me any EXP at all, which was probably intentional.

"I got two skills... 'Prism Beast Enhancement' and 'Prism Authorization,' huh?" I murmured.

Both of them were at level 1. The former did exactly what it said in the name: it enhanced the abilities of all Prism Beasts, Prism Steeds included. It prioritized acceleration and improving their skills, and at level 1, the enhancement was 10 percent.

Prism Authorization, though, was a mystery to me.

The description said, "Unlocks the restricted functions of certain Prism Beasts," but there were no details at all.

I thought it had something to do with Silver's mystery skill, but I couldn't check, since I'd lent him to Azurite.

"Guess I'll just wait..." I muttered.

Right after the battle, I'd given Nemesis some healing items and told her to look around the surroundings, help anyone hurt, and evacuate the orphans.

There was no one nearby, so as soon as I stopped moving, the world felt strangely silent.

My eyelids were closing on their own.

With Poison taking away my HP, I couldn’t really let myself sleep, but Weakness made my body feel heavy, while Intoxication warped my vision and made it hard to keep my eyes open.

My eyes closed, and I spent the next few minutes floating somewhere between dreams and reality when...

“Nh...”

...I felt someone touch my body.

They put their hands on my forehead and neck, then gasped.

A moment later, I felt something tough on my lips, followed by some medicine going down my throat.

“It’s not disappearing! Why?!” The voice was Azurite’s.

So she’d finished helping the knights and came here, huh?

Guess I should get up now...

“The Elixir’s not having an effect,” she said frantically. “Is he not drinking it all...? In that case...”

I heard the sound of something being unfastened, then felt a faint warmth over my face.

It made me open my eyes.

Silence.

Her face was right in front of me, and our eyes met.

I could feel her breath on me, and we were so close, it felt like our lips were about to touch.

She wasn’t wearing her usual mask, but I could tell it was her by her eye color and face outline.

This was the first time I’d seen her face, and I’d be lying if I said it wasn’t beautiful.

"Ah...?!" Surprised by the eye contact, Azurite jumped backwards and gulped something down.

Based on the Elixir bottle in her hand, I could only assume that she'd first tried to cure my status effects by pouring it into my mouth, but when that hadn't worked, she assumed I hadn't drunk it properly and tried to give it to me mouth-to-mouth.

Man, she must've been worried...

"Thanks, Azurite," I said. "But don't worry. These debuffs are a side effect from a skill. Elixirs won't work on them."

"I-I see!" she exclaimed, flustered, as she put her mask back on. She must've removed it because it would've gotten in the way of the mouth-to-mouth.

Good thing I woke up before she went through with it, I thought.

It was for lifesaving, sure, but Azurite probably wasn't married yet, so she might've regretted it.

"But wait... status effects that do not go away? Isn't that serious?" she asked.

"They'll disappear with time. It's fine," I replied.

I looked at the clock at the side of the road to discovered that fifteen minutes had passed since I'd beaten Logan.

The side effect would last 1,200 seconds, so it wouldn't be long now.

Then again, since Gardranda had used the "Zero" skills, I couldn't use my Miasmaflame Bracers properly now.

This must've been the price she'd had to pay to use skills that powerful, and it'd probably take a while before I could use Purgatorial Flames and Hellish Miasma again.

Also, the clock made me realize that it was just barely six o'clock in the morning.

Sure, the battle had started at about dawn, but it was hard to believe that it was this early. The sun still hadn't finished rising over the mountains to the east.

"What about you?" I asked Azurite.

"I've helped the Quartierlatin knights," she said. "We slayed most of the devils... but the rest simply vanished."

"Good to know."

I'd already assumed that because the third and fourth Gigaknights had disappeared, but this just confirmed that summoned devils weren't an exception to the "summons die with the summoner" rule.

That had to go for me and Gardranda, too. Needed to keep that in mind.

"Since you made it in time to help, I guess I made the right choice by lending Silver to you," I said.

"About that... He was an immense help, but you must refrain from lending your Prism Steed to people. It's dangerous."

"I'll keep that in mind."

I'd surely do it again if the situation called for it, though.

"Where are the people?" I asked.

"They were panicking and looking for shelter when the devils were around, but now that they are gone, the townsfolk are moving to the designated facilities. I left them to the knights who are still moving."

Oh yeah, there were no enemies in town for the time being. What a load off my shoulders.

"Speaking of the devils... did they vanish because you beat the Hell General?" Azurite asked.

"Yeah."

"I see..." She closed her eyes in thought.

For a moment, I wondered if she'd wanted to beat her mentor's killer with her own hands, but that didn't seem quite right. It seemed more like she was frustrated with something.

"Azurite?"

"It's nothing. Pay me no mind."

"All right. What about the people from the mountain inn?"

"Evacuated, as well. Many were frightened, obviously, but the skilled tians and Masters there did an excellent job helping them find shelter."

"I see... What a relief."

With that, I didn't have to worry about any people dying anymore.

"I guess all that's left is to stop the Prism Soldier plant and take out the Dryfeans going after the ruins," I said.

"Are you going to still fight?" she asked. I couldn't be sure because of the mask, but it felt like she was slightly down.

"Well, the debuffs should be gone soon. I'll go to the ruins then."

"You fought the Hell General until you collapsed from exhaustion, and yet you will still fight?"

"Yeah. Logan's not the only problem here. There's gotta be more I can do."

"I see... So you will fight again." Her tone somehow seemed slightly critical.

I thought she had issues with me for a second, but that didn't seem right.

What... or who... was it directed at?

"The Hell General, the Gouz-Maise Gang, Gideon..." She trailed off. "Why do you keep fighting for others' sakes, even when it leads to such injury?"

"Azurite?"

"Yesterday, you told me you had chosen to protect Quartierlatin... and me. But this is not new to you, is it? You must have made similar choices the other times. Why do you continue to do this when it's so taxing? What drives you to sacrifice yourself over and over again?"

I said nothing and just listened to her talk.

"Is it because you're an immortal Master? Do you protect others because you cannot die and there's no need for you to consider your own well-being? But... the one who should be protecting this country's people... the one who should face the hardship is..."

"Azurite, you've got me all wrong," I interrupted.

There was a slight disturbance in her speech. If I had to guess, it was caused by some intense feelings that surfaced as she observed and talked about me. Her own words seemed to start crushing her, so I decided to point out a major misconception before it became too heavy.

"I'm not diving into all these incidents and getting hurt out of self-sacrifice or to protect anyone," I said.

"...Eh?"

Yeah. My reason was never that grand.

"I'm doing it 'cause I think it'd give me a bad aftertaste if I didn't."

That was all there was to it. I always just dived in and faced whatever would leave a bad taste in my mouth.

"Ignoring stuff like that would hurt me way more than damaging this avatar or going through something scary, so I just move in and stop it from happening. That's it. It's not self-sacrifice, and there's nothing noble about it." I wasn't some saint who put himself on the line to save someone. It just seemed that way because I was still weak and always ended up in tatters.

"I'm not the virtuous champion you think I am — I just acted on my own feelings," I said. "Fighting Logan, saving children from the Gouz-Maise Gang, picking a fight with Franklin... I did it all because I felt like it."

"That's the... 'freedom' you mentioned yesterday, yes?"

"Exactly. I told you, didn't I? I stood up for Altar and decided to support you because I'm free and selfish."

I was just a self-centered player — a Master.

"You say things one wouldn't even hear in modern plays, and yet Truth Discernment is not reacting at all... You are so simple and softhearted... heheh..."

I had no idea what she found so amusing, but she started to giggle with tears in her eyes, just like yesterday.

"But... that's exactly why..."

Azurite stopped mid-sentence. Then, after a while of silence, gathered her wits for something and took off her mask.

"Ray, there's something I want you to know," she said, looking at me with her exposed face. "I... I am actually—"

Her words were cut off by a sudden rumble that made us both gasp.

It was an earthquake quite unlike the one I'd experienced in Torne. It felt as though something large was moving and the ground was shaking in fear.

"Ray! Look!" Azurite pointed at the mountain with the ruins.

It was completely unlike what it had been the last time I'd looked at it. Despite having ruins inside, it had been a normal mountain on the outside.

Not anymore.

"It... split?" I murmured.

The peak had parted in two, exposing the ruins inside.

The earthquake was actually the vibrations caused by the mountain-ruins opening up.

It was an absurd sight, but it didn't end there.

Something was crawling out of the parted mountain.

It was as large as a fortress, had a streamlined main body with dozens of thorn-like legs poking out of it, and shone with a metallic brilliance impossible in the natural world.

"What the hell is that?!" I exclaimed.

If I had to describe it, it was like a robot that had the shape of "a whale poking into a horseshoe crab." To be more specific, it was like the prehistoric fish called pterichthyodes, but with trilobite legs.

It was a huge, weird construct, but the fact that it had appeared from the ruins was enough for us to guess what it was.

"That's the weapon that was inside the ruins!" I gasped.

I had no idea what had caused it, but it had come alive.

We'd guessed that it existed, but... man, it was way bigger than I'd expected.

"Ray! Azurite!"

"Nemesis!" I cried. She'd come back from the orphanage.

Out of breath, she stared at the weapon and said, "Ray, is that...?!"

"Yeah. It's just like Azurite said. Dr. Mario made a move because the ruins had something way worse than the Prism Soldiers."

Speaking of Azurite, she had her mask on again. I had no clue what she'd been about to say, but it seemed like she'd figured this wasn't the time for it anymore.

"What do we do?" asked Nemesis.

"We've gotta find out what kind of weapon that is."

It seemed to be a mobile unit, just like the Prism Soldiers, and nothing would be worse than it turning out to be a moving bomb. A pre-ancient civ weapon of that size would make short work of a town like Quartierlatin.

"Let's ride Silver and attack from the sky—" I began.

Suddenly, still looking at the weapon, I noticed something.

The weapon was under attack by several men who had the same face and a bunch of wooden marionettes with weapons in hand.

Eight Toms and Dr. Mario's marionettes were already fighting the weapon.

◇◆◇

Ruins, Prism Soldier Plant

A few minutes before the weapon left the mountain...

"There. Done."

After his beasts destroyed Zircon Leader and all active Prism Soldiers, Cheshire went to the control terminal and stopped the plant.

As Tom Cat, he'd come here on a quest to do just this, but his real reason for coming to the ruins was different.

He was here to investigate if it had any weapons that could break game balance or reveal important information. If it did, he had to destroy it all before other players got to it.

Zircon Leader had turned out to be just that. The information he had made him a threat so major that Cheshire had to destroy him even if it meant having to unseal his real body.

However, unlike Zircon Leader and the weapon deeper in, he didn’t have to destroy this plant.

Looking at the data in the terminal, he could confirm there was no classified information — all it had were mass-production programs.

All the weapons available were like the Prism Soldiers in that they wouldn’t have caused any problems to the developers, so he’d decided to keep it intact, leaving the final call to Altar.

“It’d probably improve the kingdom’s situation a bit...”

Unless things got seriously out of hand, the control AI didn’t really care about the results of wars. The only exceptions to that rule would have to be as extreme as the war six hundred years ago that had almost turned the continent into a wasteland.

Still, Cheshire’s avatar, Tom Cat, was an Altarian Master, so there was no problem with him helping out his country by completing a quest or two.

“There’s also the thing about creating more Superiorrrs. It’s better for the war to be more equal so they can all improoove. Anyway, now for the thing deeper in...”

Cheshire looked at the data from the beasts he’d sent there, then sighed.

“It’s about what I’d expect from a weapon Flagman made over two millennia. It’s a whole lot of trouble.”

The information showed a battle — if you could call it that — that was still happening further in the ruins.

Acra-Vesta’s hangar was full of beasts, a number that easily surpassed one thousand. Using their claws and fangs, all of them were attacking the superweapon as it prepared for departure.

All of the beasts were as strong as Legendary monsters such as Gigaknights.

Needless to say, it was a menacing horde. If one of them could deal 10,000 damage, then a thousand of them could deal 10,000,000.

No matter how large and powerful an entity, it stood absolutely no chance against a horde of such beasts so vast it drowned the horizon.

This was evidenced by the time Cheshire had defeated an Irregularity as large as a mountain range.

Acra-Vesta was only as big as a fortress, so you would have expected them to have crushed it by now, but...

“How does this even worrrk?”

...the beasts couldn’t even scratch it.

None of the attacks from the thousand-strong Legendary beasts did anything to it.

It wasn’t even that the hull was too strong — the attacks didn’t even reach that far.

All of them stopped at the space right before the hull.

It couldn’t have been a simple force field, since that would’ve already been broken by the beasts.

There was some strange power at work that prevented all attacks from passing.

“I guess this is another anti-me featurrre. Boy, just how much of a grudge does Flagman have against me...?”

Cheshire — also known as Infinite Multiplication, Grimalkin — had passed Superior and reached his final form as an Embryo. However, that didn’t mean that he was omniscient and omnipotent. Like with all Embryos, his powers were limited to certain primary characteristics.

That was exactly why the control AIs had split their roles; they were all in charge of what their features allowed them to do best.

No matter how powerful, Embryos couldn’t escape the bane of incompatibility, and this superweapon seemed to be a hard counter to Infinite Multiplication.

Cheshire could repeatedly deal the 10,000,000 damage 1,000 times, but if, for example, the superweapon negated the 10,000 damage delivered by each beast, it would remain undamaged. And it seemed that this barrier would prevent attacks even stronger than that.

Cheshire’s infinitely multiplying army could suppress its enemies with nothing but numbers. That was simple and practical, but that was exactly what made him so open to such absurd defenses. It was one of his weaknesses.

“This defensive ability has a small range, but its nature seems like that of Red King’s,” he noted. “Is this actually...?”

The unpleasant thought made the cat grimace. He’d suspected something like this about Acra-Vesta, and it’d turned out to be right.

“Well, this sure is troublesome. My powers are really incompatible with it. Humpty, Jabberwork, and Red King could take care of it easily, but I have no time to call them. At this rate, it’s gonna go outside in just a few minutes—”

Cheshire suddenly stopped talking to himself. That was because he could hear a bunch of footsteps coming from the hallway.

He knew exactly what they were caused by — Edelvalsa’s marionettes.

They’d been fighting the seven Tom Cats until now, but when Cheshire had switched to his real body, Tom’s avatar had been put on standby.

“They must’ve had no problem getting here without me in the way. I guess time’s up.” Cheshire sent his main body back and called for his avatar as Tom Cat.

He couldn’t let anyone know who Tom Cat really was, or let them find out about Cheshire’s activities.

Killing witnesses was way too drastic, and he couldn’t do it for several reasons.

Acra-Vesta was about to go outside, anyway, so he wouldn’t have another chance to fight in his original body.

He’d already given up on destroying the superweapon by his own hands.

“Well, at least it’s not controlled by anyonnne. This isn’t all that different from a UBM rampage.”

Because of its background, Acra-Vesta wouldn’t get recognized as a UBM, but as it was now, it was truly closer to a weapon than a monster. It wasn’t captured by a country or anything, so Cheshire’s work here was as good as done.

If it rampaged like a monster, it would eventually be taken out by a compatible Superior.

“Oh... Ray beat Rumpelstiltskin’s Hell General. That leaves Quartierlatin with no Superiors. This might be the end of the town.”

Acra-Vesta still hadn’t attacked in any way, but even if you ignored Cheshire’s incompatibility with it, the fact that his beasts hadn’t damaged it at all meant that it had absurd defensive abilities — enough to put it on the same level as Ancient Legendary UBMs. And if it had more tricks up its sleeve, it could easily be a Mythical.

If the defense worked as he guessed, Tenaga Ashinaga's Master Jiangshi, Xunyu, could destroy Acra-Vesta easily.

The King of Destruction, Shu Starling, might be capable of breaking through its defense, as well.

However, they'd take a while to get here, and Acra-Vesta would cause immense damage during that time.

Altea and Gideon were far away enough for it to destroy a town before any Superior from those cities arrived here.

It was more or less certain that Quartierlatin would be reduced to ruins.

"Well," Cheshire — Tom — mouthed as he calculated the most likely future using his immense processing power, then sighed. "Tom Cat is an Altarian Master, so I'll fight for as long as this avatar holds. Now dance, Octachrome Cat — Grimalkin."

He multiplied into eight and attacked the weapon much like his beasts had, searching for flaws in this seemingly unmatched defense.

◇◆

"What is going on here?"

The field marshal was looking through the eyes of Faldreed, who was reaching the deepest part of the ruins.

The factory-like space was littered with countless Prism Soldier pieces.

There was an even larger space deeper in, where a weapon that looked like both a fish and a crustacean at the same time was preparing for something.

Besides that, his enemy from before, Tom Cat — eight of him this time — was fighting the machine.

He silently and calmly analyzed the situation.

There was no doubt that the Prism Soldiers here had been defeated by Tom Cat.

The seven he'd been fighting had suddenly vanished, and he assumed Tom had called them back to fight the Prism Soldiers.

(He wasn't wrong. The method was different than he was thinking, though.)

He figured that then, after Tom'd beaten the Prism Soldiers, he had discovered the superweapon, presumably the so-called "Acra-Vesta," as it went out of control, leaving Tom with no choice but to fight it.

"I guess I can't expect to secure it..." Gifted sighed.

The weapon was active and beyond anyone's control, making it extremely difficult to take it for Dryfe.

There was another reason why he'd given up on that. Gifted himself was outside, and could more or less see the general state of Quartierlatin. Naturally, he hadn't missed the moment of the devils vanishing.

It could only mean one thing — Logan had been defeated.

He had a strong guess about who was responsible, but decided to focus on what he had to do now.

The superweapon had gone out of control, and only one of the two of the imperium's forces were remaining, meaning that securing the weapon — the best-case scenario for the imperium — had become nigh impossible.

That left three choices for him.

One: he could destroy Tom Cat to prevent the weapon from falling into the kingdom's hands.

Two: he could assume that the weapon going out of control meant it was mission accomplished for him and just leave the battlefield.

Three: he could destroy the...

"The choice is obvious." His marionettes aimed their weapons.

They had Tom Cat in their sights.

They pulled the triggers. Their bullets went towards Tom, passed him, and pierced the space around Acra-Vesta.

"No perceived effect. Continue attacking."

Feeling that flow of will, Faldreed and all the other marionettes attacked the superweapon.

Indeed, this choice was obvious. By the time he'd arrived, Tom Cat was already fighting Acra-Vesta, meaning that it was clearly out of control.

If he let it be, the superweapon could potentially go to the imperium — specifically, the Barbaros territory. Even if it didn't, its rampage would definitely reach the local town of Quartierlatin.

The choice couldn't be more clear.

There was no hesitation or conflict.

He could protect everything he wanted without sacrificing anything. It was by far the easiest choice he would make that day.

Choice three was that he could destroy the out of control superweapon.

“I’m here to help. You won’t mind if I destroy it, will you?” he asked Tom.

“Think you can?! Do it, then!”

“Understood. Using all available force.”

The Lynx, Tom Cat and Zero General, Gifted Barbaros now stood on the same side and fought Acra-Vesta.

As the battle continued, the mountain — Acra-Vesta’s exit — opened up, shifting the stage to the surface.

◆◆◆

Acra-Vesta

Incarnation of Beasts signal lost.

As Acra-Vesta made its way to the exit, it realized that the Incarnation of Beasts had vanished.

It ran a threat search, but couldn’t find the incarnation anywhere.

Besides that, it also realized that someone had destroyed the Superior-class incarnation that was one of the reasons for its activation.

Though there were still some incarnation-like energy signals nearby, they were all so weak that they couldn’t even begin to compare.

With that in mind, if it destroyed the intruders still in the facility, there would be no need to uphold the absolute defense, but that was irrelevant to Acra-Vesta. After all...

Several Superior-class signals detected.

Acra-Vesta’s enemy-locating ability was miles above that of Prism Soldiers and many other weapons.

It was so powerful that it could locate the incarnation-like signals... the Superior Embryos... far away in the south — the cities of Altea and Gideon.

Thus, Acra-Vesta changed its priorities.

Its main mission now was to go down south and destroy all the Superior Embryos it encountered.

Of course, it wouldn’t waste time on anything or anyone else.

However, Acra-Vesta was unlike the Prism Soldiers in one important way.

Detected many signals of life.

Found humanoid animals who are not on the list.

Modifying list based on acquired information.

Recognizing humanoid animals as mankind.

Acra-Vesta's AI was more advanced than that of the Prism Soldiers, so it could see that modern tians were humanoid. They might have changed over the past two millennia, but they were human nonetheless.

Prioritize the destruction of incarnations. Ignore all potential loss of life.

Despite that, Acra-Vesta didn't hesitate to make sacrifices.

For the future of mankind.

For the world that has created us.

Annihilating all incarnations, no matter the cost.

With a will as solid as its frame, the superweapon prepared to go south — through Quartierlatin.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

The superweapon, Tom, and marionettes that had to belong to Dr. Mario were all fighting on the mountain. The eight Toms and countless marionettes were cooperating to shower the weapon in attacks.

Despite belonging to opposing countries, they were actually fighting as allies.

I could think of several reasons why they might team up, but the most likely one was that they'd realized how dangerous the weapon was and decided to team up to take it out.

The weapon, however, didn't seem to care about them and just went south — to Quartierlatin.

It was attacked from all directions, but it didn't seem to care. Completely unharmed, it moved its trilobite-like feet to move onwards.

Unlike the Prism Soldiers I'd encountered, it didn't seem to be preparing any weapons for attack. It did nothing but move forward.

Their attacks didn't hurt it at all, but they didn't suffer much, either. Some marionettes had been crushed by the feet, but that was the extent of it.

It clearly had superb defense, but unlike Shu's Baldr, it didn't seem to have any close-range firearms.

"But it's heading straight for the town," I said. "We've gotta take it out before it gets here."

It had a defensive ability so great it was absurd, but Nemesis's Vengeance ignored defense.

Maybe we could hurt it?

The three debuffs were gone by now, so I was good to go.

I hopped on Silver and called out to them. "Nemesis, Azurite, let's go and... Hm?"

I noticed the situation had changed.

The superweapon had stopped in place.

Not on its own, though — countless marionettes had gone in to hold it back.

Besides the human-sized wooden marionettes, there were stone ones about ten times as large.

There had to be at least a thousand of them. Dr. Mario was using them to force the superweapon to stay in place.

"Well, that's a good idea," I mused.

Even if it had good defense due to its hull, skills, or whatever, it had nothing against this kind of physical binding. The fact that the weapon didn't use firearms or anything made it even easier.

This was really good for us. While it was being held back, I'd go hit myself on its legs or something to accumulate damage, healing whenever necessary, before finally ending it with a powerful enough Vengeance.

"That makes you seem like one of those people who jump in front of cars to extort money," Nemesis commented.

I thought of that, too, but did you have to say it out loud?!

It was an emergency, anyway. I couldn't pick and choose my methods.

"Let's go join them," I said.

"Mm-hm," nodded Nemesis.

"Yes," Azurite agreed.

I took Nemesis in her greatsword form with my right hand and let Azurite sit behind me on Silver, just like yesterday.

The superweapon tried to move its legs to go forward, but the marionettes did a great job of keeping it in place. Even those that were trampled were quickly replaced.

I also saw Tom use some sort of Gem. It made the superweapon sink a bit into the ground, so it was probably for some sort of magic that softened the earth.

Apparently, they were now prioritizing binding over destroying it.

That was probably the right choice. They just had to hold it long enough until someone good against tanky enemies — it didn't have to be me — came over and beat it.

Wanting to get there ASAP, I made Silver hurry.

"He seems faster than when I used him," said Azurite. "Is it because the original owner's riding him?"

Her words reminded me of the Prism Rider skills.

Silver was obviously faster because of Prism Beast Enhancement.

And then there was the other skill, Prism Authorization.

Using my right hand, still holding Nemesis, I opened the window and looked at Silver's skills. I'd be fighting the moment I got there, so this was my only real chance to check it out.

"And... no dice." I sighed.

Silver's third skill was still hidden. I had thought that Prism Authorization was the condition for unlocking it, but no.

I was getting nothing even when I tried to check its details—

"...Eh?"

When I selected it, something unexpected happened.

There was some new text underneath where the skill's description was supposed to be.

"To the inhabitant of the post-incarnation world who acquires Zephyrus Silver and the Authorization," I read. "You do not have permission to see the details of this skill at level 1. However, Zephyrus Silver is allowed limited use of this skill at his own discretion. To see all his details and unlock all his functions, acquire Prism Authorization level 3 or above. Sincerely, Zephyrus Silver's developer, Flagman."

"What...?" I raised an eyebrow. It was unlike any description or game message I'd ever seen.

It seemed... personal.

This Flagman guy had left it specifically for the one who got his hands on both Silver and the Prism Rider job — in this case, me.

I was probably the first person to ever read this text. After all, Prism

Authorization was given by Prism Rider, which had been a lost job until just a few days ago.

Were there similar messages on the other Prism Steeds? Or did Silver only have this because he was, according to Dr. Mario, a prototype or an experimental unit?

Whatever the case, it was clear that this Flagman person had tech advanced enough to let him leave such messages on skill description windows.

Also, something about this message felt off...

“I can tell you want to ponder, but now is not the time, Ray!” Nemesis exclaimed.

“Look!” Azurite joined. “The superweapon is...!”

I stopped my train of thought and looked at the superweapon.

It was still being bound by the marionettes, but I could instantly see what had caught their attention.

“The back... is splitting?”

The upper part of the weapon, the horseshoe crab’s carapace, split in two and opened upwards.

I thought that Tom and Dr. Mario had finally damaged it, but that wasn’t the case.

Rather, something was rising from the space the opening had made.

It was the superweapon’s rear — the part that looked whale-like. The head that had been kept inside the crab was rising with it.

Just like that, a thing that looked like a large, multi-finned, mechanical whale split from the crab and rose upwards.

At the same time, the crab began violently struggling to break free of the marionettes’ grip. That was enough to turn the tides in the struggle. The marionettes were the ones being overwhelmed now.

It felt like losing the whale was letting the weapon use its full power.

“Is that thing actually...?” I wondered.

My own assumption made a chill go down my spine, but alas, it was completely true.

This weapon was...

◆◆◆

Acra-Vesta

Pushed down by countless marionettes, Acra-Vesta gathered data from its surroundings.

The humanoids that released faint incarnation signals were launching gems to the surroundings, turning the ground into mud.

They couldn't beat it, so the marionettes were shifting all focus to binding it.

However, these enemies and their actions meant little for Acra-Vesta. What it found important was the muddied ground beneath it.

Right now, it was sinking into this ground because it was a plain surface with no ruins underneath.

It was a decent distance away from its exit, and with it, the ruins.

That was the most important factor for it.

Closing exit.

Checking the anti-explosion and anti-impact systems on the facility's high-priority blocks.

Since everyone had been so preoccupied with Acra-Vesta, no one had cared about its exit, which had closed shortly after it left.

It was the final switch.

Separation mechanism, initiate.

Unit α, Acra — opening upper hull.

Unit β, Vesta — raising altitude.

The name of the third anti-incarnation superweapon, Acra-Vesta, was from a language other than the current Infinite Dendrogram common — the one being auto-translated for Masters.

They were of the creator's — Flagman's — mother tongue, used in the now-gone Zweier Imperium.

In that language, "acra" meant "shell," while "vesta" was "sky."

"Acra-Vesta" was literally just "Shell and Sky." A many-legged tank and an air battleship — both formidable weapons of war.

Acra's unique skill was "Space Fixation."

It shielded from all incoming damage by fixing the space in place, and it was powerful enough to survive the relentless attacks from Tom, the marionettes, and even the beasts without as much as a scratch.

Vesta's unique skill was "Space Dilution."

What it did was...

◇◆

The air battleship, Vesta, had split from Acra and was now rising towards the sky.

Tom and the field marshal didn’t just sit by and let it happen.

Tom fired arrows and threw weapons, while Gifted’s marionettes attacked it with their guns.

They weren’t particularly serious attacks, but, much to their surprise, they actually dealt damage this time.

The hull was dented, pierced, or blown open all over. They kept attacking the legged tank, too, but it just continued being impervious to damage. The same couldn’t be said for the airship.

However...

“It’s repairing itself?”

Despite being a metallic machine, the unit was slowly regenerating. The metal on the hull and machines made waves as they closed the wounds.

The damage was greater than the repair speed, but since it kept rising up, their attack options would soon be limited, and the repairs would catch up.

“Not gonna let youuu,” said Tom. “Granting permission to use heavy weaponry. Marionette Squadron Creation.”

Tom jumped from the surface, then used other Toms as stepping stones to jump even higher and approach the airship.

Leaving one Tom on the ground for safety, he created seven of himself at the top of Vesta.

The field marshal’s marionettes went into Faldreed’s weapon inventory to take out an anti-aircraft gun they used to defend fortresses, while the squadron of the newly made flying marionettes went up to the sky.

The seven Toms tore into Vesta’s armor from above, while the massive AA gun tore holes in it from below.

As Faldreed lit the machine ablaze, the flying marionettes assaulted it with gunfire from the sides.

In but a moment, the airship became covered in holes.

“Intercepting.”

Small bits of its hull slid to the side, exposing the lenses of the laser cannons they’d seen many times in the ruins.

They shot down some of the flying marionettes around it, but the field marshal quickly replaced them.

Vesta could do little against Tom as he ran around destroying it, and the lack of laser lenses on its bottom part made it impossible for it to get rid of the AA gun right below it.

The airship was powerless to stop them.

The lasers, the sensors, the empty bridge — all of it was being destroyed.

Even the important bits, such as the large reactor and the main AI, didn't escape this fate. The airship's lifeline was cut down so easily, it felt anticlimactic.

Seasoned veteran that he was, the field marshal knew that it was destroyed.

"We did it! Ah...?!"

But then, Acra-Vesta began to fix itself like it was the most normal thing to do.

"Hey... we took out your corrre," Tom Cat objected. "Can't you just, you know, breaaak?"

Shocked that it had actually happened, the two continued attacking it, but it just kept on regenerating.

Even when you obliterated its equivalent of a human's brain, heart, and lungs, it still continued to fix itself. Needless to say, it was an eerie phenomenon.

It was caused by one of Acra-Vesta's functions, Mutual Repair.

Acra was set to repair Vesta, while Vesta was set to repair Acra. No matter how heavily damaged one of them was, the system would control the metal particles building up the unit to fix it and return it to its original form.

Of course, too much destruction would eventually cause a shortage of metal particles meant for repair.

That was considered during their design, and as a result of that, both units had inventories full of metal particles, hidden in their hardest-to-destroy areas.

The metal particles were mined, extracted, synthesized, and stored over a period of two thousand years.

There was enough of it to completely fix it three hundred times.

"What's going on?" Gifted was perplexed.

"Is it just a part of the one at the bottom?" Tom wondered. "No, that's too... Hold on, is this actually Mutual Repair?”

“The theory found in Dryfean ruins...? Wait, how do you...?”

As they began to wonder about the nature of this function and were about to reach the answer, the airship rose 1,000 metels above the surface.

Just like it had waited until there were no ruins beneath, Acra-Vesta was now waiting until one of its halves reached that height.

Space Dilution.

The airship activated its unique skill, changing the very space around it.

The skill had several effects, but each of them were felt by separate people.

“What...?” The first effect was noticed by the field marshal. He instantly lost his link to the flying squadron.

He could control marionettes from as far as 100,000 metels away. Whether they were deep underground or in some barrier, he could control them if they weren’t too distant.

However, he could tell that the reason he couldn’t control the squadron anymore was because of range.

He could see them from the surface just fine, yet the message was that they were too far.

The squadron he’d lost control over was shot down by the lasers.

Gifted then noticed something else.

The AA gun that had been damaging the airship all this time now fired shots that didn’t even reach it.

It was obviously within range, but the shots just lost all speed before reaching it and fell down to the surface like a pebble thrown by hand.

The difference between what he saw and the phenomenon that was happening around the airship made a chill go down his spine.

“...!” Tom was the one to notice the second effect.

No voice came out when he spoke, and he couldn’t even breathe anymore.

The beasts created by his true form might’ve been able to bear this, but Tom was a humanoid avatar. He wasn’t designed to survive without breathing.

Besides that, there was also the view the seven of them were seeing.

Up until a moment ago, they had been able to easily see the town of Quartierlatin below the airship. Of course they had — it was only about 1,000 metels above the surface.

Now, however, it wasn't even a speck on the horizon.

It was like they were above the clouds... no... far higher than that.

But just looking upwards made that impression flip upside-down — they were really far down, and the sky was extremely distant.

Even the light from the sun rising above the mountains to the east seemed tiny.

He felt like he was suddenly taken into a vast, otherworldly realm.

This is Space Dilution and its side effect... the vacuum! This thing actually imitated Red King's... Infinite Space's space manipulation powers...!

Cheshire realized what he was dealing with and quickly tried to stop it by destroying Vesta, but he was powerless against the repair.

After a short while, the vacuum made the seven Toms' blood vessels and eyeballs burst, quickly killing them.

The third effect was noticed by Ray's group as they approached the mountain.

They saw things falling from the sky.

The whale-like airship had several fins.

Some of them had fallen off, but...

"They're... not coming down?" He expected them to reach the ground right away, but that just wasn't happening.

They just stopped in place after removal... no... they were still dropping, but really slowly.

The fins approached the ground slower than balloons full of normal air. They seemed to be accelerating, but they were still slow. You could just picture them softly landing on the ground.

"GET AWAY OR YOU'LL DIE!" the Tom on the surface shouted in a voice you'd never expect from him.

Ray's group had no way of knowing it, but this was a voice Cheshire rarely used even as himself — a warning tone meant only for the most perilous of situations.

"Ah! Okay!" Ray shouted back as he made Silver turn around and tried to run as far away from the fins as possible.

The field marshal heard Tom, too. He created a new flying marionette squadron, jumped on their backs, and flew away.

Tom himself multiplied again and split up in all directions to increase his chances of survival.

His warning was no joke. After all, those fins... these mere pieces of metal... were Acra-Vesta's greatest weapon.

◆

Space Dilution.

Belonging to the airship, Vesta, it was a skill that expanded the space around it.

Specifically, it multiplied a radius of 1,000 metels by 300 to make it 300,000 metels.

It didn't affect the outside world in any way. It was a change exclusive to the 1,000 metel radius space around Vesta.

It was a really restrictive power in that it could only be used when there were no massive objects besides it in the 1,000 metel radius. The surface counted for this, which was why it had needed to go up that high.

Like Ray and Gifted had confirmed, Space Dilution didn't affect how the world looked to those outside of the space.

Tom was inside when it was activated, and the 1,000 metel radius space was stretched out 300 times.

That was the reason why the AA guns no longer hit. Even if it seemed like you could land a shot from the outside, it actually had to cover an area 300 times larger than what it seemed.

And though the space's volume had grown 27,000,000 times larger, the amount of air molecules had remained unchanged.

As a barrier, it didn't allow any air from the outside, either.

It was almost a vacuum. No animals could survive in those conditions, which was exactly why the seven Toms had died.

However, this atmosphere had another terrifying quality.

Normally, on planets with atmospheres, there were limits to how fast something could fall. This was caused by air resistance. Objects that entered the atmosphere from an airless space would either slow down immensely or burn up in plasma born from air pressure.

In short: the atmosphere acted as a break for anything going fast.

However...

What if there was a space with 27,000,000 times less air resistance, 300,000 metels to fall from, and normally functioning gravity?

What level of kinetic energy would the falling object have by the time it reached the surface?

◇

Falling through the Space Dilution field, the fin reached about seven times the speed of sound before hitting the ground.

It could only be compared to one thing: a meteor.

It created a several hundred metel-wide crater, a ground-shattering shockwave that extended several times further, and a light, glass-breaking wave that extended throughout all of Quartierlatin.

Most of the marionettes that were around the legged tank, Acra, evaporated the moment it hit. Only Faldreed survived, but the shockwave bent his limbs and blew him several hundred metels back.

Though Acra had been on ground zero, it was unscathed because of its Space Fixation. That was how Acra-Vesta had been designed to operate.

Acra couldn't break to Vesta's bombing, and even if it did, Vesta would repair it as long as it was around.

As long as one of them existed, the two space-controlling machines would continue repairing each other from total destruction.

Their Mutual Repair system would only stop functioning if both of them were destroyed at the same time.

That meant that it wasn't impossible to destroy them, but it would be no easy task.

The unbreakable Shell and the unreachable Sky had to be conquered at the same time.

It would be impossible under normal circumstances. No one could hurt either of them, leaving them to watch as Vesta's kinetic energy bombs destroyed their enemies.

Not even the Incarnation of Beasts could defeat Acra-Vesta.

In fact, that was the very first original concept behind this weapon.

Being about 37 percent complete, it didn't have a lot of its intended weaponry and counters to other incarnations, but it was no exaggeration to say it was 100% complete as an anti-Incarnation of Beasts weapon.

The pre-ancient civilization’s grand engineer Flagman poured intense murderous intent and hope for the future into this particular superweapon, and Acra-Vesta wielded it proudly.

The kinetic energy bombs born out of the ancient hatred assaulted even those who’d escaped the direct hit. Six Toms out of eight vanished in the shockwave.

“GH?! SILVEEEEEEEEERRRRR!” Ray shouted.

Ray’s group were distant to begin with, so they didn’t suffer fatal damage, but the shockwave upon them was powerful nonetheless. They bore it only by running Wind Hoof at max capacity and shielding against it with Nemesis’s third form.

As for the field marshal...

Caught up in the shockwave mid-flight, his squadron was destroyed.

Then, he himself was blown away. His bones shattered, and he fell down from several hundred metels in the air.

Chapter Eight: The Primeval Sword

The Lynx, Tom Cat

"Huff... huff... It's not quite like the original, but Flagman actually weaponized Red King's power! Just how absurd is that guy...?"

Standing in the mountains a short distance away from ground zero, I panted heavily and cursed Acra-Vesta's creator. I'd lost count of how many times his weapons had given us serious trouble.

And most of the time, I'm the one who has to take care of them. The others should run into them more often, I thought peevishly.

"This one's way more complete than the one we broke six hundred years agooo," I pondered aloud. "Self-developing weapons really are too dangerous to ignooore. If it became a UBM, Jabberwock could set some vectors on its powers, but we can't count on that happening..."

Acra-Vesta couldn't become a UBM. Though that had happened to Edelvalsa, another one of Flagman's weapons, the circumstances here were different.

Edelvalsa had been a standalone bioweapon designed to operate by itself, while Acra-Vesta was a legged tank paired with an airship. They were weapons that could be piloted, but which were operating on auto right now — as intended.

There may have been some sort of code to override it and make it obey people again, but Flagman was probably the only one who'd ever known it.

Prism People couldn't work unless owned by humans, and Acra-Vesta was the same in that regard. It was still being used by someone and thus couldn't become a UBM... or even a normal monster, for that matter.

Others' possessions couldn't be made to evolve — this was a safety that Jabberwock's Master had set on him, and there was no way to go around it.

"What do we do nowww...?" I wondered.

My base position on the situation was the same as it had been back in the ruins: we'd wait until compatible Superiors came around and destroyed it.

Just two Superiors — one to counter Space Fixation and another one for Space Dilution — would be enough... Actually, Xunyu could probably solo them both. Distance didn't matter to her, after all.

However, Acra-Vesta was on a whole different course than before. If it went southwards, bombing everything in its path, Altar's map would change drastically.

"Well, I guess I should be glad it didn't copy Red King's offensive abilities, tooo," I muttered. "Seriously, good thing it's just the defense..."

If it'd been the full package, the damage would've been a lot worse than just a changed map.

"Northern Altar would be destroyed before any Superiors came," I muttered. "And we have... only one way to prevent it..."

I knew the original behind those space manipulation powers, so I knew the counters, as well, and it just so happened that a couple of them were right here in Quartierlatin.

A couple of people in town would stand a chance against Acra-Vesta, despite not being Superiors.

The chances of them actually pulling it off were astronomically low, but they would be capable of breaking through both Acra's absolute defense and Vesta's vast vacuum, ultimately destroying them.

"Pulling it off is about as likely as tightrope walking on a cotton thread, but it's something," I pondered. "I need to let them know... but how?"

I knew both Acra-Vesta's powers and that their powers could counter it, but I couldn't let them know that I knew.

"It's not something I should know. It'd seem unnatural if I did," I said. "Even the warning from before was pushing it."

At the start of the bombing, I'd instantly realized that it was an attack that used Space Dilution. That was knowledge I could play off as just an assumption made from being inside the field or from my experience as a veteran duelist. However, it wouldn't be normal for me to know the details about Acra-Vesta and their... or, rather, her... powers.

While his abilities had been completely exposed by Franklin, her power was like a state secret — no, even more unknown than that.

"It'd be best if they figure out its powers and that they can counter it all by themselves... but I don't think that's going to happennn." I sighed.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

Once the shockwave had subsided, we kept our distance from the enemy and talked about nature of that attack.

“My guess is that the whale’s power is to make the distance... or space... around it bigger than it looks,” I said.

If we approached the whale without knowing how much, though, it could drop another fin on us.

Tom had been near ground zero, while Dr. Mario had been flying through the air when the first one hit.

I was worried about them, of course, but if we didn’t figure out what that thing was and think of a way to counter it, Quartierlatin could end up a crater, which would leave a bad taste in my mouth.

I mustered whatever wisdom I had and tried to guess what the fins were all about. “Distance... and space?”

“What do you mean?” Azurite and Nemesis both asked. They didn’t seem to fully understand me.

“Why do you think that?” Azurite added.

“I have several reasons. One of them was the AA gun. Its shots stopped reaching the whale, and from what I could see, they dropped naturally. It didn’t look like they hit anything, were damaged in any way, or were influenced by some outside energy — they just didn’t reach it, leaving us with two options: either the AA gun’s range became smaller, or the whale went up too high for its shells to hit.”

It reminded me of the battle against Monochrome. Some Masters had tried attacking it from the ground, but none of their attacks had reached, just like with the AA gun.

“What else?” asked Azurite.

“The way the fin fell. It looked really slow to us, but you saw how hard it hit. Even if the fin weighed tens, hundreds of tons, at that speed, it could never have the kinetic energy to make a shockwave that powerful.”

“Could it not be full of explosives?” asked Nemesis.

“It could, but I didn’t see any fire, and it didn’t sound like an explosion. Then again, it could easily be a magic bomb that worked like that...”

I wouldn’t have been surprised if shockwave bombs existed in this world or something. This was a fantasy, after all. Earth's laws of physics didn't always apply.

"No, continue with your theory," said Azurite.

"All right. Another thing I noticed was that it didn't make any sound while falling."

"But it did. Quite a loud one, too," commented Nemesis.

"That happened when it hit the surface. I'm talking about the fall itself. It's a pretty large object, yet it fell without making any sound. You couldn't even hear it cut the air. If my guess is right, then that's because it was either going a larger distance than it looked... or passing a vacuum."

"Vacuum..." Nemesis murmured.

I nodded. And if it really was that, another thing would make sense. "A vacuum would explain why it didn't heat up as it fell."

"It should have?" Nemesis asked.

"Yeah. Objects that move through the atmosphere really fast are subjected to air friction, and there's a point at which the air molecules are compressed and become plasma. Understand?"

"Metallic monsters shine when they move at multiple times the speed of sound. Is it something like that?" asked Azurite.

"Close enough. Now, if my guess is right and it had enough distance to speed up to create an impact that powerful, it should've started shining because of the heat from the air friction. That didn't happen, though, so it's very likely it's surrounded by a vacuum."

"What does that change?" asked Nemesis.

"In normal free fall, the air resistance would set a limit on the object's acceleration. That limit wasn't there in a vacuum."

It reminded me of a video I'd seen in class once, showing an experiment in which they examined free fall that had gravity, but zero air resistance. They'd removed all the air from a pipe, then made an iron ball fall through. It had been faster in the vacuum than in the air.

"I have another reason for why I think it's creating a vacuum," I continued.

"What is it?"

"The lasers. That's the weapon the whale used to shoot down the marionettes. The Prism Soldiers had Gatling guns, missiles, and lots of other weapons, yet the whale only used lasers. That makes sense only if it was designed around a power that expanded space and created a vacuum."

That'd make it pointless to use any other weapons.

"After all... lasers don't lose power over distance," I said. That was one of the main properties of light. "Lasers only lose power if there are molecules in the way, so if they're in a vacuum, they deal the same amount of damage, no matter how many hundreds of kilometers they pass."

Monochrome's maximum range had been about 15,000 meters, but only because of the air molecules in the atmosphere. In a vacuum, its lasers could've reached anything.

"Lasers go at the speed of light, too," I said. "They can't miss their mark even with the expanded distance."

The speed of light was roughly 300,000,000 meters per second. Given that number, a distance difference of ten thousand meters was negligible.

That was what made lasers the only weapon that could be used well in pre and post-space expansion, as well as in and out of the vacuum.

The fact that the whale had only lasers and fins strongly supported my theory.

"Can you give us a summary of your theory?" asked Nemesis.

"Though you can't tell by looking, the whale created a huge vacuum around it," I said. "That's why the attacks don't reach, and that's why the things it drops gain insane amounts of kinetic energy before they hit the ground. That explains all the phenomena around it."

All in all, it was a pretty terrifying power. The whale ruled the skies in an even worse way than Monochrome.

But...

"What can we even do against such a thing?" Azurite wondered in despair.

"...I can beat it."

"Eh?" She turned away from the whale and back to me.

I nodded and raised just one finger. "I think I can beat the whale... but only once."

It would be a huge gamble.

I had no idea how powerful it would be, couldn't guarantee that I would hit the whale with it, or that I could survive until I finished the attack.

Nothing about my idea was certain, but going by the toughness of the whale, which I assumed I understood now from watching Tom and Dr.

Mario fight it, I could destroy the thing if the attack was at least half as powerful as the original.

"But once is not enough, is it?" asked Nemesis.

"Yeah."

She was right. Tom and Dr. Mario had destroyed the whale a few times, but it had restored itself every time and continued rising.

While the crab had insane defense, the whale seemed to have some sort of insanely powerful repair function. It would probably come back soon after I destroyed it.

“Oh, but it is enoughhh!” a voice called.

“Tom!” I cried.

Looking slightly tattered, Tom popped out of a nearby street and stood next to Silver.

“You’re okay!”

“I lost six outta eight, thouuugh. But as you can see, I’m still here and can still talk to you, so I’m just fiiine. Another one of me is still watching the thing.”

...Man, his Embryo had some impressive survivability.

We walked over closer to him and I asked, “Umm, where’s Dr. Mario?”

“Mario...? Ohh, you mean the one who used the marionettes. I’m not sure. Don’t even know if he’s alive.”

“I... I see...”

I could only hope he was. He was Dryfe’s SMTF, so he had the stats needed to survive... probably.

“What did you mean by, ‘It’s enough?’” I asked.

“That repair power is called ‘Mutual Repair.’ You find it on ruin machines sometimes.”

“What a simple name,” I commented.

“And it does exactly what it sounds like. It makes two machines fix each other. As long as one is around, it will fix the other even if the other is completely destroyed. That means they won’t be able to repair each other if you destroy them both at the same time.”

“I see...” I pondered. “Hold on.”

If that was happening between the crab and the whale...

“Doesn’t that mean they’re indestructible?”

I had a slim chance of destroying the whale, but there was no way for me to destroy the crab at the same time. I could maybe destroy the crab with a Vengeance is Mine, but then I’d be left with the whale, which I couldn’t beat from the surface. Since it wasn’t as close as it seemed, I’d spectacularly miss. Whether I went for the whale or the crab, I’d have to get close, meaning that I could only take out one of them.

“By the way, I don’t think your skills would work on the legged tank,” Tom added.

“Eh?”

“Uhh, I know about your counterattack skills from the broadcast during Franklin's gaaame. The thing about the tank is that you can't touch it. The space right in front of it blocks anything that gets too close."

"No way..."

I already knew that Tom and Dr. Mario couldn't beat it, but if we couldn't touch it at all, me and my Vengeance would be useless against it, too.

And as long as that crab was around, the whale was indestructible.

We had no moves we could make.

"Hey, why not ask for Brother Bear or someone else's help?" asked Nemesis. "Xunyu had warp attacks! Surely she could..."

"And how do I contact them?" I demanded. "Bro didn't answer when I called him, and I don't know any way to get in touch with Xunyu. Also, they'd take too long to get here, and..."

...Quartierlatin would be gone by then.

That was the one ending I couldn't accept, no matter what.

"Do we have anything else?" Nemesis wondered. "Are any Altarian Masters still alive here capable of dealing with the crab?"

"The Masters who went with me into the ruins were all wiped out," said Tom. "And most of the others were taken out over the course of the night."

That left us with no options.

I could give my all and challenge the whale, but that wouldn't be enough. If only there were one more person... someone who held the possibility of beating the crab!

Troubled and feeling like our chances were going further and further beyond the radix point, I heard a familiar voice.

"Tom Cat. I have a question."

It belonged to Azurite.

"What is it, masked lady?" Tom asked.

"The weapon on the ground is protected by space, right?"

"Yep. But none of our attacks worked. Even the whale's bomb didn't hurt it, so I doubt any normal attacks would work on it."

"I see..." Tom's hopeless words made Azurite nod. "Then I will be the one to destroy it."

She said that as if it was no big deal.

"Huh?! Azurite! Have you gone mad?!" Nemesis exclaimed.

"I haven't. I shall destroy the weapon on the ground."

She looked straight into my eyes. I saw no hesitation in them. It felt like we both saw glimpses of each other's minds.

"Ray, you said you can destroy the flying weapon, yes?"

"Yeah... I'll do it, no matter what."

"You never lie, so I shall believe you. In exchange..." With her left hand, she grasped the azure sword fixed to her hip. "...I want you to believe me, as well. I will cut down the weapon on the ground."

Her eyes had a strong will, confidence, determination, and trust for my ability to beat the whale. She clearly had a way to beat the crab.

Perhaps it was as much of a gamble as my way of beating the whale, but since she sincerely believed I could pull it off, I had to respond the same way.

"Yeah... I believe you."

I felt her resolve and accepted her choice. I wouldn't stop her from going because she was a tian. I'd said I would support her, and stopping her wouldn't be it.

I would believe that she could handle the crab, and I myself would go and beat the whale. That was my current way of supporting her.

"Let's do it, Ray," she said. "Let's put an end to the foul legacy of those ruins."

She then removed her mask and smiled.

I responded with a smile of my own. "Yeah!"

Thus began the final round in the battle against the weapons reigning over both heaven and earth.

◆◆◆

About a certain craftsman...

Flagman.

The name that would later survive on many pre-ancient civilization relics was known all across the continent during the time when the civilization was thriving.

His knowledge and ideas were on a whole other level. It was said that the very prosperity before the arrival of the ancient civilization — the incarnations — was caused by the technological revolution brought about by Flagman.

His technology felt as if it had come from another world. Naturally, all the countries wanted it, but he never bound himself to just a single one.

He never created anything specific because he was hired or commissioned to do it; he only provided his products to those countries that gave him the funds, resources, workforce, and let him make whatever he wanted.

It wasn't uncommon for his weapons to be used against one another in battlefields.

Some considered monopolizing him, while others wanted to assassinate him before others could use his talents to make more new weapons, but those plans never came to fruition.

Instead, countries which treated him favorably, like the Zweier Imperium, began receiving products Flagman considered necessary for them. The very first non-weapon he ever made, an environment-improvement tool, went to the Zweier Imperium.

Because of that, other countries began to hide their ulterior motives, ending their efforts to make an enemy out of him.

Eventually, the continent began revolving around Flagman, and after a quarter of a century of technological prosperity, the Extra-Continental Vessel and the thirteen incarnations appeared.

The countries that first contacted those incarnations launched a preemptive strike against them with Flagman's weaponry.

However, not even their strongest weapons stood a chance.

Faced with the sudden, drastic change on the continent, Flagman resolved to design weapons stronger than any he'd ever made before, and use all the countries' powers to create them.

The danger the continent was in was one reason he did it, but he had something even more important driving him: a sense of rivalry.

He had technology surpassing all others and had spent his whole life on research, so seeing his many weapons get turned to scrap so easily made him want to challenge the forces responsible and ultimately emerge victorious.

That led to the creation of pre-ancient civilization weapons such as the Prism Dragons and the throne. They were, without a doubt, unmatched, and had they been created before the incarnations came, they would have changed the course of history.

Alas, even that was nothing before the incarnations.

The Prism Dragons fell to them, while the throne couldn't be activated because its energy lines were cut off.

Thus, the pre-ancient civilization was destroyed by the incarnations.

However, there were weapons that were being created even after the very last normal weapon was destroyed and all the countries had fallen.

They were the anti-incarnation superweapons.

The concept behind them was to analyze, recreate, and utilize the incarnations' own powers for use against them.

Flagman was involved in the creation of the foundation, but he left the rest of the creation process to the machines themselves.

He was ready to die at the hands of the incarnations, so he left behind weapons that would continue to develop without him, all for the purpose of beating the incarnations.

One of them was Superweapon No. 3, Acra-Vesta, which would end up lying dormant in a mountain that had once been Zweier Imperium territory.

Flagman provided it with the foundation, concept, half of the analysis, and the name. The still-living researchers built the facility, and the rest of it was all left to Acra-Vesta itself.

None of that was different from any other superweapon, but Acra-Vesta was unique in one way: it was created as a counter to a specific enemy — the Incarnation of Beasts.

Flagman had been a true anomaly his whole life — not just among people, but perhaps even in the world itself. Despite this, there had been one person who had treated him kindly, valued his talents more than anyone else, and treasured him like family. His name was Imperator Wolfgang, and he'd lost his life to that very incarnation.

Thus, Acra-Vesta, built in the imperium's lands, was the only superweapon that embodied not only Flagman's rivalrous spirit and hope for the future, but his personal grudge, as well.

◇◆

Having completed going down the mountain, Acra was now moving southwards at its regular speed.

Vesta, its other half, was following it from the heavens.

The airship was significantly faster than the legged tank, but their current speed was completely in sync.

The units were separate, but they operated as one, and Vesta was simply slowing down to avoid leaving Acra behind.

Some would expect Vesta to have to move three hundred times faster to make up for the three hundred times larger distance, but that wasn't the way it worked.

Space Dilution was centered around Vesta, so its speed remained the same as before.

Normally, Acra would hold on to Vesta — the opposite of what they had before the split — letting Vesta move at its own speed.

However, though weak, there were signs of incarnations nearby, so Vesta couldn't undo the Space Dilution, and they had to move in their battle formation.

Suddenly, Vesta noticed an incarnation drawing close to it. "Incarnations detected."

Vesta's search capabilities easily extended all the way to Gideon, so it could sense enemies beyond even the 300,000 metels of its realm.

Without this ability, it wouldn't be able to use its lasers to shoot down any incoming enemies, so it was crucial for its operations.

On the other hand, most of its processing power and payload was split between the laser cannons, search devices, Mutual Repair, and Space Dilution, so it couldn't have any weapons besides the lasers, nor did it have all that much defense.

The weapons meant to cover those problems were still mid-development, so it didn't have them equipped.

As a standalone airship, it would be considered a frail failure, but that wasn't a problem, for as long as Acra was around, Vesta would be indestructible.

"Target approaching at high speeds." Vesta's search systems looked for the enemy's exact position.

It was coming from...

◇◇◇

Ten minutes ago, Prism Rider, Ray Starling

We promised to destroy the machines — with Azurite going for the crab on the ground and me taking out the whale in the sky — and split up.

Tom would support Azurite, so now I was alone with Nemesis and Silver.

"So, Ray," Nemesis spoke up. "The method you have in mind is the Black Warcoat's skill, right?"

"Yeah." I nodded as my coat waved in the wind.

Its Light Absorption skill gathered light and stored it as energy which it would probably use for the other skill, which was most likely a giant laser beam like the one used by Monochrome the UBM.

It had to be capable of destroying the whale.

"Hmm, well, the compatibility is certainly there. You can finish charging the coat by letting it absorb the whale's lasers, and since, like you said, lasers don't lose power over distance, it doesn't matter how much the whale's expanded its surroundings."

"No. We'll have to get close," I said, correcting her misconception.

"What?"

"It expanded the distance by a lot. Even a slight error while targeting would make the beam fly completely off the mark, so we need to get close enough to at least see it clearly."

From what Tom told us, the area around the whale was like a different realm where both the sky and the ground seemed extremely distant.

His assumption was that the distance couldn't be any less than several hundred thousand meters.

So to make sure my laser hit it, we had to get as close to it as possible first.

"We'll counter the vacuum by preemptively compressing the air around us using Silver's Wind Hoof," I said. "There's not much MP left in Gouz-Maise, but it's enough for some decent compression."

That would be my substitute for a space suit.

"Honestly, I'm more worried about the lasers than the vacuum," I added. "I have no idea if Monochrome and The Black Shield will be enough for them."

"That's true, but I see a flaw in your idea," said Nemesis.

"Which would be?"

"You said you would compress the air around us, but it would be limited, no? We'd run out of it long before we reached the whale. Silver can't run in a vacuum, you know that from when we fought Monochrome, don't you?"

"I do. That's why we're I'm not making him run."

"Nh?" My words caused Nemesis to make a confused face.

"Listen, Nemesis, this isn't like the Monochrome battle," I said. "We aren't chasing something that can rise to the sky at supersonic speeds."

The main problem back then had been that the enemy was high up in the sky and moved higher if threatened. What about the whale, though?

"There might be a several hundred thousand meters between us, but it's actually only about a thousand meters in the air."

"Several hundred thousand meters are just a thousand?" she asked.

"The distance is only messed up in the space around it. It's not affecting anything outside."

It was hard to comprehend with our standard laws, but in this case, the several hundred thousand and the thousand were actually the same distance.

That allowed us to do something that we couldn't do against Monochrome.

"What are you planning?" Nemesis asked, despite already knowing the answer. You could tell by the stiff smile on her face, to which I smiled back.

The answer was painfully simple. It would let us get to the whale faster, and without making Silver waste any air for movement.

Our method of getting to the whale...

"We just have to go above it and fall for hundreds of thousands of meters."

...was exactly the same as its means of attack.

◆◇◆

Quartierlatin, town outskirts, sky

"The enemy is descending from straight above." Vesta's systems and optical sensors spotted a black mass falling towards it. It was Ray and Silver.

"Intercepting."

As Ray endlessly accelerated through the vacuum around Vesta, it activated its laser cannons and began shooting him.

The sophisticated search system made it impossible for them to miss.

However, all the lasers were consumed by the darkness — the black color covering Silver.

“No effect.”

Dozens of lasers were consumed by the coat, doing no damage.

Vesta’s upper part was its blind spot. It was originally supposed to be equipped with secondary weapons meant to cover it, but unfortunately, it hadn’t had the time to develop them.

Still, even without them, the lasers should’ve been able to shoot just about anything down with a good enough barrage.

The problem here was that the lasers didn’t seem to have any effect at all.

As Vesta’s artificial intelligence began operating to find a solution to this problem...

Enemy spotted.

...Acra from down below informed it of another threat.

◇◆

“Enemy spotted.”

As Acra went to the south, it was hindered by eight people.

“Are you sure you wanna do this by yourself?” asked one of the eight men who had the same face. “And was it really okay for you to remove the mask?”

“Yes,” said the ninth person. “And you already knew my face, didn’t you?”

“Well, yeaaah... It’s Ray who’s weird for not realizing.”

“Heh heh, he really is.”

The eight were Tom, who’d already fought Acra once. They split up, leaving the only non-Tom alone.

The person had no entry in Acra’s logs.

“No sign of incarnations,” Acra said.

Indeed, the last one wasn’t an incarnation, but Acra-Vesta had been set to ignore all human casualties. Thus, it would head forward even if it had to crush someone in its way.

“Advancing while retaining speed.”

It would just keep going forward. That was Acra’s sole weapon. The absolute defense from Space Fixation made it into an object that couldn’t be destroyed, no matter what it crashed into. Nothing could surpass its toughness.

Though faced with Acra’s deadly charge, Azurite didn’t move an inch.

She just held a Job Crystal in hand...

“Job Change — ■■■■■■ ■■■■■■■■.”

...and shattered it.

Acra paid no heed to that and just continued speeding through the ground with its legs akin to twisted thorns.

Azurite’s slender body was about to be torn apart by the legs, but before that happened, she voiced the name of a skill.

“Release.”

“...?”

Now, even after Acra had passed her, Azurite was still standing.

Though she was supposed to be caught in its legs and badly wounded, if not dead, not even her silky hair was damaged.

There was only one difference about her — the azure blade in her hand was glowing.

"Repeating attack... error." Upon realizing that its attack failed, Acra tried to turn around and face Azurite again, but it couldn't.

As it attempted a turn, a few of its legs detached from its body and fell.

"Analyzing damage. Initiating repairs." As a machine, Acra felt nothing about its impenetrable defense being broken. It would just mechanically fix itself with mutual repair.

However, that...

"Repair... impossible."

...was something that could never happen again.

"That wound is the origin," Azurite said with her back to the machine. Acra had just lost its legs, which were under Space Fixation's absolute protection, and couldn't fix them despite its impressive repair powers. "You have not 'lost' the legs. The 'you without those legs' has become the original you."

Thus, the damage could never be repaired.

Acra's repair function was in Vesta, rather than itself, yet Azurite had just stated that not even that mattered to the wounds she'd given — the origins she'd etched.

"This blade of azure severs all," she told it. "The wounds it bestows never heal. It is the blade that etches inescapable origins."

Azurite gently swung her blade, and the empty space it passed was actually torn. This unfathomable sharpness was the true nature of her sword.

It was the kingdom's most prized treasure, an anomaly of a relic, and the legendary blade said to have been wielded by the founder and first king of Altar.

"The Primeval Sword, Altar shall cut all that you are!"

It was a sword... and an Irregularity.

"The Primeval Sword, Altar — matching data found. Wielder — no matching data."

Even the database that had been built in the time of the pre-ancient civilization had records of Altar. As one would expect, however, it had no info on the wielder.

Thus, Acra released a question-like tone, and Azurite was courteous enough to answer.

"I am the one who shall wield Altar as I stand alongside them as the vanguard resisting all that menace the kingdom."

The words contained her will and determination, and the words that followed were proof that she alone was capable of wielding Altar.

"I am the first princess of the Kingdom of Altar — Sacred Princess, Altimia Azurite Altar."

It was none other than the name of the one who inherited the blade, Altar, and the country named after it.

Azurite, also known as Sacred Princess, Altimia, looked at Acra with her unmasked eyes.

Facing the machine as it stood up using its remaining legs, she declared, "By these names, the duties that come with them, and by my own will, I shall not tolerate anyone menacing the people of the kingdom."

Then she pointed the tip of her blade at Acra, cracked a fearless smile, and asked:

"Are you prepared?"

Chapter Nine: Their Choice

About The Primeval Sword, Altar

"The Primeval Sword, Altar" was the name of a legendary azure blade that had existed even before the time of the pre-ancient civilization.

It was a transcendental sword of immense power that was said to be able to cut anything.

Two thousand years ago, during the final years of the pre-ancient civilization, it had disappeared from the face of history, and resurfaced only about five centuries ago.

Back then, the entire continent had been in a state of perpetual war, like the modern Tenchi.

It was the time after the time of the immensely powerful Draconic Emperor, King of Kings, and The Lynx.

The Draconic Emperor's long life expired, the King of Kings was sealed by The Earth, The Ocean, and The Atmos of that era, while The Lynx simply disappeared somewhere.

With the King of Kings's disappearance, the vast lands to the west of the continent lost their ruler, causing many to fight for control over the fertile lands near the west coast.

Some wanted as much profit as possible, some tried to replicate what the King of Kings had done, some simply wanted to defend themselves. The reasons were varied, but the west was in a state of chaos nonetheless.

The situation quickly stabilized in the southwest, under the control of the long-lived races, and in the northwest, where people were unified by their worship of the pre-ancient civilization, but the space right between them had no common banner to fly, so it ended up becoming a gathering of small countries fighting with each other for a long time.

That situation was made even worse by the appearance of The Evil.

Eventually, however, there came a man who subjugated all the countries and unified them into one.

His name was Azurite.

He started out as a shepherd who was grieved about the war, but it all changed when he chanced upon The Primeval Sword, Altar, buried under some dirt.

The blade chose him, and he became the Sacred King. He used the sword's immense power to fight in the wars, eventually defeated The Evil alongside his friends, and brought stability to the central west part of the continent.

He was Azurite Altar — the first king of the Kingdom of Altar.

"The blade chose him, and he became the Sacred King" meant exactly what it sounded like.

After the destruction of the pre-ancient civilization and the death of its previous owner, The Primeval Sword, Altar, spent centuries untouched and even became a UBM over the years, but that did not change its role — to determine who was suited to wield it and to give them the Special Superior Job of Sacred King, or, if the wielder was female, Sacred Princess.

The first king, Azurite, qualified for this role and became the Sacred King, letting him wield Altar.

There were two types of Superior Jobs: those who could be reached through talent and hard work, and those for which no amount of work and aptitude was enough.

Hierophant — or High Priestess if female — and The Saint were good examples of each.

They were both Superior Jobs with a heavy focus on healing magic, but there was an important difference between them.

First, the conditions for Hierophant:

One — reach level 500 with only jobs linked to the clergy, such as Priest, Temple Knight, or Monk.

Two — find 1,000 people who had maxed out the Priest job, have them nominate you for the Hierophant job, gather their signatures, and bring them to the priest grouping crystal.

Three — complete the special job change quest.

As hard as these conditions seemed, it was entirely possible to fulfill them with just hard work and talent.

The same thing couldn't be said about The Saint's conditions.

To gain that job, you had to be a woman who had the blood — the genetic information — of a certain family, and complete a special quest.

The Saint prioritized bloodline over all hard work and talent.

Basically, normal Superior Jobs could be acquired through aptitude and determination, while the Special Superior Jobs had unique conditions which excluded the vast majority of even the most talented people.

Sacred King and Sacred Princess were Special Superior Jobs that could only be acquired by people with aptitude for The Primeval Sword, Altar.

The first king had used the blade's name for his country, giving rise to the kingdom of knights.

The royal family of these lands had been inheriting the blade ever since, and because they had the blood of the first king in their veins, the children of their family inherited the first king's aptitude for Altar.

Not all of them had it, however. In fact, only one child in every few generations did; those who did were actually quite rare. Not even the previous king, Eldor Zeo Altar, had been an exception.

His daughter Altimia, however, possessed this gift.

Though born to two blonde-haired parents, she herself had azure hair. This was definitely not because of infidelity, but more like an atavism.

The first king's hair color had been azure, and every now and then, the gene resurfaced in his descendants. That detail alone was considered auspicious to the point that the azure-haired child was always given the first king's first name, Azurite, as a middle name.

However, unlike most of the previous blue-haired Altarian royals, Altimia also had Azurite's immense aptitude for Altar.

Soon after she was born, the blade, kept in the treasury, began glowing blue, and Altimia, despite being still a baby, was given the Sacred Princess job.

Needless to say, her father, Eldor, instantly knew that his first daughter was the blade's chosen one.

However, he didn't want to force her into a life of fighting just because of how she was born.

The sentiment was similar to his stance on Masters, but this surely must have been stronger than that.

He couldn't tolerate the idea that an infant, not even months old, would be forced into a life of strife just because she was chosen by an ancient power.

Thus, he kept her job, as well as Altar's sudden gleaming, hidden from the public.

Revealing it would have given him cards to use against foreign countries, and it would definitely have enlivened his people, but he still prioritized his daughter's peace.

Still, he was well aware that, as royalty and as someone calling this world her home, Altimia would not be able to live without knowing battle at all. Simply having a power like hers put her in danger, and he wanted to make sure she didn't hurt herself.

Thus, Eldor revealed the truth to and asked the help of two people: Langley, the Celestial Knight and an old friend of his, and the Arch Sage, his own teacher.

Langley taught Altimia in the ways of the sword, while the Arch Sage taught her about how the world worked. Thanks to that, the girl grew up to be someone who wouldn't misuse her power as the Sacred Princess.

However, there was one thing no one expected.

Langley had soon realized that Altimia's status as the Sacred Princess wasn't the only thing special about her — she also had a talent for swordfighting.

It was so immense, in fact, that she surpassed even Langley, and when combined with the supreme power of sword only she could wield, her talent made her the strongest swordfighter in Altar.

◇◆◇

Quartierlatin, town outskirts

"Hhn!" Altimia didn't even dodge Acra's charge.

With a breath, she dove right into the rows of its needle-like legs, evaded them all with supreme precision, and swung Altar's azure blade.

The sword that could cut everything tore through the fixed space around Acra, then through its own armor like it was nothing.

She found it easier to swing than a feather. Many would feel that that actually made it harder to use, but to Altimia, handling the sword came as naturally as breathing.

Another thing of note was her speed. She'd originally used the Swordmaster job to hide her identity. But when switching to Sacred Princess, she'd activated the job's passive skill, The Inheritor of the Sacred Blade, which multiplied all her stats by ten whenever she wielded Altar.

It was one of the things that made the Special Superior Job so impressive. With her speed now exceeding 50,000, she was too fast for Acra to keep up with.

She surpassed the speed of sound five times over, and Acra, a machine which dedicated most of its Resources to Space Fixation and Mutual Repair, had no way to counter her. As powerful as Acra-Vesta's abilities were, they consumed all of its available resources.

Thus, when faced with Altar — an enemy against which its functions meant nothing — it lost all of its advantages.

"Requesting backup." Acra quickly calculated what it had to do, and decided to request that Vesta release one of its kinetic energy bombs.

Though Vesta was in a battle itself, it quickly acknowledged the request and released one of its fins right over Acra.

Tom, who was watching Vesta's surroundings, quickly called out, "Princess! The thing above just released a fin!"

Not even a Special Superior Job such as hers was sturdy enough to survive this attack. That was the very reason why Tom had been watching Vesta — to let her know when she had to back away.

But...

"Just one...? There is no need to retreat, then," she replied.

"Eh?" Tom couldn't understand what she meant.

"I shall not allow it to damage Quartierlatin any further. We are too close to the town. There might be casualties this time."

"Well, I get your point, but it's already falling down!" Tom was already making seven of himself retreat, and the fin was falling faster by the second.

Just like the first one, it was going to reach speeds of seven times greater than the speed of sound.

"If it is only a little bit faster than me... then I can match it," Altimia declared as she stood where it would fall.

Her claim was based on not just her AGI, but on her kinetic vision, as well. That was what had allowed her to keep an eye on Tom while he was moving at supersonic speeds and she herself was only half as fast.

She correctly calculated the moment the fin would reach the ground, and...

"Cut."

...with a skill bearing a basic name, swung her azure blade on it.

It was hard to describe what happened next.

The gigantic fin, now split in two, gently descended to the ground.

There was none of the insane speed it had gained during its free fall through the vacuum.

"What did you just do...?" Tom asked, completely dumbfounded.

"I just cut its kinetic energy."

She said it like it was nothing special, but that definitely wasn't something you could cut.

However, Altar made it possible.

It was a blade that could sever matter, space, and even energy, regardless of whether the thing had a shape or not.

Tom knew that well, so the main source of his shock was the skill Altimia was demonstrating. She'd effectively cut through something that moved at seven times the speed of sound, while she herself was at five.

When fighting Ray during their first encounter, Altar had been dormant, and she'd been trying to incapacitate, rather than kill, him.

Now that she'd unleashed Altar's and the Sacred Princess's powers, she definitely had enough power to match many solo fighting-focused Superiors.

Altimia began to silently ponder that. There was no doubt that she had supreme power. Perhaps if she'd taken part in the war, she could've defeated Logan and protected her mentor, and maybe even saved her father from Franklin, too.

Even now, she was often tortured by regret at the fact that she hadn't stood at the front lines, despite being the kingdom's strongest tian.

However, what'd stopped her from taking part in the war were Eldor's own words.

One more thing, Altimia... I do not want to push people to fight just because they have the power to. And that's why, Altimia... you don't have to fight.

His words had been gentle and full of fatherly love, but as she was now, she would never nod to them. Though it was far too late, she'd developed a better answer.

"Father... you claimed that you didn't want me to fight merely because I had the power to. I am extremely grateful for your consideration, kindness, and love, but...”

She stopped to cut off more of Acra’s legs and armor and continued to talk to her late father.

“I have now decided, by myself, to join the Masters in battle.”

That was the path the current Altimia was choosing to take.

“I will not be the pacifist you wanted me to be, nor the same me who distanced Masters and tried to bear it all by myself.”

As she muttered that, the face of a certain Master came to her mind.

All Masters follow their own wills and choose how they’re gonna be. As a Master, I choose to protect you and Quartierlatin.

Those were the words Ray had told her yesterday. His choice was his and his alone, and born of nothing but his freedom.

Those words had left such an impression on her that she had gotten the urge to choose something herself.

“I shall stand with them at the front lines and resist all that menace the kingdom.”

Inspired by Ray, she took a step forward on her own path.

“Father, please watch over me from the heavens... and see where the battle I chose leads me.”

With those words, Altimia split Acra’s body in half and looked up at the sky.

The lights high above were proof that her comrade in arms was fighting, as well.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

The whale’s field was a strange space.

The moment we entered, I instantly became unable to see Quartierlatin. The increase in distance made it appear far away.

I was free falling down and accelerating towards the whale below.

Since there was no air, I didn’t feel any wind — the compressed air barrier protected me from it, but I felt no resistance behind it, either — and since there was nothing but sky around me, I had completely lost my sense of distance and was now left with no idea of how fast I was going. I was just falling through the cloudless sky — and I wasn't sure if it even qualified as that, considering it was a vacuum.

This would be the fourth time I'd fallen from the sky like this.

The first time was when my sister wheedled me into going skydiving in a South American jungle, I reflected.

The second time was when I first logged in to Dendro and Cheshire dropped me to Altea.

The third time was just a couple days ago, when I failed to reach Monochrome and had to go back down like I was falling.

This fall, however, was way more silent than any of those had been.

This descent through a soundless space felt more like drowning in the sea.

The light coming from the sky became distant as I continued this seemingly endless fall.

But then, something entered my vision.

"Here they come again! More lasers!" Nemesis exclaimed.

From a distance at which I still couldn't properly see it, the whale attacked us with dozens of laser rays. Most were consumed by the Black Warcoat covering Silver, but some that came from a different part of the whale grazed me.

As you'd expect, the whale had powerful anti-air defense. It was probably aware that attacks from above were its weakness. After all, if you could somehow bring something heavy above it, you could do the same thing to it as it was doing with its fins.

The lasers were there to prevent that.

If those lasers changed an object's trajectory even slightly, it would become a major difference mid-fall, and it would miss the whale.

Considering that that would make the object fall near the town instead, it wasn't really an option for us. The chances of hitting it were low to begin with, anyway.

However, things were different with us being the thing that was dropping towards it. My Monochrome could absorb the lasers, and Silver could move to make up for any slight changes in our fall trajectory or the whale's position.

"Those lasers also help us know where it is," Nemesis added to my thoughts.

“Yeah.”

Lasers went straight, so the whale could only be directly where they came from, and we simply had to fall in that direction.

I was actually beginning to see an insanely small dot in the distance, and I had no doubts that it was the whale.

However, I couldn’t attack it yet. If Shining Despair did what I expected it to, firing it from the top was out of the question, as it could damage the town, too.

I had to get to where I could see the whale clearly, and fire from its side or the bottom.

“But... can we survive long enough to get there?” she wondered.

“We’ll have to.”

I used the Black Warcoat to protect Silver, as his Wind Hoof protected us from the vacuum.

Naturally, for all the Monochrome surface area I dedicated to him, I had less of it to protect myself. I could block some of it using my Black Shield, but some still grazed me, sometimes going dangerously deep.

Also, though Monochrome’s Light Absorption dealt with the light, it couldn’t absorb all of the heat. The many lasers hitting us were slowly increasing our temperatures, and my skin already had signs of Burns and Scorches on it.

But we had already fallen about a third of the distance to the whale. There was no going back now, and I, praying that they didn’t land a critical hit, had no choice but to continue.

There was just one problem. As we drew closer to the whale, the whale gained better angles to attack us from.

“Ray?! Gh... There are more and more lasers I can’t protect you against!”

I silently gasped as another laser hit me.

If this keeps up... No! Not yet!

“We’ll reach it, no matter what!” I shouted.

Azurite has to be fighting that crab right now. I have no reason to give up!

“Ah...! Ray! There’s something above us!”

“Above?! But the whale’s below us!” I looked up, and what I saw shocked me. “That’s...!”

What was falling towards us was...

◇◇◇

Zero General, Gifted Barbaros

"If you're to take Emilio, maybe I should go, as well?" the voice in my memory said.

"Mina, you don't like using dragon carriages, do you?" another voice responded. "Not to mention that there's count work to be done."

I instantly understood that my life was flashing before my eyes. When on the verge of death, the brain projected the past into the hazy consciousness.

I'd been through this a number of times before. Once when the current The Ram was young and we'd fought a powerful UBM together, once when I'd fought other SMTF members during the imperator accession civil war, and that was just the tip of the iceberg.

Looking back at it, it was strange to reflect that I'd survived to thirty-one with so many deadly battles on my record.

"That's true, but... I'll ask again. It is safe, right?"

"Of course. We will come back in less than a month. I imagine I'll be missing your cookies dearly at that point."

During some of these near-death experiences, I often saw visions of the past. Most of them were of my youth in the Barbaros household, but what I was seeing this time was different.

"You want a cookie?"

"You can't. You're too young for cookies. You don't even have a full set of teeth yet."

The memory was too vague for me to remember how old I was. However, I could clearly see two people in it.

"Ha ha ha! Emilio, just wait a few months and you will have the teeth for them. Or maybe you'll be able to eat them by the time we come back from Dryfe. Who knows?"

One was a man reminiscent of my image in the mirror...

"Oh, then I'll have to work hard and welcome you with my best cookies yet."

And the other was a gentle-looking lady with a right eye much like his, and a beautiful green eye...

“Emilio...”

◇

“...ther...” The vision I saw on the verge of death vanished along with the strange sound that left my lips.

“I... I’m still alive, I see.” I quickly checked my window to assess my state and realized I had less than a tenth of my total HP left.

I also had the Bleeding and a number of Broken Bones status effects. If I’d continued drifting in that vision for just a few minutes more, I’d have been as good as dead.

Moving my broken arm, I reached into my inventory and took out a Potion, as well as drugs that increased regeneration and sped up the process at which injury-based debuffs vanished.

My HP stopped decreasing, and then began going up instead.

Waiting until I was sufficiently healed, I stayed collapsed on the ground, pondering something.

Specifically, why was I still alive.

I’d suffered lethal damage from just the shockwave alone. The Brooch and my SJ stats had kept me from dying instantly, but considering the situation and the height from which I’d fallen, it didn’t make sense that I was still alive.

“Was it the growth here?” I wondered out loud as I realized that I was lying on some plants in some garden.

It really didn’t seem like enough to soften my fall and keep me alive, though.

Thinking there had to be something else, I looked around and saw a tree so large that it left me speechless.

Some branches of this brilliantly verdant giant were broken as if something from high up in the sky had just fallen on it.

For some reason, though, lying down and looking up at it gave me some immense déjà vu.

I actually felt like I’d done this before. A very long time ago...

“Milady! You must take shelter within the mansion’s barrier!”

“I know... but I just heard something happen at his tree. I’ll only take a look. You take shelter and treat everyone's wounds."

"...!"

As I searched my memories, those voices reached my ears.

One of them was new to me, while the other made my heart shiver, for some reason.

Hearing them also made me realize where I was.

These were the gardens of the Quartierlatin Mansion.

I'd simply happened to fall here by chance.

With that in mind, it was easy to know whose voice that was.

"Good... I can still move," I muttered.

The healing had progressed enough, so I slowly got up from the plants I was lying on. As I stood tall, I heard someone behind me, but I couldn't let myself turn around.

"You are..." a voice said.

I couldn't face her. I was the Dryfean field marshal, and I'd already rejected the option to return to my mother in Quartierlatin.

Thus, I couldn't let myself meet her.

Even if I did, she'd probably treat me like any other trespasser.

I hadn't been here since I was an infant. A whole three decades had passed since then.

The only proof that I was her family, my heterochromia, had been taken away from me by Edelvalsa.

Right now, I was nothing more than an injured man who'd fallen into her garden. The countess would probably see me as a potential threat, and meeting her face-to-face would simply burden her.

After reaching that conclusion, I began dragging my feet towards the gate...

"Emilio?"

...but that word made me freeze.

"...How?" I whispered.

There was no way she could've known. She hadn't even seen my face. My height and build were nothing like when she'd last seen me.

The "me" she'd known was a harmless infant, not this man reeking of blood and gunpowder. How, then, could she speak that name upon seeing me?

"You... You are Emilio, aren't you?"

Silence.

Unable to confirm or deny that, I just stood in place and listened to her words.

"I don't know why, but I had a feeling I would see you soon," she said. "It started yesterday, I believe... I somehow felt like I did back when you and he were still with me."

I'd definitely visited this place yesterday, but how could that have been enough for her to realize who I was?

"Perhaps it was because of the young man's words, but I don't believe it was only that."

I was silent.

"I also met him in a dream last night. 'Emilio is coming home,' he said, still using that strange manner of speech."

That sounded a lot like something I would say when acting as Mario. Why had I decided to use that manner of speech, anyway?

"The town has been in a dreadful state since early morning," she continued. "And then this tree shook at a time like this, so I came out to take a look... and found you. You could say he arranged for us to meet."

Ah, so the "he" she was talking about was my real father.

Oh, I see... so that's why the tree looks so familiar, I thought.

It was the same one that I'd slept under when I was an infant. And it'd saved my life just now. This was definitely a strange day.

Strange things happened on strange days, so perhaps it was only natural that she would realize I was Emilio.

"Emilio... can you show me your face?" she requested.

In response...

"I can't..." I shook my head.

I was now Gifted Barbaros, the Dryfean field marshal.

I hadn't chosen to live as the kingdom's Emilio Quartierlatin, so that name wasn't mine.

Not only that, but I was a man who was willing to destroy Quartierlatin for the sake of the imperium.

Could a person like me face his mother? Certainly not. At least...

"...not at this time," I murmured.

Until this incident and all other issues between the kingdom and the imperium were settled, I had no right to face my mother.

"I understand," she said, accepting my selfish reply and not pressing any further. "I can feel that you are resolved. You have a reason for that, don't you?"

"I do."

"In that case... just finding out that you are alive... is more than enough for me," my mother said in a tearful voice.

Suppressing the urge to turn around, I gave her a promise. "I will... come again... someday." My own voice made me realize I was choking up, too, but I continued regardless. "I have a wife... and a daughter. We will all come visit you someday... no matter what..."

"I'll be waiting... Emilio."

"Yes... Please be in good health... until then," I said. And then I forced myself to begin walking.

"Take care, Emilio."

"I'm off."

With that promise, I left the Quarierlatin mansion.

Albeit barely, Faldreed was still working, so I looked through his eyes and saw the battle between the legged tank... and the first princess.

"Looks like they're engaged in battle now," I muttered.

It turned out that the masked woman really was her.

The disguise was so obvious that I'd actually thought it was a bluff or something. But she could wield Altar, so there was no way she could be anyone else.

I had no orders from the imperator this time. The princess was unrelated to my current mission.

After finding out what was happening on the surface, I looked up at the sky and saw Ray Starling, the Unbreakable slowly descending towards the airship. He was being barraged by lasers, but he was blocking them somehow.

"But he won't last," I muttered. I could tell he was close to his limit.

Just like the princess with her Altar on the surface, the Unbreakable probably had a way of dealing with the airship, too, but as things were, it didn't seem like he'd succeed.

"I don't have much MP and SP left... and I can't really tell what damage the fall did to my brain..." I examined my state. "Well, it won't be a problem."

I used Marionette Squadron Creation a few times in a row.

Many of the trees in town became flying marionettes.

They used a lot of my brain's calculative power even under the best circumstances, and I was making an awful lot of them, despite my condition.

"Gh..." My head rang out in pain, and my left eye socket, where I had Edelvalsa, began to bleed, but I didn't care.

If I didn't do anything, the Unbreakable would break, and the airship's fins would destroy Quartierlatin.

That would make the promise impossible to fulfill.

"Run at maximum capacity!" I ordered. "All units, support the Unbreakable!"

Thus, the hundred flying marionettes took to the sky to protect my promise to my mother, and to protect the possibility leading to the best future.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

What I saw were wooden marionettes with their arms spread like wings.

They were all falling directly down.

"Those are Dr. Mario's!"

I knew because they looked exactly like the one he'd been riding before the kinetic explosion.

Unlike us, who were free falling, they were basically diving through the vacuum, and ended up going ahead of us.

That made the whale's lasers focus on them instead of us, but no matter how many of them were shot down, they kept going forward.

One after the other, they went ahead and took the laser fire in my stead.

"This is..." I whispered.

"Are they opening a path for us?" asked Nemesis.

A path. That had to be it.

The countless marionettes were using themselves to shield me from the lasers and to give me an opening leading to the whale.

"Dr... Mario..."

As one marionette burned to protect me, I looked at its head.

At that moment, I felt like I heard the word “Go.”

This was a vacuum, and the marionette was silent. But I had no trouble understanding that he was urging me keep going forward.

There was only one thing for me to do at this point.

“Nemesis! Silver! Let’s do this!”

“Certainly!” she called.

“Gh...!” agreed Silver.

Chapter Ten: The Warped Hope and the Shining Despair

Vesta

"Enemy count: 158," Vesta said.

Vesta's excellent enemy detection ability let it know the exact number of enemies approaching it. Then it intercepted them all with its lasers, starting from the closest one.

It also knew that there were two kinds of enemies. The majority, which were the wooden marionettes, could be shot down with just one laser, while the weak, incarnation-like entity absorbed all the lasers and continued to fall.

Still launching lasers, Vesta's artificial intelligence processed the situation.

"Moving unit to evade the attackers."

"Denied. Moving any more would negatively affect the Mutual Repairs with Acra."

The Mutual Repair system installed in Acra-Vesta was the reason why Vesta constantly floated above Acra.

Most skills had their limits, and this one was no exception; it had a maximum range of about 300,000 metels. That was almost the exact distance between Acra and Vesta with Space Dilution active.

If either of them went beyond that, the repairs wouldn't work anymore.

At this point in time, Acra had lost most of its legs, rendering it almost immobile, which, in turn, made Vesta unable to move, too.

It was also worth mentioning that Acra could no longer be fixed due to the attacks from Altar, but Vesta was the core of the matter right now.

The machine was faced with a dilemma.

It could either evade the enemies and lose its repair ability, or...

"Analyzing enemies..."

"Measuring mass..."

Vesta's sensors looked for data they hadn't looked at before and quickly concluded that the incarnation and the marionettes were far lighter than the fins Vesta was dropping.

Vesta could quickly fix the damage from the impact they would deliver, so it concluded that they would use something other than kinetic bombing.

"No explosives or explosive magic detected."

That meant that this wasn't a kamikaze attack of some sort, making it likely that it was either a hijack or simply a close-range attack. Upon reaching that conclusion...

"Enacting countermeasure."

...it went for the kill.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

Using the opening created by Dr. Mario, we advanced towards the whale.

The lasers either hit the marionettes or were absorbed by Monochrome.

We single-mindedly accelerated to our target.

"It's only an estimated 40,000 metels away now!" Nemesis shouted, making it clear that we were at the home stretch now.

Silver started using the air around him to slowly break.

At the speed we were going, without breaking, we would pass the whale in the blink of an eye, not even giving me a chance to aim at it.

Monochrome's Shining Despair was fully charged, and all I had to do now was fire it. However, doing it from the top would endanger Quartierlatin, so I would have to fire at either its side or around a bottom area where there weren't many lasers.

We wouldn't have any problems reaching those spots. I'd found out just how good Silver was at descending in the Monochrome battle.

I was starting to feel pretty confident. "We're gonna make it..."

Suddenly, everything changed.

"Eh?" For a moment, I was completely lost about what just had happened.

Of course I was. After all, the whale, which had only been about as big as a pinky until now, had suddenly become a gigantic wall right in front of me.

"...!"

I quickly realized what had happened: It had canceled the field.

It had undone the field meant to protect it, instantly returning that vast distance between us back to normal.

The whale that had been off in the distance was now right in front of my eyes.

Though Silver had slowed us down, we were still going at the speed of sound.

In barely a moment, we would crash into the airship and quickly disintegrate.

The whale would sustain some damage, too, but it could easily fix itself.

It knew that our combined mass wasn't enough to completely destroy it, and that was why it had undone the field. That wouldn't cause much of a problem to it — it just had to activate it again after we crashed.

It had analyzed our and its own abilities and done the best possible move for the situation.

It felt like a proud demonstration of its abilities.

Time seemed to slow down as the impact was drawing closer, and we...

◇◆◇

19XX years ago

Deep within an underground shelter, a man silently glared at a set of blueprints.

Though now bordering on elderly, he was none other than Flagman.

The once-renowned apex of craftsmen from the era that would eventually be known as the pre-ancient civilization was now hiding within an underground shelter and designing weapons all by himself.

He'd been doing nothing but working on weapons ever since the invasion of the incarnations.

Even after all was lost, he had shut himself in a shelter specialized to be impossible to detect, eating only preserved foods of his own design and drinking only water while doing nothing but research, all day and night long, for the sole purpose of destroying the incarnations.

He'd already tried all the technology available while the pre-ancient civilization still existed. There were even some secret plants that had already begun automatically constructing the superweapons he’d designed.

However, he didn’t think it was enough, and there was no better judge of that than him.

He knew better than anyone that he needed to use newer technologies that had eluded even him so far. Otherwise, he wouldn’t stand a chance against those Infinite-class monsters.

Thus, he continued doing nothing but thinking of new weapons.

However, the look in his eyes made it clear just how drained he was.

The reason for this was his most recent failure.

Edelvalsa, the autonomous semi-bioweapon he’d created to defeat the Incarnation of Beasts, had unexpectedly fallen under the incarnations’ influence and changed completely.

Because of that, he’d had no choice but to seal Edelvalsa away and rework most of his planned weapons from the basics.

It felt like rebuilding a collapsed tower, and it was draining both mentally and physically.

It had even made him wonder if all his effort was meaningless. Remembering that made his hands shake, either due to fear or madness — it wasn’t clear.

He’d spent the last few decades doing nothing but thinking of weapons all by his lonesome. A normal person would’ve gone insane at this point, and perhaps he was already there.

“I need a change of pace...” he murmured.

Even that was something he hadn’t had in dozens of years.

He decided to design a unit as he desired. It didn’t even have to be a weapon. He simply wanted to invent something by letting his whims take charge — like he had back when he’d still had friends and companions.

That was when he discovered something in the warehouse.

“This is...”

It was a half-finished Prism Steed frame.

Having an excellent memory, Flagman instantly remembered why it wasn’t complete.

“Oh, it’s Thunder’s first frame.”

This was the original frame he’d started when he’d wanted to create a Prism Steed focused on the use of lightning.

However, during development, he'd realized that the material used for the frame was sub-optimal for the end result's planned abilities, so he'd restarted and built a new frame from a different material, eventually constructing the Prism Steed now known as Gold Thunder.

"Guess I'll try working with this," he murmured.

Leaving the base frame as it was and changing only its functions, he would let his creative freedom take charge and lead it to completion.

Thus, he began working on it.

"This material is good for wind... No, then it'd be the same as Jade Storm."

"Then I'll change my approach completely and try... this theory, maybe?"

"All I have so far is the torso... For the rest, instead of emulating some already-existing parts, I should use some new gimmicks..."

"Now this is interesting. Too bad I don't have Horse Riding or Riding. I'd need those to try it out."

While working on the frame, he made the exact same face he'd once made often — the face of a creative child proud of his work.

"All right. Done. But... what do I name it?"

Days and months passed, and Flagman eventually completed the Prism Steed. However, he couldn't find a name that would reflect its nature.

The Prism Steed that had wind as its power had been given the strong name of "Storm."

He didn't want to give that same name to a unit with different strengths and abilities, but he couldn't think of anything good.

"I'll breathe some outside air," he said one day, at last. "You come with me."

That morning, Flagman left the shelter for the first time in long while, taking the Prism Steed with him.

The atmosphere, the environment... everything was capable of sustaining human life, but the scenery had none of what he had created.

It was all nature, and no culture.

The civilization born with his intelligence as one of its pillars had crumbled and disappeared without a trace.

The genius silently looked at the scenery.

"Hm...?"

Suddenly, he felt the wind caress his side. The western wind, Zephyrus, was heading to the east.

He followed the invisible wind’s destination and saw a sunrise.

“Wind...”

Certain words came to his mind like a revelation.

“This unit is ‘Wind.’”

There was no need for exaggerated or strong names here.

“This is the wind that will, by its nature, blow towards the new dawn.”

This unit was designed in a way unlike any other, and the post-apocalyptic world reflected in his eyes was completely new to him. Thus, he decided to use a new, different naming system than he had used for any other Prism Steed.

This unit’s name was...

“Zephyrus Silver.”

Satisfied with the name, Flagman rubbed the mechanical steed’s face.

“Zephyrus Silver, I’m not giving you a mission.”

Flagman spoke to the final Prism Steed he’d ever created.

“Among all the things I have created, you’re probably the only one that’s free.”

Silver wasn’t just another weapon built to kill the incarnations — he was a manifestation of Flagman’s creative freedom, built simply because Flagman had wanted to do it.

“One day, when you get an owner... gallop through the world as you like,” he said. Surrounded by wind and nature, he pointed towards the sunrise. “Join your owner and walk through the wind as you see fit.”

◇◇◇

Over 1,900 years had passed since then.

The artificial intelligence installed in Silver remembered his creator’s words. And he realized... that now was the time to walk through the wind.

“■■■■■.”

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

We couldn’t comprehend what was suddenly happening.

“Wh...?!” I gasped in shock.

“What happened?” asked Nemesis.

I clearly remembered that we were about to crash into the whale and disintegrate.

However, that hadn’t happened.

In fact, we were actually below it now.

All the acceleration from before, the hull that was right in front of my eyes, the imminent impact — all of it was gone.

I had no idea why this was happening.

But I did know one thing: that there was no better time than now.

“NEMESIIIIIIIISSSSS!” I shouted.

“I know!” She instantly changed into her greatsword form.

I swung the black blade into the whale’s armor right above me, shouting, “VENGEANCE IS MINE!”

It doubled and sent back all the damage from the lasers — even that absorbed by Monochrome and Nemesis in shield form.

“Lower hull, lost,” Vesta reported.

The hit wasn’t enough to destroy it, but the armor’s disappearance left its mechanical insides — including the engines — exposed.

At this point, I didn’t know which part was responsible for the Mutual Repair function.

“...I see it!”

Right as the opening I’d created was beginning to repair itself, one of the engines inside lit up.

The timing of that engine’s activation gave it all away — it could only serve one purpose.

Thus, I now knew where to aim.

“MONOCHROOOOOOME!”

Following my shout, the Black Warcoat unwrapped itself from Silver and went to my left arm instead.

The material took on a pipe-like form and grew wings like the ones that had once decorated the Void of the Black Sky.

My left arm had become a jet-black, winged cannon.

This feature might perhaps have something to do with the fact that I’d gotten it when I didn’t have my left arm. And though it was my first time using it, the shape made me know exactly what I had to do.

"OAAAGHH!" I roared as I pointed the cannon at the whale right above me, then felt immense energy gather at the end of my left arm.

All the light gathered by Monochrome was becoming condensed, compressed, and turned into an extremely powerful, all-consuming light. It felt like there was a small star forming in my hand.

The overflowing light made the entire Black Warcoat gleam with blinding intensity.

"Ray! She took care of the one on the ground!"

Hearing Nemesis's voice, I glanced down and saw some blue trails tear up the mechanical crab.

I'd told Azurite that there would be an intense light right as I was about to defeat the whale, so that was surely her doing. She'd timed the defeat of the crab with the impending doom of the whale.

That meant we could destroy them both.

"Turning right. Aiming lasers." With its lower hull still broken, the whale began tilting to the side. I was in one of its blind spots, so it was probably trying to put me in range of one of its laser cannons and take me out.

However, it was too late.

Right before I fired, I silently pondered about what Dr. Mario had told me last night.

The pre-ancient civilization had fought the ancient civilization and been thoroughly defeated.

This whale had been left behind by the pre-ancient civilization.

This and the crab below... everything within the ruins had most likely been built to become someone's hope.

Someone from the dying pre-ancient civilization had created these to be the hope of future generations.

Or perhaps this was a remnant of the creator's vision that had never come true, no matter how hard he tried.

The weapon must've been intended for use in battle against enemies, fighting for the goal of protecting the people.

But now, this hope had become warped.

It was trying to destroy the descendants it was supposed to protect.

And since I couldn't tolerate that... I would launch this skill.

“SHINING...”

Oh. Now that I think about it, this name is painfully apt.

“...DESPAAAAAAAAAIIIRRRR!”

A shining despair to burn away the warped hope.

The cannon unleashed a light akin to the brilliance of a sun.

The pillar of light that’d once almost burned the entire village of Torne was now aimed for the heavens.

Releasing light and heat unmatched even by the UBM’s skill of a similar name, the pillar of light pierced through the whale’s insides, evaporating a number of engines, including the one responsible for the repairs.

Chapter Eleven: The End of a Hope

Acra-Vesta

The third anti-incarnation superweapon, Acra-Vesta, had spent 99.9 percent of its existence doing nothing but developing itself.

Following Flagman's ingenious blueprints, that development had continually imitated parts of the incarnation powers he'd analyzed.

Doing so was an extremely difficult task — even Space Fixation and Space Dilution had only been completed recently.

Like Zircon Leader, the supervisor unit of the facility, Acra-Vesta had spent most of the past two millennia doing nothing but preparing for the task.

Most of the past two millennia, but not all...

◆

It happened shortly after Acra-Vesta's core, the AI block, was completed.

One of the facility's founding technicians and his son, who had taken shelter with him in the living quarters, were looking at Acra-Vesta through the transparent window.

"Dad, is that the thing that will protect us?"

"It is. Acra-Vesta will save everyone."

"Really?"

"Yes. Acra-Vesta is our hope. It will beat the incarnations and save the world."

To protect humanity. To eliminate the incarnations. Acra-Vesta knew those purposes were at the core of its being. Those purposes were what made Acra-Vesta their hope.

"When that happens, will we get to see Mom again?"

"Sure... When the world is at peace again."

The technician patted the child's head, then took the boy's hand, and they left.

Acra-Vesta continued using its sensors to watch as the child used his free hand to wave at it.

The boy came to watch Acra-Vesta's creation a few more times after that. But eventually, an alarm resounded throughout the facility.

[Incarnation of beasts, approaching.]

[To ensure the secrecy of this facility, all personnel and their families must leave and go to another shelter as soon as possible.]

An incarnation had appeared.

Despite the proximity of the enemy it had been created to fight, Acra-Vesta couldn't even move. Only its AI was complete, after all, and creating the rest of itself would take entire millennia.

[Please make your way to the surface.]

[I hope you all see each other in the shelter.]

Upon hearing the message resounding through the facility, Acra-Vesta's AI began calculating the likelihood that they could cross the surface, which was still being menaced by the incarnations, and make their way to the nearest shelter.

The chances turned out to be extremely slim.

It didn't know why, but Acra-Vesta watched the evacuation through the facility's cameras.

One of them showed a familiar child hop on a vehicle alongside his father.

The boy was waving.

Perhaps it was his way of saying goodbye to his brief home, or maybe he was waving at someone the camera couldn't see.

The gesture could've been directed to anyone — even Acra-Vesta.

Whatever it was, the child left the facility... and never came back.

After that, Acra-Vesta did nothing but bring itself closer to completion.

At the present time, it was still far from complete, but it had developed itself enough to fight, which turned out to be necessary, given the reappearance of the incarnations.

Acra-Vesta prioritized the elimination of the incarnations over all else.

Of course it did; that was the very reason why Acra-Vesta had been created, and why it'd spent the past two millennia developing itself.

But why was it necessary to destroy the incarnations?

The reason for that was...

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

"It's over, huh?" I murmured.

The Shining Despair had left the whale badly damaged.

It had pierced through the middle of its frame and evaporated all the engines within.

As a result of the destruction, the tail fin started to fall to the surface.

I was scared for a moment, but then I realized that the field was no longer active. The tail fin was as large as a few trucks, but it wouldn't deal nearly as much damage as the meteor-fin had before.

That meant I only needed to worry about Azurite and Tom, who were fighting the crab on the surface right below us, but I looked and noticed that they'd already retreated.

The tail fin reached the ground in no time, and though the sound it made as it hit the remains of the crab was very loud, it definitely didn't leave a crater.

However, there was something strange.

"What's that?" I wondered.

The remains of the tail and crab released a burst of some powder. It looked either white or silver from here.

I worried that something big was happening again, but it just stopped after creating a small mountain of the stuff.

"That reminds me of the time Brother Bear broke an inventory," Nemesis commented.

Yeah, the one that was full of wheat flour, I nodded. I guess the inventories of the whale and crab broke. I have no idea what was inside, though.

"Ray, more importantly..." Nemesis began.

"Yeah, I know."

The crab on the surface had been sliced apart, while the whale's frame had lost most of its middle, as well as its tail fin. Despite that, it was still active.

"You don't break easily, do you?" I commented.

Above me was the front part of the whale, still floating.

In fact, it had continued floating even after Tom and Dr. Mario had damaged it way more than this. Perhaps it had been designed to continue its functions even through extreme destruction.

But... it was clearly at its limit.

The whale had lost its back half, and I couldn't see anything undamaged inside.

And most importantly, it couldn't repair itself anymore.

It was as good as dead.

"It isn't firing any lasers, either," added Nemesis, and she was right — the laser attacks had completely stopped after my firing of Shining Despair.

Did it lose its weapons system? Or does it just not have the energy to fire?

Whatever the case, the front part of the whale was nothing but a floating object now.

"Do we finish it off?" asked Nemesis.

We probably should, I thought in response.

However, Shining Despair's charge was back at 0, and we'd already spent the damage Nemesis had gathered on Vengeance.

And with the Miasmaflame Bracers being unusable, all I could really do was slash at it. It'd be great if it'd just fall down like its tail had, but...

"Can't hope for that, huh...?" I murmured.

The whale slowly began moving.

I didn't know where it was heading, but its direction was the same as before — the south.

What was different now was the fact that it had lost the crab following it below, and it couldn't use the field skill anymore.

It can't bomb Quartierlatin anymore, so... Huh?!

"Hold on!" I yelled in shock as I realized something. "It's slowly going down!"

The whale was heading to the south while lowering its altitude. It looked like a plane getting ready for an emergency landing in the middle of Quartierlatin.

It couldn't use its kinetic bombing anymore, but a huge whale falling into a town was bound to cause some serious damage.

"Kh!"

I made Silver move right before the whale and used what little MP I had remaining in Gouz-Maise to create a Wind Hoof barrier, but the whale broke through it like it was nothing.

"Then we have to bring it down right here!" Nemesis cried.

"We can't! It's already above inhabited areas!"

I didn't have any means of destroying it anymore, and bringing it down would cause major casualties. Which meant that...

"Ray!" she shouted.

Silver and I went below the whale and tried to push it upwards, which caused great strain on my back and Silver.

I'll keep it at least a bit higher... and make it fall outside of Quartierlatin...!

"That's ludicrous!" Nemesis yelled.

But I can't just sit by and watch!

Dr. Mario's marionettes joined me in my effort to prevent it from falling on the town, but even then, it only slowed the fall a bit.

The whale continued towards Quartierlatin, and its large frame quickly approached a building.

◆◆◆

Vesta

Even after suffering immense damage and losing Acra, its other half, Vesta didn't give up on eliminating the incarnations. It resumed going southward to do whatever it still could to further that cause.

However, it soon noticed the anomaly in its functions.

The propulsion engine it'd reactivated had been badly damaged, and running it for any longer would mean self-destruction.

Thus, it deactivated the engine and let inertia take over as it prepared for a landing.

It had lost a lot of important functions, but it could easily resume them after ceasing all operations and dedicating some time to repair itself.

Even without the integral Mutual Repair ability, Vesta, just like most of Flagman's weapons, could repair itself using a self-maintenance ability. The repair speed and quality would be far lower than that of Mutual Repair, but that wasn't a problem.

While Acra had no hope of recovering, Vesta could be completely restored in about a month or so.

Thus, to minimize the damage to itself, it decided to make an emergency landing in Quartierlatin.

The enemy from before was touching it, but Vesta didn't care, and simply continued going down.

After the emergency landing, it would have to prioritize repairing the lasers so that it could intercept any enemies coming near.

Admittedly the likelihood of it repairing itself completely was low, but even so, Vesta refused to give up on its base objective to eliminate the incarnations.

With a plan set, Vesta prepared for landing...

"Optical sensors captured new movement."

But then something came out from the building it was going to land on.

It was no incarnation, and its energy signals were minuscule. Even so, it was an entity that happened be caught by Vesta's optical sensors — a young child.

The child was curiously looking up at Vesta as it fell from the sky.

There were seconds until impact.

The child probably couldn't understand that he was in danger — he wasn't even crying. Instead, he just raised his hand and, as if Vesta was nothing but a big doggy to him, waved at it.

Upon seeing that familiar motion, Vesta's AI remembered something.

"Remaining propulsion engine, initiate at full capacity."

Vesta reactivated the engine it had stopped.

"Raising altitude."

Right as it was about to hit the ground, Vesta raised its front end and quickly regained height.

Unfortunately, making the near-broken propulsion engine work at full capacity accelerated its destruction.

"Engines disintegrating due to overload."

The destruction didn't stop at just the propulsion engine. The energy running through Vesta's circuits began burning its own insides, creating small explosions and short-outs.

"Discovered an energy counter-current. Risk of explosion."

At this rate, Vesta would be destroyed from the inside. Once that happened, there would be no room for any maintenance, and the machine would be destroyed for good.

"Continuing propulsion at full capacity."

Even so, Vesta didn't stop its engines.

"Total engine damage: 87 percent."

As it accelerated, Vesta's large frame began spewing large bursts of flame.

"Destruction: inevitable."

It was too late to stop the engines now. Vesta would break, no matter what.

"Moving away from town area. Minimizing casualties from self-destruction."

Not even that was enough to stop Vesta from running its engine and increasing altitude.

It was as if that were its very role.

"Reassessing base objectives."

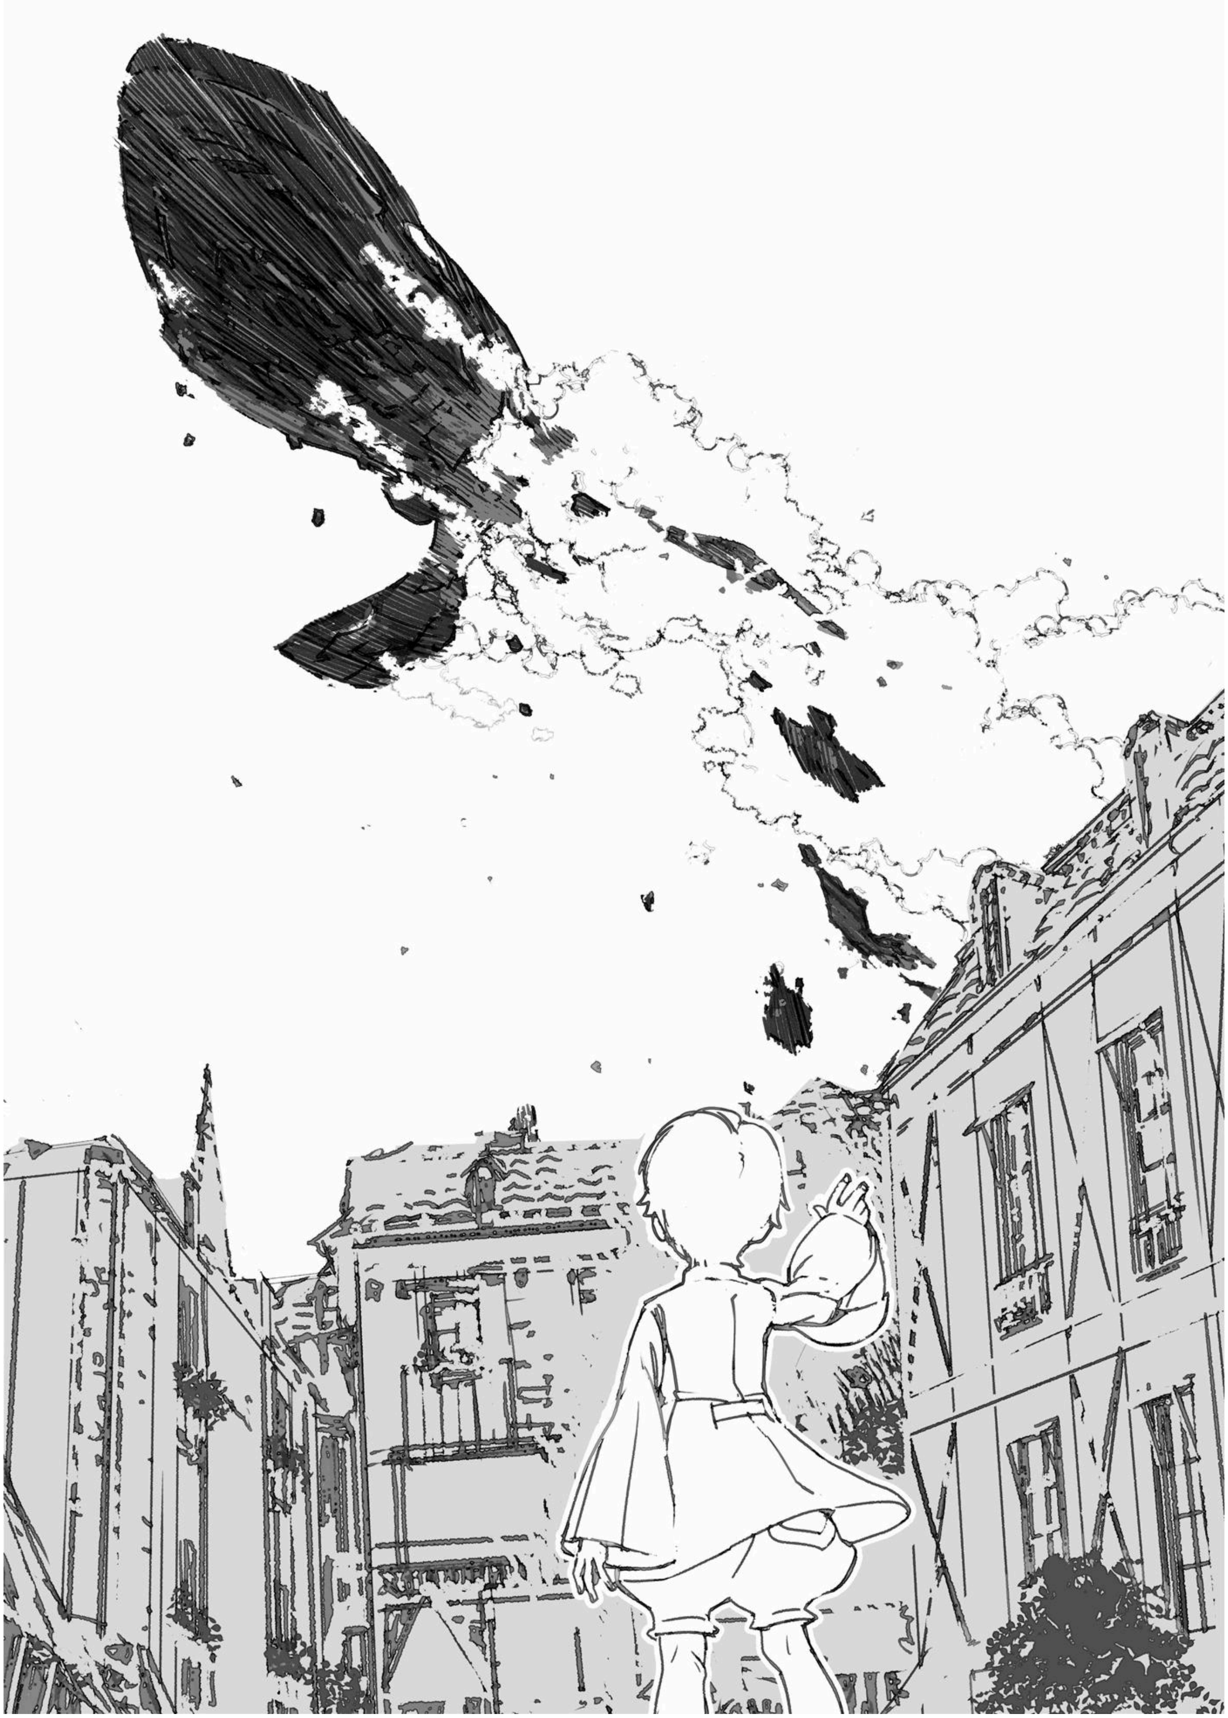
As it drew closer to the limit, Vesta began to question what it was doing. It took another look at its base objectives — the reason for its creation.

"Elimination of incarnations." That was its role as an anti-incarnation superweapon. The elimination of incarnations was the very reason Acra-Vesta had been created.

But why was it necessary to destroy the incarnations?

The reason for that was...

"To protect humani—"



◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

All of a sudden, the burden on my back became light.

I looked and noticed that the unit falling towards Quartierlatin was now rising once again.

As if mustering all of its final strength, it let out an engine sound akin to a whale’s cry and continued to move up.

It eventually left Quartierlatin and arrived at the sky above the mountain from which Logan and his devils came... and that was where it exploded.

The blast was strong enough to tear apart the whale’s large frame, and once it subsided, all that was left were small pieces of scrap, as well as an ash-like powder of a white or silver color.

The shockwave and the sound reached us a few seconds later.

That was the end of it.

The superweapon that had been sleeping in those ruins for two millennia had now entered eternal slumber.

It could no long respond to anything.

No one would ever know why it had gone out of control or raised its altitude at that very last moment. But...

“Ray?”

“What is it, Nemesis?”

“Why are you crying?”

Nemesis’s question made me realize that there was a tear going down my cheek.

“I’d like to know, too...” I murmured.

No one could know what its AI had been thinking.

However... I fully understood that it had spent its final moments protecting something.

Epilogue A: The Imperium

Zero General, Gifted Barbaros

“Ngh...?”

I woke up and realized that I’d lost consciousness. I couldn’t remember when, though. My memory seemed to be failing me.

Wait... My last memory before losing consciousness was the moment of the destruction of both Acra-Vesta machines, right before the moment the flying ship exploded.

That must have been the moment I’d passed out.

“Where am I?” I murmured.

At first, I thought I’d been caught by the kingdom, but that didn’t seem to be the case.

The light shaking around me made me realize that I was in a vehicle — a tank, apparently.

The continent was large, but the only country using Geists (the tank-type Magingears) was the imperium. Because of this, at first I assumed I’d been retrieved by the Barbaros tank division, but I soon realized that wasn’t the case.

The inside of this vehicle was nothing like that of the tanks I knew. It was far too large to be a Geist, so it had to be something entirely different.

If I have to guess...

“Ohh? Field Marshal. Ya up?” My thought was cut short. Someone replied to my drowsy question.

I looked and saw a man sitting at the control seat.

He was wearing an army uniform and had a cloak that made it seem like he was preparing to fight in the desert.

There was a cigarette in his mouth, and his unkempt beard seemed to purposely accentuate his jawline.

I knew this man.

“King of Chariots, Colonel Murdoch Martinez. Haven’t seen you in a month.”

“Yeh. Last time I saw ya was at the investiture.”

This was one of the Superiors newly hired by Dryfe.

During his hiring, he’d insisted that his payment would be accompanied by his receiving the rank of colonel in the imperium’s army.

Since we’d had an open seat among the military authorities, the imperator had suggested brigadier instead, but Murdoch had replied with, “Thanks, but nah, colonel’s cooler.” He was no doubt a strange man.

“Why are you here?” I asked.

“I’m on a mission. Not gonna hide it — I was told it didn’t look good for ya, so I got sent to pick ya up.”

“What?”

“Franklin reported that li’l Logan lost, so the imperator stepped up and gave me a direct order to pick ya up and take ya away from the heat ’cause yer important and all that. I’d say the kid didn’t wanna lose an uncle, but what do I know?”

“I see...”

That seemed possible. It was no surprise that Franklin would know what was happening in Quartierlatin, and this man here had the speed to get from Vandelheim to there in less than an hour; he had the fastest, strongest tanks in the world, after all.

I couldn’t feel it inside the vehicle, but we were probably going at breakneck speeds. We’d be Vandelheim in just a couple dozen minutes.

With a quick glance, I turned around to look behind me. I couldn’t see anything through the tank’s wall, of course, but I was sure that Quartierlatin was just behind it.

“What’s wrong? Oh yeah, I found your pricey-lookin’ doll. It’s inside.”

Oh, so he got Faldreed, too.

“Or did ya forget somethin’ else? Do I turn this thing around?”

Something I forgot? Well, I guess you could say that.

“It’s fine... I’ll go there myself eventually.”

Once it was all over, I’d visit Quartierlatin and take my family with me.

“Fine by me. Gotta say, the town’s a bit of a mess right now, but it’s a nice place. Really green. I’d love to visit it after it recovers.”

“I understand what you mean. However, you should keep in mind that they have a ban on public smoking.”

“Ha ha ha! I’ll remember that.” Murdoch’s cigarette shook as he laughed.

Imagining the moment I would return to the land where I was born, I also cracked a smile.

◆◆◆

Three days later, Vandelheim outskirts, Triangle of Wisdom Headquarters

Early morning of the third day after the incident in Quartierlatin, Hell General, Logan Goddhart, barged into the Triangle of Wisdom headquarters with greatsword in hand and demons at his side.

"FRANKLIN! WHERE IS HE?!"

The Hell General's face was warped in anger and hatred, and it was easy to see that he'd come here to get back at Franklin.

Needless to say, it was because the mad scientist had uploaded Logan's defeat at the hands of a low-rank to the internet.

Right now, Logan was like a gun with an itchy trigger finger on it. It wouldn't take much for him to sic the entire devil army upon the headquarters.

However, the Triangle of Wisdom members present didn't seem all that concerned about that. They only said things like, "Ah, it's His Excellency," or, "Guess his death penalty's over."

For some reason, they also looked extremely sleepy. It didn't seem like they'd just woke up; it was more like they'd been working on something all the way until dawn.

"BRING ME FRANKLIN!" Logan demanded.

"Oh, yeah... he told us to give this letter to you when you came." The tian in charge of the clan's official business handed it to him.

The letter contained only the words "I'm waiting for you here," accompanied by some coordinates.

It was basically a challenge text.

"YOU'RE ON!"

Still livid beyond words, Logan hopped on a devil's back and headed out to the given coordinates.

However, as he left, he suddenly noticed something.

What's this smell? he wondered for a second, but then shook it off, ignored the thought, and just took off to his destination: the Harshwinter Mountains.

"Hello!" called one clan member, logging in right as Logan left. "Whoa! This place is about thirty percent worse than normal!"

He saw lots of his clan members, all half dead from the all-nighter of work.

But then, it had to be noted that the clan's standards for normality were a bit warped.

"We've been doing lots of testing on this and that..."

"Ohh, you're making a new weapon? By the way, what's this weird smell? I feel like I'm net fishing near the sea."

It was a scent you wouldn't normally experience in Vandelheim, a landlocked city. It was a smell of pure sea water, and it was somehow permeating the entire Triangle of Wisdom.

One of the collapsed clan members pointed at a few large objects covered in barnacles and corals. "It's coming from that thing."

The silhouettes seemed like the limbs of a large reptile, but the azure color peeking out from beneath all the corals and barnacles made it clear that it wasn't of animal origin.

"What's that?" the clan member asked. "Where'd you get it?"

"The sea. Where else? Our leader salvaged it from the sea north of the continent."

"Eh? Didn't the imperium create a navy and start face-offs with Granvaloa...? I'm impressed he could go out into the sea."

That was month-old news in the imperium. Dryfe had started planning to expand to the sea, so they'd formed a navy and ended up sparking tensions between them and Granvaloa, who owned a lot of the world's oceans.

"It's the other way around. The leader wanted to salvage this thing, so he had the big-shots in the government create a papier-mache navy just for that."

"Eh...?"

"While Granvaloa was distracted by the navy, the leader went off with some aquatic monsters to take this thing."

"Whoaa..." The clan member was thoroughly impressed by the level and scale of this distraction. "What is that, anyway? It's all covered in barnacles and corals, so I really can’t tell...”

“A Prism Dragon.”

“...A what?” He knew the term full well. Just about anyone in the Triangle of Wisdom did.

That was the name of a weapon type that had been used by the pre-ancient civilization during their final years.

They were said to be on the same level as Mythical UBMs, and many doubted whether the things had ever actually existed.

“You know the data we found in the ruins where we got Her Highness Claudiah’s Jade Storm? There was info on the appropriate location where the pre-ancient civilization lost one of the Prism Dragons, Lapis Lazuli Decimation. The leader used that data to go and salvage it, and, well, succeeded.”

“Is this even usable?” the clan member asked.

“It was, apparently. It’s been underwater for two millennia, but it was about ninety percent functional. Well, he’s used it for parts, though, so it won’t work now.”

“Parts?”

“Yep. The limbs are all that’s left, and we can use them for research and whatever.”

Like he’d said, all that was left of Lapis Lazuli Decimation were the limbs.

It was as though everything else had been eaten...

◆◆◆

To the north of Dryfe and the rest of the continent, there was an area called “Harshwinter Mountains.”

It had a high altitude, thin air, and had awful temperatures below negative forty degrees Celsius. The area was made even more dangerous by all the monsters that lived here, many of which were stronger than the ones you’d find at the deeper levels of created dungeons.

This area didn’t belong to any country. Theoretically, you could use it to travel between the east and west, but the number of people who’d succeeded at that could be counted on both hands.

Even now, there was a violent blizzard here that seemed to reject all humanoid influence.

Standing on top of one mountain, there was a Master wearing a lab coat. He obviously had a cold resistance accessory on him, but he definitely looked unprepared for this harsh climate.

Still, this man named Franklin seemed to be in a good mood as he waited for something within the blizzard.

“Ah, my boy’s here,” he whispered as he saw countless silhouettes appear at the base of the mountain.

That was Logan and his army of devils — which had already lost some of its numbers due to the severe conditions.

Logan hollered, “Found you, Franklin! What was the meaning of that?!”

“Whatever do you mean? You’re gonna have to elaborate, Your Excellency,” Franklin responded with a slightly mocking tone.

“That video! Why’d you upload that?! Because of it, I...!”

Logan broke off, seething at the memory that the video had displayed only his battle against Ray, making it seem like he’d lost against a newbie 1v1.

None of that could have happened without Veldorbell having destroyed vast quantities of Logan’s army and breaking Logan’s Brooch, but there was no way for viewers to know that.

Because of this, most comments either praised Ray or ridiculed Logan.

Logan’s infamy as a duel champion who fought only by summoning his Mythical devil made him pretty unpopular, so he was like the heel in wrestling — someone who pleased the crowd when he lost.

Whatever the reason, Logan couldn’t handle being the subject of ridicule.

“I’ll be frank — I was just observing Ray Starling to see if I could find a weakness,” Franklin said casually. “I really didn’t expect to capture that pure, grade A goodness... Kheheheh.”

He wasn’t lying about that. Franklin had continued to observe Ray even after Logan’s defeat. He’d even recorded the fight against Acra-Vesta.

However, Franklin had only uploaded the battle with Logan, because of a purpose that would become obvious soon.

“You... damn...! You’d better be ready for this! I’m about to crush you over and over! Just like you once did to some insect!”

“Oh yeah, I did do that once,” Franklin said. “But you can’t really pull it off with me, can ya?”

“Shut up! Devils, attack!”

Upon hearing Logan’s order, the devils flew and closed in to Franklin to tear him apart.

There were even some of the Legendary-tier Gigaknights among them.

A non-combatant job like Franklin would surely die in less than a second.

“Nope. Can’t even have a proper test with these.”

However, the devils that were trying to kill Franklin all burst and died in the blink of an eye.

“...?!” Logan was speechless.

Missile-like objects had zoomed in from beyond the blizzard behind the mad scientist and blown up the devils approaching him.

Even Logan’s cherished Gigaknights had melted in a beam-like light.

“I see!” Logan shouted. “You prepared a monster here! You unfair frick!”

“Ha ha ha! I’m wondering why you didn’t expect something like this. Did ya seriously think I’d just stand here and die? That I wouldn’t place a monster or two to protect me? Please.”

There was something behind Franklin, densely veiled by the blizzard. Showing only its silhouette within the snow, the monster was making sounds that seemed to lie right between mechanical and animalistic.

“By the way, Your Excellency. About one of the reasons why I uploaded the video... Before getting yoinked outta the game, you’d already sacrificed your special reward, right?”

“What about it?!”

“You know what I’m getting at. You can summon the Mythical without sacrificing another one, right?”

That was correct. The points Logan had gotten from sacrificing a special reward were still there, even after the death penalty.

He’d failed to summon the Mythical in time against Ray, but he could do it now.

“You’re telling me to use a Mythical against you?!” Logan bellowed.

“Do it. Otherwise, you’ll be known as a scrublord who’s lost against both a newbie and a non-battle job. Just so you know, I’m filming this, too.”

“...! YOU’RE DEAD!!”

Logan went through the chant, ending in:

"CALL DEVIL ZERO EXCEED!"

He successfully summoned the Mythical devil. It was the strongest being under his command — the fearsome creature that had defeated the Celestial Knight, Langley, and brought him to the top of the duel rankings.

It had the appearance of a stereotypical devil — head of a goat, bat-like wings, and four thin legs. The most notable thing about its looks was its size, as it was a whole seventy metels tall.

All of its parameters greatly exceeded those of a Gigaknight, and all its stats except LUC were over 40,000.

It could even use spells that matched those of magic-based Superior Jobs, making it extremely versatile.

This was Zero Exceed, Logan's trump card.

"Boosted Devil Strength! Boosted Devil Endurance! Boosted Devil Agilityyyy!"

Logan buffed the devil even more, raising its STR, END, and AGI all to over 120,000.

"Behold! This is me at my strongest! I only lost against that weakling because I was caught off-guard! I'M STILL THE STRONGEST!"

"'Strongest'? But, dude..."

Franklin made a grin that seemed both wry and full of ridicule. His right eye shone blue as he ran his Analyzing Eye of Wisdom. He'd already finished analyzing Zero Exceed and knew its stats clearly. So he gave his extremely frank opinion.

"Those stats don't even reach Behemot's. It's weaker than the King of Beasts, kiddo."

"...KILL HIM!" The words enraged Logan, and he set his trusted Zero Exceed on Franklin.

The Mythical devil's speed was twelve times the speed of sound, and it wasn't something a non-combatant job like Franklin could keep up with.

Even if Franklin had a Brooch and could transfer his damage to his monsters using Life Link, he'd get the death penalty in the blink of an eye.

That would be the natural outcome.

However, Zero Exceed's attack charge was stopped by a different gigantic creature.

"AGI's lookin' good," Franklin commented.

“...?!”

Logan couldn’t see it in its entirety. This was because of the raging blizzard... and also because it was even larger than Zero Exceed.

What he could see was that the creature had a strange, lapis lazuli-colored head reminiscent of dragons.

The dinosaur... or kaiju... was a monster that seemed to be made of machinery.

“Wh-What is that...?” Logan sputtered.

There were two feelings swirling around within him: confusion because he didn’t know what it was, and fear at the fact that it could match his enhanced Mythical devil.

“This is my MGD. The Mechanic God Dylan,” Franklin replied with a smile. “He’s my masterpiece. I completed him recently. The only problem I’ve found with him so far is that he’s so perfect that it’s hard to find a good enemy to test him on.”

“...?”

“I’d originally designed him to be an anti-SUBM and anti-King of Beasts weapon, so half-assed test subjects just aren’t good enough.”

“...! Wait. You...!”

Logan finally realized why Franklin had uploaded that video, why he’d said that Logan’s ability to summon Zero Exceed was one of the reasons, and why he’d provoked him to summon it. It was all so that Franklin could use Logan’s Zero Exceed as a test subject.

“It’s a secret weapon, so I can’t use him in those duels you love so much,” Franklin said pleasantly. “Man, you lost at the perfect time. It made it easy for me to resolve to use it, y’know?”

Those words felt both needlessly provocative and completely honest.

“I’ve gotta be as sure as can be about this. Ray Starling always exceeds my expectations. To crush him for sure, I need it to be at least powerful enough to beat an enhanced Mythical devil.”

Franklin’s words made Logan lose his.

It sounded as though Logan, a Superior, was just a test for Franklin to prepare to beat a newbie.

In fact, that was exactly what the mad scientist thought, and it made Logan boil with fury unlike any he’d had before.

“Don’t look down on me, Franklin!” Logan screamed. “I’ll tear apart that pile of scrap and make you regret ever making light of me! My Zero Exceed is above that pile of crap!"

Fired up, Logan ordered Zero Exceed to destroy the MGD, making the two monsters clash.

Watching over the battle, Franklin cracked a faint smile. "Well... they do have similar stats."

He spoke quietly, and Logan couldn't hear him over the blizzard and sounds of battle in any case.

"But that doesn't really matter here," Franklin murmured.

Those words were the very reason why the outcome of this battle was obvious before it even began.

Thirty minutes later, a single monster went down the Harshwinter Mountains, carrying its owner.

The creature with the lapis lazuli-colored head had lost its right arm. But that was the extent of it. It hadn't taken a single fatal injury during the entire battle.

Zero Exceed, on the other hand, had become particles of light and disappeared into the Harshwinter blizzard along with its owner.

Logan had witnessed his strongest creature be crushed right before his eyes, and then received the death penalty.

The battlefield had left the scar on the land — a giant hole in the mountain. It was akin to a grave.

Despite the lost right arm, Franklin was very satisfied with the MGD's performance.

"Even the loud brat can be useful sometimes, huh?" he said fondly. "I even got to test the Decimation Cannon."

He was especially happy to know that the two-millennia-old weapon he'd taken from Lapis Lazuli Decimation worked like a charm.

"The lost arm means there's room for improvement, though. I'll have to finish it up before the war. What's important is that it can win an equal battle."

Franklin began planning modifications, picturing the enhanced MGD completely crushing Ray.

The thought brought a smile to his face.

Epilogue B: The Kingdom

About Altimia

Ever since the war, Altimia had spent her days cornering herself.

After starting to run the kingdom in her father's stead, she'd also started losing herself in her harsh training as the Sacred Princess.

Whenever there was trouble, she'd hide her identity and go solve it herself.

Perhaps it was her way of atoning.

Though her father had been partially at fault for stopping her, she — despite being the kingdom's strongest tian — hadn't joined the battle for the kingdom, and that had led to the loss of many of her people, as well as her own loved ones.

She couldn't forgive herself for that.

She believed that things might've gone differently if she'd gone against her father's wishes and headed out to battle.

Thus, she wanted to stand at the forefront next time, protecting everything she'd failed to protect last time.

Azurite wanted to safeguard the country, its people, and her loved ones.

She wished to be like the first king, Azurite, the origin of the Altar bloodline.

That was why she used that name whenever she hid her identity. It was one of her names, and it represented what she wanted to be.

About a month ago, something major had happened in Gideon.

The infamous Franklin's Game.

Gideon, the place where her sister was, had been terrorized by Franklin, the man who'd killed their father.

It had happened right when Altimia was afflicted by an Epidemic.

Upon seeing the broadcast Franklin was projecting over the capital, she had found out what awful things were happening in Gideon and that her little sister had been kidnapped.

Azurite had instantly tried to hurry over there to save Elizabeth and to fulfill her duty as one who was supposed to protect the country from those menacing it.

However, the illness had made it impossible, and the retainers surrounding her bed had urged her to reconsider, so she'd stayed.

Overcome by despair, she'd cried over and over.

"Why can't I ever be there?! Why can I only watch as I lose my loved ones? I..."

If Gideon had been destroyed, if something had happened to her sister, the despair would've surely haunted her for the rest of her life.

However, there was someone who'd shattered her despair.

A Master.

A Master challenging a monster many times more powerful than him, one that had even been designed to beat him.

All ragged and torn, he had continued fighting the seemingly hopeless battle... and actually emerged victorious.

He'd put himself forward and erased the despair that was going to overcome Gideon.

Azurite could clearly remember him raising his right arm.

That was the moment when her distrust for Masters had started to warm into an equivalent trust for them... and the moment when a certain Master had left a mark on her heart and mind.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

With the whale's explosion, all the battles in Quartierlatin ended.

Once it was all over, I realized that the only surviving Masters were me, Tom, and the few that had helped the people find safety.

Some tians had been lost. The Hell General's devils had killed both knights and civilians alike.

It was tragic, but it wasn't like we hadn't gained anything here.

I was pretty certain that all the factions involved here had lost something.

That was probably why I felt less "victorious" and more "glad that this was over."

If there was one thing I'd gained here, though...

"These, huh?"

There were ten palm-sized inventories before me. I'd picked these up in the huge load of silverish, whitish powder I'd found in the mountain where the whale had exploded.

These inventories seemed to have a lot more space than the bag-like inventory I always used.

Looking inside, I found that they were full of the powder. Checking out the powder, the window only gave me the description of "Metal Particles."

I really need to consider getting Identify...

"For now, simply take the inventories," said Nemesis. "You can ask Brother Bear, Marie, or B3 about the powder."

"Yeah."

They were knowledgeable enough to know something about it, surely.

This made me realize how clueless I was about Dendro compared to a good chunk of my acquaintances.

"Ray." My thought was cut short by Azurite.

After the battle, she'd gone to visit Countess Quartierlatin, and now she was back.

"How was it?" I asked.

"Well, besides the fact that Tom Cat is gone, we don't have any problems."

"Tom's gone?" I really doubted that he'd gotten the death penalty. Had he logged off for some urgent business or something?

"Both the countess and the people from the inn we stayed at are unharmed."

"They are?"

Good to know, I reflected, and then remembered somebody else.

"Wait... What about Dr. Mario?"

"I haven't seen him, either. With the troubles here over, I imagine he's returned to the imperium."

I wanted to thank him for his help fighting the whale, but it looked like I'd have to save it for later.

"By the way, Azurite, should you really be walking around with your face exposed?" I asked.

She wasn't wearing her mask right now. Azurite was talking to me, out here in public, with her beautiful face out in the open. This meant all the passersby were staring at her.

“Ray... there is something I’ve wanted to tell you,” she said.

“There is?”

Oh yeah, she’d almost said something before the whale and crab appeared. Was it that?

“Listen, Ray... My real name...” She looked at me with a serious face before gathering her resolve and continuing. “...is Altimia Azurite Altar. That is who I am.”

“Oh, so your first name’s ‘Altimia.’” This was the first time I’d heard her full name.

“...That’s it?” She looked dumbfounded.

“Well, I didn’t realize ‘Azurite’ was your middle name.”

Of course, a middle name meant that she had to be a big deal in the nobility. She had mentioned that she had Quartierlatin blood, after all.

Wait, hold on... She said her family name is “Altar...”

“Are you related to the royal family?” I asked.

Azurite stared at me with an indefinable expression. I couldn’t tell if she was surprised, angry, or just at a loss for words.

“Ray...” Nemesis joined the exchange. “Isn’t ‘Altimia’ the name of the first princess?”

“Ohh... So she has the same name as her, huh?”

“It’s not just the name. She might be the real thing, don’t you think?”

Ha ha ha! Don’t be silly, Nemesis.

“A princess would never wear that shady-looking mask,” I said. “Say whatever you want about everything else, the mask nullifies it all... Huh? Azurite? Why’re you raising the sword?”

The next moment, Azurite hit me with the dull side of the azure sword.

BHPH!

“Realize it already!” she shouted. “You were so perceptive during the exploration and battle! What happened to that?! Do you have any idea how hard it was for me to reveal this?!”

She half-cried, half-laughed as she bashed me from a fair distance away.

What did I do to deserve this?!

“It’s me! The first princess! The masked princess! The Sacred Princess! Altimia! So what if my mask makes me look shady?! I’ll say it again — I don’t want you to talk to me about fashion sense!”

That was enough for me to finally understand that she really was the first princess.

"Sorry for what I said about the mask," I said.

"You should be!"

"Can I ask one thing, though?"

"...What?" She looked at me like she was sure I was about to ask something about her mask.

That wasn't the case, though. It was much simpler than that.

"Azurite... what should I call you?"

"Eh?"

"You're the first princess, you know? Should I call you 'princess,' like I do Elizabeth, or 'Your Highness,' or something?"

After a brief moment of surprise, she sputtered a laugh. "Call me Al... no... 'Azurite' is fine. You don't have to use any titles in non-official scenarios."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. Call me that."

"All right. I've got another question now."

"What is it?" She looked at me curiously.

I extended my hand to her and asked, "Azurite... Can I cooperate with you?"

"Ah..."

On the night of our first day here, I'd told her that I'd appreciate it if she'd accepted any Masters who wanted to help. This was just a repeat of that.

A Master was presenting the first princess of the kingdom with the same question as before.

So this was less of a question and more of a request for an answer.

With my hand still extended, I waited for her to make her choice.

"Back then..." She closed her eyes and seemed to be remembering something as she began talking. "When we fought the weapons that came out to the surface, I defeated the one on the ground, while you bested the one in the sky."

"Yeah."

"But I'm certain that you couldn't have beaten the one on the ground, and I couldn't have touched the one in the sky."

“That’s true.”

“I can stand on the front lines, but there are things I can’t protect by myself. However...” She smiled. “I believe there are things I can protect if I stand side-by-side with you... with Masters.”

She extended her right hand.

“I’ll be counting on you, Ray.”

“Yeah. Let’s get along, Azurite.”

We shook hands.

◇◇◇

A week after the incident in Quartierlatin, the first princess made a kingdom-wide announcement.

She said that was seeking the Masters’ help in the many challenges the kingdom would face, including the war with the imperium.

Some were confused about what had caused this change of policy, but in the end, both tians and Masters alike accepted it.

Though the specific measures weren’t happening yet, a gale of hope swept throughout the kingdom.

Epilogue C: The Ancient Ones

???

"Gurmalkin?"

"It's 'Grimalkin,' Master."

"Grewmalkin?"

"Grimalkin."

"It's so haaard..."

"Then call me whatever you want."

"Can I?"

"I just hatched, but I am your Embryo."

"Then... Tom!"

"...Now that one is really simple."

"I think it's cute."

"Isn't it a bit too... normal?"

"It's fine! Tom is Tom now!"

◇◆

Cheshire woke up.

"A dream, huh?"

A side effect after using his real body was a cooldown period which caused him to experience something similar to human drowsiness.

Right now, Cheshire wasn't in the dream, but in a work space that he'd grown tired of seeing a long time ago.

"It's been so long, yet I remember so clearly."

He heaved a sigh.

Cheshire had many names.

His official title was "Infinite Multiplication, Grimalkin."

His name as a control AI was "Cheshire," and like the others, based on a character from Alice in Wonderland.

His name as the third major force that had fought to prevent the ultimate battle between the King of Kings and the Draconic Emperor two generations ago was "Schrödinger Cat."

Besides those, he also had fake names like "Stray Cat" and "Wild Cat."

However, the name "Tom" was especially important to him.

It was just an alias, but he'd received it from his Master.

Out of sentimentality, he'd chosen that name for his identity as the developer-side Master at the top of the kingdom's duel rankings.

"I'll go take a look," he murmured to himself.

He left his work space and went somewhere else.

He was currently in control AI territory... the place that the pre-ancient civilization had given the apt — but not completely right — name of "Extra-Continental Vessel."

Cheshire moved before the door leading to its deepest part and stopped.

The door before him was like a bulkhead door to a nuclear shelter, except more complex and a whole lot larger.

Though he was already in a space that only a control AI could enter, this place was even more secure than anything else here. It seemed to reflect its solemness.

It was protected by the Red King — who could control space — and the Rabbit — who could control time. With multiple Infinite Embryos guarding it, no one had any hope of going inside.

Thus, even Cheshire had to request that the supervisor let him through.

"Number 0, can you let me in for a moment?" he asked.

"Access granted." He instantly got approval. The voice was the same as the one that had responded to Cheshire's request to use his real body in the ruins.

Soon, the complex mechanisms slotted out of place as the bulkhead slid and opened up.

Cheshire slightly nodded and went inside.

He looked around silently.

It's the same, he thought. Of course it wouldn't change.

He was looking at a certain object.

It was a large, star-like sphere orbited by thirteen other bright, planet-like spheres.

No, that wasn't entirely right.

The central sphere was surrounded by thirteen spheres that shone, as well as one that emitted no light.

"How long will it be until that one lights up?"

His whisper was full of several complex emotions.

He'd spent too much time on this to be able to put those emotions into words.

Of course, it was absolutely certain that the time it would take for the last one to light up would be nothing compared to the time he'd spent waiting and working.

"We're at over half already... so even at the longest, it won't be more than five years."

Thinking about what he... no, they... were waiting for, he heaved another sigh.

"I hope it's someone I see as worthy... No."

He slowly shook his head and turned around.

"Maybe it will be the same, no matter who it is."

With those incomprehensible words as his last, Cheshire left the room.

Even after he left, the fourteen spheres continued to orbit the large one in the middle.

◆◆◆

Ruins, living quarters, great hall.

The ruins at Quartierlatin were being investigated by the kingdom and the Masters they'd hired.

However, the ruins seemed to be focused mostly on the material storage and the research and production plant. To them, the living quarters were secondary, if not tertiary.

Thus, the great hall Ray had visited on his second day in Quartierlatin was completely empty right now.

Some investigators had come here, but all they'd done was take pictures of the painting, like Ray had, and gather all the scattered Prism Soldier parts.

The piece of art on the wall had been slightly burned by the lasers used in the battle against Tom Cat.

The burns had mixed with the colors of the artwork, and it looked they had been that way from the start.

If you strained your eyes, you could see some text there.

Unlike most of the writing on the piece of art, it was written by hand, rather than burned into it, so the burns made it especially hard to notice.

It said, “With a prayer for restoration, I lay hope to sleep in this mountain.” Those words were accompanied by a name.

It was the signature of the one who’d written it, the man in charge of the facility — the great craftsman Flagman himself.

This facility had many things with his name on it, so it wasn’t special in that regard.

However, this one was a bit different than the others.

While his title on most of them was “great craftsman” or something similar, this one had his role — his job.

It wasn’t known why this artwork alone had his job on it, but Flagman’s job was considered to be one of the mysteries of the pre-ancient civilization, and it was solved right here.

The small text next to his name said just two simple words:

Arch Sage.

To Be Continued in the Next Episode

Afterword

Cat: “Time for the afterwooord! I’m the ‘Cat,’ Cheshire! I haven’t been here in a while!”

Xun: “I’m XunyU, and I’m surprisEd this guy cAn come here after that mAin story.”

Fox: “I was wondering how to talk with him around, but it looks like I didn’t have to worry. Oh, and I’m the ‘Fox,’ Tsukuyo Fuso.”

Bear: “Well, the af-ter-word is a law-less waste-land, af-ter all.”

Xun: “Hm?”

Bear: “I am the ‘Bear,’ Shu Star-ling. I have not been here fur a long time, al-so.”

Fox: “I know that, but... why are you talking all stiff?”

Cat: “Yeah, and why is your suit all metallic?”

Xun: “Yeah, you’re likE a mech rIght now. Or just an animAted hunk of scrAp, really... Wait.”

Bear: “Yes. Pre-cise-ly. I am now... an-i-ma-ted.”

Cat: “Are you about to...?”

Bear: “PREBEAR YOURSELVES, FOR THE DENDRO ANIME IS HEADING INTO YOUR TV SCREENS!”

Xun: “He actUally did it... He stOle the announcEment!”

Cat: “With a crappy pun and set-up, tooo.”

Fox: “He said this place is lawless, but there are limits, right?”

Bear: “Mecha suit off! Back to the one I bear-long in!”

Fox: “Oh, so it really was a suit.”

Bear: “Yep. And just so you know, that announcement was something the author’s always wanted to do.”

Xun: “It wAs?”

Bear: “There are things that can only be said once in a lifetime. It’s basically like shouting ‘WOO HOO!’ at the beary top of the mountain.”

Xun: “It doesn’t seEm like that at all...”

Cat: “Anyway, yeah, we’ll have an anime noow. You can read more about it laterrr!”

Xun: “As in... whEn?”

Cat: “Thanks to how many pages we got for this volume, we have a much bigger afterword this time. That’s why we dedicated more space for the author’s own words.”

Xun: “So that’s whAt the ‘Afterword (Characters)’ is about, hUh?”

Bear: “We got a double afterword to cele-bear-ate the anime. You just can’t beat us!”

Fox: “Is that really the right thing to dedicate more pages to?”

Cat: “Volume 9 was really looong...”

Bear: “And had more battles than any other...”

Cat: “But there will be a 180 from the other ones, since it will be pretty peaceful for Ray.”

Xun: “Really? A relaxed Dendro volume? That’s rare.”

Cat: “You’re getting it wronnng.”

Xun: “Hm?”

Cat: “It’s only peaceful for Ray and everyone around him.”

Xun: “...Suddenly, the volUme sounds the oppOsite of relaxed.”

Cat: “Anyway, I guess it’s time to announce it. I worked hard in the main story, and I haven’t done this in a while, so I will be the one to...”

???: “I am a bad ■■■■■. Therefore, I am stealing this announcement... Volume 10 is set to come out mid-2019!”

Cat: “Wh-What...?”

Bear: “He slipped in here fur-om the next volume!”

Fox: (This is sooo familiar.)

???: “Now, let us meet again on volume 10.”

Xun: “Huh? The afterword’s gettin’ even more characters?”

Dearest readers, thank you for purchasing my work. I am the author, Kaido Sakon.

As you may already know from the cover and the earlier afterword, Infinite Dendrogram is getting a TV anime.

Having your work adapted into an anime is an important milestone for all light novel authors, and I couldn't be more overjoyed that Infinite Dendrogram and I have made it this far.

This certainly couldn't have been done without support from all of you.

When the first volumes were coming out, I was always worried about the possibility of cancellation. It's an industry with hundreds of books coming out every month, after all. Not all can survive, and it wasn't unlikely that my work wouldn't make it.

However, with all of your support, Dendro has made it this far, and I couldn't be more thankful for that.

Since I have about eight more pages for the afterword, and since it's a good opportunity in general, I would like to look back at and tell you more about how things were during and after publication. Consider it a post-volume mini-essay extra, of sorts.

The first volume of Dendro was released in the year 2016. Around the release, there was a marvelous event titled "The Great Dendro Festival," in which many artists made art to help spread the word and support Dendro (you can still find this art on the series' official website.)

As you certainly know, the one hired to work on the illustrations for these novels was Taiki, and his art is simply out of this world. Then, at the end of the Great Dendro Festival, it was revealed that Kami Imai himself would provide my work with the best manga adaptation imaginable.

To be honest, I was being a bit too optimistic back then. At the very least, I probably thought that stability was guaranteed. But then I looked at the sales. They weren't bad at all, but personally, I was worried if they really matched the backing it was getting.

Did my work really live up the hype?

Did my novel really match the excellent conditions it was provided?

What if I still wasn't good enough?

What if it was canceled after the first volume?

A lot was bothering me back then, but after the editor, K, told me that the second volume sold about ninety percent of what the first did, those worries slightly relaxed.

I also realized that it was better to work than worry, so I simply took to improving the light novel releases, writing the exclusive short stories, and uploading new web novel parts.

That was when I was writing the extreme, tumultuous Gloria side story. Look forward to it in volume eleven!

That reminds me... At the end of 2016, I was talking to K by phone, and he said he would go around Comiket to say hi to the illustrators.

"Will there be Dendro doujins or something?" I asked.

"Light novels need anime adaptations to get those," he replied.

"Ohhh, right."

"Doesn't look like Dendro's getting one anytime soon."

"I know, I know..."

At this point in time, an anime was nowhere in sight.

New Year's passed, and it was now 2017.

This was a very great year for Infinite Dendrogram.

The sales of the currently released volumes kept steadily increasing, and then some big things happened.

First, Dendro won first place in BookWalker's New Light Novel Awards. Then it won third place overall, and second place for new entries in its category on the "This Light Novel is Amazing!" awards.

Thanks to these awards, Infinite Dendrogram became more popular than ever. The older volumes received reprints, while the newer ones were now selling enough for me to feel completely safe.

This was nothing if not fortuitous, and I am certain it couldn't have happened without support from both the readers and the publication team.

Thanks to this, at the end of this year, I was a lot more relaxed than the last.

That was when I got a call from K.

"Can you talk right now?" he asked, like he always did, before getting straight to the point and dropping this bombshell:

"We're getting an anime."

Talk about a surprise. I thought my heart was about to leap out of my chest.

Since 2017 had been such a good year for Dendro, I had mildly hoped that we would get one next year, and here it was coming before 2017 even ended. I felt like I'd teleported right next to it before I could even see it.

K likes such surprise attacks. He did this when he got Kami Imai on the manga, too. Heartstoppers like these can kill a man. It's in the word. If that ever happens, I hope it's after I've completed Dendro.

With that revelation, my relaxed end of the year became one of excitement and nervousness.

So came the year 2018.

If I had to sum it up in a couple words, it would be the "Year of Preparations."

Now, in addition to helping with the light novel, checking the manga, and putting out new web novel parts, I also had to work on the anime.

My first job was to provide name lists, character descriptions, key design features and other materials for them to work with.

My second job to check the scripts, pick and choose the most important dialogue lines, shorten the longer ones, and add any depictions I felt were necessary.

I recall being surprised by how quickly anime scripts are made. The script wasn't the only thing I was involved with — I also had a part in the art direction.

I remember looking at what they gave me and thinking things like, "So this is what noble mansions in Altea look like, huh?" It will probably influence how I depict the city in writing.

Everyone on the staff was putting a lot of effort into their work, and I really thought that Dendro as a whole was blessed with the best people.

Now, no anime is proper without voice actors. Since I myself am primarily an anime watcher, rather than a creator, I know next to nothing about this and just assumed that they would be picked by the experts.

That was when I got another call from K.

"We're holding auditions for the main cast. Come participate."

That was when I concluded that his calls could only ever be about two things: deadlines or bombshells. I feel like one day he'll go full zabaniyya on my heart.

And that's how I ended up being one of the judges in the auditions.

Upon seeing the list of people who'd participate, I went, "Eh?! There are so many big names...!" and my heart almost leapt out of my chest again.

There were two major auditions, and I took part in them both. In both cases, I took a bullet train to Tokyo first thing in the morning, and both auditions lasted until there were no more bullet trains to take me back. The schedule was harsh, but overall, I'm two hundred percent fulfilled and satisfied I was part of it.

I had to check live vocal performances in the auditions, then return home to re-check the voice recordings, as well as check the submissions from those who couldn't make it due to tight schedules. I was doing nothing but checking all day long, but it was a fun experience you don't get every day.

I also realized that different people read the same lines differently and with varying emotions. That is something I now consider when writing, and I appreciate that.

Also, I found out that picking the voice actors for monotone characters is actually really hard. I feel like I had the most difficulty judging auditions for Cyco (who's showing up again in the next volume, by the way).

In case you're wondering, the second in difficulty — though in a completely different way — was Babi.

The auditions passed, and at the point of writing this afterword, the main cast and Franklin have already been decided.

I am so happy with the casting that I've been excited about it nonstop since last year.

I don't know whether they're revealed yet, so I won't write them here, but I'm sure you, dear readers, will know what I mean when you see them.

By the way, one day after the auditions, K called me again.

"By the way, about the one doing the BGM..."

Yes, he attacked my heart even from that angle. That was how big of a shock it was. I feel like everything I'm writing about K has to do with surprises and my heart, but that's just how it is.

Anyway, those have been my days since the release of the first volume until now.

There are still lots of things I can't mention, but rest assured that the people involved in the anime are great. I can hardly wait for it myself.

Oh? What's this? Another call from K?

"Hey, about that deadline and the anime exclusives..."

HA HA HA. What a double punch.

Anyway, it seems like 2019 will be even busier than 2018 for me. But just like everyone involved with the anime is working so hard, I will also use my writing to make the most out of Dendro's once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

I thank you all for giving me the chance to go all-out, and I intend to continue doing my best.

Please continue supporting Infinite Dendrogram.

Sakon Kaidou

Bonus Short Stories

Covert?

WARNING: Contains spoilers. Please read after volume 9.

A certain day of a certain month, Royal Palace

A few days before the incident at Quartierlatin...

"This is a job for Azurite," declared the kingdom's first princess and acting ruler, Altimia Azurite Altar.

Those were her first words, upon hearing about the ruins that had shown up in Quartierlatin.

This was a declaration that she would hide her identity and go investigate it herself.

If she hadn't been alone in the room, the other person would surely have pointed out that using your actual first name wasn't smart if you wanted to hide your identity.

However, if she used a fake name, someone with a high level Truth Discernment skill would sense it, so just using her middle name was actually safer for covert action.

There was also the fact that Azurite was a fairly common name here in the kingdom. As the name of the first king, a man who'd risen from shepherd to sovereign, many commoners gave that name to their children in the hopes that they would be at least a bit as successful as he was.

Nobles, however, avoided using it due to respect for the royalty.

"If I take care of the necessary verdicts ahead of time, things should be able to run without me." Altimia checked all the relevant political affairs and confirmed that everything would be fine without her. "I also need some equipment."

Since she would be acting covertly, she obviously couldn't wear her regal clothing. Her best equipment, the highest quality forged dress armor, also wasn't an option. She needed something that wouldn't stand out in a city and came with decent stats, which led to her choosing light swordswoman clothing. It was a good quality product that wouldn't draw much attention to her.

However, that did nothing about her most prominent feature: her face.

Altimia believed that every single person in the kingdom would be able to recognize her by her visage.

Infinite Dendrogram was a primarily a fantasy, but it had both newspapers and cameras. There were photos of her face everywhere, and there was even a clan which doubled as her fan club.

Hiding her face was an absolute necessity.

"I guess I'll have to use this again," she muttered as she equipped a mask.

She'd prepared it for situations such as this, and it even had an anti-Reveal effect. However, the design was such that it only hid the upper half of the face, which made her look quite shady. Anyone who'd wear something like this anywhere except a masquerade would be considered suspicious.

"Perfect. No one will suspect a thing."

Sad as it was, the princess, lacking in worldly knowledge in some regards, had no clue regarding the odd nature of her appearance.

Thus, Altimia went on her covert(?) operation to investigate the ruins in Quartierlatin.

Soon afterwards, she met Ray Starling and was faced with a terrible situation where her appearance was seen as shady as his.

The End

The Lynx's Monetary Affairs

WARNING: Contains spoilers. Please read after volume 9.

A certain day of a certain month

"By the way, what do you think Tom spends his money on?" Bishmal, the seventh in the duel rankings, asked during a post-spar lunch meeting.

The other participants were Riser, the seventh in the rankings, as well

Ray and Nemesis.

It was common for duel rankers to eat something together after sparring. Others who tended to participate included Juliet, the fourth in the rankings; Chelsea, the eighth in the rankings; and even Figaro.

Ray wasn't in the rankings, but since he sparred a lot, he often ate with the rankers, too.

"Tom?" Ray repeated.

She was referring to The Lynx, Tom Cat. The ex-dueling champion who'd lost his throne to Figaro and gone on to defend the second spot with his fearsome cloning ability. He was a man of mystery.

"He's gotta have a lot of money, right?" Bishmal asked. "But I never actually see him spending it on anything."

Not only did Tom make impressive amounts of money from his dueling awards, he also ran a few revolutionary establishments in Gideon, such as the maid café. There was no doubt that he was rich, but no one ever saw him actually use his wealth.

"Munch munch... Isn't he just buying new equipment?" asked Nemesis.

"No... As far as I know, he hasn't changed his equipment even once," answered Riser, a true veteran player. "He never changes his equipment or the weapons wielded by his clones."

"You seem to know a lot about him."

"I was one of those who tried to surpass him and become the duel champion. I never won against him, though."

The top three in the rankings could only be challenged for their rank by those who were directly below them. To challenge Figaro, the current champion, you would have to defeat Tom, the second in the rankings, and take his place.

"Speaking of money, I once saw Tom enter a money exchange place," Ray said.

Everyone else was perplexed. "Money exchange?" they asked in unison.

In Dendro, where there was only a single currency, a money exchange business was simply a place where you would exchange your coins to make them easier to use. You could get hyper-expensive coins for big purchases, or cheaper coins for smaller ones.

They all wondered why Tom would go to such a place, finally coming to the conclusion that he must have been planning to buy something expensive.

“This is your first moneeyyy. Five silver coins worth a total of 5,000 liiir. An onigiri costs about 10 lir, by the waaayyy.”

In a study-like area, which was the character creation space, a white cat was handing a new player some money while giving him an explanation.

The white cat was Cheshire — one of the control AIs, and the true form of Tom Cat.

He was giving the new player five silver coins. It was the amount that each and every player received, and all of the money came from Cheshire’s work as Tom Cat.

It was his own earnings that he exchanged into mere silver coins.

Control AIs could simply create the money, but they preferred to reuse the money already in circulation to prevent a collapse of Dendro’s economy.

Speaking of control AIs and money, Mad Hatter — the item control AI — earned more than Cheshire purely due to his gacha machines, but all of that money was moved to drops and created dungeon treasure chests.

While Dendro’s control AIs may have been operating the most immersive and realistic VRMMO experience around, it was important to note that they also partook in simple moneymaking activities.

The End

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 10 of this series, coming soon!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 9
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2019 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2019 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2019 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2019 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: June 2019

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
10. After the Storm, and Before the Storm

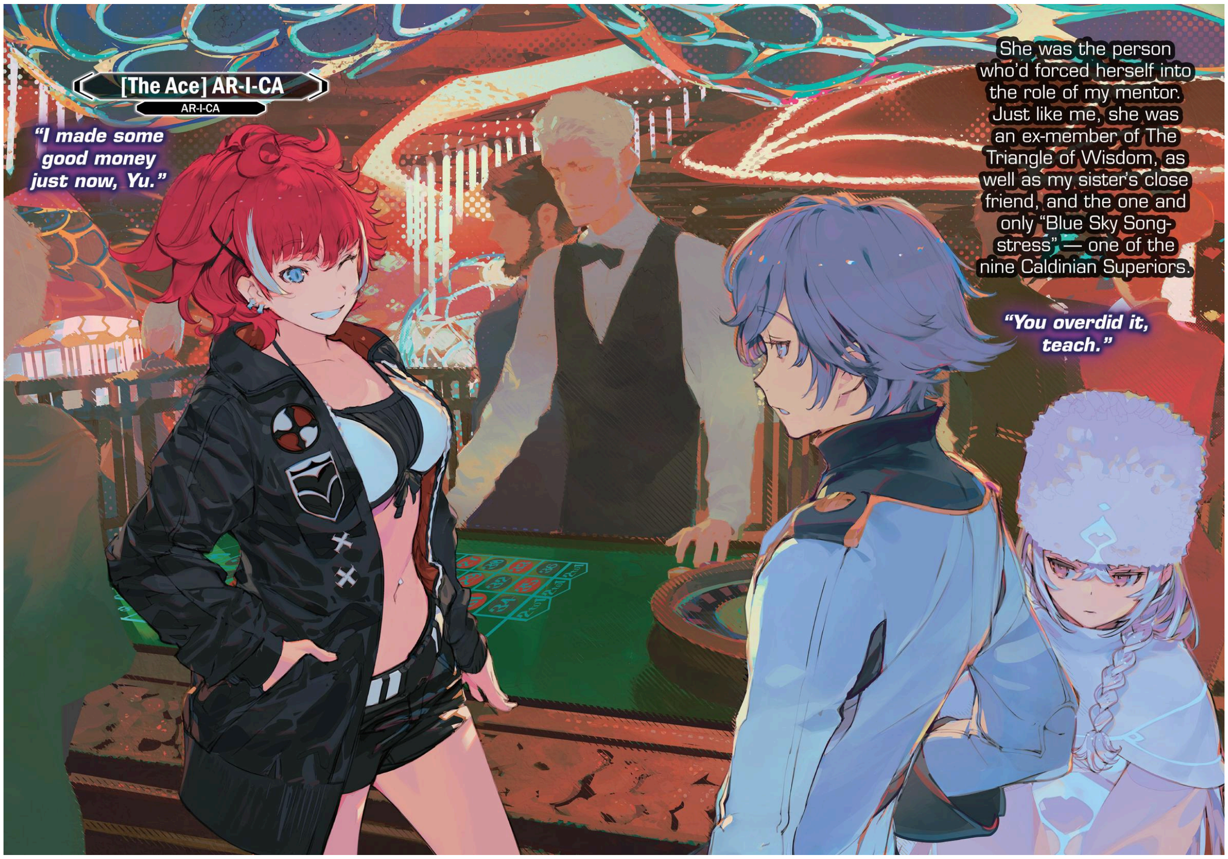
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
10. After the Storm, and Before the Storm

Infinite Dendrogram

10. After the Storm, and Before the Storm

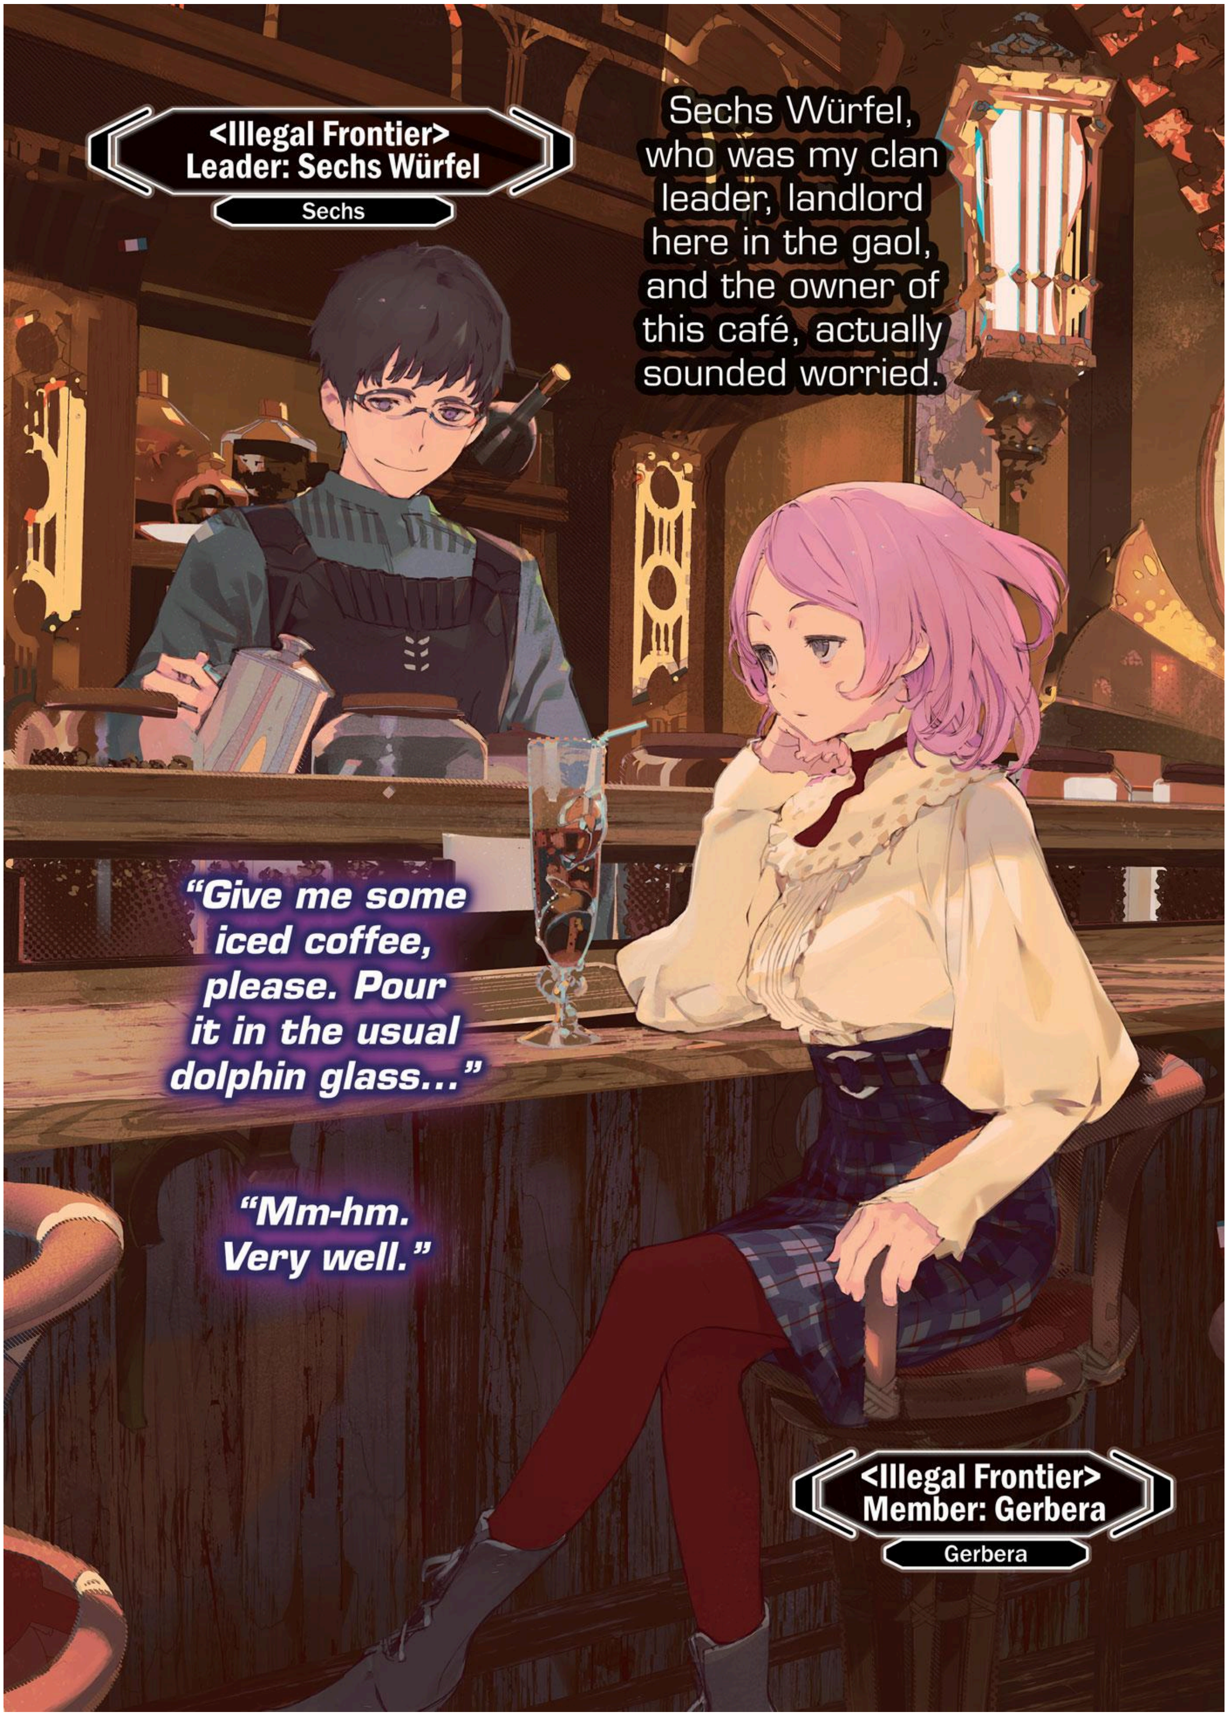
Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



[The Ace] AR-I-CA
AR-I-CA
"I made some good money just now, Yu."
"You overdid it, teach."

She was the person who'd forced herself into the role of my mentor. Just like me, she was an ex-member of The Triangle of Wisdom, as well as my sister's close friend, and the one and only "Blue Sky Songstress"—one of the nine Caldinian Superiors.



<Illegal Frontier>
Leader: Sechs Würfel
Sechs
Sechs Würfel, who was my clan leader, landlord here in the gaol, and the owner of this café, actually sounded worried.
"Give me some iced coffee, please. Pour it in the usual dolphin glass..."
"Mm-hm. Very well."
<Illegal Frontier>
Member: Gerbera
Gerbera

Table of Contents

Cover
Color Illustrations

Prologue
Episode One: College
Side Story: A Certain Arrest
Episode Two: Seniors
Side Story: Crime and Invitation
Episode Three: Sister
Side Story: Valentine’s Day of 2044
Episode Four: Consultation
Pallid Pages Part One: Spin the Roulette Wheel
Episode Five: Predicament
Side Story: Nightmare at the Gaol
Epilogue: After the Storm, and Before the Storm

Afterword
Bonus Short Stories
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Prologue

Control AI Workspace

"Ngh... There's so much work..." A certain white cat was hard at work in a space populated by countless screens.

It was control AI no. 13, Cheshire.

Once in charge of spreading culture, he was now the odd-job AI, constantly dealing with various tasks piled up on him by the other AIs.

Now, while Cheshire was working in this space, he had clones currently leading new Masters through the tutorial, and an avatar acting as a duelist.

This ability to split himself and thus divide his processing power was what had gotten him the role of the odd-job AI.

"I'm not at my best, either," he grumbled. "Using my real body took away a whole lot of my processing power..."

Recently, in the ruins near Quartierlatin, he'd unleashed his power as Infinite Multiplication, Grimalkin and crushed an army of pre-ancient weaponry.

Doing something like that wasn't without its costs, though.

Unlike how it was with controlling normal clones, using the main body to its full potential left a burden on his processing power. In other words, it made him tired.

"Nngh... But I need to clear some of this work to open up processing power for my match as Tom..."

Tired or not, he still had work to do.

All the administrative work was done by just thirteen AIs, so breaks were out of the question, especially when there were those who were even more tired than Cheshire. It was a vicious circle, like in a typical employee-exploiting business.

Then again, perhaps you couldn't expect any rest while managing Infinite Dendrogram — a world that was active 24/7 and constantly had several hundred thousand people connected to it.

It made sense that they would have to use so much of their processing power.

“Looking back at it, the first two thousand years here before launch were sooo easy... Even if you ignore the hell I went through because of Rockfell and Fanlong.”

Cheshire grinned wryly as he recalled the time when he was The Lynx, Schrödinger Cat. Those were the names of the King of Kings and the Draconic Emperor of that time.

It was now called “The Era of the Peerless Three,” but from Cheshire’s perspective, it was “The Era of the Peerless Two and an Extra.”

Most of his memories of that time consisted of nothing but getting into trouble made by two people who were basically walking glitches.

“Our recent incident reminds me of that time.”

Cheshire had needed to deal with the pre-ancient civilization’s weapons back then, too. Remembering how hard it all was, he felt a bit nostalgic.

“Oh, also...”

He then remembered a certain newbie Master... who probably couldn’t be considered new anymore.

Ray Starling — the man who’d taken Cheshire’s words about freedom to heart and then defeated half of Acra-Vesta, against whom Cheshire himself was hopelessly incompatible.

Cheshire wondered what the young man was up to right now.

“He’s probably having a hard time...”

The young man had been caught up in all sorts of happenings ever since he’d started.

The event in Quartierlatin had been preceded by the battle against Monochrome in Torne and the trouble with The Lunar Society.

“I can’t get a break myself, but I really hope he doesss.”

A rest without anything special happening. A silence after a typhoon.

Cheshire thought it wouldn’t hurt for Ray to have that.

Beginning Episode: Break Time

Episode One: College

April 3rd, 2045, Reiji Mukudori

On the first Monday of April, I woke up earlier than usual.

We'd gone through the enrollment guidance and procedures and introduced ourselves to our fellow freshmen on Friday, so today, we were going to start classes and our college life.

It was just a weekend, but somehow, it felt like a whole year had passed since Friday.

The weekend was just that impactful, I guess, I thought.

First I'd picked up a search quest that had culminated in the battle against Monochrome. Then I'd gone to change my job at Quartierlatin's ruins, only to end up fighting Hell General and the whale.

The weekend had been almost as packed with happenings as my first few days in Dendro, everything from coming online until the conclusion of Franklin's Game at Gideon. I felt like I'd done nothing but fight the whole time.

Now, though, I had to focus on my college life. My parents had told me that I could only live by myself if I made it into Tokyo University, one of the country's best universities. I'd done just that, but this would be pointless if I didn't keep up with my studies. It'd make for quite a bad joke if I went on to repeat a year because of too much Dendro. What would my parents think? Seriously. They already had enough to worry about with my siblings, so I didn't want to add to that.

I'd balance my real and Dendro lives to be a proper college student.

Speaking of my siblings, I got a call from my sister. She congratulated me for enrolling into college, which was so normal of her that it actually worried me.

She'd been traveling all over for as long as I'd known her, and she was now busy working in a different time zone, which was the reason why it had taken her so long to contact me.

Being busy with work was a good thing, though. For example, as busy as it would make them, authors who were having their work adapted into anime must surely be happy.

Not like my sister worked in that sphere, though.

We chatted and reminisced (some memories made my legs tremble) for about half an hour before she asked if I wanted anything for my enrollment party, to which I answered that I wanted some foreign sweets, preferably from famous confectioners.

That might seem inconsequential, but when it came to such things, my sister was a person you had to be specific with. If I were to just tell her 'anything's fine,' she would bring something far out of reasonable limits or something incomprehensible.

Shu had done that once, and he'd received a gift that had somehow gotten him into major, life-threatening trouble in Aokigahara. That was only a little while before the Un-kra world tournament, when he'd been shaping up to be a great martial artist, and even then, the gift had almost gotten him killed.

If I got into something like that right now, it'd make a mess of both my school and Dendro life, so I went and asked for something harmless.

Despite the slight bit of fear, my chat with my sister was fun, and it ended without a hitch.

Still, for some reason, I heard an explosion right before we ended the call, which made me think, Man, she never changes, huh?

It honestly felt like she was living in a world and genre a whole lot more dangerous than even Dendro.

◇

I made it to college pretty early.

It wasn't far from my apartment, so I just used my bike.

First I went to the student cafeteria and ate some breakfast while checking the syllabus on my mobile for the details on the various courses.

Unlike in high school, where all but a few classes and timetables were decided for you, in college, you have to choose your curricula and set your timetables yourself. I'd looked at it at home, but this could decide my life, so I had to be careful with it.

"For my required foreign language... I'll just take English II. I'm sure you can't go wrong with the ability to talk with those from the Anglosphere."

Although we had some really accurate translation apps these days. Dendro, for instance, translated everything into Japanese for me, no matter where the speaker was from.

Rook and Figaro were from the UK, Chelsea was American, Xunyu was Chinese... no, wait, Singaporean. And going by his name, Hugo was French.

You could probably find a lot more interesting nationalities if you looked hard enough.

"Gotta pick one more, right...? What should I go for?"

I was interested in Greek because of its relation to Nemesis, but I didn't have that option here.

She was based on Greek mythology, right? As far as I knew, "Vengeance is Mine" was a biblical quote from the New Testament.

Oh, well. Nothing could be done if Greek wasn't an option.

Still, what other language could I go for?

"Heya, Rei! How are ya?" Someone slapped my back and greeted me with a cheerful voice.

I turned around and saw someone familiar. "...Natsume."

This girl with unruly hair and a bit of face paint was a fellow freshman: Soprano Natsume. She was one of the four other freshman Dendro users I had met during the introductions.

Though her first name was read as "Soprano," it was actually written in Japanese kanji for "high" and "sound." Such names had once been rare, but it was at least one in five people now. It had been that way since I was in elementary school.

"That's my name!" she exclaimed. "Anyway, what're ya up to?! You okay? Wanna do some cat's cradle?" Natsume presented me a cat's cradle wrapped around her hands.

"...Why?" I asked.

"Brain exercise?"

What's with the questioning tone? You're the one who offered.

"Mukudori, Natsume, good morning," yet another person greeted us.

"Oh. Good morning, Akiyama."

"Morning, Suba!"

It was Subaru Akiyama, another fellow freshman Dendro user.

Unlike Natsume, Akiyama wasn't the kind of person who'd touch you upon greeting or randomly ask to play some cat's cradle. However, she was wearing a long-sleeved maid uniform.

College had no rules for clothing or hair styles, but constant cosplayers like her were few and far between.

Then again, she claimed that it wasn't cosplay. During the introductions last week, Akiyama had said she was juggling her college life and work as a maid in a certain household, and this was her uniform.

I'd asked why she didn't just change, and gotten the un-maidlike response of, "Changing a bunch of times per day is a pain."

The other two Dendro users I'd met were guys who were about as... interesting as these two.

I was probably the blandest among us Dendro freshmen.

That made me realize that the higher years had people like Miss Eldritch and Tsukikage. Tokyo U sure was full of weirdos.

"I must say, you're early," said Akiyama. "I know we agreed on something for the first period, but it's over an hour away."

"Oh, I just wanted to think about my timetable."

The thing we'd agreed on was related to classes.

We five liberal arts freshmen Dendro users would split up and take a look at the available courses. We'd all look at different classes and take notes and stuff to help each other decide what courses to take.

Whether someone wanted something easy, useful, or nothing at all depended on them and them alone, but it wouldn't hurt to have more info. The syllabus didn't contain everything, after all.

I could ask B3, though. Kozue Fujibayashi was a diligent girl who could teach me a lot.

There was also Miss Aberration, but... we were in different departments, and I felt like her help would cost something I could never repay. So a strong "no" from me.

"We haven't even started looking around. What're you so troubled by?" asked Natsume.

"The second foreign language. I still don't know what to pick," I answered, and both of them looked at me in confusion.

"I thought you'd just go for German."

"Yes. I think it would suit you well."

I had only one response to that strange opinion: "...Why?"

The two looked at each other, then back at me, and then said simultaneously: "Because it would fit your in-Dendro edgy chuuni fashion."

"All right, when we meet in Dendro, I'm dueling you both."

What was so chuuni or edgy about my gear? How rude.

Though, yeah, I'd just go for German. That seemed cool.

"Your newest set is just crazy," said Natsume. "Ah, in a good way, I mean."

"You even ate a devil..." muttered Akiyama.

I said nothing.

They were talking about the video uploaded shortly after my battle against Logan. I had no idea who, but someone had recorded it in its entirety.

"Hmm... But that vid looks a bit R-rated, so maybe most edgy kids can't see it?" one of them said.

"Well, it does seem inappropriate for minors."

"Don't talk about me like I produce adult content!" I exclaimed.

What do they think I am?!

"Ah. I just got mail from Draggy," Natsume said as she looked at her mobile.

"Draggy" had to be Dragon Kasugai — another fellow freshman.

Just like with Natsume's "Soprano," "Dragon" was only the reading, and it actually used Japanese kanji when written.

He had a mohawk and wore sunglasses, so he might've stood out even more than Akiyama and her maid uniform.

"He says he's tired after yesterday's mixer, so he'll take the first period off," said Natsume.

"It's the first day!" I shouted, wondering if all colleges had this level of freedom. "Is that really okay?! What about our agreement?!"

"Planning tiiime!" said Natsume, instead of responding.

"Let's ignore the classes with the lowest priority," said Akiyama.

"Wouldn't that be a bit mean to the professors?" I asked. It didn't seem good to remove those from the running without even trying.

"That's true. Then let's make it fair and roll for it," Akiyama said as she took out some dice.

"Why are you carrying those around?" asked Natsume.

I could ask the same about your cat's cradle, but I won't.

"I like gambling."

"That's not something I'd like to hear from a maid," I muttered.

Those long sleeves made her seem like a capable maid, but this and her refusal to change from her uniform made me believe that she was actually pretty slovenly.

Still, she'd made it into Tokyo U, so maybe she was a diligent student.

...One who was about to pick her classes by rolling dice.

Still, we had to remove some classes to make up for Kasugai's absence, so we had no choice.

"Oh? Lexy mailed me, too," Natsume said as she took out her mobile again.

"Lexy" was her nickname for Alex Fuyuki, the last of the freshmen Dendro users. Like the name implied, he was half-Japanese, and he always wore an overcoat — even indoors.

It was a chilly spring right now, but what would he do when it was summer?

"Oh, dear," she added.

This gave me a slight sense of déjà vu. "...What did he say?"

"He's not coming today."

"He's skipping not just the first period, but all the classes?! It's the first day!"

Isn't that, like, really dangerous?!

"Wait, he could be sick," I composed myself. "Warm clothes don't make you immune to colds, so..."

"He says he's busy with Dendro."

"He's not sick?!"

While I was here worrying about my life-Dendro balance, Fuyuki was going and tossing it aside on the first day.

Then again, maybe I wasn't in a position to say anything to him.

I could totally imagine myself skipping college if, for example, the battles surrounding the ruins were happening now.

It wasn't unlikely that I'd be in such a situation eventually.

That aside, I was kinda worried about Fuyuki's college life right now.

The guy was actually skipping the entire first day of college.

Would he be all right...?

Side Story: A Certain Arrest

April 3rd, 2045, Tenchi

The island country known as Tenchi was located to the east of the continent.

It was considered “different” even by Dendro country standards, but not due to its culture or appearance.

The extra-fantastical Fairyland of Legendaria or the floating country of Granvaloa beat it out in that regard.

Tenchi’s culture was a unique reflection of Azuchi-Momoyama or Edo Period Japan, but that wasn’t what made it stand out.

It was the fact that it was in a state of constant civil war.

The country had a de facto leader, the person with the job of “Conquest General,” but the feudal lords under him... the “daimyos”... constantly waged war on each other. In fact, you could say that even the Conquest General was just the daimyo with the greatest amount of land, as proven by the fact that his status could often be taken from him.

In Tenchi, conflict and death were part of daily life. The reason for the constant civil war wasn’t clear. The separate parties had their own reasons, but the conflicts kept continuing in an endless chain, and as of yet, no one had united the entire island under a single flag. Even if most of the daimyo families were destroyed, the larger ones would split, increasing their number again and continuing the conflicts.

They fought as though it was in their DNA. At this point, that was part of Tenchi’s identity as a country. Many of the Masters who learned about it would call it “the country of strife.” This aspect of the country was reflected in its people. The median level of Tenchi tian fighters was over 300. Being a country of conflict had made it a breeding ground for warriors far stronger than those from other countries. One of the reasons for this was surely the fact that tians were a better source of EXP than monsters.

It was often said that history would’ve gone completely differently if Tenchi had stopped infighting and invaded the continent. But even now, after the explosive increase in Masters, Tenchi continued to be the land of strife.

◇

Three shadows were moving through a mountain forest in the northern reaches of Tenchi. They all had unique appearances.

One was a blooming beauty akin to a squid. She had ten mechanical tentacles growing out of her back. She traveled by using them to reach for the ground and pull herself forward, and her speed was nothing to scoff at. The tight-fitting bodysuit she wore made her look like a sci-fi ninja.

The second was a middle-aged man wearing apparel like that of a Japanese diviner, an onmyoji. He was sitting cross-legged on an ant as large as an elephant, which was moving as fast as the tentacled woman. With a marked Fu in hand, he whispered something under his breath.

The third person was a young man in a coat that was clearly too big for him. There was a clear contrast between his apparel and his small stature. You'd expect him to have trouble walking, but that didn't matter now, as he was being carried by one of the woman's tentacles. Another thing notable about him was the Fu on his forehead, which made him look like a jiangshi from Huang He, but he was neither a jiangshi nor an undead.

"Well, Winterbaum? Is that Fu doing its job?" the man on the ant asked the youth.

"Yes. I don't feel any motion sickness. Thank you, Mr. Eashtan," replied the young man, Winterbaum.

"Kyah kyah kyah!" the man on the ant laughed. "It's just a Fu to ward against weak poison-type debuffs, but it does the job for motion sickness. You can't ride Probe's chains without it. I could let you ride my ant, but they throw off anyone they're not used to. You don't have to worry about that with her holding you, though. Right, Probe?"

The woman clearly heard him, but didn't respond. Some might think they were on bad terms, but that certainly wasn't the case. This was just how they usually were. That was proven by what happened next...

"BHOAAHHH!"

"BHAAOHHH!"

A pair of large, Demi-Dragon-tier boars jumped out on the path and attacked them. Without saying a word, Probe tore one of them apart with one of her tentacles.

"This doesn't look like pork I'd like to eat," said Eashtan as three ants appeared from out of the ground and instantly reduced the other boar to bone.

Still bound by the tentacle, Winterbaum could do nothing but watch. Unlike the other two, he was a newbie with stats that wouldn't let him last a minute against those two boars. They were on a whole other level, both literally and figuratively.

They're amazing... So this is the power of Hokugen'in's top fighters, huh? he thought, both tense and excited.

"Hokugen'in" was the name of a particularly well-known daimyo family in Tenchi. They owned lots of land in the northern reaches of Tenchi and had a lot of strong fighters at their disposal, many of which were Masters. The best of the best among them were known as "The Hokugen'in Elite Four," and they were feared and respected all across the already-dangerous country.

The two people Winterbaum was accompanying were among those four.

One was The Whip, Probe USA One the "Dismantler," while the other was Onmyou Doctor, Eashtan the "Army Ant." Both were extremely powerful pre-Superiors who'd made a name for themselves in both Tenchi's duel and kill rankings.

I'm so lucky, Winterbaum thought. Despite being just a newbie, he'd been invited to go on an official Hokugen'in quest alongside these two.

It's hard to refuse a request to party up with our top people. The reward is great, too, so it's worth skipping college for this... I'll have to apologize to them, though...

Winterbaum — otherwise known as Reiji Mukudori's fellow freshman, Alex Fuyuki — slowly nodded to himself. He did feel bad about skipping out on their agreement to scout out their course options together, but it was a sacrifice that had to be made.

I hope I can make up for it with some lunch...

"What's wrong? You look like you got something on your mind," said Eashtan, noticing the youth's expression.

Winterbaum didn't want to lie to someone he respected. "Oh, I... I'm just thinking about college. I skipped it today..."

Eashtan looked at him with worry. “Isn’t April an important time in Japanese colleges? Can you really do that?”

“It’s just the first day, so I’m sure I can get it back...”

Tokyo U was among the country’s best, but he didn’t want to believe that skipping a single day would be enough to ruin his college life.

W-Well, this week is all about examining the courses, and lots of people change theirs after the first or second lecture, so I’ll be able to make up for this... right?

His own words had made Winterbaum a bit worried, so he had to try and convince himself that it would be all right.

“Funding education. Parent burden. Idle pleasure. Not good.” Probe spoke up for the first time. Her tone was strong, and she coupled it with a few light slaps on Winterbaum’s forehead.

However, Winterbaum didn’t really understand her. Her words were too simple for him to process.

“...What?”

“‘Your parents paid for college, so you shouldn’t waste it by playing around,’” said Eashtan. “That’s how I interpret that, anyway.”

“College life. Prioritize studies,” Probe added in a huff.

“Right... I’m sorry,” Winterbaum apologized, now feeling down. “But class is about to end, anyway, so please let me keep questing.”

Probe said nothing and just gave him a glare.

“Hey, it’s fine,” Eashtan said. “It’s too late for that now. And he will be useful, right?”

“...Reluctant agreement.” Probe still didn’t seem to think it was okay, but she did seem to see that she had to accept it, so she just continued carrying Winterbaum.

“Well, just remember to prioritize your real life next time,” Eashtan said.

“Okay...” Winterbaum felt bad for worrying them, but he was also curious about something.

“Sorry to bring it up so late, but why does Probe speak in sentences of just two words?”

“I don’t know myself,” said Eashtan. “We can still communicate just fine, so I don’t mind it.”

“I see...”

I guess there really are a lot of weirdos among the top players, he thought. It doesn't bother me, though.

"Oh!" Winterbaum exclaimed as he opened a map. "We're close to the third village, you two!"

"Mhm," nodded Eashtan. "And what does your Horus show there?"

"I'll take a look," he said as he reached into the crest on his left hand and took out a magnifying glass. He then held it over the map. Specifically, the aforementioned village. "Uhh... There's a fight. Or more like, they're being attacked."

Instead of simply magnifying the map, the lens displayed a bird's eye view of the actual place it represented. Winterbaum's Horus was an Embryo of farsight, based on the ancient Egyptian god said to have the sun and the moon for eyes. It created livestreams of distant places when simply held over maps.

It had a flaw, it couldn't see inside buildings, but that didn't stop it from being extremely useful for reconnaissance. This was the very reason why a newbie like him was going on a quest alongside these two renowned Masters: the lens of Horus presented a clear scene of brigands attacking a village and its inhabitants struggling against them.

"I expected this," said Eashtan. "The first two villages were untouched, but this one is closer to the halfway point. Still, we're on a quest to both bring the news and enforce order, so let's hurry there."

"Pressing urgency," Probe agreed.

The two of them prepared to hurry over to the village, but then...

"Hm...? What?" Eashtan suddenly placed the Fu in his hand against his ear.

"Mr. Eashtan?" asked Winterbaum, but Eashtan just gestured for him to be quiet.

A few seconds later...

"Hmm... We don't have to hurry anymore, you two," Eashtan said as he not only slowed down, but changed direction. "Let's go to the fourth village. We'll just be late to this one."

"Demanding explanation," said Probe.

"We were too slow. He's already there. There's nothing for us to do there now."

"Eh?" Winterbaum looked at the village once again. The situation had completely changed, and it left him speechless and wide-eyed.

“Dear me. Didn’t we set out on this quest before him? I can see why he and Saki are considered abnormal,” Eashtan grumbled.

As for Probe...

“Mist...” She whispered her first one-word sentence and looked at the mist at the foot of a nearby mountain.

◇◆

Tenchi was a land of strife.

Because of this, it had the strongest tians on average, which in turn made it difficult for malicious Masters to commit crime. Even tians could beat them, after all.

But there were exceptions...

“TAKE IT AAAALL!” a man roared. “DON’T KILL THE WOMEN AND CHILDREN! WE’RE SELLIN’ ’EM OFF!”

A certain mountain village was under attack by bandits. It wasn’t that special of a situation, but there were two strange things about it: all the bandits had crests on their left hands, and there were nearly no young men among the defending villages. The few elders tried fending them off with spears, but the power gap was evident.

Watching his partners in crime round up the villagers, one of the bandit Masters spoke to their leader. “Big catch, huh, boss?” The boss had a large build and a fierce look about him. His apparel was as colorful as a kabuki performer’s, and on his hands, he wore gloves with the letters “B A N” engraved on them.

His name was Gigamaru Gakido. He was the King of Grind — the Superior Job from the Boxer grouping’s Pound Boxer sub-grouping — as well as the leader of the “Sixth Realm’s Chaos” bandit clan, and the tenth in the highly competitive Tenchi duel scene.

“Heh heh. Sure is,” he chuckled. “Looks like they sent all their fighters to Kurowa. Seems like they lost, too, so they ain’t comin’ back, either. Kheheheh. Perfect time to make a killin’.”

A few days ago, the local daimyo family, Kurowa, had battled one of the neighboring daimyos. They’d suffered a decisive defeat, making them lose a lot of influence and land.

This village was one of the places Kurowa had lost, but the victorious daimyo still hadn’t established his rule here. As a general rule, all daimyos in Tenchi ruled separately, and each had their own laws.

Since this was no longer Kurowa land, Kurowa laws no longer applied, but since it wasn’t officially under the wing of the victorious daimyo yet, their laws didn’t apply, either. Basically, this was now an unprotected, lawless land.

Sixth Realm Chaos had purposely attacked them at this exact time.

This wasn’t their first time attacking tians. However, since their crimes hadn’t come to light yet, they weren’t on the wanted list yet. This was a major job, even for criminals like them.

“No proper warriors guarding ’em, no laws or rights to protect ’em... We rarely get prey this good,” Gakido said, grinning. “But where’re we sellin’ ’em? Can’t do it in Tenchi, can we...?”

“That’s nothin’ to worry about. We got in contact with a good slave trader recently, didn’t we? Said he’ll buy all the slaves we catch and handle all the shit surrounding ’em.”

“Ohh? That sounds good. What was his name, again? Slipped my mind. La, Ree... Relacma?”

“La Crima. He’s the one who told us about the war and where to find these villages. Also gave us some damn good accessories as a sign of friendship. A good guy, that one.” He pointed to his earring-shaped accessory.

Gakido himself had better accessories, but these gifts were more than good enough for his underlings.

“Ha ha ha! That’s great. It costs money to grow the clan and to hire smiths to make better gear for the duels, so we can’t miss out on tasty deals like this. You know what, I’ll give ya a better share for mediating.”

“Heh heh. I knew you’d say that. You’re a nice guy, boss.”

While they were having this conversation, the rest of the clan mostly finished rounding up the villagers. They were all sitting in the center of the village, bound in chains. Five of them, however, were seated separate from the rest.

They were the prettier-looking women, girls, and boys, and they were bound in just shackles, rather than chains.

“Hmm? Does this mean what I think it means?” Gakido asked.

The clan members responded to his question with nothing but vile grins.

“I’ll have the redhead. You do whatever you want with the rest,” Gakido said.

“That’s our boss! You know what it’s all about!” Hollering, the bandits surrounded the girls and boys.

Gakido himself reached for the red-haired woman he’d picked... but then realized that something wasn’t right.

“...Mist?” he muttered. A dense mist had filled the village.

There was a well here, but the kind of river that could form such a mist was a fair distance away. As they all wondered what was happening... an unfamiliar voice reached their ears.

“Hmm... No good. No good at all,” the voice said. “The women and boys of the world have a beauty to them that changes with the passage of time. Violently tearing it while it’s still budding is truly a waste. After all... what’s a love-making without love?”

The source of the voice was on the roof of one of the buildings.

It was a muscle mountain of a man. Not in the unsightly sense, though. He was over two meters tall, and combined with the muscles, he created a very balanced-looking build.

He had hair that was long, dark, and disorderly, and a beard that grew away from his face. Additionally, he wore skins that looked like they were freshly-torn from a baboon, and had a hatchet-like blade at his side.

Judging by appearance alone, you would have assumed that he was from Gakido’s clan.

“Who the hell are you?” Gakido demanded.

The man reached for his side and took out a traditional Japanese smoking pipe before responding.

“Me? I’m Bigman.”

He then lit the pipe and began smoking it. It was a calm and casual act — which was in complete contrast to Gakido and his gang. After all, “Bigman” was a major name — a true big deal.

“King of Brigands...” one of them trembled.

“Bigman the Mountain-Splitter!”

“The Superior that’s second in the kill rankings!”

The man held the brigand grouping’s Superior Job, King of Brigands. “Mountain-Splitter” was a nickname, said to have been born when he’d cut a mountain in half. Obviously, he was a Superior.

“You can’t be serious!” one of the brigands yelped.

Tenchi had a number of Superiors. The top three in the duel rankings were among them, so Gakido — a duel ranker himself — knew their power well.

But that wasn’t all.

Bigman was...

“So you’re all informed, huh? Guess I don’t have to introduce myself now. If you know that much, then you probably also know that... I’m a guest at Hokugen’in’s,” Bigman exhaled some smoke, mixing it with the mist before continuing. “This recently became Hokugen’in turf.”

Indeed. The daimyo family that had fought Kuroha and conquered this land was the Hokugen’in. Thus, there could only be one reason why one of their Elite Four would come here.

He took out a seal case and presented it to Sixth Realm Chaos.

“Hokugen’in’s law’s in place now. In case it ain’t obvious, we can’t have our people taken into slavery.”

“Gh...!” The words made the bandit clan grind their teeth in frustration, and the villagers cheer. The item Bigman had shown was proof that he represented the Hokugen’in family.

Midorino Hokugen’in, the current head of the family, had taken the potential of such crime into consideration. Thus, he’d given his seals to some of his guest Masters and had them travel around to prevent it. Eashtan, Probe, and Bigman were among those chosen Masters.

This was no longer lawless territory. Thanks to the edict, it was now under the law of Hokugen’in.

“Blood has already been spilled,” Bigman continued. “But it’s my own fault for not making it in time. It would be wrong to judge you for simply adhering to the law of lawlessness.”

Falling silent for a moment, he looked down upon the Sixth Realm Chaos.

“But if you continue to act as criminals even after seeing this seal, you’ll all lose your heads and drop straight to the gaol.”

His status as a Superior — one of the strongest Masters — made his words feel like a menacing growl.

Looking at his awed gang, Gakido clicked his tongue.

He’s not someone we can handle.

Gakido didn’t believe that numbers gave him any sort of advantage. Battle-focused Superiors weren’t the kind of creatures that could be swarmed. Backing down was obviously the right choice here.

But before he could tell his clan to retreat...

“Ohhhh?” Bigman noticed a few of the clan members point their weapons at the bound villagers. The one he’d talked to before Bigman’s arrival was among them.

“Wh-What the hell’re you doin’?! Put your weapons away!” Gakido shouted. However, the brigands said nothing in response and just swung their weapons at the villagers.

A member with Telepathy Cuffs equipped tried to talk to him telepathically. “B-Boss! Something’s wrong! My body’s moving on its own and I can’t ta—!”

His sentence was cut short by Bigman jumping off the roof and splitting the man in half before he could harm the villagers.

“Looks like you’re all victims of possession... no... parasitism,” Bigman said. “I did hear that a worldwide criminal who has an Embryo like that had infiltrated Tenchi...”

“Huhh...?” Gakido looked and noticed that most of the members had lost the earrings they’d been wearing.

No... That wasn’t right. The earrings had crawled inside their bodies through their ear canals... like parasites.

“Wh-What the hell?” Gakido didn’t know what was happening.

However, the battle had already begun. The Sixth Realm Chaos had surrounded Bigman, weapons in hand. Albeit outnumbered, Bigman laughed.

“Fwahahahah! Sorry, but I can’t tell which of you’ve got the things in ya, so I’ll just beat ya all. This and all the other stuff they find out about ya will probably put ya on the wanted list, so you just go and have a good time in the gaol.”

“What?!” Gakido screamed.

“Well, I guess it just goes to show that crime doesn’t pay.” Bigman swung his hatchet at the Sixth Realm Chaos members.

Strange as it was, he easily chopped off the heads of those who were clearly outside of the hatchet’s reach. The sound of the blade rending the air and the spraying of blood resounded in the village.

"FUCK!" At this point, Gakido resolved to fight the Superior.

He had a chance against him. His Embryo, the gloves on his hands, had the power to defeat anyone in a single hit. It was an Embryo focused on that alone, and it would give him victory if he just landed a hit.

"I'll beat you and escape!"

Taking the peekaboo block position from boxing, Gakido ran towards Bigman.

"Grinding Shockfist!"

As he closed the distance, he used the ultimate job skill of the King of Grind.

"Pound Boxer" was a hybrid job fusing Boxer and Crasher, making it a job specialized in grinding trees and rocks with fists.

Thus, the ultimate job skill of the King of Grind, the culmination of its grouping, was focused on destruction, as well. It created a shockwave in the shape of a fist that treated its targets as if they had 0 starting defense.

It was a crushing, devastating attack that only registered defense from skills. As Gakido approached Bigman, he pulverized trees, rocks, buildings, and even his own clan members. Bigman, however, dodged it with light movements you'd never expect from someone so burly.

Gakido, surrounded by the debris caused by his ultimate job skill, used that opening to approach Bigman and prepare to use his Embryo — his true ultimate skill. But then, to his shock, there was suddenly a lot of distance between them.

"Ah...?!"

It wasn't that Bigman backed away.

He'd simply moved the tip of his pipe over his shoulder and pointed it towards Gakido.

Gakido was blown away by a smoking pipe as large as a pillar. Once airborne, he was completely at Bigman's mercy.

"Dewblade's Touch — Brocken."

Following that ultimate skill, the hatchet sliced Gakido in two, giving him the death penalty.

◇◆

After beating Gakido, Bigman went on to get rid of the rest of his clan.

"That takes care of that," he said with satisfaction. "Now we've just gotta wait for the officials to arrive."

He removed the chains from the villagers, helped them bury their dead, and took a break.

"Man, I feel like I'm dancing on someone's palm. The real big bad here's the guy with the parasite Embryo, but it doesn't look like I can trace him from here."

Since they were no longer equipped, the members of the Sixth Realm Chaos had dropped the parasite earrings. However, the earrings had quickly blown up and dissolved into light, no doubt to destroy the evidence.

"He was gathering slaves... No... That was just to bring us here so he could gauge us, clearly. It's looking like we'll end up fighting eventually. Man, the battles just don't end here. Infinite Dendrogram sure is a restless place... Or is it just Tenchi? Ha ha ha ha ha."

Bigman laughed and looked at where he'd just fought the Sixth Realm Chaos.

"Now, they're obviously going to the gaol. It's hard to cross the sea from Tenchi." His words reminded him of the last of The Elite Four. "I wonder if Saki did it with that shabby raft."

There was a hint of worry in his tone.

Unless you had save points in other countries, getting the death penalty in Tenchi while on the wanted list meant going straight to the gaol.

The waters in the strait between Tenchi and the mainland were known to be extremely rough and full of powerful aquatic monsters. Crossing it alone was so extremely difficult that the only ones who succeeded were people like The Unsheath, Kashimiya.

There was also the option to give up on the strait and take the long way through the ocean, but Tenchi was on bad terms with Granvaloa, who considered all the waters beyond Tenchi's territorial waters to be their domain. This lack of insurance in case they were put on the wanted list was another reason why Masters in Tenchi were reluctant to commit crimes.

"I hope Saki doesn't cause too much trouble in Caldina or Huang He. Caldina's 'Blue Sky Songstress' and Huang He's 'Fenghuang' sound like the kind of people she couldn't get along with..."

Bigman was worried that his fellow Elite Four member would pick a fight with a foreign Superior and end up on a wanted list.

"Even if that does happen, Hokugen'in has her back, so at least she wouldn't lose all her save points and go to the gaol," he thought out loud. "Speaking of that place..."

Bigman looked up at the sky and thought of the mysterious place in an unknown location.

"I wonder what kind of Superiors they have there. They must be pretty rough."

Martial artist that he was, he couldn't help imagining the place full of powerful potential foes.

It must be a war-torn hellhole that makes Tenchi pale in comparison...

◆◆◆

April 3rd, 2045, gaol, Bow Hunter, Gerbera

On a Monday afternoon, I logged in to the gaol and found a note on the counter.

"Miss Gerbera,

I have business to attend to in real life and won't be able to return until evening.

During my absence, the establishment will be closed, but feel free to eat whatever you find."

It said that our clan leader wasn't here right now.

"That's rare," I muttered.

He'd been online almost all the time every day since I'd come here a few days ago. I'd only ever seen him log out to eat or use the bathroom. He even went to bed here.

"Ah. So April's here even when he's gone," I added. He must've set her to stay around, even when he was offline.

You could also do this with tamed monsters, but since they could be killed or stolen while the Master was away, it was rarely used. April was once again just sitting in her chair, eyes closed. That seemed to be her default whenever not working.

“He said ‘eat whatever you find,’ but...”

There actually wasn’t that much food here.

There were some ingredients in the fridge-shaped inventory with time-stopping function, but the only things that could be eaten just like that were the bread, and the ham and veggies for sandwiches.

“Going out to eat... isn’t a good idea, either,” I murmured.

The food in the gaol honestly wasn’t very good, which was only obvious, since there were no tians here, and the Masters were all criminals.

Masters who did nothing more than run a restaurant or something wouldn’t end up in a place like this.

There were no proper cooks with the “Cooking” sense skill, so you only had back-alley cooks who tried to do what they could with their real life cooking skill.

So yeah, the gaol lacked good food.

At first, I’d thought that our leader’s café was successful because he was the King of Crime, but it turned out that his good coffee and tea-cakes played a big part in that.

He was actually good at cooking. Still, there had been a time when he was making nothing but popcorn.

“He’s not here... so I guess I’ll just have to make something myself,” I muttered.

“Eh?”

Did I just hear April make a sound I never heard from her before? I’m just imagining it, right?

Shaking my head to clear it from the distraction, I said, “I can make a berry pie out of this stuff.”

I would have liked to make something more proper, but sweets and pastries were all I could do.

“Thinking of sweets reminds me of my life in Gideon,” I added nostalgically.

They had tons of cafés and restaurants there. I’d always enjoyed lunch time back there. With all the places selling them, I hadn’t had to make any sweets myself.

I wanna eat doughnuts from White Sugar Peach again, I thought longingly.

“Anyway, it’s a pain, but I don’t wanna go through hell’s training on an empty stomach," I decided.

I prepared the cookware and ingredients, and made my first pie in a while.

I remembered how to make it, so I just moved my hands based on my memory. I could feel the "hang of it" coming back to me. It reminded me of my days helping Mother make sweets.

While I was busy, April had opened her eyes.

“What?” I asked her.

“...No-thing.” She was looking at me as though she was seeing something unbelievable.

She’s a maid robot, so... did she notice something strange about my pie? Well, whatever. I’m making this for myself. If it’s not good, then it’s my own fault.

Over two hours had passed before I was done.

It had taken longer than expected. It wasn’t my lunch anymore, but a mid-afternoon snack.

“Here goes...” I cut the freshly-baked berry pie, placed it on the plate, and began eating.

It would be good both warm or cold, but I was hungry right now, so it was best to eat while it was still hot.

Well... It was pretty good. It would’ve been better if I’d prepared for this, but it was makeshift, so this was probably the best I could have done.

“I’m back,” our leader said as he suddenly logged in.

Oh, you’re earlier than I expected.

“Welcome back,” I said.

“Oh...? What’s that?”

“I baked a berry pie. Want some?”

“...I might as well.”

I took out a new plate and dished up some of my pie for him.

Oh, I’ll also give him the candy art, I thought. Now that I think about it, I didn’t need it or the little peacock if I’m eating by myself.

“Here I go...” he said as he took a bite.

Ah. He fell silent, I thought. He didn’t like it? Is it because of the slime thing? But he’s human now, right?

“I forgot to breathe,” he finally said.

“Hm?”

Breathe? You can survive without a head. Don’t talk like that matters to you.

“Miss Gerbera, did you take Cook or Patissier jobs?” he asked.

“No I didn’t. They weren’t in the training menu, were they?”

“I see. That’s true. So this is all you. It’s like Shu...”

What’s wrong with him today? He’s not the type to get lost in thought and mumble like that.

"Miss Gerbera, could you please make some desserts for us to sell here?" he asked.

"Sure, but it's amateur work. Will that be fine?"

I didn't even have the Cooking skill. Could we really charge for the stuff I made? Then again, that wasn't rare here in the gaol. Not even our leader had the skill.

"...Yes, please," he said.

"Okay. I'll make some in my spare time and put them in the fridge."

And so, I now had confectioning as part of my daily routine. Yup. That was my life now. Just another peaceful day in the gaol.

Episode Two: Seniors

April 4th, 2045, Reiji Mukudori

It was the second day of college. Classes were over, and I was heading to relax in the café. Fuyuki had ended up not coming to college all of yesterday, but he'd come as normal today.

The four of us — including Kasugai, who had come during second period yesterday, as planned — all scolded Fuyuki, telling him we were worried about him, and then sharing the info we'd gotten from sitting in the classes.

Natsume also told him that he owed us lunch in the expensive cafeteria.

Anyway, I parted ways with them, and it was time for me to build my timetable for Monday and Tuesday. I'd have to consider the balance between all the days, but I knew for sure that I wanted Monday's first period open, since I'd probably spend most of my weekends logged in to Dendro for long periods. Quartierlatin surely wouldn't be the last clash between Altar and Dryfe, so I had to dedicate as much time for Dendro as possible.

...That thought made me feel like Dendro had become a really big part of my life, but I was fine with that. I just had to take care of any Dendro trouble while being careful that I didn't lose control of my life in reality. Of course, it would be best if there was no trouble at all.

Specifically, I would have liked to avoid any more Superior-related trouble, but that seemed unlikely. Anyway, I'd save the thinking about Dendro trouble for when I came online. For now, I was just going to think about my real life, drink this fancy tea, and—

"Heyoo! Hi, Ray! How're ya?!" a voice came from behind me.

It was akin to the insane ramblings of a cosmic horror, and it was coupled with a slap on my shoulder. It clearly wanted my attention, but I didn't want to turn around, because I knew exactly what it was.

"Ah. Those cream puffs look great. Don't mind if I doooo!" The creature reached forward and took one of the 300 yen chou à la crèmes I had.

The slender, beautiful fingers made me picture the tentacles of indescribable eldritch horrors lurking inside the deepest, darkest trenches of the ocean.

"So what kinda tea's that?" the person went on.

...No good. If I continued to ignore her, she'd probably take more of my snacks.

"...Fuso," I said as I turned around. "You're not supposed to take people's food without permission. What are you, Nemesis?"

"Those words make me wonder about li'l Nemesis's role," said the cosmic aberration, AKA the Superior and my upperclassman, Tsukuyo Fuso.

Not even real life could save me from encountering this Superior...

"Hmm? Why're ya lookin' at me like I'm a monster?" she asked.

You're not a monster, but a yokai, I thought, not daring to say it. The Chou à la Crème Kitsune.

"Oh dear, you look upset," she said. "Sorry 'bout the cream puff. It looked so good that my hand moved on its own. I skipped lunch, so I'm hungry, too. Will you forgive me if I buy you somethin'? I can even get you somethin' more expensive. A sponge cake? Parfait?"

"Just get me a new chou à la crème," I said.

"'Kaaay... Didn't take you for the type who'd be picky about food names."

"I'm just calling it by its name on the menu."

She went on to order some tea and snacks, and sat down on the chair in front of me.

Ah! Damn it! We ended up sitting at the same table!

"Boy, is it hard to meet when we're in different departments," she said, flopping back across from me.

"Yeah..."

"We had a good time chattin' in the club room last time, didn't we?"

"That's not how I remember it!"

You dragged me in and held me down!

"Details, details... How're you doing these days?"

"Fine, I guess," I shrugged. "College is different than high school, so I'm still adjusting to the system. I'm making a timetable right n—"

"I don't wanna hear that boring stuff," she cut me off.

She just called everything I was up to "boring"...

"I meant in Dendro," the aberration continued. "What kinda deadly fights are ya gettin' into recently?"

"Why are you making it sound like I'm always on the verge of dying?" I demanded, looking back at the dangers I'd faced in Quartierlatin and being unable to deny her implication. "Well, I did go through some stuff after leaving Torne..."

"Ah. Were you caught up in the trouble at Quartierlatin?" she asked, making it clear that unlike Natsume and Akiyama, she hadn't seen the video.

"No comment..."

"Ahaha! 'No comment,' he says!" I had no idea what was so funny, but she burst out laughing and started poking me in the cheek.

Her nails weren't sharp — probably because she was a medical student — but it kinda annoyed me.

"Tell me if the trouble ends up hurtin' ya. I'll treat ya for a special price," Miss Aberration said.

"...How much are we talking?" I asked.

"One heal and you join the club."

I could consider that much...

"Two heals and you join The Lunar Society."

"Not happening!"

I was against getting a death penalty just to fix a bad injury-type status effect, but I sure as hell wouldn't pick anything worse!

"Oh, that's sooo mean."

"At least I'm not going around a university campus inviting people to my cult," I shot back.

Isn't that forbidden? I fumed silently.

"Hey, don't be like that," Miss Eldritch said. "That was just a joke. Look, the snacks are here, so let's just have some tea. I need a break right now."

"Did something happen?" I asked slowly.

"I had to hand in some reports. Today was the deadline, but... stuff happened on Saturday, so I had to get 'em done yesterday."

Reports? I thought. So even she can be a proper student, huh?

She was a Superior in Dendro and the top of a cult both here and there, but now she seemed like a normal university girl. The “stuff on Saturday” must’ve been related to Mr. Shijima.

...Fine. I have her to thank for fixing my arm, so I could at least have some tea with her.

“This all looks sooo good. Wanna feed me? Here! Ahhhh,” she said as she opened her mouth.

This woman...

“Nope,” I replied. “Also, isn’t that something you should ask your boyfriend?”

“Boyfriend?”

“Isn’t that what Tsukikage basically is?”

She blinked a few times, then laughed out loud. “No no no no! We’re not like that.”

“You aren’t?”

“We’re childhood friends. Kage’s from the family that’s been serving mine for generations. He’s now my secretary and caretaker.”

“I see.”

So that kind of thing actually exists...

“So there,” she added. “He’s not my boyfriend. I left my parents’ place in Kyoto and moved here for college, and he’s been a big help.”

“In what way?”

“He makes my breakfast and dinner. Sometimes even gives me some packed lunch.”

“Mm-hm...”

“He does the cleanin’ and laundry, too. Thanks to him, I don’t need a cleaning robot, no matter how much of a mess I make.”

“...Hm?”

“Whenever I almost sleep in, he takes me to college in his bike’s sidecar, he translates all the foreign papers I need for reports, and he always looks through The Lunar Society’s register and other documents.”

I had no words. Wasn’t the guy working too hard? And why did it seem like Miss Eldritch did absolutely nothing?

“I asked him to get material for yesterday’s report, too, but... for some reason, he’s not getting up from bed.”

“Overwork! That’s your reason!” I shouted.

Tsukikage! You’re pampering this cosmic horror too much!

“Seriously, don’t you think you’re working him too hard...?” I added.

“But I’m working, too. I wrote the report myself, and handed it in before the deadline,” she said with a smile, and puffed up her chest.

“So this is where you were, president,” a familiar voice came from behind. It was Kozue Fujibayashi, AKA B3.

“O-Ohh... B? Wh-What’s up...?” asked Miss Aberration. Her smile was looking a bit stiff.

“Your mobile is off, so I went looking for you. Associate Professor Miyano left us a message in the club room.”

“No! I don’t wanna hear it!” the aberration wailed as she closed her ears and shook her head.

B3 ignored this and delivered the death sentence. “‘You need to fix the report. The deadline is 9PM today.’”

The aberration made Tsukikage work so hard, and yet couldn’t even handle the report? I feel for the guy...

“Nooo...! I don’t wanna go through that again! B! Do it for me!”

“Who do you think you’re asking? We’re in different years and departments. Give up and go back to editing the report. And turn your mobile back on.”

She clearly turned it off because she knew this would happen, I thought.

“Nooo...! Help me, Kage!”

You mean the person who collapsed because of you?

Miss Aberration continued to whine for a few moments before finishing her tea and snacks and returning to the club room to fix the report. She’d always been just this indefinable, morally-grey cosmic horror to me, but now I knew that she could be a normal college student, too.

“So... She has bad grades?” I asked B3.

“Not bad or good. They’re normal. It’s just that she is juggling her studies and being the leader of The Lunar Society, so all the lacking bits really stand out.”

That makes Tsukikage seem... really amazing.

“Anyway,” said B3 as she took Miss Aberration’s seat. “Haven’t seen you in four days. In reality, anyway.”

Chasing after Miss Eldritch had worn her out, so she was sitting down to take a breather, and I’d be damned if she didn’t deserve it.

“That’s true. We just met on Friday,” I said. But on the other side, she’d been with me all the way through the events at Torne until returning to the capital. “Still, you get a few more days if you add the time in Infinite Dendrogram.”

“True,” she agreed.

The tripled time never ceased to weird me out.

“How was it at your parents’ place? Did it all work out?” I asked.

“Yes. The tea ceremony went by without a problem.”

Her family back in Kyoto were practitioners of the Way of Tea, and when everyone there had caught a cold, she was called to fill in.

I was glad to hear it had gone well.

“I returned here yesterday, after cleaning up and catching up with my family,” she said. “You seemed to have a hard time, though... I saw the video.”

“Ohh...” So Fujibayashi was more informed than Miss Aberration.

“You really like going head-first into trouble, don’t you?” she commented.

“I’d say that trouble likes coming to me,” I replied. Then again, I’d gone there to get the Prism Rider job. No one had forced me. So maybe you could say I’d jumped into trouble on my own.

“Sorry I couldn’t help you,” Fujibayashi went on. “Are you still in Quartierlatin?”

“Yes. I still have something to do there.”

Quartierlatin now had many quests related to the town’s restoration and the ruins. I was fine with returning to Gideon next weekend, so I’d decided to hang around Quartierlatin for now. Besides, Azurite had said she’d stay there until Thursday, Earth time.

“Then I will go there tomorrow,” Fujibayashi said. “I can’t come online today because I’m also busy with reports for college.”

“Okay. I’ll be waiting.”

We chatted about recent happenings and enjoyed some tea for awhile.

“By the way, this is unrelated, but...” Fujibayashi seemed to have remembered something. “I have something to tell you about Hell General.”

“What about him?” I asked as I remembered the devil-wielder.

“Tonight... or more like tomorrow... he’s going to have a duel for his throne.”

“Well, he is the first in the imperium’s duel rankings. It seems a bit sudden, though.”

“I’m sure he knows the general opinion about him and wants to fix it as soon as possible. Thus, the duel.”

Basically, he’d found out about the video and wanted to restore his reputation where he had the home field advantage — the duel arena.

Since the arenas returned all the items you used, he was absolutely free to summon the Mythical devil he hadn’t been able to summon against me. It was definitely the best place for him to show his power.

“Though, I can’t be sure if he will win this one,” Fujibayashi said after a sip of her tea.

“Why?”

Mythicals were two tiers above the Legendary Gigaknights I’d faced. If he was free to summon them, I was guessing he’d have the win in the bag.

Fujibayashi answered briefly, but told me everything I needed to know in a few simple words: “Because he’s up against another Superior.”

Side Story: Crime and Invitation

April 5th, 2045, Imperial Capital, Vandelheim, Noble District.

The countries on the continent all had capitals with a similar design.

They all had a central building, such as a royal castle. It was surrounded by the noble district, which was surrounded by commoner houses and stores. Vandelheim was basically that, too — it was built around the Imperstand.

The only notable difference was that its outskirts had military bases, and research facilities like The Triangle of Wisdom's headquarters.

The noble district of the city had recently begun housing people other than nobles... specifically, Superiors and Masters important to the imperium.

But those who used them well were few. Franklin had a residence, but it was unused because he always slept at The Triangle of Wisdom's headquarters. The King of Beasts had one, too, but due to that Master's long absences, the only people living there were some servants who regularly cleaned the place.

Out of the two new Superiors, one had simply refused the residence by saying, "Unneeded."

However, the other newcomer, the King of Chariots, Murdoch Martinez, now made good use of his, going as far as to use the attached garage for his hobby of tank maintenance. He also occasionally went to the outskirts to have some fun with his subordinates and Embryo in some tank battles using mock shells, so he really seemed to enjoy his new life here in the imperium.

Now, Dryfe had one more Superior. It was the Hell General, Logan Goddhart.

As a veteran Dryfean Superior right behind the King of Beasts, he obviously had his own noble residence and generally lived there. He had a large number of servants, and it was safe to say that he was the Master who led the most noble-like life in the noble district.

However, he was now curled up in his own bed. "Nhh! Nngh!" he cried into the pillow he was holding tightly. It didn't suit the beautiful young man represented by his avatar, but it was something you might expect from his real self — a boy in elementary school.

The reason for his crying was simple — he'd lost again. First, he'd lost in Quartierlatin, against the newbie, Ray Starling. Then, he'd lost against Franklin, who'd recorded his fight against Ray and uploaded it to the Internet. And now, he'd lost his third fight... along with his throne at the top of the duel rankings.

"Damn it... Damn it...!" he sobbed.

The first loss could be portrayed as an accident, and the second loss could be seen as the result of a trap, but the third loss, which had happened in his own domain on the arena, left him completely devastated.

The person he'd just lost against was someone who'd climbed up to the second place in the duel rankings at an amazing speed.

She was the King of Thieves, Zeta — one of the two new Superiors in the imperium. She was originally from Granvaloa, but something had led to her being put on the seafaring country's wanted list.

After many twists and turns, she'd ended up signing a contract with the imperator and becoming part of the imperium. Then she'd risen up the duel rankings at an incredible speed, and then finally faced Logan.

It had been, for all intents and purposes, a Clash of the Superiors for the champion's throne.

Logan definitely hadn't been holding back in that battle. In fact, he'd felt he had to win it at all costs, so he'd faced the challenger without any conceit. And yet, he'd ended up losing without as much as scratching her.

"What the hell was that?!" he screamed, remembering it.

Right after the start of the duel, Logan had started to summon Zero Exceed. However, for some reason, he hadn't been able to say a single word needed for the summoning of the devil.

Then his vision had drowned in red.

Whatever she'd done, blood had started flowing out of his eyes and nostrils, while the blood still inside started to boil.

He'd tried to counter it, but Zeta had closed the distance between them at supersonic speeds, and then, without even scratching his skin or armor, she'd stolen his heart in the most literal sense. Logan had watched, utterly baffled, as she'd casually crushed it in her hand.

All he understood was that the final attack was the ultimate job skill of the King of Thieves.

The inability to speak, the bleeding, and the blood boiling were all a complete mystery to him. He'd never experienced such a fight while rising up the imperium's duel rankings.

Surely the only one there who had understood everything, audience included, was Zeta herself. All everyone knew now was that Logan was no longer Dryfe's duel champion.

Once that realization had spread, the arena had drowned in cheering, and Logan had fled back to his residence, as if to escape them.

"Those fricks...!" he cursed.

The passion from the audience made it seem as though they'd wanted him to lose, and that was nothing but the truth.

Logan had only been the duel champion because of his ability to crush all his duel opponents by summoning Mythical devils for literally no expense whatsoever.

His battles were always the same: summon Mythical devil and win. Even if he was up against someone stronger, he'd just summon more and maybe sprinkle some Legendaries here and there. All of his battles had been won the same way.

The only Dryfean Master capable of facing multiple enhanced Mythical devils was the King of Beasts. However, the imperium's strongest didn't participate in duels, so Logan's matches had always ended up becoming nothing but Logan's summoning shows.

Watching something like that was more like a chore than a duel.

The audience hadn't been pleased, and the duel rankers had lost a lot of their motivation.

All of that was more than enough reason to cheer for Logan's defeat.

"Gh..." Logan moaned. He felt completely crushed to have lost at something he'd thought he couldn't lose, and that no one had wanted him to win. After burying his face in the pillow for a good few hours, Logan whispered, "Maybe I should quit Dendro..."

He'd become a Superior, the duel champion, and had held some of the greatest war potential in Dryfe. He'd believed he was at the top of Infinite Dendrogram.

Little boy that he was, he had little life experience, and thought he was better than everyone. This game had affirmed his delusion and satisfied his pride.

But now, after three defeats and the loss of his position, the pain and embarrassment made him want to quit, which, again, was very much like the little boy that he was.

Without Logan, the imperium would become a far weaker foe in the war. However, since he was about to quit, Logan didn't care about what would happen in this game. He activated the logout timer and prepared to leave Infinite Dendrogram for good.

"Restraint. I am stopping your escape." A certain person placed a hand on his shoulder, stopping the logout process.

"Eh...? You...?!" Logan jumped away and brandished the Viledragon's Prideblade, Woltgyzur.

His weapon was aimed at a strange person fully covered in bandages.

It was none other than the one who'd defeated him and became the new duel champion: the King of Thieves, Zeta.

"No one let you in here!" he yelled. "What do you want?!"

His tone as he said that wasn't that of the "Logan" avatar he played, but the little boy he was in real life. However, neither he nor Zeta seemed to care.

"Response. I have an offer for you," she simply answered his question.

Her manner of speech was strange, but Logan could understand it. "Offer...?"

"Addendum. Before I speak of it, allow me to say that I heard you mumble about retiring. That would be inconvenient, so I am stopping you."

Logan said nothing. He realized that she hadn't just appeared out of nowhere; she'd been hiding in this room, watching him.

He wanted to sue her for violation of privacy, but crimes between Masters couldn't be taken to the court of law, so that wasn't something he could do.

Of course, since Logan was underage, he had special restrictions and protections put on him. If Zeta had done something inappropriate, she'd have received a penalty, but Logan didn't realize that.

"I'm not talking to someone who sneaks into people's rooms! Get out!" he shouted.

"Appeasement," Zeta replied. "Please do not be upset. I apologize for sneaking in, but the offer I have is one you will like."

"I will?"

"Affirmative. Specifically, I can provide you with a plan to make you a lot stronger than you are now."

"Ah...!" That was something that he, defeated three times in a row now, couldn't ignore.

He really wanted to become stronger and show all those who'd wished for his defeat who was boss.

However, since the person making the offer was the one responsible for the third defeat, Logan wasn't sure about this.

"Can you even do that...?" he ventured.

"Affirmative. We have a unique compiled database, using which we can give you several sub-job plans that suit you. Additionally..." She fell silent before continuing. "We can provide info about a maximum of eighteen undefeated UBMs."

Surprise filled Logan's face.

"I can even give you one right now." Zeta took out some sort of orb.

Logan looked at it. He didn't know what it was, but he could tell that it was related to UBMs.

"What's that?" he asked.

"Answer. A Treasurebeast orb. It is not an item, though."

"Hm?"

"Treasure. A national treasure from the eastern empire of Huang He."

"National treasure?"

Zeta nodded and said, "Beast. It has a UBM sealed inside."

Those words surprised Logan.

"Statement. You can have this one... and I will give you info about all the UBMs whose locations I know."

"...!" Logan wanted that so badly, he almost jumped on it.

Logan's trump card, Call Devil Exceed, required MVP special rewards to work.

He'd originally had three of them, but he'd used one up in his battle against the Celestial Knight, then another against Ray — which he ended up using against Franklin — and now, he only had the Viledragon's Prideblade.

MVP rewards could be great sacrifices and gear, and Logan desperately needed UBMs that could drop them for him.

"If I had that..." he began.

...I could play Dendro again, he finished silently.

However, he was also suspicious. He could understand if she just wanted to give him a job plan to make him stronger, but UBM locations and UBMs themselves were just too great of a treasure. Defeating them gave amazing prizes, so you'd expect any capable Masters to go after them themselves.

And there was no way that Zeta, who'd mysteriously, yet easily, defeated Logan, wasn't capable.

Why would she just give such valuable information to Logan?

What did she want in return?

His suspicion was about as great as his desire.

"...What do you expect to gain by making me stronger?"

"Sound. I am here to sound you out about something," Zeta said, then looked at Logan with her eyes peeking through the bandages on her face before continuing. "Invitation. I invite you to join our clan, Illegal Frontier."

Illegal Frontier, otherwise known as "I.F." It was the most infamous clan, led by the King of Crime, Sechs Würfel, and made up exclusively of Superiors on wanted lists all over.

Zeta was part of it, and she was inviting Logan.

"I.F...? That I.F?" he asked.

"Affirmative," Zeta nodded. "With the Quartierlatin incident, you are officially on the kingdom's wanted list. That gives you the qualifications."

Logan's actions in the war hadn't been considered a crime because they'd happened in wartime. However, the incident at Quartierlatin had been clearly outside of it, and Logan was now among the kingdom's wanted.

That made him a Superior on a wanted list.

"But what are you guys even planning?" he asked.

That question was only natural. I.F. was infamous for being a clan made up of only wanted Superiors. Other than that, their nature and goals were a mystery.

No matter how great the rewards were for joining, Logan couldn't bring himself to accept without knowing that much.

Zeta understood that, and so... "Explanation. We aim to..."

...she began telling him about their goal.

◆

“That sounds great!” was the first thing Logan said ten minutes later.

And for the first time in a while, he was genuinely excited.

“Question. Do you like our goal?” asked Zeta.

“Yeah. I want in on that, too. And if I’m also getting UBM info, then I have no complaints. Though, hold on a second...”

Zeta tilted her head, wondering what he’d say.

“This country has another Superior who’s on a wanted list.”

Needless to say, that was Franklin. If the mad scientist would also be invited to Illegal Frontier, Logan couldn’t join it.

However, Zeta shook her head. “Denied. We will not invite Mr. Franklin.”

“Why? I know I shouldn’t say this, but...” Logan couldn’t bring himself to finish the sentence with, “He’s stronger than me now.”

“Unfit. The person in question could not exhibit his true power with I.F. And more importantly, he is not in gear with us.”

“Hm...?” Logan couldn’t understand what Zeta meant, but he did understand that Franklin wouldn’t be invited by I.F.

That left him with no reason to hesitate.

“All right,” he said. “Then I’ll gladly join the clan... and take the payment, of course.”

“Reception. Welcome, new member.” They exchanged a handshake.

“So, when should I leave Dryfe?” Logan asked.

“Hold. Stay with the country for now. I will contact you when the time is right.”

“All right... I can’t wait.”

“Training. Until then, I will provide you with a plan to make you stronger.”

“All right. I’ll play along. Uhh... Don’t disappoint me.”

“Certainly. You will have clear results.”

And so, Logan and Zeta were now on the same side.

This was the moment when a third faction began tangling itself in the intrigue of the Altarian-Dryfean war.

Episode Three: Sister

April 4th, 2045, Reiji Mukudori

I returned home from college to find something in the mail: the foreign sweets I'd asked my sister to send me.

It was pretty fast, considering she'd just called two days ago. It was also delivered by a company I never heard of, but that wasn't that strange — my sister had connections.

Just to be safe, I looked up the confectioner and product online, and sure enough, got a decent number of search results. After confirming it wasn't weird in some way, I threw one in my mouth, and it was a proper, delicious sweet.

Nothing weird happened even after a few minutes post-eating, so I was now completely sure it was safe. A part of me thought I was being too wary of my own sister, but this was necessary. She was the one who'd casually asked me if I wanted to go to the jungle, and then actually taken me there when I'd said yes.

I still wondered how she'd taken me to South America when I hadn't even had a passport. Honestly, it felt like I'd just... suddenly found myself flying over a jungle in a small plane, and then...

"Gh... Thinking about it makes my head hurt."

The point was that I'd learned to exercise an appropriate amount of caution when dealing with her. However, I didn't think that she bore any ill will. Whatever she did with me, she did out of kindness.

Even that traumatizing trip had probably been nothing more than her taking advantage of her work trip to South America to show her little brother what jungles were like. She certainly hadn't intended to endanger my life and chastity.

I still didn't really know why I had been chased around by Amazons or why the jungle had ended up on fire.

It was probably a rude thing to think... but my sister was quite abnormal as a living being. That probably affected her standard for me. There was also the fact that her first little brother, Shu, was also quite the superhuman.

Compared to them, I was pretty normal, so I knew I always had to be cautious with her. I felt that it was an inviolable rule necessary to my survival.

Still, I wouldn't forget to send a "thank you" email to her. She scared me like hell, but she was a dear part of my family and not a bad person.

"I've gotta say, these are pretty good," I muttered. Since they looked really safe so far, I began trying out the sweets for real.

I'd just had some chou à la crèmes at the college's café, but these were simple chocolates, so I still had plenty of room for them. College had exhausted my brain more than I'd expected, so my body needed the sugar, too.

I also hadn't rested at all in the café because of Miss Eldritch.

"Speaking of chocolate... there's Valentine's Day in Dendro, right?" I murmured.

Special as it was with its full-dive capabilities, Infinite Dendrogram had planned events, just like any common MMO. Most were based on real seasonal events, such as Christmas or Valentine's Day. I'd started in the latter half of March, though, so I'd missed both Valentine's and White Day.

I had yet to experience any seasonal event, actually. There had been two Valentine's Day events so far, and I had no idea what they were like.

"Did Shu and the others participate?" I wondered.

Shu, Figaro, and Miss Eldritch had been playing since launch, so they must've seen a whole bunch of events.

"I wonder what Valentine's was like... I'll have to ask them."

Valentine's Day was associated with love, so it must've been a peaceful, sweet time.

Side Story: Valentine's Day of 2044

February 14, 2044

Figaro logged in to Infinite Dendrogram and was welcomed by his friend saying:

"Figgy, let's hop off and hunt for chocolate."

His friend was none other than Shu Starling, wearing a two meter-tall animal costume.

The clumsy inclusion of "hop" was him making a pun, for he was wearing the "Hyper Costume Series, Cyclone Pocket" — a costume he'd gained from an UBM that looked much like a kangaroo.

He also emphasized his "roo"s and even added them where they didn't belong.

Figaro silently looked at him, remembering some of Shu's previous costumes. He made bear puns when wearing the bear costume, but when wearing the wolf costume, he just threw in the occasional "woof." How does he decide between puns and animal sounds? he wondered.

He chose not to ask, though, for there was something more important.

"'Hunt' for chocolate? Not receive it?" Even Figaro understood where this talk about chocolate came from.

In the real world, it was Valentine's Day — a special occasion in both Christian and non-religious places. Figaro had already received chocolates in real life.

Though his inborn heart disease had him bound to his house for medical reasons, he had still received chocolates from his mother, the maids working at his house, and his little brother Keith, for some reason.

Figaro was sickly, and one of the symptoms of his disease was the spasms that happened every time his heart rate rose above a certain point. Because of it, he couldn't exercise to lose calories, and the increase in heart rate from overeating could kill him, so he could only enjoy the chocolate he was gifted in small bites.

Even so, he really appreciated the love they had put into them.

“Yeah. We’re v-roo-ming through the Valentine’s Event!” Shu shouted.

“Oh... That’s a thing...?”

At first, women handing men chocolate on Valentine’s Day had been a Japan-only thing. A certain confectioner had created the practice in the twentieth century.

In the West, the go-to gifts were flowers and sweets of any kind, and the gender of the giving party was never a question.

However, by the fourth decade of the twenty-first century, the constant flow of culture had led to the Japanese practice spreading to the West, and being a worldwide VRMMO, Infinite Dendrogram reflected this.

There were also events for the more local occasions, such as the Japanese Setsubun.

“This one’s like Halloween and Setsubun,” Shu explained. “Monsters that drop chocolate spawn on the map. You’re supposed to stuff your pouch full of them and exchange them for prizes.”

“Ah. So it’s not the chocolate that’s the prize?”

“Yep. You’ve gotta exchange it. Though I hear it’s so tasty, it makes you d-roo-l.”

“Oh? So you have people who try to eat an exchange item, huh?”

The event had begun twelve hours ago in real-life time. The seasonal events generally began when the real-life holiday began in the time zone furthest ahead, and ended when it ended in the time zone furthest behind, making it last a total of 48 real life hours.

That translated to six days in Dendro, which was a standard amount of time for an event.

Side note: the number of people online had dropped during the Christmas event.

Those who were online, however, were extremely passionate about it... but it was best to not ask for the reason.

“I get that it’s a hunt, but why are you asking me?” asked Figaro.

You know I can’t handle myself properly when I’m not solo, he added silently, knowing that Shu would understand.

“That’s ’cause this event’s special.”

“It is?”

Shu nodded and said, “Only couples can kill the monsters for this event. I’m roo-seless alone.”

“Hm...?”

According to Shu, this was an event where you had to make parties of two and kill the monsters the devs spawned.

Those monsters couldn’t be harmed and couldn’t harm you if you weren’t in a party of two.

This was surely done out of consideration for non-participants, tians, and monster ecosystems. The devs tended to think such things through.

What made this a Valentine’s Day event was that a party of two was a couple swearing their love for each other. The devs were fine with homosexuality, so the gender composition of the party didn’t matter at all.

They didn’t allow pairing up with monsters, though — both party members had to be humanoid creatures.

“I haven’t found anyone else to pair with me, so I’m asking roo,” said Shu. “I’ll do all the fighting, and we can split the rewards evenly.”

“I don’t mind. I didn’t have anything planned besides a trip down the Tomb Labyrinth,” Figaro replied. “But I find it odd that you didn’t find anyone to pair with yet.”

Shu was an eccentric weirdo who constantly wore animal costumes, but he was pretty popular, so Figaro would have guessed he’d have no trouble finding someone to pair with.

“Lei-Lei’s busy in real life, Darshan’s got the restaurant to take care of, and everyone else already has a pair. And those roo don’t, well...”

“Well...?”

“I quote... ‘it’d give me pain to be treated as a couple with a guy in an animal costume,’ ‘I’d feel like a lonely office lady who went to Disneyland,’ and, ‘Take it off. Please, take it off.’”

“‘Take it off’? Now that’s asking for too much of you.”

“Hell, this is all because of... Forget it, I won’t go too deep into it.”

“Hm?”

The actual reasons why the girls had refused had nothing to do with Shu’s costume and everything to do with their relationship situations in real life, but since Figaro had no love experience whatsoever, he wouldn’t understand that.

He understood affection between family members, but he knew absolutely nothing about the more passionate kind of love. If he had been just a bit more sensitive to subtleties of that kind, this incident might’ve gone differently.

◇

Regardless, Figaro agreed to form a party with Shu and participate in the event, even if as just an observer.

“Let’s v-roo-m off northwest!” Shu shouted.

There were event monsters spawning around the capital, too, but Shu didn’t hunt there, since their strength and the value of chocolate dropped was adjusted to fit the local level ranges.

Also, since they’d been part of the first wave of players, they were already in their fifth forms, and it would be immature for veterans like them to steal kills from the newbies.

Thus, they were now riding Shu’s Baldr’s fourth form, the tank, northwest of the capital, where he could find monsters of his level.

“Not using the battleship?” asked Figaro.

“Not for simple traveling. Roo have no idea how much it stands out.”

Baldr’s fifth form was a land battleship only as big as a light cruiser.

“Also, the ammo costs are roodiculous,” he added, sighing at just how expensive his Embryo had become. “I’ll use the fourth and my fists this time.”

Standing on the tank’s cupola, he did a check on his weapons and items. In its tank form, Baldr could be remote-controlled or put on autopilot. He could use it as one of the self-driving vehicles that had become popular in real life and make it drive him to his destination without him lifting a finger.

Baldr would automatically attack the occasional monsters popping up on the way, and all their drops would go to Shu’s Cyclone Pocket’s “pouch.” This was the item’s unique skill, High-Speed Auto-Retrieve, which, true to its name, automatically retrieved all items he had a right to.

While a UBM, “Whirlwind Beast of Ill-Omen, Cyclone Pocket” had been a frustrating monster that automatically retrieved the items people held in their hands and even projectiles flying at it, so you could say that the MVP special reward skill was a big downgrade.

As for how Shu had beaten it... he’d simply made Baldr go into fifth form and fire its proximity shells at it. Cyclone Pocket had absorbed them all, and the explosions right before they were stored away had made short work of its HP.

It was probably the easiest UBM kill Shu'd had so far. The proximity shells had cost a lot, though, so getting back the money lost had taken some effort.

"By the way, what kind of monsters do we have this time?" Figaro asked.

Events generally had monsters related to the events.

Setsubun had featured oni and bean bag monsters, while New Year's had featured rat monsters, since that was the Chinese zodiac for the year.

Because of this, Figaro thought Valentine's Day monsters would be chocolate monsters, but...

"Girls," Shu said.

"...Huh?"

"Pretty girl monsters. Crooture type: devil."

Figaro had no words.

Though he was a musclehead battle junkie, he was still Christian, so he wondered why a celebration of love involved devils or why there'd even be an event focused on stealing chocolate from girls.

Then he realized that he was about to watch a kangaroo riding a tank massacre girls for their chocolate.

Instead of questioning any of it, he just said one thing. "What are the devs thinking?"

"I'm pretty sure the control AI in charge of events doesn't actually know what Valentine's Day is," said Shu. "Those devils also throw chocolate and absorb three times the damage they deal."

That's not what it means to return it three-fold!

A few hours later, the two arrived at their destination.

With monsters of level 51 and above lurking about, it was the perfect hunting ground for a high-rank like Shu.

He'd intended to start hunting the event monsters right away, but...

"That's not an event monster, is it?" Figaro asked.

"I don't see a name above it," Shu agreed.

In the area, they were facing a strange entity.

It wasn't an event monster, nor a Master hunting them.

It looked like two towering, metal legs that skipped around with lightness you wouldn't expect from their size and earthquake-causing weight.

Additionally, there were Master-like people where it was heading, and you could see them being crushed and turned to light.

The most bizarre thing about this place, however...

"AHAHAHAHHA! CRUSH! I'LL CRUSH YOU ALL! IT'S WHAT ALL BOYFRIENDS AND HOMEWRECKERS DESERVE!"

...was the feminine roar echoing from the top of the legs.

The two watched the scene, not saying a word. They were skilled Masters who'd already faced many foes, so they were able to make a quick, calm analysis of the situation.

The shouting woman was a Master.

The large metal legs were her Embryo.

The fact that she was crushing Masters in this high-level area meant that she was really strong.

Her legs were making them scatter with next to no effort on her part.

However, anything that came from such analysis meant nothing compared to the searing hatred in her voice.

Shu instantly understood that, She's the type you shouldn't get involved with.

Figaro, on the other hand, thought, She looks strong. I wanna fight her.

That might've been the reason why there was such a gap in the amount of danger they felt. Figaro knew nothing of love, so he couldn't understand just how deadly the grudge in that voice really was.

"We're hoppin' away from that," said Shu as he turned Baldr 180 degrees, determined to leave as soon as possible.

"Eh...? Ah. Okay," Figaro replied, slightly disappointed. But then... the hellish voice rang out above them.

"IS THAAAT A COUPLE I SEEEEE?!"

They looked up and saw the metallic legs. Not saying a word, the two silently analyzed the situation again. The scariest thing about this was that neither of them had noticed her come close.

They both had exceptional intuition, of course. Therefore, this had to be teleportation or something similar.

She'd also come to them after killing every single Master on the map, making it even clearer that she'd be a tough foe to fight. While Shu thought that they were in for some trouble, Figaro was excited.

Shu started out by trying to communicate, “Uhh... We’re just—”

“Eh? What?” She unexpectedly cut him off. “There’s a guy in that costume?”

You could tell by her voice that she was surprised by something. A few seconds later, she asked, “Are you a gay couple?”

“No,” Shu and Figaro replied in perfect unison.

“Then all’s goooood... Hold on a second.”

Suddenly, the hellish thundering subsided, the towering metal “legs” vanished, and a woman descended from the sky.

It was worth noting that it was over 100 meters worth of free fall, and she went down with great energy and splendor.

The woman was in her mid-twenties, and looked reasonably beautiful. However, her beauty didn’t seem to extend beyond her appearance.

“My name is Hannya,” she said. “Sorry if I surprised you.”

Her voice was nice to listen to — nothing like the curses she’d spewed while PKing.

That just makes her even scarier, Shu thought.

And why the hell would you name yourself after a Noh mask, of all things?

“I’m Shu,” he greeted her, cautiously, for he was experienced enough to know just how scary and complex women could be.

“And I’m Figaro. Nice to meet you,” said Figaro, as casually as ever, for he knew absolutely nothing about such things.

Shu appreciated that he was acting natural, but was also worried that he could step on a landmine.

“Oh, yeah. You say hi, too, Sandalphon,” said the woman.

“Yes. Right away.” Following the voice from her crest, it began to glow and released her Embryo.

And what a strange Embryo it was.

It looked human. That alone wasn’t strange. Both Shu and Figaro had seen human-like Guardians and girl-Embryos — the Maidens.

But this Embryo was different.

Unlike human-like Guardians, it didn’t have any inhuman parts, such as a tail or horns, but unlike Maidens, it wasn’t a girl... but a boy.

Not an androgynous girl, but very clearly a boy. Shu could tell.

It was their first time seeing an Embryo that looked like a human boy.

"My name is Sandalphon," he said. "My Type is Apostle-Angel Gear."

Neither Figaro or Shu had ever heard of "Apostle" or "Angel Gear" Types. Though they had a guess that the latter was a category unique to him, developed from either Arms or Chariot.

Regardless of what he was, his power was immense.

The ground Sandalphon had tread on looked completely ravaged.

The event monsters were fine, though, since they could only be harmed by couples.

"There weren't any tians here, were there?" muttered Shu. "This'd be a real calamity if there were."

"Don't worry," said the woman with a mild smile. "He has the ability to differentiate NPCs and Masters, so there aren't any dead NPCs here. I don't have any grudge against them, so I don't want to kill them."

So what you're saying is that you have a grudge against Masters and want to kill them, Shu thought, sweating inside his costume.

"Why're roo going around cursing and PKing?" he asked Hannya.

"Because couples are the enemy."

"And you didn't attack us because...?"

"You're not a couple."

Ah. We've got a walking pile of complications here. Best not pry deeper, Shu thought, setting his mind on changing the subject.

He was so careful with her that he even decided to refrain from using his puns.

However, that went to waste when Figaro asked, "Why are couples the enemy?"

"FIGGYYYYYYY!" Shu groaned.

The peaceful meathead at his side clearly didn't notice the darkness surrounding her love life.

Hannya began answering Figaro's question. "It happened 52 days ago... or about five months ago here."

"...Ah," Shu said as he realized what day that meant. Like Valentine's, that was also a day tightly linked to love.

"Yes, it was Christmas," she continued. "Back then, I had a boyfriend I was dating with the intention to marry him."

Her eyes were calm and her tone was nostalgic, but Shu knew that this was basically like the peace you felt while going up a tall roller coaster.

Her emotional state would soon go downhill. Figaro, of course, was clueless, and just listened to her story.

"I knitted a sweater, scarf, and gloves for him, and made a full course Christmas dinner for both of us. I even baked a three-layered cake. I even had a marriage registration and betrothal money. I was fully prepared for him to propose to me."

Damn, you're overbearing, Shu thought, and praised himself for not saying it.

Figaro, on the other hand, simply thought, That's impressive.

"But he didn't come to my room at the time we agreed on..." Hannya continued.

"Here it comes..." Shu murmured.

"Huh? What do you mean?" Figaro asked.

You wouldn't understand... Shu thought.

"I called and messaged him over and over and got no response until, about an hour later, he just wrote, 'Let's break up.'"

Shu said nothing.

"Why?" Figaro asked her.

Hannya opened her eyes wide, cracked a joyless smile and said, "'I found someone I like more in Infinite Dendrogram, and we're now going out in real life. Sorry.' Ahahahah..."

It was definitely a sad thing, in at least one way, if not a few.

Shu dedicated a moment to think about it. Real love born through MMO relationships and online game marriages had existed for almost half a century now.

And this was Infinite Dendrogram. A world as real and realistic as this gave plenty of room for love to blossom. Epic fights against powerful monsters could also produce a good suspension bridge effect.

Over half a year had passed since release, and you had more and more Masters marrying other Masters or even tians. There was even a term for it now: Dendromony.

However...

"WHY. WAS I LEFT. BECAUSE OF A DAMN GAAAAAAME?!" the woman screamed.

Yes, whether someone who was left for such a reason could accept it was an entirely different matter.

Shu knew that everyone loved differently, and that all loves had different origins. However, he wished that people would at least give their loves a clean conclusion. Otherwise, you could create people like Hannya — desperate and hurt creatures who went around causing trouble for others.

"Ah," Figaro said, seeming to realize something. "Are you in Dendro to...?"

"TO CRUSH MY EX AND THAT THIEVING HOMEWRECKEEEERRRR!" she screamed her desire, crying profusely.

Sandalphon went to pat her on the back. He looked used to it, so this must've been common.

I'd like it if you didn't bring real-life drama here, Shu thought with a sigh.

"Hoo, hoo... Sorry. This happens whenever I remember it... Sorry." The scream worked as an outlet for her emotions, letting her calm down a bit.

Just a bit, though.

"Can't you settle this in real life?" Shu asked. "Take him to court and make him pay for the emotional damage or something?"

"I've already been filed with a restraining order. That got me a criminal record, and I was fired for it, but I can still get my revenge on him here."

"You got physical with him before trying to solve it lawfully?" Shu mumbled.

She didn't hear him and just began reciting what she'd gone through so far. "Once I got on Dendro to get my revenge, I started in Caldina, since it's in the middle of the continent and I thought I'd quickly find him there. No luck, though. I then went to the west, since he likes Europe more than Asia. The time we went on a trip to Italy on my money, he—"

"Yeah, uhh... I get it," said Shu. "And why did you go around crushing all the couples here?"

"Because they all seemed like him and the homewrecker to me. I mean, I don't know what they look like here, and I don't even know the thief's name. That's why I'll treat all couples as them and C R U S H. T H E M. A L L."

Damn it, woman, you're one big step into insanity, Shu thought before saying, "You said you don't know their faces or her name. Do you know the guy's name?"

“Yes. He had a blog called ‘RockPanther’s Dendro Tour,’ so it has to be ‘RockPanther.’ But the blog didn’t get a lot of clicks, and he shut it down after I flamed it.”

“Flamed... Uh huh, okay. ‘RockPanther,’ right? Gimme a moment.”

“For what?”

“I think I might be able to find the guy...”

“Really?” Hannya asked while looking at Shu with eyes bordering on demonic.

There was no room for lies or jokes here.

Shu refrained from emphasizing the “might” and just said that he’d ask an informant he knew.

Then Shu walked away from Hannya and took something out of his inventory.

It was a luxury item imbued with communication magic, given only to the best customers of a certain information broker: the DIN.

You could only use it to communicate with DIN workers who had the receiver, but unlike most comms magic devices, you could use it just about anywhere.

“Uhh... Hey, it’s me,” Shu began talking to the informant. “I need you to find someone...”

She’ll probably attack us if they don’t find him, Shu added silently.

While he was busy with that, Figaro was talking to Hannya.

“By the way, you look pretty strong. What’s your job and Embryo form?” he asked.

She could absolutely crush skilled players who were hunting in this high-level area, so there was no doubt she was powerful.

Figaro, the battle-junkie that he was, also wondered if she would be up for a duel.

“Job... What was mine, again?” Hannya asked a seemingly impossible question. It wasn’t a joke or anything like that, though — she had actually forgotten her job.

Her revenge on her ex occupied such a large part of her that she couldn’t care about anything else.

“You are now the King of Berserk, Lady Hannya,” Sandalphon helped her.

“Oh yeah, that’s it,” Hannya nodded.

"...A Superior Job," Figaro muttered in amazement.

Indeed — the King of Berserk was the Superior Job from the berserker grouping.

If she was telling the truth, she'd earned it within just fifty days since starting Dendro, which was simply staggering, even when you took into account the tripled time.

Even Figaro was still just aiming for the gladiator grouping's Superior Job.

Granted, the only reason why he didn't have it yet was simply that one of the conditions was to be first in the duel rankings. He'd already cleared the other two.

Figaro was currently second, and he was preparing to beat the first — Tom Cat.

By the way, while Hannya didn't remember any of the conditions, and Sandalphon was too ashamed to say it, one of the King of Berserk's conditions was basically unclearable.

It was: "To kill 444 humans within 10 seconds of seeing them."

Berserking at its finest.

No sane person would even attempt it, and even if they would, they probably couldn't do it. Unless you'd preemptively decided to kill everyone, you could never decide whether to kill someone and then do it within ten seconds.

In the time when there were only tians, you'd be hunted down and punished as a murderer. Those who'd tried it were many, but none had succeeded, making the King of Berserk into a true lost job.

Masters would've probably attempted it with other Masters, but as mentioned above, this condition had been completely buried by the time Dendro was released.

There were probably berserker grouping Masters doing this and that, trying to figure out how to get the Superior Job, completely unaware that it had already been taken.

Now, though this condition was something you normally couldn't and wouldn't clear, the fact that she was the King of Berserk was all the proof you needed that she could and had done it.

This was due to Sandalphon's skill that allowed him to differentiate Masters from tians, and due to Hannya being a dangerous person who instantly killed any Master couple she saw.

As a result of her shenanigans, she had inadvertently cleared the long-buried condition for the King of Berserk, and taken the job.

“And my current form is six,” Sandalphon continued.

“Six... Amazing,” Figaro said.

Neither Shu nor Figaro were there yet. He did feel like his evolution was close, but it was still five.

“He’s an ‘Apostle,’ right? Maybe they evolve quickly,” Figaro guessed.

“Maybe,” said Hannya. “I only know Sandalphon, though, so I can’t be sure...”

“I barely see my own kind,” said Sandalphon. “I wonder why?”

There was a time when a thing called “category-based personality analysis” had enjoyed decent popularity. It was simply personality guessing based on people’s Embryo’s base categories, so Figaro wondered what kind of personality the super-rare Apostle represented.

Then, he noticed Hannya looking at him weirdly.

“What?” he asked.

“Well... I just felt like it’s been so long since I’ve had a proper conversation. I don’t think I’ve talked to anyone since my ex left me. Except Sandalphon, I guess.”

“Indeed,” the Apostle said. “As far as I can remember, this is the first time.”

Of course it was.

She was a PKer who went on a rampage the moment she saw a Master couple, and the onlookers would see her as a rabid dog, if not worse. She herself knew that she was weird, but that awareness wasn’t enough to hold back her emotions.

Even Shu couldn’t help but be a bit freaked out by her.

“Umm... are you sure you want to talk to me? I’m weird, aren’t I?” she asked.

“How?” Figaro asked, puzzled.

The only ones who could look at her without any sort of lens... were those who couldn’t even understand what was weird about her.

As a sickly person all his life, Figaro had limited experience in everything, so he assumed that even Hannya’s eccentricity and rampages were nothing special.

There was also the fact that his first friend had been a man in an animal costume. It was like he didn't even have a compass for the very concept of weirdness.

Hannya looked at him in silence. Figaro had just honestly asked her what was so weird about her, and since she didn't know that there was something wrong with him, it had made her heart skip a beat.

"Can we meet again once I'm done with my revenge?" she asked.

"Hm...? Sure," Figaro replied. "I'd like to see you again, too. Want to exchange emails to stay in touch?"

He only wanted to see her again for a duel, and was completely unaware of the romantic potential of his words.

"Yes! Of course!"

And so, the clueless, meatheaded son of a wealthy family exchanged addresses with a yandere King of Berserk.

◇

"All right, thanks... I know where RockPanther is," Shu ended the call and said as the two were talking.

Hannya turned to him so fast you could hear it and said, "Really?"

"There's this large group of info brokers called 'the DIN.' They have a list, and he was on it. He's a Legendarian right now. You'll get the details if you go to a DIN office and tell them the number on this paper."

"Ohh..." Hannya was so moved that her eyes filled with tears and she joined her hands. "I'm so glad I came to this country... to this area... and I met someone... and got a hint to help with my revenge... Oh, dear... Are you an angel?"

Shu wanted to say that her Embryo was the angel here, but didn't.

She looked calm right now, but there was no telling what could set her off. However...

"Ahahah. Your Sandalphon is the angel here, isn't he?" Figaro asked.

His friend didn't seem to care about such dangers.

He's got the wrong job, Shu thought. He ain't a Gladiator... he's a goddamn Hero!

Thankfully, it turned out that it wasn't a dangerous thing to say, and Hannya just giggled and said, "You're right."

Shu felt that she was being strangely nice to Figaro, but again, he didn't say anything.

"Then I'll be going to Legendaria," said Hannya. "It's to the south of here, right?"

"Yeah. Just go straight south. You can't miss it," said Shu.

"Thanks again. Let me help you out with something after I'm done with my revenge."

"No need. Really."

Seriously, don't, he added silently.

"Goodbye, Shu. And... Figaro!" She walked up to the Gladiator and handed him something

"What is this?"

"I just got them. It's Valentine's Day, right?"

It was the chocolate dropped by the event monsters.

"I'll send emails," he said. "Let's meet again!"

"Yeah. See you," she said as she waved, made Sandalphon transform back to the towering, metallic legs, hopped on and ran off into the horizon.

She was heading to Legendaria, and it was guaranteed that she'd make a scene.

Man, I'm glad her boyfriend isn't in Altar, Shu thought. I do feel bad for Legendaria, though.

"Let them handle the rest themselves, I say," Shu whispered.

If she was to be believed, her ex was at fault, so he believed — or, rather, chose to believe — that this was the right decision.

Shu ended up not hunting any event monsters.

The encounter with Hannya was so emotionally and mentally draining that he lost all motivation.

He and Figaro were now riding Shu's Baldr back to the capital.

On the way, Figaro decided to ask Shu the question he had about Hannya and Sandalphon.

"Category-based personality analysis?" Shu raised an eyebrow.

"Yes," Figaro nodded. "What would Apostles represent?"

"Hm..."

"Proactive people?" Figaro asked.

"I'm pretty sure there'd be more if that was the case."

"Ah. True."

Shu was genuinely impressed that Figaro could look at that woman and see proactiveness, of all things, as the defining feature.

"Well, I can't make any conclusions with just a single sample, but I have a guess," he said.

"Which is...?"

Shu's guess was based on two factors — Hannya's words and actions, and the extreme rarity of Apostles.

It was...

"They hate Infinite Dendrogram."

...a real contradiction of an answer.

“I see. So that’s why there are almost none of them.”

Most people started Infinite Dendrogram because they were interested in it — they liked what it supposedly had to offer.

Sure, there were those who experienced something as they played and began to hate it, but those who hated it right from the start — before their Embryos hatched — were practically nonexistent.

Unless, of course, it was a woman who’d started Infinite Dendrogram to get revenge on an ex she’d lost to this game, and the homewrecker who’d taken him from her.

“Now that I think about it, Sandalphon’s quick evolution wasn’t caused by some Apostle quality, but by her obsession,” Figaro added.

“Well... Maybe, maybe not,” Shu answered.

In Shu’s mind, Apostle Masters were contradictions right from the moment they started.

Masters who hate Infinite Dendrogram, yet still start it, must be a really troublesome bunch, he thought. Imagine the sense of duty they’d need to dive in here...

“She’s also the second person I’ve seen who’s ahead of me, the first being Tom,” Figaro said. “I need to work harder.”

“Yeah, do your best, Figgy. I’m cheering ya on. You’ll hop up to the top in no time.”

Though things hadn’t gone as planned, seeing his friend become all fired up made Shu satisfied. All that was left now was to ride Baldr back to the capital.

“Hm?” Shu raised an eyebrow as he noticed Figaro eating something.

It was the chocolate Hannya had just given him. He probably didn’t want to exchange a gift, so he was deciding to eat it himself.

Shu silently thought about them both. He was perceptive enough to understand that Hannya’d had feelings for Figaro from the moment she’d handed him the chocolate.

Hannya was currently a mix of love and hate.

While her hate was directed at RockPanther, her love had ended up targeting Figaro — the man who was almost completely dense about matters of love.

Shu felt that Hannya would eventually cause even more love-related trouble, but this time related to Figaro.

Honestly, I think that would be good for Figgy, he thought.

Even if there was some sort of misunderstanding that led to PvP between them, Figaro would probably welcome it with open arms.

"Hell, you really need a lesson in just how complex and scary women can be," Shu added.

"Hm?"

Figaro tilted his head, not really understanding what his friend meant, as he bit into the chocolate.

"Ah," he added, suddenly realized something. "If only couples can kill the event monsters, how did Hannya end up having this?"

"Who knows?" Shu shrugged, feigning ignorance.

He knew full well that it had been dropped not by the event monsters, but by one of the couples Hannya had killed.

You could very well call it "murder chocolate."

Shu knew that Figaro probably wouldn't care, but he also saw no need to tell his friend that the chocolate he was eating had a bloody history.

And so, with the evening sun on them, they rode the tank back to civilization.

◇

Following this encounter, Hannya changed her country to Legendaria and used the DIN's info to start searching for her targets more seriously.

Thus, on the final day of the Valentine's event, she found both RockPanther and his new lover, and got her revenge on them, making a huge mess of the town they were in.

But then, a tian Special Superior Job and a group of ten Legendarian rankers defeated her, and she was sent to the gaol due to the severe property damage and tian injuries she'd caused.

However, by some miracle, no one had died, so it didn't count as murder, and she would get to leave the gaol in only three or four years, *Dendro*time.

After getting locked up, Hannya, feeling completely refreshed, began to get her real life in order and fix all the problems that had arisen while she'd been focused on revenge.

She also occasionally logged in to Dendro. Whether to get rid of stress or to prepare for when she was released, she trained in the gaol by trampling all over the other Masters locked up in there.

She also promised to meet Figaro again, and they regularly exchanged emails.

Now, to evaluate the Valentine's Day of 2044.

Shu didn't get to hunt.

The Masters in the area were unjustly PKed.

The destructive drama was nothing but a disaster to the Legendarians who were caught up in it.

And finally, RockPanther — who could be considered the root cause of this — had ended up breaking up with his new girlfriend. Admittedly, she'd had problems with him to begin with, so you could say it was the straw that broke the camel's back.

Most of those involved in this incident had gotten nothing good out of it.

The only exceptions were Hannya and Figaro.

After settling the score, Hannya began a new life and got a new love, while Figaro believed he had found a new duel buddy.

That was all he thought of it.

In his emails to her, he wrote things like, "I want to see you." (So we can duel.) "I hope you're released soon," conveniently forgetting to type out the bracketed part, as if it were obvious, and letting Hannya interpret it in a completely different way.

Hannya's love for Figaro grew larger by the day, but Figaro, who'd never loved before, had no means of noticing it. This severe failure in communication continued for over a year in real life and over three years in Infinite Dendrogram.

It eventually led to a certain incident, but that was a story for another time.

Episode Four: Consultation

April 4th, 2045, Prism Rider, Ray Starling

I looked through my mail, had a meal, and logged in to Dendro.

Even though it was night in real life, the sun was still high up in the sky here.

"You're back." Nemesis popped out of the crest and welcomed me.

"Well, I have college tomorrow, so I can't stay online for more than a day here," I said. "There's no helping it. Life on the other side is important, too."

Now if that ain't something Fuyuki should hear, I thought, rolling my eyes. Still can't believe that guy skipped the first day of college.

"Also, it's not like we have any major trouble here right now," Nemesis added.

"True." I nodded.

We'd had problem after problem for the first few days after coming here, but things had calmed down after that.

There was no sign that anything was about to happen now, and the local quests reflected that — there were only tame ones like ruin investigation and town restoration.

"We'll hang around and do a bunch of those before returning to Gideon," I said.

"It feels like it's been so long since you were kidnapped by that fox," Nemesis commented.

Well, it's been an impressive journey, I thought. We went all the way from Gideon in the south to Quartierlatin in the north.

"I actually miss Gideon quite a bit," said Nemesis. "I'd love to be back soon."

"Same here," I said. "It's pretty far, though. Even getting to the capital takes a while. We'll go back to Altea on Thursday the 6th, then go to Gideon over Friday and Saturday."

We'd have to talk it out with Azurite, though. She was still working here in Quartierlatin.

“Wouldn’t we return faster by riding Silver through the sky?” Nemesis asked.

“The skies above the capital have the occasional Pure-Dragon flying around,” I replied.

“Now that... is troubling.”

If there was one thing we’d learned from Gigaknight, it was that we were weak against enemies who didn’t rely on any gimmicks, but were simply strong.

We were bound to fare badly against flying dragons who would fight from outside my range and use various breaths.

Sure, I’d beaten a Pure-Dragon-tier worm near Gideon before, but it wasn’t a good comparison to the sky beasts above Altea.

“Riser told me that you could even come across UBMs there,” I added.

“Mm-hm... Let’s avoid needless deadly battles. You’ve had too many of those recently.”

“Seriously.” I wanted some peace and quiet right now.

I’d probably get more than enough of that if I just didn’t log in, but that would leave a bad taste in my mouth.

“Anyway, we’ll think about the way back later,” I said. “For now, let’s just take care of our business for today.”

“You’re planning on going to a craftsman, right?”

“Yeah. They offered, so I might as well.” A local craftsman had offered to make something out of the metal powder I’d acquired from the whale. The place wasn’t far from the local save point, so we went there right away.

It was a mix of workshop and store. It specialized in equipment, and there were two counters: one for buying ready-made equipment, and one for ordering custom-mades.

“Now that I think about it, all the equipment you’ve ever had has been either monster loot, ready-mades, or gifts,” Nemesis commented.

“True.”

All I’d ever gotten in the past was either store-bought gear, MVP special rewards, gacha pulls, or gifts from B3.

“A custom-made certainly won’t hurt,” said Nemesis.

“I do have the money and mats for it,” I nodded. “It’ll be my first one.”

Speaking of order-made gear, I knew someone who knew a lot about that: Juliet.

Her gothic dress-armor and many other things she wore were order-mades.

We'd even talked about the subject once...

◇

A few days before Miss Eldritch kidnapped me from Gideon, Juliet and I had a mock battle.

If you ignored Figaro, a Superior, and Marie, who primarily used ranged attacks, Juliet was the sparring partner I had the most trouble with.

This was due to her build being extremely balanced. She could move at the speed of sound, fly, had powerful physical and magical attacks, intense debuffs through her curses, and a knight grouping Superior Job, Fallen Knight, which gave her great defense.

Sure, I could turn her debuffs into buffs by using the second form's Reversal, but that barred me from using Vengeance, which overall just made it worse for me.

On top of that, I didn't have my left arm, so I couldn't use Purgatorial Flames. And Nemesis was in her second form, as I wouldn't get Monochrome until I went to Torne later.

I lost the overwhelming majority of my mock battles against the rankers, but Juliet was easily the one who beat me the most times.

This was simply due to the fact that we were often online at the same time, and thus sparred the most.

Apparently, she was a middle-schooler who also lived in Japan. We were in the same time zone, and just as I'd started Dendro on my pre-college holiday, she'd started her spring break right after Franklin's Game, so our online times coincided a lot, and we had many mock battles because of it.

Well... my online times coincided even more with Shu's and Marie's, who were not only living in Japan, but were also unemployed, but we didn't spar a lot because Shu was busy with his popcorn stand, while Marie had an important job as a mediator between Count Gideon and the ninjas now working there, among other things.

Well, back to the main matter. While Juliet beat me more than anyone else, I was also learning a lot from her.

Though I still wasn't perfect at it, she was the one I had to thank for teaching me how to counter those moving at supersonic speed, and since my battle style incorporated rare things such as Counter Absorption, Vengeance, Silver, and MVP special rewards, she also ended up learning a thing or two.

That was what she said, anyway. My guess was that she was preparing to fight someone who used unique battle styles and special rewards.

At first I'd assumed it was Figaro, but by now, my guess was that it was Rosa, who was just below Juliet in the rankings. That was probably the reason why she'd shown me her most secret move a whole bunch of times now. It was like she was testing it on me.

Now, since Juliet and I sparred a lot, we tended to have many post-spar chats over lunches or tea. On this particular day, we talked about fashion.

The reason for that was the fact that, just a few days ago, I'd pulled the BR Armor from the gacha. The once-cursed, spiky armor that had melted in the battle against Monochrome had really intrigued her.

"Although no longer bound by the abyssal shell of malediction, it continues to shine an obsidian black," Juliet said.

That roughly translated to: "That spiky armor looks cool even without the curse!"

I liked it myself. It was better than glasses, animal ears, or crossdressing, anyway.

"Is this truly a praisable design?" asked Nemesis, clearly not sharing our sentiment.

Looking back at it, Nemesis had been very critical of my fashion even before we'd met Azurite.

"Goblin bracers, corpse greaves, an iron prosthetic arm, spiky curse armor... where are you even going with this?" she muttered.

"'Tis naught but the wondrous and mysterious hand of fate," Juliet said with shining eyes.

Nemesis sighed in response, but I couldn't tell if it was because she didn't have anything to say or didn't understand Juliet's words, which, by the way, meant: "You got this design set from MVP rewards and the gacha! You didn't even try for it! It's gotta be fate! Wow!"

She then added, "If you wish to resist fate and reveal yourself to the world in a new form, you must resolve to sacrifice material wealth in exchange."

"Hm?" Nemesis raised an eyebrow.

"She's saying that if you want something with a specific design, get it custom-made," I translated.

According to Juliet, though it was based on their stats and skill levels, craftsmen could slightly alter the designs of the gear they were making.

From what I'd been told, before people like those in The Triangle of Wisdom — that lab coat lunatic's clan — had come along and made things like humanoid robots, most items crafted by Masters had been exactly that: just slightly-altered non-originals.

Still, the increase in Masters that could create new things hadn't decreased the demand for design changes, and even now, you had many Masters who came to craftsmen to forge their own unique look.

Juliet was one of them. She regularly used the money she won in duels and materials she got from kills to order various new gear from her favorite craftsmen. She probably liked trying out new clothes. You could even see her walk around the normal clothing shops.

Not too long ago, I'd seen her in front of some shop's show window, talking to Chelsea and some other girl I didn't recognize. They must have been having a hearty chat about fashion, like the girls they were.

"My false eye itself was wrought by the hands of those with art and ability," Juliet said as she reached for her right eye and removed its surface.

It was a contact lens.

I'd always thought that both her eyes were red, but the one under the lens was blue.

"You can even have custom-made colored contacts?" I asked.

"Certainly. This one bears the powers of Identification and Reveal."

That reminded me of when I'd met Franklin for the first time. He'd been wearing a penguin costume and mentioned that you could get glasses with skills on them.

I guess contact lenses are the same, I thought. Do they count as accessories?

"The truly exceptional false eyes have the power to throw your foe's condition into disharmony," Juliet added.

Oh? There are contact lenses that give debuffs by just looking? That's pretty strong, I thought. Still, you can probably negate them with the right level and resistances.

"Why is that one colored?" I asked.

"I began having eyes of a different hue, bewitching in purity, but it came to be known that the foes see such a quality as an ill omen," she explained.

"...I see."

So at first, she'd used transparent contact lenses, but since her avatar had heterochromia, her enemies would be wary of something in her eyes despite the transparency, so she'd switched to one colored contact and one transparent one, to make her eyes appear the same color.

Every now and then, you would see manga with characters who hid their heterochromia — and with it, some sort of power — behind contacts, but in Juliet's case, the contact was the power, while her avatar's heterochromia was just a bit of fashion.

But now, you couldn't even tell that she had heterochromia, so the fashion factor was gone.

I was guessing that this had caused an inner conflict between her as a fashion-loving middle schooler, and her as a high-ranking duelist.

"Did you just imply that heterochromia is merely a bit of middle schooler-like fashion?" Nemesis asked telepathically.

What else? I replied.

"This false eye also demands the remains of a crystalline Pure-Dragon, bestowing upon it an immense value," Juliet added.

"You need materials for custom-made items?" I asked.

"If you seek apparel that reaches supreme heights in its splendor, you must be willing to part with elements common folk cannot procure, some so precious that not even the weavers of finest cloth have them in store."

She had basically just said, "Craftsmen sometimes don't have the material for high-level gear," which was completely right. Most Pure-Dragon-tier material couldn't be found on the market, and if it somehow got there, it'd be really expensive.

It didn't mean much to me, though. I couldn't equip any of that fancy gear at my level, so there was no point in gunning for it, even if I had the money.

If there was one thing to take from this, it was that it was standard to bring your own material when ordering a custom-made item.

Side note: UBM MVP special rewards were sometimes materials which had to be used by craftsmen to become something useful.

“How troubling it is that you are aesthetically complete,” said Juliet.

“Ray,” said Nemesis, “what did she just say?”

“‘Your set is so perfect that there’s really no point in ordering any custom-made items...’”

“THIS is your idea of perfection?!”

◇

Yeah, that was the conversation Juliet and I’d had.

Since then, I’d lost the spiky gear and instead gotten a black coat and armor of fire and darkness, so I was beginning to feel like my personal fashion was converging on the darker side.

“...Really? ‘On the darker side’? Is that the extent of what you think of the disaster that is your equipment?” asked Nemesis.

“I see your point. This gear would let me be the star of a dark overlord fashion show,” I said.

Deafening. Silence.

“I’m cracking a joke here. How about a reaction? At least boo me if it’s that bad.”

“You said nothing but the truth. I had no comment whatsoever.”

Anyway, this “dark overlord” gear of mine couldn’t really be replaced.

The three MVP special rewards were closely linked to my fighting style, while the VDA I had as my upper body armor was both really good and a gift from B3. Therefore, the only open slots I had were lower body armor, headgear, and accessories.

I noticed that Nemesis looked somewhat pensive.

“What now?” I asked.

“...Nothing,” she replied.

“Hm?”

Oh well, I thought as I went back to considering my gear.

In my hand, I held the shining material — the metal particles — I’d gotten from the whale.

I could get some lower body armor, but the result would be plate mail, and thus would probably make it harder to move around. Besides that, I had headgear and accessories... but then I decided to just ask the craftsman about my options.

In the store, I met the same person who'd recommended I have something crafted using the powder, and he gave me a list of items they could craft from it. Apparently, Countess Quartierlatin had given him some of it, too, and they were in the process of investigating its properties and uses.

The powder turned out to be really easy to work with, and it could be used to make various pieces of high-quality equipment. It must've been one of the reasons why the whale regenerated so quickly.

As I looked through the relatively small list, I saw an "Anti-Poison Oxygen Mask."

"This one's good," I said.

It counted as an accessory, and once equipped, it provided a flow of clean air.

I really needed something like it for whenever I used Hellish Miasma or flew around on Silver.

Besides, its name was "Storm Visage," which sounded crazy cool to me.

I'd clearly found what I was looking for, so I wrote it down on the order form.

There was a section for the design, too, but since the designs I thought were good didn't sit right with Nemesis, I decided to respect her and not think about it myself.

Instead, I just wrote down, "Please make it match my current set."

This was the kind of thing best left to the pros! Nemesis would surely be glad I took this route.

"Hey," Nemesis spoke up. "A chill just went down my spine. Did you write something strange on that form?"

"Hey, it's all good," I said. "It's nothing for you to worry about."

"I certainly hope so..."

Anyway, that ended my first order of a custom-made item.

I can't wait until it's done!

◇

After ordering the Storm Visage, I went to the adventurer's guild to pick up a quest.

Quartierlatin's adventurers' guild was away from both the ruins and the town center that Logan targeted, so it hadn't suffered any damage in the attacks, and was functioning as normal.

Scratch that — it wasn't normal, since you had way more Masters and tians looking for quests through the catalogs than usual.

It looked like many people had rushed over to Quartierlatin to help.

Azurite had told me that at first, she'd banned the adventurers' guilds from spreading any info about the ruins, in order to keep the Masters away. Because of this, the only ones who'd come were those who'd gotten the info some other way, like I had through the DIN.

But the ban was now lifted, so you now had people from all across the kingdom coming here on or for quests.

"All right, let's see what quests we have today," I said as we sat down at a table that'd just opened up.

However, there was someone else who sat down at it.

"Hm?"

"Oh?"

Well, it's crowded, anyway. Might as well share, I thought as I looked at his face.

"...Hm?" I said.

He looked familiar.

It was a guy with a bandana on his head. Where had I seen it before?

"Y-You're Ray Starling the Unbreakable!" he suddenly raised his voice.

Oh, so we did meet before, I thought. Wait, no. I'm weirdly famous, so I can't be sure about that. Back in Torne, some PK clan even tried to beat me to make a name for themselves and—

"AH!"

It came back to me! This bandana guy is...!

"The leader of Sol Crisis!" I shouted as I stood up from my chair.

"Shh! Shh! Don't mention that clan!" he put his finger in front of his mouth and signed for me to be quiet, then looked around in a panic. The guild was so crowded and noisy that no one noticed what was going on here.

"Are you still after Ray?" asked Nemesis menacingly.

Last time, B3 had handled Sol Crisis because they were using her name, but honestly, if there were PKers going after me, it was only fair that I would be the one to take them on.

“No no no no! I’m not plannin’ on messin’ with ya anymore!” He lightly waved his hands in front of him and asked me to calm down.

“Why would a PK clan come here, then?” I asked. “Are you plotting something? Like you did in Torne?”

“I’m not! I’m just here to quest, man! And I’m not in a PK clan anymore. Not Sol Crisis.”

“Hm?”

As I wondered what he meant, he became dispirited and slumped down in his chair. He looked really down, and his shabby gear didn’t help at all.

Even I, an ex-enemy, was kinda worried about him.

“...What happened?” I asked.

He hesitated for a moment, then began talking, saying, “The clan collapsed after the real deal kicked our asses back in Torne.”

I said nothing, but I could see why that had happened.

The clan had gathered members by stealing the authority of a major player killer: B3, AKA Barbaroy Bad Burn.

It was only natural that they’d get many quitters after they learned that their Barbaroy was a fake and the real one had come in to beat them up.

They’d probably also thought that she’d come after them again if they stayed.

“The guys also put us to sleep and used Steal and Plunder to take all of our stuff...” he added.

“Ouch...” Nemesis and I said in unison.

So that was why his gear is different than it was in Torne, I thought.

“Vermin... the guy who faked Barbaroy and the other founding member besides us... ran away before that happened to him. Blue and I stayed and tried to get the clan back up, but the aggro of the guys we tricked went all on us...”

I didn’t know what to say to that. It was their own fault for faking B3, but I also felt kinda bad for him.

“We couldn’t use ‘Sol Crisis’ anymore, so we changed it to ‘Rising Sun,’” he continued. “It’s just me and Blue, though, so it’s barely even a clan, really.”

So that was what he’d meant by, “Not Sol Crisis.”

“And ‘Blue’ is...?” I asked.

“Blue Screen. The guy who shut down your Prism Steed replica back in Torne.”

Oh, him, I thought. Silver’s not a replica, though.

“Sorry ’bout that, by the way,” he added as he suddenly bowed to me. “I was in a PK clan, so I’m not gonna say sorry for trying to PK ya, but now I think we should’ve picked a better time for that. You beat the UBM, didn’t ya?”

“Yeah.” I nodded. The Black Warcoat I was wearing was all the proof I needed to show that I’d killed the UBM that’d attacked Torne — Void of the Black Sky, Monochrome.

“I didn’t think anyone could do that, and went after ya ’cause it seemed like the perfect chance... but you actually did it. In the end, we just got in your way and got flattened by Barbaroy. So damn stupid.”

Once again, I had no words. Unlike Azurite, I didn’t have the Truth Discernment skill, but the self-derisive, sad-looking smile seemed pretty genuine to me.

Maybe he’s not a bad guy at heart, I thought.

“So why did you come here, anyway?” asked Nemesis.

“I’m just looking for jobs. We’ve got no gear, gold, or people besides me and Blue, so we need ways to get money that don’t ask for much.”

Well, there are tons of quests in Quartierlatin, so you can make some decent money here, I thought.

“But if you’re here, then we’ll just go somewhere else. You probably couldn’t relax with us here,” he said as he stood up and prepared to leave the guild. “I’m out.”

I stopped him by saying, “You don’t need to be considerate of me.”

“What?”

“You apologized, and honestly, that’s enough for me.”

“...You sure?”

“Yeah. You’ve already had it pretty rough, and it’s not like your getting in my way back in Torne resulted in something that couldn’t be undone.”

I’d made it in time to save Louie, and we hadn’t gotten any major increases in casualties, so with the apology, it was all water under the bridge.

“...Thanks.” Dum-Dum, the ex-leader of Sol Crisis and current leader of Rising Sun, bowed to me once again.

"Still, I don't know what B3 will think, so you should talk to her," I added. "I'll say something to her, too."

"Yeah. Thanks again. You tell me if Vermin or someone else starts bothering you again."

"Sure. I hope that doesn't happen, though."

And just like that, the minor conflict between us, born back in Torne, reached a peaceful conclusion.

Shortly after that, Dum-Dum found a quest that suited him and accepted it.

After he left, Nemesis and I looked through the quest list for any good ones, but then one of the guild's workers called us. She said that someone important was calling me and asked me to come to a certain room here in the guild. I could only think of two "important" people that could call me in this town, and sure enough, I came into the room to find one of them — a familiar masked lady.

It was none other than the first princess of Altar, Altimia Azurite Altar.

"Still wearing that mask?" I asked.

"Many outsiders gather in this facility, after all. And why does it feel as though you always talk about my mask before you even greet me?" she replied, slightly annoyed.

"I heard you needed me?"

"Yes. To be specific, I need your connections."

Connections?

"I assume you heard that the kingdom resumed the investigations into the ruins after the chaos surrounding them died down?" she asked.

"Of course."

The quests in Quartierlatin that had appeared after the incident could be put into three groups: material gathering for rebuilding, monster hunting until the local knight order recovered and could take it over again, and ruin investigation.

They were all backed by Countess Quartierlatin and the kingdom itself, so the rewards were generally higher than usual. However, the ruin investigation quests had ended yesterday, and I hadn't seen a single one of them today.

"Aren't you done with ruins investigation?" asked Nemesis.

"We have finished exploring the interior, at least," Azurite replied.

“What do you mean?” I asked.

“Simply put, we are done exploring it as a standard dungeon, but the investigations are going nowhere.”

According to her, they’d shifted from mere exploration to trying to figure out what they could do with the technology.

“But as things are now, Altar does not have any people capable of that.”

“I see.”

For that, you needed people with jobs and skills related to machines, but due to the inherent nature of the countries, most of them were in either Dryfe or Granvaloa — certainly not Altar.

Some had taken the machine-related jobs available at the crystal in the ruins here, but their level was still low, so they couldn’t be useful for this.

“We could hire outsiders, but that would be careless,” added Azurite.

Of course it would be, I thought.

The ruins were a classified matter — one serious enough to cause Dryfe to get involved. Altar clearly couldn’t just hire anyone who didn’t serve the country’s interests.

“I can only entrust this matter to someone who is both trustworthy and has knowledge of machines, or someone who is vouched for by someone I trust,” she said.

“And so you’re asking if I know someone like that?”

“Yes. Does anyone come to mind?”

“Hm...”

There was one person who came to mind before anyone else. However, he wasn’t here, couldn’t come here, and I couldn’t let him take this.

The second person who came to mind was Shu, but while his Embryo, Baldr, was very mechanical, it didn’t mean that he was fit for the job. In fact, I could totally imagine him somehow destroying the ruins.

The third person who came to mind was B3. She was well-informed and surely knew more people than me. I felt like she could find the perfect solution to this problem.

“I know someone who’s very knowledgeable,” I said. “I’ll ask her.”

“I see. Is she trustworthy?” Azurite asked.

“Of course.”

She’d easily make the top five people I trusted the most.

“She said she’s coming here tomorro— I mean, in three days. You can talk to her yourself.”

“Good idea. I will still be here in Quartierlatin, so I’ll meet her.”

Thus, I arranged a meeting between B3 and Azurite.

“Is it really a good idea to let them meet?” asked Nemesis telepathically.

Huh? They’re both the diligent type, so I’m sure they’ll get along, I replied. They both have a thing for hiding their faces, too.

“You are no different, no?”

Having just ordered the Storm Visage, I really couldn’t deny that.

Once Azurite and I were done talking, I picked up a quest, left the guild, and walked through Quartierlatin.

The restoration efforts were going well, but many buildings were still damaged, and the trees and flowers that distinguished this town from the rest were still a huge mess.

Those were the scars of the recent incident, and they reminded me of how Gideon had looked after Franklin’s Game.

“Hm...” I murmured.

Remembering that made me think of a certain someone. He was a friend I’d faced twice — once at the gate, and again atop Franklin’s Embryo.

“Someone trustworthy who knows a lot about machines, huh...?” I added to myself.

It was the first person who’d come to mind when Azurite asked me.

“What’s Hugo up to these days?” I wondered. I hadn’t seen him since our final clash in Gideon. Over a month had passed since, so I couldn’t help but wonder what he was doing now...

Pallid Pages Part One: Spin the Roulette Wheel

Late March 2045, City-State Union of Caldina, Hermine the City of Gambling

It was late March, about a week after the incident in Gideon.

The location was Caldina, the country almost completely covered in desert and dry wasteland.

The dry areas of old had become deserts, while the dry areas that had become deserts just a few centuries ago were now wastelands.

The few areas that were neither were either oases or fertile lands surrounding the rivers flowing from the Harshwinter Mountains to the north, and most Caldinian cities were built around these.

Hermine the City of Gambling was one of them. It was built around an oasis. Like its title implied, it had an entire district focused on the gambling industry.

Masters often compared it to the likes of Las Vegas.

One notable thing about the casinos and other gambling houses here was that they all differed depending on which organization was funding them.

Caldina was a place where merchants and organizations from all the other countries gathered to do business, and the casinos funded by them often had an air similar to their homelands.

The more elegant-looking casinos were often funded by Altarian merchants, while the ones that had a heavy focus on entertainment value were built by Legendarian design.

Then you had the ones that those from Earth would call “Asian-looking.” The serpentine dragons on them clearly showed that they were built with Huang He in mind.

On one of them, there was a sign which translated to something along the lines of “Mirage.”

That was the name of an organization from Huang He, but they were by no means mere merchants — it was a Huang Hean mafia.

It had roots in the underside of the empire's society and worked with an iron fist to incite people's greed and gather money. One of its sub-groups ran a casino here in Caldina.

This wasn't unique. There were also casinos funded by the likes of the Great Pirate Fleet of Granvaloa — the most infamous of the Four Great Fleets — as well as the vampire clans of Legendaria.

Hermine's casinos weren't even the only places that had monetary support from foreign underground societies.

In fact, the Caldinian authorities saw them as venerable guests and good sources of money.

As long as they could tax them, Caldina didn't care who ran the establishments or what they did there — they even appreciated when other countries made certain businesses illegal, for it increased the number of shops moving here and, subsequently, their tax income.

Of course, there were those who refused to pay the taxes, but they were not an issue, since they would just die while wandering the deserts between the cities and perish before bringing their money back to their countries.

They would either die because they couldn't get a guide, walk into monster habitats because they were given false maps, or simply get taken out by certain professionals.

There were some guides who claimed to be non-official and agreed to escort those who refused to pay their taxes through the desert, but they sometimes turned out to be Caldinian assassins who led them into Pure-Dragon worm lairs, or worse.

Regardless of how, the non-paying would regularly lose their lives and money, which would then be picked up by Caldina.

If you wanted to avoid such consequences, you had to abide by the rules, pay the taxes, and get the official guides.

That was the kind of country Caldina was — everything was allowed if you paid money, and everything was lost to you if you didn't.

◇

Back to the topic of Mirage's casino...

The establishment had Huang He-like — or China-like, for those from Earth — decorations, both inside and out. Despite that, the gambling going on within the premises was more on the Western side. You had roulette, poker, baccarat... most of the games Masters knew well.

Servers clad in Huang Hean dresses that emphasized their legs, similar to qipaos from China, walked around the casino, plates in hand, and handed out alcoholic drinks to the gambling customers. Beauty must've been one of the job criteria, for they were all either beautiful girls or boys that looked the part.

Some of the customers were simply enjoying the sight of the servers at work. Many would gather here not to gamble, but to relax after a long day at work while having a meal and drink at the designated eating space. Watching the gamblers and the servers was a strange kind of spice to them.

Among those eating, there was an individual wearing strange clothes. That strangeness made him attract lots of attention. Perhaps his apparel wouldn't appear strange in some places, but they certainly didn't suit this casino. It looked like a mix of a military uniform and pilot suit, and neither Caldina nor Huang He had anything like it.

Another notable thing about him was his face. He was a handsome man, but for some reason, there was sadness in his expression. That well-defined face combined with grief made for a combo that moved the hearts of many women here, young and old. However, more perceptive folk would notice that his mannerisms were sometimes too feminine for a man.

The third notable thing about him was the snow-white girl at his side, who was silently eating almond jelly.

They were Hugo Lesseps and Cyco — ex-member of The Triangle of Wisdom and his Embryo, and together, they really stood out in this casino.

◇◇◇

High Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

"Haaah..." I sighed, wondering how I'd ended up in a place like this.

I'd left Dryfe and headed out towards Tenchi, on the other side of the continent, in order to broaden my horizons, so it wasn't strange for me to be here in Caldina, which was on the way there. But I didn't know why I was in a casino, of all places.

Why was I being forced to wait here?

“I’m underage,” I muttered.

In reality, I was a girl who’d just turned fifteen, so this shady place was just a bit much for me.

I felt like I was about to cry.

Being here was actually harder on my mind than attacking the Gouz-Maise Gang’s hideout.

But “I”... which was to say, Hugo Lesseps... did my best to not cry, and just look sad instead. Crying in a place like this would just make me stand out more.

“You’re such a crybaby,” Cyco commented. “And FYI, you’re so handsome that even making a sad face makes you stand out.”

Shut up, Cyco. Just eat your almond jelly, I shot back.

“Okay, okay. Ah, also, if you don’t wanna stand out, why not just change your clothes?” Cyco asked as she pointed at my Triangle of Wisdom-made pilot suit.

You know I can’t, I responded silently. I don’t have any other clothes besides a few sets of these.

I’d only realized that after entering the desert, and I hadn’t had a chance to buy anything new since then.

I’d also spent most of my money on repairs, and ToW-quality parts that’d made it to Caldina were more expensive than I’d thought.

With the money I have left, I can’t get any pilot suits that don’t stand out and have good stats.

“You can just stop caring about stats,” said Cyco.

Shut up and just get more almond jelly.

“Who do you think I am? Nemesis?” she retorted. “One portion is enough for me.”

I said nothing in response. That name made me remember a familiar face — Ray.

We’d been enemies at our last meeting, but I still wondered how he was doing right now.

I’d cut off his right arm, and he’d lost his left against Francesca... Had he gotten them back yet?

I’d love to meet and talk to him again, I thought. Probably not to apologize, though.

“Oh yeah,” said Cyco. “When you’re down like this, you should act all smug, like you did when Ray was around."

To be honest, keeping up that act has become really hard lately.

One of the reasons was probably the fact that I'd lost all reservations I'd had for Francesca, but anyway, the Hugo Lesseps character wasn't as big of a part of me anymore.

If I remember correctly, even my thoughts were more "Hugo-like" before, I thought.

"Oh, I get it," said Cyco. "You turned fifteen on the other side, so that cured your chuuni... your self-conscious fourteen year-old syndrome."

"No. I am not in a phase," I retorted.

"Ehh? You're a handsome, pompous gentleman who likes saying hot one-liners."

"No. Hugo Lesseps is not a product of adolescent self-consciousness."

"'Lady, we shall stop your tears. I promise that you will greet tomorrow's morning with a smile on your face,'" Cyco quoted me.

"You even stopped speaking in monotone to say that! Can you not?!"

And that wasn't a weird thing to say, right?! I know I'm the one who said it, but that's a good line!

"Ugh... I didn't expect the very basis of who I am to be put into question at this point," I complained.

"Did that help?" Cyco asked with a smile.

"...Eh? Ah..." That made me realize that I was feeling a lot more comfortable than I had been a few minutes ago.

So my verbally abusive, monotone Embryo had said that to take my mind away from the pressure of being in a place like this.

"Thanks, Cyc—"

"Anyway, I'm gonna write a report about what's not right about you and hand it over later."

"You've ruined it in more ways than one," I muttered.

Anyway, though she had hurt me a bit in the process, Cyco really was helping me deal with being in this place.

Feeling a bit better, I continued to wait for the person I was here with.

"What's going on there, anyway?" I said as I looked into one part of the gambling area — the roulette space.

Just like in reality, the roulettes had all the numbers from 0 to 36, red or black colors on them, and green on 0. They were European-style roulettes.

Yes — they were almost no different from the ones in reality.

"That reminds me..." I murmured.

Francesca believed that the developers had made the tians accustomed to these games ahead of time.

She theorized that Infinite Dendrogram was the result of someone creating a cutting-edge virtual space from scratch, then using it to simulate an ecosystem of virtual life.

I wondered if creating a civilization this complex was possible without it taking really long. Even on Earth, this would've taken hundreds of years. However, Francesca had said it was possible due to several factors, including the function they used for the war.

"Also, doncha think that creating an entire world this detailed in no time and from nothing would be way more insane?" she'd added, and I was inclined to agree.

Back to the matter of games...

Roulette, card games, and even the board games popular outside of casinos all had their equivalents here in Dendro.

You could say the same about food and drink, too. The almond jelly Cyco was eating, for one thing, was basically the almond jelly you could get on Earth.

Francesca thought that this had all been done by the developers' design to get this world used to Earthly breakthroughs of this kind ahead of time and keep Masters from being the ones to bring them.

It was to prevent them from using real-world games or food to either make some serious money or impact the cultures here.

Francesca said that if the world of Infinite Dendrogram had lacked popular entertainment or good cuisine, you would've had many Masters bringing such things from reality and acting as if they were their original ideas.

And if anyone had been successful, it would create many copycats who'd attempt the same thing.

"The devs were probably worried that it'd divert Infinite Dendrogram from its main point," she'd gone on.

I recalled asking, "But isn't Infinite Dendrogram supposed to be all about freedom?"

She'd grinned and said, "Sure. At least, as long as it doesn't stray from the main point — Embryo development."

According to her, the devs wanted Masters to evolve their Embryos.

"They've gotta have a goal like that. This game's just too extraordinary for it to be just for profit. Ha ha! I mean, come on, you don't need something of this level just to make some money."

Then she'd given me her theory.

"If it's about something other than profit, it's gotta be something that distinguishes Infinite Dendrogram from the other games. That would be our Embryos. They're something the devs force upon us, and something no other game has. That made me conclude that Infinite Dendrogram was made so we Masters, as a group, could nurture all kinds of Embryos. Eh? You think it's this realistic world that makes it stand out? I don't think so. I have a basis for that belief, but it's long, so I won't say it now. Anyway, I'm pretty damn sure the devs made the game so they could have us grow some Embryos... specifically, Superior Embryos such as my Pandemonium, or maybe something beyond that... not that it matters right now. Eh? You wonder how this relates to entertainment and all that? Isn't it obvious? If the meta was all about trying to make money by introducing the real world's features to Dendro, it'd be nothing but a glorified business simulator. You can't develop a good Embryo under those conditions, right? They set up the entertainment culture to prevent Masters from converging on doing nothing but looking for success through easy breakthroughs."

Francesca's rapid-fire theorizing had been just that — theorizing.

However, she probably had good reasons for believing what she did.

Anyway, Francesca's point was that the devs were making sure that Masters couldn't just introduce easy breakthroughs, but it felt weird to hear it from her because she herself had actually done something like that.

She'd brought humanoid robots — a fictional thing from the real world — into Infinite Dendrogram

The developers probably hadn't anticipated anyone using the technological architecture here to pioneer humanoid mecha, or they simply hadn't thought that anyone could do it.

As a result, Francesca was now living proof that you could bring something revolutionary here and turn it into a business.

While remembering that, I looked at the roulette table in the gambling area. It was surrounded by an air of expectation... or perhaps fear.

"I... I shall throw it, then," said the dealer with a tense voice.

Something was strange, though.

Not about the dealer, but the roulette's betting table.

There was only one token on it, specifically, the red 1 to 1. It was the cheapest, too, worth a mere 100 lir.

Despite there being many people around the table, that was the only bet on it.

Rules were rules, though, and since someone had made a bet, the roulette had to be spun.

But after the dealer threw the ball on the roulette...

"Ten million lir on 21."

...someone made an additional bet and placed ten of the most expensive tokens on top of the 21.

"Me too, me too!"

"Same here!"

More additional bets followed as those surrounding the table also bet on the 21.

The dealer became pale, the roulette gradually stopped spinning, and the ball... ended up on the 21.

“T-Twenty-one...” he stammered.

The table was drowned in raging cheering.

The person who’d bet first — and the most — was given 36 times the original bet, which amounted to 360,000,000 lir’s worth of tokens.

That was equivalent to 30,000,000 Euros in real life, and it was enough to buy a whole twelve Marshall II’s with add-ons... with ToW member prices, at least.

“Isn’t that too much?” I muttered.

I didn’t know whether I was heard or not, but the person took the tokens and left the table.

The surrounding gamblers looked blatantly disappointed that they could no longer win by simply copying her bets.

“Ah.” The woman realized something and stopped before pointing at the table, looking at the absentminded dealer, and saying, “This is two hundred lir short.”

Those were the winnings from the first token she’d bet on the red 1 on 1.

That was the straw that broke the camel’s back and made the dealer cry. Even so, he forced himself to give her the tokens.

Not only had she won an immense amount of money — she had even broken the dealer’s spirit.

This person’s appearance was best described as “red and white.”

Her hair was red with a few streaks of silver.

Wearing only hot pants, a bikini-like top on her chest, and a flight jacket, she was brazenly showing off her nice figure. However, the most notable thing about her were her eyes. Each of them had a different color. The left eye was red, the right one silver.

A closer look into her right eye would reveal that its iris had the pattern of a detailed kaleidoscope, and that it as a whole was artificial.

I knew that that was her Embryo.

She casually walked over to the eating space, approached our table, and said, “I made some good money just now, Yu.”

“You overdid it, teach,” I said.

She was the person who’d forced herself into the role of my mentor.

Just like me, she was an ex-member of The Triangle of Wisdom, as well as my sister's close friend, and the one and only "Blue Sky Songstress" — one of the nine Caldinian Superiors.

She was The Ace, AR-I-CA.

◇

I'd met her about three weeks ago in Dendro time.

After the incident in Gideon, I left The Triangle of Wisdom and tried crossing the Caldinian deserts to go to Tenchi.

Using the sea route was the better option, but ever since Dryfe had created a navy and tried to expand into the ocean, the country's relationship with Granvaloa had become sour. We'd even started stopping Granvaloan merchant fleet ships, so I really couldn't go to Tenchi by sea.

I even considered using Altarian ships, but I wasn't brazen enough to just pass by through the country after causing all that trouble in Gideon.

That left only one route — the desert in the middle of the continent. There were also the Harshwinter Mountains to the north, but that was no place for people, passing or otherwise.

The person who'd passed the place most recently was a Huang Hean Superior and his flying fortress, which said everything about how inhospitable the land was and how much you'd need to pass it. That was why I'd chosen the desert, but since it'd be a long journey and I would have to log out, I wouldn't be able to ride alongside merchant dragon carriages.

Xunyu the Yinglong had arrived at Altar using a dragon carriage that functioned as a mobile save point, but unfortunately, that was among the best magic items you could get, and I didn't have anything that luxurious.

Still, even without anything that fancy, I had ways of traveling long distances.

Caldina had these so-called "sandships," and since ships counted as half-buildings, I could travel by setting the ship's inside coordinates and my logout location. When looking it up on the internet, I'd thought that was the way to go, but then I'd realized that the diplomatic relations between Dryfe and Caldina were so bad that you had no civilian sandships going between the countries.

I decided I had to give up and go by myself using my Magingear, but then I quickly realized that was impossible.

There was no denying it: I was naïve.

Piloting Magingears used MP, even when you weren't fighting, and the desert was such an unwelcoming place that even the simplest movements drained a lot. It didn't help that I was using the unit Francesca had gifted me. It was a custom-made heavy-type machine focused on output, so it drained a lot more MP for less movement than standard ones.

To avoid being wasteful, I stored the Magingear and tried walking through the desert alongside Cyco... but it almost killed me. My job was High Pilot, and my sub-jobs were Pilot and Mechanic, so I didn't have the stats needed to survive crossing a desert. My END was especially low.

That was when we were attacked by a large number of desert-dwelling worms that saw us as food. I tried fighting back with my Magingear, but while the unit was in good shape, I myself wasn't — traveling through the desert had left me drained — so we'd ended up in a dire situation.

The worms didn't seem to be cannibalistic, so La Porte de l'Enfer didn't have any effect on them, either. But right before things became really bad, I heard a song-like sound coming from the sky. Wondering what it was, I looked up and saw a Magingear. It was my first time seeing one speeding through the skies.

The flying Magingear made a song-like sound as it fired shells at the heads of all the worms leaping from the sand, quickly exterminating them. It was so precise that it felt like the pilot knew where they would leap from — none of its movements or ammo were wasted. It fought with a brilliant beauty, and all the worms were dead in less than two minutes.

Once done with the battle — if you could call it that — the Magingear landed in front of me. The pilot left the unit, and looked at me with eyes of different colors: red and white.

"That's Fran's unit, right?" she asked. "Wow, you don't see a lotta human-shaped Magingears here to begin with, but I didn't think that Fran made any other full custom units besides my Opera... Huh? Now that I think about it, it's rare for her to go that far for someone. She's sociable, sure, but a bit... messed up."

The pilot spoke without even stopping to wait and give me a chance to respond. Her voice was blatantly full of curiosity, wonder... and nostalgia. She clearly knew the person who'd made this unit — Francesca.

That was why I asked, “You know my sister?”

A moment later, I realized my mistake.

In Infinite Dendrogram, Francesca was a man named “Mr. Franklin.”

Even those who knew “him” wouldn’t make the connection between “him” and the word “sister.” Some would even use it to assume that Mr. Franklin was actually a woman.

I panicked and was about to say that I’d stuttered, but the pilot then said, “You know Fran’s gender and call her sister...? Oh! I get it! You’re her little sister, Yu!”

“Eh...?” I was really surprised that Francesca had told this person about her real self.

People she opened up to were rare. Even in the ToW, it didn’t go beyond me and the sub-leader.

“Huh? But Yu’s a sister, and you’re a man... Are you a crossdresser?” she asked.

“N-No. My avatar is a man, but I’m a girl in real life,” I answered.

“I see! Just like Fran! You’re so alike!” she said as she gave me a thumbs-up, for some reason.

The strange vibe about her was nothing like Francesca’s, but it was still a bit overwhelming.

Still, I brought myself to ask, “Umm... who are you?”

She clapped her hands before answering, “I’m The Ace, AR-I-CA! I used to be a part of the ToW, but now I’m with Sefirot! And I’m a close friend of Fran’s!”

That made me gasp.

The Ace, AR-I-CA — Francesca had told me about her.

She’d started out as one of the ToW’s first test pilots, then left to become one of Caldina’s Superiors.

Her nickname was “Blue Sky Songstress,” and I’d heard that she was combat-capable, even for someone from Sefirot.

The fact that such a person was before me surprised me, and as I tried to figure out what to say...

“By the way, what’s with the outdated red and white two-tone color look?” asked Cyco. “It’s excessive and cringy.”

The sudden insult to the Superior’s appearance made me feel like the air had frozen, and I wasn’t even using La Porte de l’Enfer.

I was a bit conflicted. I wondered why Cyco always verbally abused anyone we met — she'd even done it to Ray and Nemesis — while at the same time slightly agreeing that the red and white hair and clothing combo was a bit... much.

"Yes! Red and white are the colors of the coolest legendary pilot! The excessiveness makes it good," The Ace said as she gave a thumbs up with a full smile.

She didn't look the least bit upset. It was like she didn't even understand that she was just insulted.

"Hugo. No good. My insults don't work on her," Cyco complained.

"Can you just... not insult her?" I asked.

Insults make things awkward, I added in thought. Let's just stop badmouthing people's fashion, okay?

But now that I thought about it... Francesca was a full mad scientist, the King of Destruction was a half-naked bear, and Figaro and Xunyu were weird in their own ways. Maybe it was a rule for Superiors to have a weird fashion sense.

"By the way," AR-I-CA said. "It looked like you weren't having a good time here. You okay?"

"Yes. Somehow... Ah!" I realized that I hadn't thanked her yet and said, "Thank you for helping me."

"Don't mention it. Anyway, you're not used to the desert, huh?"

"I... Yes."

Those worms had almost gotten me, and going through this desert any further would be difficult. I'd probably need to switch to accompanying a merchant group or something, but then how would I handle logging out?

"All right, leave it all to me," said AR-I-CA.

"Eh?"

"I'll become your mentor."

"Ehhh...?"

"From crossing the desert to the ABCs of Magingears — I'll drill it all into your head! Call me 'teach' from now on."

And so, with a forcefulness I'd never experienced before, I gained a mentor.

◇

That was how The Ace had become my mentor and forced me to call her "teach."

Her constant forcefulness was a bit problematic, but I could tolerate it just fine.

There were two much bigger problems.

First was the fact that her training was actually hellish. She'd started out by making me level up by throwing me into a lair of worms similar to the ones that'd attacked me, putting my unit in danger of destruction.

Then, she made me do "mock battles" (read: one-sided beatings) with her. She'd evaded my La Porte de l'Enfer despite not knowing anything about it, which was completely ridiculous. She'd even made me pay ten million lir to repair my unit, and I was really glad the broken parts weren't custom-made.

Her vibrant appearance was hiding a darkness that came out whenever she was acting as my mentor. It was hard to complain, though, since I actually was getting stronger.

Not only was I gaining more levels, I was actually becoming a better pilot beyond just my Piloting sense skill level. This positive canceled out the negatives of the first problem, so I could accept it.

But then there was the second problem...

She was likely the apex of all Magingear pilots, and had a wealth of knowledge about machines in general and Caldina in particular, which made her a mentor deserving of respect.

However, as a person, she had a disposition that made me uncomfortable.

"You're looking for prey even in a place like this?" I asked.

"Yep," she replied as she looked around the establishment and drank a non-alcoholic cocktail, clearly satisfied with all the tokens she'd won.

She was looking not at objects, but people such as the attractive servers or the young, rich ladies who'd come here to gamble.

"And who do you have in mind?" Cyco asked her.

"Either that Chinese-looking pretty boy with long hair, that lady with a 90cm bust, or that fiery-looking girl!"

"You really don't have any limits for this, huh? I hope you die," Cyco put in.

"And you're as sulky as always, Cy. It's soooo cute!"

“Don’t hug me. It makes me feel like I’m in danger.”

Yes, that was the problem with my teach’s personality — she hit on anybody she thought looked good.

It also didn’t matter to her whether they were men or women.

In fact, it seemed like she hit on women more often than men.

She’d only have tea with some of them, while taking it far beyond that with others. Still, it was something that a fifteen-year-old like me couldn’t quite grasp.

“If you’re feeling lonely, why not get a lover?” I asked. “You’re in a clan. Don’t you have someone you like in there?”

“Nope. I asked our leader, but he awkwardly refused. I don’t know what Carl’s like on the inside, Albert’s a hardcore, iron-faced terminator, Fatoum is handsome, but married, and the old man and lady are... well... old. There are no good love interests in the clan.”

“Doesn’t Sefirot have three more people?”

“They’re not even worth considering,” she said, strongly implying that she was averse to the very idea of loving them.

Looks like even the strongest clan in the world has some internal issues, I thought.

“Also, getting a long-time lover is fine and all, but one-night stands are great, too,” she said. “Both sides fall in love, are drawn to each other, have a tryst of a lifetime, and part ways with only the sweet memories to show for it. You see that kinda thing a lot in movies from my homeland of Italy. That’s why I’m more about hitting on and picking up than keeping.”

“But... three days ago, you said something about getting a real beauty to sleep with you for a million lir,” I said.

“I did,” she replied as if it was nothing.

“Does that really count as ‘hitting on’ or ‘picking up’...?”

“Looks, words, wealth... I’ll use everything I can to charm them! I’m The Ace of love!”

“...Eh?”

“Though, my Superior Job has nothing to do with my sexuality.”

“Now that’s a relief. For a moment, I wondered if that was one of the conditions for The Ace.”

“Ahahahah! If one of the conditions was to make a number of people fall for me, I’d have gotten it three months earlier than I did!”

She laughed, but it was hard to see it as a joke, considering how she behaved.

"Annnyway," she continued. "I've got a good idea of who I wanna pick up, but when I think about what's about to happen, I probably shouldn't do it here... Ah!" She looked at me and Cyco as if she just had a brilliant idea. "Hey, Yu."

"...What is it?" I asked.

"Let's have some fun later, shall we?"

So she finally bares her fangs at me, I thought.

"My avatar is a man, but I'm a girl on the inside... an underage one, at that... so I thoroughly refuse."

"Eeehh? But the three of us could have so much fun, right, Cy?"

"Not in a million years."

"Oh my, what a shame."

I really appreciated that she never actually forced anyone to go with her, so all you had to do was refuse.

She'd also told me that she backed down if she found out that her targets weren't single.

That made it sound like she had limits, but it had to be emphasized that she went for every good-looking person besides those in relationships.

"No chance, huh?" my teach continued. "Fran rejected me, too, so now I've been given the cold shoulder by both of you sisters. Oh, woe is mee."

She went for Francesca, too?

"Aren't you and my sister friends?" I asked.

"Yeah. That's why I hit on her with the intention of marriage. She rejected me, but she's still my best friend!"

...She'd wanted to marry her best friend?

I really didn't understand her outlook on love. It made me want to turn my brain off.

"So what are you into, anyway? Men or women?" asked Cyco.

"Both, obviously," my teach replied without even thinking. "I specialize in taking the lead with other girls, though."

"Is your gender different on the other side? Like Hugo?"

"No way. I'm a woman all the way through."

Her indifference for what she was saying made me heave a long sigh.

"Aren't you a better fit for Legendaria than Dryfe or Caldina?" I asked.

"Ahahah! Don't be stupid," she laughed before making the most serious face I'd ever seen her make. "My sexuality has nothing on the perverts there."

The words by themselves were like a joke, but it certainly didn't feel like she was fooling around.

Hearing that made me promise myself that I'd never, ever go to Legendaria.

Following the silly exchange about my teach's sexuality, I lowered my voice and began talking about something more serious.

"About the roulette game... are you sure you didn't win too much?"

"It's fine," my teach replied. "It was obvious they were gonna cheat if the bets were too high, so I bet when the hole the ball was going into became obvious and threw a wrench in their plan."

I was silent. Knowing where the ball was going to seemed impossible... for anyone except her, anyway.

"I don't use my eye unless they're cheating," she went on. "It wouldn't be fair if I was the only one doing it."

"But isn't this place owned by Huang Hean mafia? If you bet and win in ways that stand out... you'll catch their attention, right?"

"That's the plan. I'd seriously appreciate it if they picked a fight with me."

"Eh?"

"If you wanna fight tians who aren't criminals, you need them to attack you first. Otherwise you're going to the gaol. Ha ha!" she laughed before adding, "As long as they pay their share, even mafia don't count as criminals here in Caldina."

This was the first time I'd heard that she'd come to this place to fight the Huang Hean mafia backing it.

Shaken by the revelation, but hiding it well, I said, "Before we came here, you said that there was something you were supposed to get here. I thought you just meant some money for the journey."

"Ah ha ha! Please. I'm not poor enough to need to gamble to get through the day. I'm a Superior, and the money I already have is on a whole different level than what I won today."

Right... Superiors like her and Francesca were basically people who made astronomical amounts of money with little effort and wasted it just as easily.

I’d heard that there was a broke Superior who was making money selling popcorn, but that had to be an urban legend.

“The thing we’re here for is basically a stolen article,” my teach said.

“Stolen?”

“Yeah, I’m doing this at the request of the good old company leader... Well, the main source of it is someone even bigger. I’ve gotta retrieve or destroy the thing that was stolen.”

Retrieving something stolen seemed like a good enough reason to infiltrate a place owned by the Huang He mafia, but I didn’t understand the rest of it.

“What’s the point of destroying it?” I asked.

“Sorry, I said it wrong. We’re supposed to break what’s inside it, not the thing itself. But that’s only if it comes out.”

That made it sound like the item was some sort of container.

But in that case, shouldn’t she have said that the stolen thing was the content of the container?

“What is it, anyway...?” I asked.

“Something that was stored away in Huang He’s treasury. Not too long ago, when Canglong the third prince was leaving for Altar, they decided to give a couple of these to him, and when they took them out and got busy deciding which ones to pick, someone came in and stole it.”

“You mean it’s a national treasure?!”

Not a Caldinian one, either — it was from Huang He in the east. Something that important had made it to the hands of a criminal organization here in Caldina.

Though, since it was in the possession of a Huang Hean mafia, it had probably gotten here through Huang He’s criminal channels.

Regardless, this was big enough to become an international problem.

“It’s exactly that,” my teach said. “We’re bound to get a lot from Huang He if we bring it back to them, and if whatever’s inside comes out, we’ll have to break it... and if it comes down to that, it might as well be us. That’s why I was chosen for the job. We don’t have a lot of members who can fight while being careful not to break something. The old lady’s all about one-on-one fights, while Carl’s unbeatable, but a bit dull, if you know what I mean. I’m the least worst choice among us.”

She'd mentioned breaking the contents of the object again.

It was a foreign national treasure, yet she was speaking as if breaking it was inevitable.

"...Teach," I said.

"What?" she asked.

"Can you describe the stolen object in detail?"

"Ohh, it's a—"

Before she could finish, the casino became astir.

Suddenly, dozens of people in black suits ran out through the staff doors, and half of them gathered in the eating space — around our table, specifically.

This is...

"Hahahah!" my teach exulted. "See, Yu? I knew that talking about something that big was gonna make them pick a fight with us!"

"You could've told me about this..."

"Well, you can look at it as just some observation and perception training!"

Those two words almost made me remember the silver-haired boy I hated, but I did see her point.

The black-suited men who weren't surrounding us were kicking out the customers, who were complaining, but had no choice in the matter.

"Whoa, now, if you mistreat your customers, you're gonna lose business," my teach said cheerfully, not bothered by the situation one bit. "Though... that only matters if this place is still standing by tomorrow."

She was ready to fight them.

With her hand in her jacket's left pocket, she was moving something that made a clicking sound.

I'd better prepare, too, I thought.

"Anyway, I'm sure you heard what I said," my teach said as she looked up at the suited men. "Can you give me the UBM... the Treasurebeast Orb that was stolen from the inner treasury?"

The moment she said that, the air around the suited men changed.

"Do that, and we can forget about the 360,000,000 you lost—"

And we were both assaulted by a barrage of combat magic.

◇◇◇

The story of certain treasures

Huang He had a Special Superior Job called “Draconic Emperor.”

It occasionally manifested in the imperial family, which, due to the ancient dragon blood flowing in their veins, were oftentimes called “gulong ren” — ancient dragon kin.

A Draconic Emperor was a living deity closely tied to the very history of Huang He.

While all of them were revered, the manifestation of the Draconic Emperor before the previous one was considered to have been the strongest of them all.

His level had surpassed 2,000, and he’d defeated countless UBMs.

This was due to a mix of his supreme stats, unique skills such as Draconic Inheritance and Gulong Ren Cells, the various techniques he crafted through harsh training, and the many special rewards — Mythical included — he gained from killing many UBMs all by himself.

It was fair to call him a beast among beasts.

His era was one in which Masters almost didn’t exist, so he was easily among the strongest the world had to offer. It was believed that if King of Kings and The Lynx hadn’t existed at the same time as him, he would’ve unified the entire continent under the flag of Huang He.

As he fought off UBMs to protect Huang He, this Draconic Emperor realized that expanding his own strength any further would not help Huang He in any way, and that instead he needed to increase the number of people who wielded immense power.

Thus, he began research into a technique that would allow him to seal away powerful monsters. Of course, they already had monster storage in the form of Jewels, but they could not store UBMs — those weren’t even tameable to begin with. However, the Draconic Emperor didn’t give up trying to wield their powers, and eventually, he created the so-called “Treasurebeast Orbs.”

These weren’t items, but a type of barrier that materialized and acted as live storage for treasurebeasts — in other words, UBMs. The orbs made it possible for anyone to draw out and wield the powers of the UBMs inside. Since such powers were usually reserved to those who had contributed the most in the UBM’s defeat, this was simply astonishing.

Being the only one capable of using this technique to trap UBMs, that Draconic Emperor had done it many times throughout his long life. He’d sealed away tigers, dragons, and monsters unlike any you’d ever see. The trapped beasts’ tiers reached as high as Mythical, and their number amounted to almost a hundred.

When that Draconic Emperor was on his deathbed, he left the young, normal emperor with the words, “I shall die soon. But worry not, for I left you many means to make up for my absence. Use them to protect yourself, bring security to this land, and make the country prosper. This is goodbye, young one. Also... I have been feared my whole life. Everyone besides the King of Kings and The Lynx were afraid of me. You are no exception, but I’ve always found it endearing how you faced me despite your fears.”

And so, the long-lived Draconic Emperor had breathed his last.

Sadly, history hadn’t played out as he’d desired.

The young emperor he’d entrusted the future to died to a disease only a few years later.

That sparked a civil war between his brother and his unborn child... or rather, those who supported his unborn child’s rights to the imperial throne.

Not only did it cause many deaths, but it ended with the child being born as the next Draconic Emperor, while being a person who had no right to inherit the political throne.

It had been a time of meaningless bloodshed, and perhaps the most embarrassing stain in Huang He’s long history.

But if there was one good thing to say about it, it was that neither side had used the Treasurebeast Orbs even once.

That was because both sides had greatly respected the previous Draconic Emperor, not wanting to trample upon his will... and because they simply couldn’t even use them.

The inner treasury, where the Treasurebeast Orbs were kept, could only be unlocked by the emperor or the Draconic Emperor.

No one else could open it, and according to the late Draconic Emperor, if someone tried to enter without using the proper means, they would vanish from this world, alongside the treasury.

There was no emperor or Draconic Emperor during the civil war, so no one could open it to use it in the conflict.

Both the younger brother, who went on to become the emperor, as well as the child who became Draconic Emperor, thought that this was good, and greatly appreciated the late Dragon Emperor's work on this front.

The Treasurebeast Orbs went unused even after that.

The only exception happened post-civil war, when the emperor gave a tiger orb to a group of people who'd decided to travel to the west.

This was what the emperor said concerning the use of Treasurebeast Orbs:

"These are powerful indeed. However, we must not wage war or quarrel merely because we have them. Instead, we should let them lie dormant until we truly need them."

Perhaps that wasn't what the late Draconic Emperor had intended.

However, the people of Huang He, weary from the civil war, readily accepted his words, and the nearly one hundred UBMs sealed within the Treasurebeast Orbs were left to lay dormant without even using their power.

That ended once the treasury was opened a few centuries later, when the third prince of Huang He was heading out to the kingdom in the west... and someone used it as an opportunity to steal some of the orbs.

◇◇◇

Hermine the City of Gambling, Mirage

"Mr. Zhang, we've disposed of the rats," an employee reported.

"Well done." In the gambling den's manager's office, the man in charge of the place, and all of Mirage's operations in Caldina, sighed in relief and sat down on his chair.

His name was Zhang, and there was a Treasurebeast Orb in his hand.

He was looking at a crystal giving a live video feed of the gambling den's hall, where he saw nothing but smoke caused by several dozen combat magic attacks.

"Phew..."

Needless to say, his relief was due to the death of the Masters he'd ordered to have killed... or at least one of them.

As one who worked here in Caldina, Zhang obviously knew about AR-I-CA.

She'd come here to take the orb in his hand.

She was a Superior operating as part of the strongest clan, Sefirot.

Her nickname was "Blue Sky Songstress," and she was one of the strongest people in the country. However, that was only when she was riding her Magingear.

That was why he'd given out the order for her death while she was still bare.

In a way, Zhang was lucky. If she'd been replaced by Carl Lourlou the Multifariously Invincible, this attack wouldn't have done anything to him. He was the ultimate endurance fighter, known for, among other things, his fight against a UBM in boiling magma, and also the destruction of a spellcaster association that'd tried to defeat him with thousands of combat spells at once.

Surprise attacks wouldn't have scratched him, and they'd have been defeated before the battle even began. However, if the man had demanded the orb, they would've still had to fight despite the overwhelming odds.

That was just how important the orb was to them.

They'd received it from Mirage's headquarters in Huang He about a week ago. All Zhang knew was that it was a bargaining chip in negotiations with a certain clan present here in Caldina. Since Zhang was in charge of Mirage's operations here, he was in charge of this task.

Once the appointed time came, he would go to a designated spot, present the password, and complete the negotiation. It seemed like a basic trade, but the object in question was extraordinary.

The orb was a national treasure that everyone from Huang He had heard about in stories from their childhood days. He also knew that this would be less of a trade, and more of a creation of a bond with a certain organization. Zhang had been surprised by that and asked the one who'd presented it, "What kind of bond could be worth something like this?"

He hadn't gotten the answer from him, so Zhang had used comms magic to contact Mirage's main branch. They'd responded with nothing but the name of the organization, but that was more than enough.

Zhang understood the gravity of this exchange, and that his head was on the line here, along with those of every Mirage member here in Caldina. Thus, even if the one who'd caught wind of it and come here for it was a Superior, he had no choice but to shoot.

"This orb... that clan... Are the main branch planning a coup d'etat?" Zhang murmured.

He knew what they wanted to do, but he couldn't understand what they were thinking. Even so, he knew he would all be over if he went against the order.

He would be crushed by either the main branch, or that organization. Regardless, his future was so bleak that making an enemy out of the Blue Sky Songstress seemed like the better idea.

“She’ll come back in three days, but the exchange will be done in two,” he muttered.

Unlike tians, Masters were immortal. Zhang knew full well that he had only bought himself three days worth of time. However, that was all he wanted.

That was enough for him and his group to go through the exchange and leave Hermine.

Having made an enemy out of a Caldinian Superior, he had no choice but to abandon this business. That was why he could act without caring about its reputation among the customers or any damage dealt.

Otherwise, he would’ve never used explosive magic indoors. Zhang looked inside the crystal again — at the scene where a Superior had just died.

“...Isn’t this smoke lasting a bit too long?”

The smoke rising from the spot where the two Masters had stood showed no sign of going away.

Is it burning that hard? Zhang wondered, and a chill went down his spine. Zhang was a battle-focused Mirage operative that’d lived through many fights, and the chill was his experience speaking to him.

“Ventilation magic. Use vent magic to spread the smoke away!” he shouted.

“But if it’s a fire, that might make the flames stronger...”

“Doesn’t matter! Do it!”

The member followed Zhang’s order and used a vent magic, Fu, to disperse the smoke.

It exposed a cylindrical object that was continuously releasing smoke. Those with Identification saw that it had the name “Smoke Discharger.”

But there was something that attracted even more attention.

“Is that... scrap metal?”

At the ground zero of the combat magic attack, there was a large pile of scrap metal... or maybe remains.

The wall was covered in various kinds of mechanical junk, including weapons and armor. They had no idea that before the attack had hit, a certain someone had released the scrap from her inventory into the magic's trajectory.

Needless to say, the person who'd done it was...

"Ohh, you noticed?" a voice rang out from behind the wall. "Too late, though. It's showtime!"

The wall of scrap suddenly collapsed.

As though its role was over, it fell as if calculated for performance value, and revealed a blue, human-shaped machine.

It was a humanoid Magingear, but those who only knew the Marshall II wouldn't believe that. This unit was impossibly slender. It almost felt like it was but a chassis without its armor. The design made it look like a slightly bigger, more beautiful version of the power armor Magingears that had once been the norm. The only thing that made it clear that it was bigger than it first appeared was the device equipped on its back.

The unit's name was MGFX-001 Blue Opera. It was the first unit of the MGFX series. That was the title for custom units that Franklin, the father of all mech-type Magingears, created without paying any heed to the cost.

This particular unit was all blue in color, and so slender and streamlined that it didn't even feel like a Magingear.

"Sing... Opera!" Blue Opera absorbed the pilot's MP and activated its engine.

An air-shaking song started to stream through the air. It was merely the sound of the machinery inside Blue Opera, but it was comparable to the voices of proficient soprano singers in its elegant beauty.

The melody wasn't made by a human voice, but the beauty made it more than worthy of the title "songstress." The audience here wasn't moved, however, for they realized that this songstress might be the siren bringing them their doom.

"I'm ready, too, teach," a new voice rang out as someone behind the blue songstress stood up.

This Magingear was larger than the songstress, and a whole lot bulkier, but it was beautiful nonetheless.

It was a heavy unit with layers upon layers of armor. It was as though they were petals.

While the former was a songstress, this was a blooming flower.

Its name was MGFX-002 White Rose. It was the second MGFX unit, and Franklin's birthday-farewell gift to his little sister. All white in color, it was no doubt the most solid Magingear of all.

"You hopped in yours too, huh?" AR-I-CA asked.

"Yes," Hugo nodded. "But next time, please inform me that we are going to fight before we enter the establishment."

"You've gotta learn to sense that by yourself. It's part of your training!"

"Do you think that anything can count as training?"

"N-Nooooo..."

"You're stuttering."

The pilots of the blue and white units were chatting in the same way they had around the table before it was blown up. The Mirage members facing them couldn't feel so carefree, however.

Someone among them gulped.

These machines were enemies they had to defeat, and it seemed like there was no better time to strike than now, while they were chatting.

However, they felt like everything would end the moment they attacked.

All of them thought that this would be where they died.

◇◇◇

High Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

"Eh? You actually keep your Magingear in a Garage?" my teach had said three hours before we'd entered the gambling den. "Well, they're good for their automatic light maintenance and gun loading, but if you need to use it in an emergency, you should keep it in an inventory with Instant Release on it. There's no point in using Garages when your mech's a hundred percent battle-ready."

Then she'd given me a spare inventory, which I'd moved my Rose into.

That should've been enough for me to realize that I would be involved in some battle soon.

At least this experience had made me understand just how useful Instant Release inventories were for spontaneous battles.

It was the first time I'd heard of such a technique, but that was probably because we ToW pilots were mostly focused on tests and didn't use

Magingears this way.

This had to be something my teach had thought of in her battles after leaving Dryfe.

“Is it just me, or did that scrap wall almost break?” I asked.

“Don’t worry. It was right in the trajectory, and it... was tough enough.”

“Why the pause and why the ‘was’?”

“Hmm... Well, this is all scrap from the machine I broke. Maybe it wouldn’t have lasted if I’d used just a little bit less...”

I said nothing and just thought, So she’s basically saying that if the scrap had been only a little more weathered, we wouldn’t have made it.

“It’s fine, it’s fine. I can just dodge it,” she said.

“But... then I would be dead, right?”

“...That’s part of traini—”

“Stop that.”

As we continued the nonsensical analysis of the situation, I noticed something at the edge of my monitor.

It was one of the Huang Heian mafia members. He was preparing to fire more combat magic at Blue Opera.

The unit was lightly-armored, so he probably thought that it could be disabled with a well-aimed surprise attack. He launched his spell before I could say anything...

“And just so you know, apparently, Embryos grow-up more powerful if you die a couple times.”

...while my teach just continued her speech.

His spell headed straight for her back, but my teach avoided it by simply tilting her unit. It didn’t even affect the flow of conversation.

“Eh?” the mafia member said.

He probably didn’t understand what had just happened. It was as if my teach had eyes on her back... or some other mysterious sense.

She was capable of that.

I was pretty sure that no one could land a surprise attack on her. Before her Superior Embryo, traps, sneak attacks, gambling cheats... all dangers were rendered powerless.

“Teach...” I began.

“Yeah. I guess we should start the battle. We don’t want the one with the orb to escape.”

As she spoke, she materialized two rifles in midair — probably using Instant Release — then grabbed them with her Blue Opera.

"...! Fire!" a mafia member shouted.

They all began attacking us all at once.

A rain of combat magic fell on both Opera and Rose, but it didn't have the effect the casters were intending.

My teach's Opera repeated the previous feat and dodged every single one of the spells.

Her Magingear was on the smaller side, but still much larger than a human, and yet it didn't even get scratched.

My Rose, on the other hand, couldn't dodge at all, so every single attack heading my way landed.

Still, the petal-like layers of armor created a white light that blocked off all combat magic.

It seemed like we were demonstrating the difference and viability of AGI and END-focused builds.

If not that, then we were showing them the power of the most expensive and strongest Magingears built by Dryfe's largest clan.

Of course, it was worth noting that while my teach was dodging using her skill, I was surviving using nothing but the power of my unit's gear.

"You're bad at dodging," said Cyco. "Your sister probably knew that."

Probably, I thought.

If you looked at this and one other feature it had, you would truly understand that Rose really had been made for me.

It seemed like proof that Francesca knew me well.

I should write to her soon, I thought. I'll mention that I met my teach, too.

My thoughts were cut off by my teach saying, "Hmm... What to dooo?"

"Teach?"

"Hey, I'd like to go look for the orb. Can I leave these to you?"

"Hm..." I closed my eyes and thought.

Not so long ago, I'd exterminated almost every member of the Gouz-Maise Gang.

That was enough to believe that I could do it.

But was it something I was okay with doing? I'd absolutely had to get rid of the Gouz-Maise Gang, but what about this mafia...?

"Just so you know, I looked Mirage up, and their Caldinian branch engages in murder, burglary, gang violence, drug trade, kidnapping, and slave trade. Though the latter half is legal if you've got the money!"

"...It's like you read my mind," I muttered.

Like a certain silverhead...

Anyway, I now understood how it was and was ready to do it.

"Let me handle this by myself," I told her.

"Sure thing," my teach replied. "I'll go look for the orb."

She moved her Opera and activated the ancient legendary MVP special reward on its back: Skycontrol Wings, Aircluster.

A moment later, Opera vanished, leaving behind no trace of it besides the echo of a thunderous, destructive sound.

I looked at the wall and saw a hole large enough for Blue Opera to fly through. I could've sworn it hadn't been there before.

So the one with the orb is already outside, I reflected. "Anyway..."

With Opera gone, all the attacks were now focused on Rose.

Even so, they couldn't even scratch its white armor.

The mafia members were looking at my unit with pure fear in their eyes.

They must've thought that it was indestructible.

I, on the other hand, didn't feel the least bit safe or secure.

"It's a real MP hog," I muttered. "I won't last more than five minutes like this."

"Yeah," Cyco agreed.

Rose's multi-layered armor, Fleur d'Hiver, was designed with the Shield Giant's Thousand Shutter skill in mind, and it created a barrier that blocked off a certain amount of damage.

It could deal with combat magic from low-rank tians with no Embryo stat growth bonuses without me having to lift a finger, but keeping it up cost a lot of MP.

And that was only when I wasn't doing anything else. If I started using other skills or engaging in complex maneuvers, my MP would downright melt.

MP Potions couldn't keep up with me, either, so I had to make sure this battle didn't drag on.

"What's the count on them, Cyco?" I asked.

"Twenty on average."

Our main weapon, La Porte de l'Enfer, was based on the number of creatures of their own type the enemies had killed.

Twenty wasn't a good number for it to be effective.

The battle would surely last long if we relied on it, so we wouldn't use it this time.

"What about Deuxième?" I asked.

"That should work, I think."

Then let's use it.

"Okay, time for high-rank Cocytus to make her debut!" Cyco declared.

"Indeed. Let us decorate this sand-covered oasis with the flower of abyssal ice."

"Oh? I guess your edgy phase didn't go anywhere, huh?"

"...Shut up."

Blushing due to the words that'd escaped my lips, I prepared to fight.

◆◆◆

Hermine the City of Gambling, outskirts

The leader of Mirage's Caldina branch, Zhang, was standing on the sand all by himself.

Hermine had been built around an Oasis, but everything outside it was just desert. Once the blue and white units had appeared in the gambling den, he'd left and run all the way here. He wasn't just making off with the orb, however.

"There she is!" He looked up at the sky and saw one of the units, Blue Opera, descending nearby with a high-pitched song. "That hunk of metal sure is loud. Doesn't she know that it's night?"

The Magingear descended, but didn't attack. The pilot seemed to be worried that she would break the Treasurebeast Orb.

AR-I-CA's goal was to retrieve the orb, and killing the UBM inside was merely a relief measure in case it broke.

That was why AR-I-CA tried talking to Zhang first.

"Evening! I'm guessing you're the Mirage member with the orb."

"Indeed I am," Zhang said. "I'm impressed you found me."

"I've got this radar here. It's a special reward, and I just followed the person with the highest level."

"I see," he sighed as he realized that escape wasn't an option.

"Anyway, you didn't give me the orb or run any farther, and instead you just stopped here in the middle of nowhere. Does that mean what I think it does?"

"Yes," Zhang said as he turned his hands around, revealing dozens of Fu talismans. "I realized that battle with you was inevitable and prepared myself for it. That's why I changed location." Indeed. He hadn't gone to the desert to escape; he'd been waiting for AR-I-CA so that he could face her.

"If I went all out in there, I'd end up killing my subordinates!" he shouted as he spread his arms.

A moment later, five pillars of sand rose behind him, revealing five long silhouettes.

The things that popped out appeared much like the local worms, but there was something different about them.

"I'm the head of Mirage's Caldina branch, Great Soul Daoshi, Zhang Zangqi! My nickname is 'Wuxing Jilong,' and I will use the five great jiangshis that gave me this name to destroy you!"

"Wuxing Jilong" translated to "Penta-Ravenous Dragon," and that was exactly what these creatures were.

Their eyes were completely lifeless, and each of them had a Fu on their face.

They were simultaneously Dragons and Jiangshi, and for some reason, they were covered in lightning.

"Oh? So you have a Superior Job. Great Soul Daoshi is basically Huang He's King of Tartarus, right?" AR-I-CA asked. "You're not exactly that similar, though."

The soul daoshi grouping was the Eastern equivalent of the West's necromancer grouping. Thus, the Jiangshis they were dealing with counted as undead.

Still, they were creatures controlled by Fu, and despite the similarities, they weren't much like the Jiangshi job.

"You took some upper-level Pure-Dragons, enhanced them by turning them into Jiangshi, and now you're enhancing them with the orb, too, huh...? Now, that is strong."

AR-I-CA already understood the details and extent of his power, and even though she saw him as strong, she remained cheerful.

“But I guess this is better than hunting down each member one by one.”

In fact, she was downright ecstatic.

“I mean, what’s the point of a mech fight if you’re not up against someone strong?!”

Yes, the battle she was about to have was already making her genuinely happy.

“Anyway, thanks for the answer! A thumbs-up to your courage!”

AR-I-CA raised Opera’s right thumb in the same way she always raised her own.

Then she turned the hand, making the thumb face down.

It was a sign of killing intent.

“...And goodbye.”

“Prepare yourself!” Zhang shouted.

With the great desert of Caldina as the stage, the battle between the Blue Sky Songstress and Wuxing Jilong began.

◇◇◇

High Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

“We’re done,” I said as I confirmed that the members of Mirage here were defeated.

We had done it in less than two minutes. The casters were all partially or completely Frozen.

“Great, huh?” Cyco spoke up. “That was so super easy, huh? Boring, huh?”

“Could you at least not call it ‘boring’?” I couldn’t deny that it had been super easy, though.

I’d taken all of them out with a single skill.

“At least we now know that La Porte de l’Enfer Deuxième works in battle,” I said.

That was the skill Cyco had gained upon advancing to her fourth form.

Like the name implied, it was an upgrade... or more like a sidegrade... to La Porte de l’Enfer.

Its effects were exactly the same as that of the first, but the formula was different.

The original La Porte de l’Enfer gave an X% chance to Freeze X% of the selected target's body every 13 seconds, where X was the number on the target's kill counter for the same creature type as the target.

La Porte de l'Enfer Deuxième, on the other hand, simply Froze X% of my targets' bodies, where X had the formula of "Damage received from target (includes negated damage) × amount of own creature type killed ÷ HP of the in-range target."

Basically, it meant that someone who'd dealt 1,000 damage to my Magingear, killed 20 people, and had 1,000 HP would have 1,000 × 20 ÷ 1,000 = 20 percent of their body frozen.

With 2,000 damage, that would be 40 percent.

It could only work if I received damage from my target, but it was much less picky than the original La Porte de l'Enfer. There was no luck factor, either.

The evolution had happened after Francesca's gift of the Rose, and that was probably why it was so endurance-focused.

Besides that, this skill...

"It's so obviously made with Nemesis' Vengeance in mind," said Cyco.

"...Yeah," I nodded.

I couldn't say whether it was the moment he'd defeated me in Gideon or just the way he acted in general, but Ray had clearly influenced me and the way my Embryo had evolved. Deuxième was an actual counter skill.

"Anyway, my work here is done," I said.

Considering the noise we'd made, the Caldinian military police would come soon. The mafia members couldn't move, so I could just leave them here and go to my teach. After making Cyco cancel the merge with Rose, I returned the equipment I'd used.

"I've gotta say," said Cyco.

"What?"

"Battle Mode II didn't get to do a lot, huh?"

"It eats a lot of MP, so I don't wanna use it too much."

I was done with my role for now. The rest was up to my teach, but she probably wouldn't have any problems.

In fact, I didn't know anyone who would be a worse opponent to have than her.

I could confidently say that not even the King of Destruction could beat her.

◇◆◇

Hermine the City of Gambling, outskirts, sky

Lightning cracked the darkness above the desert.

Normally, these cloudless, dry, barren lands were no place for such phenomena, but at this moment, the skies above were decorated by five lightning-clad, serpentine Dragons — specifically, High Dragon Jiangshi.

They twisted and twirled in a seemingly random but definitely organized manner, chasing after the shadow of the slender unit, AR-I-CA's Blue Opera.

The five corpse-dragons spewed fire, ice, wind, petrification, and curse breaths, but the unit dodged them all.

"You're from a country that has these dragons as a symbol, aren't ya?" AR-I-CA asked. "Pretty messed to make them into Jiangshi, doncha think?"

"Perhaps that is the reason why I was tasked to work in Caldina," her opponent replied.

"Good point."

The one commanding the five lightning-clad dragons was Great Soul Daoshi, Zhang Zangqi.

He was riding one of them, but the lightning wasn't shocking him, nor was it burning the Fu on the High Dragon Jiangshi's forehead.

Despite that, the electricity surrounding them burned and melted all the shells fired by Blue Opera.

This was done by the Treasurebeast Orb in Zhang's hand. It sealed the UBM called "Thundershield Beast, Dangai," which was said to fight using lightning armor. Despite centuries of imprisonment, its power hadn't faded.

"Wow, that's just unfair," said AR-I-CA. "That's some broken loot."

"Be silent. You're in no position to call anyone unfair."

Despite the immense power he wielded, Zhang didn't feel like he had the upper hand. While the lightning rejected all the attacks heading his way, none of his dragons' attacks were landing on Blue Opera.

Even when he calculated its trajectory and fired where it would be a moment later, it kept dodging in a 90 degree angle, seemingly ignoring aerodynamics and the law of inertia.

This was due to the special reward on Blue Opera's back: Skycontrol Wings, Aircluster.

It was the remains of an UBM that had appeared here in Caldina, often described as an "unidentified flying object." The item came with the item skills "Inertia Control" and "Air Canopy." The former did exactly what it said in the name, while the latter allowed manipulation of air resistance. Combined, they let Blue Opera fly in trajectories that ought to be impossible.

"It seems like we're on equal footing," said Zhang.

Both he and AR-I-CA only had one UBM power they could use in this battle. AR-I-CA had her radar, too, but it was useless to her right now.

Though Zhang's UBM power was leaning towards endurance and AR-I-CA's was focused on speed, they were more or less evenly matched. Zhang's attacks couldn't hit Opera, while AR-I-CA's shells couldn't break through the lightning barrier.

If I hadn't had Dangai, this battle might've been over already, Zhang thought, impressed by just how accurate AR-I-CA's shells were.

Nevertheless, as things were, he was right that they were on equal footing. It was a stalemate neither of them could easily break.

Thus, Zhang predicted three outcomes to this: it could either become a struggle for who would run out of MP first, AR-I-CA could use some sure-kill attack that could break through the lightning barrier, or Zhang's attacks could somehow hit Opera.

He obviously wanted it to be the third one.

"I'm not losing sight of her, anyway," he muttered to himself.

Blue Opera's dark colors melted into the night sky as it moved quickly and erratically, yet Zhang always knew exactly where it was.

It wasn't his own ability, but a certain feature on the unit — specifically, its engine sound.

The high, song-like roars filled the entire battlefield, making it easy to tell exactly where it was.

It could go to Zhang's side or behind him, but he would track it down like a cat with a bell on its neck.

At first, Zhang believed that the sound would be used for some kind of bluffing tactic, but he now realized that that wasn't the case.

This unit would make this sound whether AR-I-CA wanted it to or not.

The engine sound was a flaw Blue Opera had had since its creation.

◇◆

Blue Opera was a defective unit.

Specifically, there was an issue with its core magic-exchange engine.

Most Dryfean machines operated by transforming the user’s MP into power.

Therefore, one of the most desirable features on them were engines that could transform MP to power with great efficiency and not take too much space on the unit.

Blue Opera’s engine was perfect in that regard.

It had efficiency incomparable to other Magingear engines and was small enough to install on a motorbike.

Its creation was accidental, so it was difficult to recreate it, but it was still perfect for its intended purpose.

At least, if you ignored the extremely loud sound it made while active.

It was so loud, in fact, that it couldn’t be used in normal battles, let alone covert operations.

Once active, it would give away the unit’s location to even the farthest enemies, leaving it open to ranged attacks and skills of all kinds.

Naturally, Franklin, its creator, tried to solve this problem using silencers and many other things, but strangely enough, the more of these he installed, the less effective the engine became.

It was as though it itself wanted to be loud — to sing to the world.

“I’m not dealin’ with a Tenchi-esque karakuri or a Legendarian spirit doll here...” he muttered. “Why’s this engine such a weirdo?”

Eventually, Franklin just gave up on it.

There was no way you could make a decent Magingear with an engine like this. It would stand out so much that it would be shot down immediately.

Thus, Franklin considered sealing it away in the warehouse until he had the technology to properly analyze it, but AR-I-CA, who watched him work, said, “Who cares if it stands out? Just don’t get hit!”

His friend’s words made Franklin’s eyes widen. Then he smiled and thought, Yeah, you could pull that off.

Though the focus on speed contradicted its immense presence, Franklin felt that it suited AR-I-CA well, so he took to creating the first MGFX — a unit he spared no expense on.

Thus, MGFX-001 was born. Combined with AR-I-CA's piloting skill, it became the only Magingear that could move on the surface faster than the speed of sound.

And the Aircluster it had now made it even more mobile than ever. Blue Opera was the fastest, loudest unit, entrusted to AR-I-CA by her dear friend.

◇◆

Blue Opera flew through the night sky, singing all the way through.

The five corpse dragons attacked it over and other, but none of their breaths even touched it.

It danced in the air as if playing with them like a sylph.

Why can't I hit her? Zhang wondered.

As far as he knew, no matter how well-equipped, Magingears could never go beyond Pure-Dragon-tier.

Of course, this one was piloted by The Ace, who surely had the maximum level in Piloting, making it twice as powerful as usual, if not even more than that.

However, Zhang's five High Dragon Jiangshi were all upper-Pure-Dragons enhanced even further.

There should've been no difference between each of them and AR-I-CA's Blue Opera, and it was 5v1, at that.

Even so, they were on equal footing.

It should be equal... wait, no! Zhang realized.

The Ace and the Great Soul Daoshi.

Air Cluster and Dangai.

Blue Opera and five High Dragon Jiangshi.

Those factors alone made them seem equal, but there was one factor that couldn't be ignored.

While Zhang matched her on those fronts, he couldn't forget that this was a battle between a Superior Master and a tian.

"Gh...!" Zhang used all five of his dragons, enhanced himself with Fu, and launched a perfect surprise attack on AR-I-CA.

Even so, she evaded it.

He couldn't believe that he had failed to even scratch it.

Zhang knew full well that The Ace, AR-I-CA was the greatest pilot in the world, and that her Magingear was the only one that could move faster than the speed of sound.

However, skill and speed alone couldn't explain this result. There had to be something more to AR-I-CA.

"It can't be..." Zhang muttered as a thought came to mind.

He quickly used one of the aces up his sleeve.

Following Opera's sound, he made the High Dragon Jiangshi closest to her prepare to fire its breath, saying, "Death Tornado."

That activated the Fu inside the dragon, making its stomach area release a powerful magic attack. It was a surprise attack that was coming from a place that normally wouldn't be used for attacks.

No one could expect it, and normally, it couldn't miss.

However...

"Whoa!" The Ace evaded it with little effort, and just like the others, it ended up not even scratching her before it faded.

Zhang didn't say a word as the corpse dragon's stomach burst and it fell to the ground, paying the price for its attack.

One of his namesakes had just died a useless death, but Zhang couldn't even care about that.

All that was on his mind was the answer to the phenomenon that'd just happened: the reason behind her ability to dodge a complete surprise attack.

The nature of AR-I-CA's power was...

"She can see the future?"

◇◆

Some jobs had the skill called "Prophecy," which let the user give vague predictions for the distant future.

There were sense skills that could sharpen people's senses for incoming dangers, such as Killing Intent Perception, which informed the user of nearby hostiles, and Danger Sense, which did the same for danger in general.

However, there were no skills that gave you a detailed understanding of the future, and the same applied to Embryo skills.

In fact, though they gave Masters access to powers far outside the norm, when you looked at it as an MMORPG, Infinite Dendrogram had some abilities that were thought to be impossible even for Embryos.

One of them was time stopping. Since the world of Dendro hosted so many people at the same time, stopping time for all of them at once was considered too great of a feat for a single person. The closest you could get to time-stopping was raising your AGI so high that it looked like other people weren't even moving.

Besides that, there was Master mind control. While this didn't apply to tians, players' minds were immune to all kinds of control. It was possible to control their bodies, though, and it was thought that the mind immunity was due to the player protection system.

Then there was future-sight. It was also considered impossible for one reason: Masters.

A certain ludo Master once said, "When you look at Infinite Dendrogram as an MMORPG, everything can be predicted because everything acts based on programming. However, players aren't programs. You don't know what's on their mind and how they'll act, and that creates a map with countless possible futures. That's why it's impossible to see which one of them is right."

This Master wasn't wrong about how the future could easily be changed by the will of the people. It wasn't something that could be calculated.

But there was an exception to this, and that was an Embryo that saw the future by looking into the hearts of people, Masters included.

Whether it was to protect their privacy, or just a functional limitation, this Embryo wasn't actually able to tell its Master what others were thinking.

However, it calculated everything.

It turned others' thoughts into masked data and calculated every relevant factor, inside or out.

Temperature, wind speed, geothermal heat, gravitational pull, all the artificial physical states... nothing wasn't considered.

Not even the thoughts of those nearby escaped it.

It calculated everything and delivered it to its Master as "danger," letting her see what would imperil her a few seconds ahead and evade it easily.

That was The Ace, AR-I-CA's Superior Embryo: Transcendental Calculator, Cassandra.

It was currently the only Superior Embryo that could see the future.

It took the shape of AR-I-CA's artificial eye, and its unique skill, Calamity Princess's Prophecy, was basically in the same vein as Killing Intent Perception and Danger Sense.

However, it was on a whole 'nother level.

Cassandra not only knew there was danger — it saw what it was.

It saw the trajectories of all the attacks that could touch Opera's frame, the air movements the attacks would make, the scattered rocks that would fly in their path when a stray shot hit the ground... Cassandra saw all the dangers several seconds before they happened.

It could be a skill like La Porte de l'Enfer, which was sure to kill anyone who didn't know about it, or a surprise attack that wasn't telegraphed at all... nothing could escape its gaze.

And Cassandra's Master wielded this power well.

Back when AR-I-CA was riding Geists or slow Marshall IIs, the machines couldn't keep up with Cassandra's predictions. But all of that changed once AR-I-CA got the supersonic unit that was Blue Opera.

She saw all and dodged all — the power of absolute evasion.

That was half of the reason why she was a renowned battle-focused Master.

◇◆

"Prescience..." muttered Zhang. "I guess I should assume that you can read all my moves."

Zhang had lots of battle experience, but someone with such a power was new even to him.

"But that's it — I simply didn't know something like this."

Not having experienced something before wasn't enough for him to deny it when it was happening before his very eyes. That was the right thing to think.

He also pondered, How far can she see?

If AR-I-CA could see everything to the end of this battle, Zhang had no chance.

But he knew that that wasn't the case.

If she could see that much, she could've handled this a lot better.

For example, she could've captured the person who'd delivered the orb to Zhang before it reached him, or handled herself better at the gambling den.

Because of that, he believed that she could only see a few seconds ahead. If she could see further ahead, this battle would be over already.

He was right about that, too.

That means I must lead her into a situation where she can't evade my attack, even if she had a few seconds to do it, Zhang reflected. He had an ace up his sleeve that could do that.

Not saying a word, Zhang looked at all his dragons — even the one that was lying on the ground.

This is your final mission... Go.

Following Zhang's will, the three airborne corpse dragons created space between them and began flying about as though to surround Blue Opera.

However, the space between them was so great that none of their breaths could reach her.

"Hmm...? Ohh, I get it," AR-I-CA said, and suddenly, something changed.

First, the corpse dragon that had fallen to the ground exploded, releasing countless Fu.

The three surrounding AR-I-CA did exactly the same, multiplying the amount of Fu several times.

The Fu began whirling, creating a cage around Blue Opera... or a hurricane with it as the eye.

The spaces between the Fu were wide, but still too small for the Magingear to pass.

The Fu gradually closed the distance, creating a giant, orb-shaped cage around Blue Opera.

Each Fu had enough power to keep Blue Opera inside the cage, effectively making that cage into a coffin.

It was the sign that the Great Soul Daoshi, Zhang Zangqi, was about to release his strongest magic.

It was called...

"Zhenwo Zhendao, Xuanlongba!"

The skill translated to “True Vortex True Blade, Whirling Dragon Dominance,” and it punished its targets using all the powerful wind-blades inside.

It cost all the Fu flying around, and it was equal in tier to the Baolongba that the famous Xunyu had used in The Clash of the Superiors.

He had to sacrifice all four of the corpse dragons he had left.

And Blue Opera was definitely within its range...

◇◆

The battle’s outcome was decided the moment Blue Opera was caught in Xuanlongba.

It was an immensely powerful skill which had more than enough power to quickly reduce the unit to scrap.

Even if AR-I-CA currently had a Lifesaving Brooch, her Magingear wouldn’t survive the continuous onslaught.

AR-I-CA’s defeat would be certain.

The battle would soon end.

The present painted an image of a future where Zhang won...

“The Calamity Princess Closes Her Eyes — Cassandra!”

...only to take it away the very next moment.

◇◆

Zhang didn’t understand.

Experienced as he was, Zhang had been able to expose the nature of many of AR-I-CA’s abilities.

However, he couldn’t even begin to understand what was happening before him right now.

Blue Opera had left the deadly storm as if it was nothing, then fired off shells that easily broke through the lightning barrier and pierced the forehead and Fu of the corpse dragon Zhang was riding.

The Fu was the thing supporting its fleeting life, and without it, it ceased all function and began falling to the ground.

The shells then blew off Zhang’s right arm, which Blue Opera then reached for to retrieve the orb it was holding.

The unit then showered the falling dragon in countless metal cans — Grenade Bombs.

Flames soon engulfed both the half-dead Zhang and his last dragon.

Unable to understand what had led to his defeat, Zhang fell to the sand below, concluding the battle in the desert.

◇◇◇

High Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

It was the day after the incident with Mirage.

After logging out and taking a nap, I returned to Infinite Dendrogram.

Normally, I would just sleep in here, but I couldn't have done that after what'd happened yesterday.

There might have been Mirage remnants who'd assassinate me or steal my inventory and unit, and that wouldn't have been funny.

Anyway, as strange as that seemed, Hermine looked exactly the same as it had yesterday.

One of the underground organizations that had made a nest in the city was gone, but things were continuing on, as always.

Perhaps events like yesterday's aren't uncommon here, I thought.

As a result of the chaos, all members of Mirage's Caldina branch had been arrested.

Like my teach had said, they'd accumulated many sins to their name, but I wasn't sure if they would really be punished, since I'd heard that Caldina would forgive anything as long as you had the money.

But my teach had said that they couldn't pay their sins off in this case.

"Sure, money can bend the law in Caldina. That's why people trade illegal goods all the time here. But listen here, Yu: the sin of endangering or taking the life of another person isn't cheap. You can try to pay it off by working your ass off your whole life, but even that wouldn't be enough."

That was her reason for thinking that Mirage would be properly punished.

"Of course, two of the three worst people I know are dumbasses who go against that, too," she'd added.

Anyway, I was glad to find out that even this "money is everything" country had some level of morality.

Also, Zhang, the head of Mirage's Caldinian branch, was considered missing.

My teach had said, "I'm totally sure I beat him, but I don't know what's become of him. I'd say that there's a 70 percent chance that he's alive."

I was guessing that, in my teach's mind, the battle had ended the moment he was defeated and she'd taken the orb from him.

Pushing yesterday's events aside... I was now waiting to meet up with my teach. We'd agreed to rendezvous in the hotel's lobby at nine in the morning.

It was ten now.

"She's a whole hour late," I mumbled.

"She should have more respect for time," Cyco commented.

She tends to be late, and is generally carefree. Is that due to her being an Italian? I wondered. But now that I think about it, neither Francesca nor I act very... French. I guess stereotypes have nothing against the individual.

"Ah. She's here," said Cyco.

"Finally... Wait, ehhh?"

My teach was showing up an hour and ten minutes past the time we'd agreed on.

Not only was she awfully late, she was accompanied by a vaguely familiar woman.

My teach had her hand around her waist, and she even kissed her as they parted.

"Last night was amazing..." said the girl.

"It really was. I'll never forget it for as long as I live. Your cuteness will stay with me forever."

With that, the two split apart.

I suddenly remembered that the woman was the lady my teach had been eyeing back in the gambling den. Apparently, she'd gone on to court her and do the you-know-what.

I'm not sure I know "what," I added silently. I'm only fifteen.

"Kept ya waitin', huh?" my teach said, coming over. "Nice morning we're having. I'm still a bit sleepy, though."

"I'm not gonna say anything about your way of life, but can you at least come on time?" I asked.

"Sorry 'bout that. I got a little carried away last night. Oh, I just remembered the innocence on her face... She was the best!”

Really, now?

“I hope you die,” Cyco and I said in unison.

“You’re gonna be in sync for that?!”

According to my teach, the orb had been given to a transporter before the end of yesterday.

Since it was a barrier-like thing that couldn’t be placed in inventories, I’d wondered how they’d handle transportation, so I was glad to hear that.

I also asked about something that had me curious.

“We crushed Mirage’s Caldinian branch. Won’t that make us a target of the entire organization?”

It was a famous underground entity, after all, and I didn’t want to have to worry about them all the time.

Some people could easily handle being their targets, but we were Pilots, which meant that we were fragile without our Magingears.

“I don’t think you’ve gotta worry about them,” my teach said.

“Why not?”

“You’ll know when you read today’s evening newspaper.”

“Hm?”

Had something article-worthy happened?

Well, no matter what, we’d finished retrieving the orb here in Hermine. Even though I hadn’t even known my teach was doing something like this.

I’d been thrown into an international problem concerning a national treasure without any warning, and that was... draining, to put it lightly.

Honestly, I wouldn’t want to take part in something like this even if I was fully-informed.

“I’m glad we were able to get the orb without too much trouble,” I said.

“Yep! Time to get back to training as we go for the next one!”

Training... I wonder what she’ll make me do now, I thought. I’ve almost maxed out High Pilot, so it’s almost time to change... jobs... Hm?

“Next one?” I asked.

“Yeah. Didn’t I tell you?” she said as she raised seven fingers. “There’s a whole seven of these stolen Huang He orbs.”

Seven, huh? I see. I see...

“We’ll have to do this six more times?!” I shouted.

“Yeah! Let’s do our best, Yu!”

I could hear my body turn limp.

◇

Hello, Francesca.

I hope you are well.

I went through some things that made me feel like I'm about to die inside.

It looks like I won't be making it to Tenchi for a long time.

I'm broadening my horizons, but maybe not in ways I ever wanted.

Why am I getting involved in Huang He and Caldina's national problems right after leaving Dryfe? Was this how you felt when you were traveling across the Earth?

I feel like I just heard you say, "No way, damn it!"

It must've been my imagination.

I'm pretty tired, so I'm leaving it at that for now.

I'll write again if something happens.

Also, let's talk a lot when I return to Dryfe someday.

I hope my journey is one that gives me more good stories to tell than complaints.

Until next time,

Yuri Gautier

◆◆◆

Huang He, a certain place in the draconic capital, underground

The space was under a building of a company that was large even by the draconic capital's standards.

It was a place of proper business, too, but its — Mirage's — true nature was in its underground.

In the space, there was a U-shaped table, surrounded by eight men and women of various ages.

"And everything is going as planned, I presume?" one woman asked.

"Yes. Of course, milady."

One was the head of the Huang He branch.

One was the contraband supervisor.

One was the slave trade supervisor.

One was the intelligence supervisor.

And finally, there was The Fang, the SJ working as the assassin supervisor.

They were all part of Mirage, and they all had an extremely important role in the organization.

At the end of the U-shaped table, there was a platform with a chair placed as high as a person.

On it, there was a young girl who was looking down at the rest. She was clad in robes you'd expect to see on Huang He's imperial family.

The girl wasn't there by mistake.

"Excellent. Once the clan in question begins cooperating with us, Huang He will return to me — its rightful ruler," she said.

Her name was Hualong.

She was the current head of Mirage, and had only risen to the role about a month ago.

She was the only gulong ren besides the current imperial family.

◆

Gulong ren — ancient dragon kin — were the descendants of half-breeds born between ancient dragons and mankind.

They ruled Huang He as the imperial family, looking after its people as themselves, emperors, or the famed Draconic Emperors.

However, there was one time when the gulong ren had fought amongst themselves.

It was the civil war that had come after the Draconic Emperor before the previous one and the emperor had both died within a span of just a few years.

The gulong ren had been split in two groups, fighting a battle which would only end when the child of the late emperor — which one side claimed had the right to the imperial throne — was born as the Draconic Emperor, who couldn't simultaneously be both.

However, there was one problem: the gulong ren faction that had supported the child then attempted to assassinate the emperor.

The child they'd pushed had no right to the throne, but they believed their faction could still win if they got rid of the emperor.

With that foolish thought, they tried to kill the new ruler.

But their plot was exposed before it could happen.

The one who revealed it wasn't anyone from the new emperor's faction, but someone who didn't even belong to Huang He: it was The Lynx.

No one knew what the rival of the late Draconic Emperor was thinking when he did this, but the result was clear — the assassination didn't happen, and all those who were planning it were executed.

However, there was one person who'd avoided death.

It was a young girl — the person the assassins had wanted to make the empress.

She was little, so people assumed that she'd known nothing of the plot, and thus she was the only one of the faction who avoided execution.

Or perhaps the emperor simply hadn't wanted to kill a child.

Regardless, someone related to the assassination plot had no place in the imperial court. Because of that, the child was merely banished.

Some worried that she could spread gulong ren blood to the outside and that killing her was the better option, while others believed that the optimal course of action was locking her up until she died, but the emperor rejected those ideas and simply banished her.

Respecting a child's life was obviously the kind choice, but it became a source of woe for Huang He.

Over the years thereafter, the girl became a prominent figure in Huang He's underground society.

She was a gulong ren, after all. You couldn't judge her capabilities by human standards.

Thus, it was clear that she would become a skilled fighter. That might have even been the reason why the emperor had exiled her — he'd known she could make it on her own. Still, he probably hadn't expected her to join the underground society.

Anyway, by the time she was an adult, she had great wealth, many subordinates, and something you could call an organization.

Its name was "Mirage."

Indeed, at the center of the infamous Huang Heian mafia, there was an exiled gulong ren.

The name of the mafia was actually the name for her hideout, a reference to it being an illusion compared to the palace she rightfully belonged in.

We won't get there in my generation, she would think as she watched Mirage's progress.

"There" referred to the imperial throne.

Indeed... she was living on while carrying on the will of the would-be assassins from her younger years.

She planned to exterminate the current imperial family and rise to the top.

It wasn't that she hadn't known anything — people had simply thought she hadn't.

And she was still thinking of killing the emperor and becoming the empress herself.

"It will take us a few generations to grow large enough," she murmured with dissatisfaction.

No matter how quickly Mirage expanded, it would never be able to fight Huang He in her generation.

Thus, she entrusted the plot to her descendants, essentially turning Mirage into a mafia.

Several centuries had passed since then.

◆

"Everyone, the time has come." Seated in her throne-like chair, the current head of Mirage, Hualong, spoke to her people.

Another thing of note about her was her name. The "long" in it, which meant dragon, was actually only allowed on men born into the imperial family, so her having it was just another show of defiance towards the current rulers. All the heads of Mirage had done this.

"Recently, the inner treasury, which had been sealed for centuries, was opened, and one of the orbs ended up in our hands. With it, we were able to secure the strongest reinforcements. The heavens themselves are telling us that now is the time to act."

Many would consider that to be a mere coincidence, but the girl was certain that this was their greatest opportunity yet. Her family had been waiting to take the throne for centuries.

“The battle to decide the true emperor draws near!” she declared. “That is when the Mirage will become the reality!”

Thus, she was drawing a picture of the future she desired. The moment that her family would have their revenge for the pain they’d experienced... which was arguably well-deserved.

They would start a coup d’état and take the imperial throne for themselves.

It wouldn’t be legitimate, of course.

The people had no issues with the current imperial family, and their chances of success were low.

However, Hualong thought she could keep them under control if she simply had the power to do so.

At the moment, half of Huang He’s Superiors were outside the country. Thus, if the clan she had in mind, which was said to be one of the best, came here and helped, they should be able to overthrow this country.

At least, that was what Hualong believed.

It was easy to call her idea foolish. In fact, one might even ask her how she’d come to that conclusion. However, she’d ascended to Mirage’s throne while she was still young. Her predecessor had died prematurely and left her without the knowledge necessary to lead this organization.

She’d also been taught about her family’s history and the power of Mirage for as long as she could remember, so her conclusion was the only one she deemed possible.

“Heh heh heh,” she snickered. “I can’t wait.”

The responses of Mirage’s leadership were varied.

“I guess we’ll soon be ministers.”

“I would be fine with just handling money.”

“So, who do I gotta kill?”

Some were thinking the exact same thing as Hualong.

Some were certain of her failure and were thinking about how to survive.

Some were simply trying to do their roles regardless of Hualong’s ideals.

With even her most trusted people being this divided, it was natural to expect infighting, too. However, compared to the chaos that would befall the people soon, any infighting was nothing. They were about to repeat the civil war from three centuries ago — the greatest conflict in Huang He.

As they pictured the upcoming battle, a voice that didn't fit the scene reached their ears.

"Hello and good evening to all of you, my dear fooools!"

Hualong and her underlings looked at its source — the only entrance to this place.

A woman was standing there.

She was unbelievably beautiful.

If human beauty was like a work of art, hers would be a treasure that would be talked about for centuries, if not millennia. It was the golden ratio of beauty, pushing the very limits of human attractiveness. Her voice, too, was as pleasant as a feather tickling the earlobes. While beauty was in the eye of the beholder, hers would surely be considered perfect by many.

The people of Mirage were no strangers to beauty and pleasure, but even they were overwhelmed by her beauty.

However, those who kept their sanity felt something completely different.

"Fenghuang... Phoenix!"

"Dancing Princess, Huili!"

The experienced fighters on the scene shouted her name, bringing the ones bewitched by her beauty back to reality.

That was just how big of a deal her identity was.

"That's meee!" the woman called. "I'm Huili, the leader of Huili's Army of Fools!"

Huili Yuminjun or Huili's Army of Fools was the clan at the top of Huang He's clan rankings, anomalous in that every member there was a devotee of Huili, the Superior at the top.

No clan in Huang He matched their numbers or quality.

Hualong raised her voice from atop her false throne. "What do you want, Superior?!"

Huili wasn't shaken by her demeanor at all. "Oh my. Are you Mirage's young leader? Aren't you just the cutest little cutie pie. You're not as pretty as me, though."

"You wretch!" Hualong became angry at her behavior.

"Hey, hey, hey, by the way, listen up. You aren't gonna believe this, but..." Huili said, making Hualong even more angry. "The emperor requested that I come here and destroy Mirage!"

Those words made Hualong's anger instantly fade as she squeezed out a "Wh-What...?" "So yeah, here's how it is. Until now, he thought that Mirage was such a big deal that destroying it would be even worse than just leaving it, but with the whole orb thing, them getting outside the country, and that little coup you're planning, he decided that he couldn't ignore you anymore. The bad from leaving you is worse than the bad from destroying you."

She spoke like a little girl with limited intelligence, but her words had endless importance to Mirage, for they implied that Huang He knew about them having an orb, using it in a trade, and their coup.

All of these were top secret matters. The only ones who were supposed to know them were the high-ranking Mirage officials here. Not even the leader of the Caldinian branch had been told about it.

In fact, he hadn't even been told of the organization's ultimate goal. He was far too normal — unfit to take part in their ambition.

Regardless, the Mirage leaders present were now suspiciously eyeing each other. They wondered which one of them had leaked the information, but none of them seemed to have a clue.

There was no lie there; none of them had told anyone about this. Even those who'd considered betraying Mirage hadn't made a move yet.

"By the way, we got this info from the DIN," added Huili.

"Those damn paper salesmen!"

The DIN was an information organization with no borders. Mirage certainly hadn't anticipated them having and selling info about the plot of Huang He's most secretive group.

"Aaanywayyy, His Majesty's also giving us a good reward, so it's bye bye to Mirage!" All smiles, Huili eyed Hualong and her people. Her smile bewitched some of them, while terrorizing the rest.

They all understood that that smile meant nothing pleasant. It carried in it the will that could tear them apart.

"Ah. I'm sure you fighting types probably realized it already, but..."

Huili took out one of the two fans on her waist and used it to point at the ceiling.

"...there's no one alive upstairs."

Mirage had had a total of over two hundred fighters on the surface and on the path leading here, and Huili was saying that they had all been dealt with.

One of the battle-focused Mirage officials and The Fang, who was in charge of security, already knew they were dead due to no one having come here to deal with Huili.

“Just how many did you bring?” Hualong demanded.

“No one. It’s just little darling me. You’d see me coming if I brought an army, and I made my Five Generals go crush all the other Mirage branches in Huang He.”

“What?!”

The Five Generals were the strongest members of Huili’s Army of Fools, which put them among the country’s strongest Masters, as evidenced by them taking ranks three to seven on Huang He’s duel rankings.

There were two reasons why the leaders here were shocked.

First was the fact that such powerful people had gone to crush the branches they were supposed to be in charge of, and the second was that Huili was capable of silently killing a whole two hundred of their fighters without her generals at her side.

“And that’s why Mirage is over,” Huili went on as she equipped two fans.

It was her Superior special reward of “Phoenix Wings, Suling Er.”

At that moment, one of the officials made a move. It was The Fang, who had a Superior Job focused on dagger use.

He had an AGI build, so he was able to move behind Huili at a supersonic speed and use the fang-like dagger in his hand to attack her neck...

...only to lose his head and both of his arms.

“Don’t touch my hands, okaaay?” the woman sang.

“...Eh?” Hualong voiced her confusion at The Fang’s vanished head and arms.

She knew him very well. He was her bodyguard and an assassin who’d sent many of her enemies to their graves.

She trusted him more than anyone else here, and he was now lying in a pool of his own blood, leaking from the places where his head and arms were supposed to start.

“Oh dear, I’m gonna get blood all over me. Maybe the head was enough?" Huili said as she made a troubled face.

In her hands, she held two bloody fans, making it obvious what happened — she'd killed The Fang using those as her weapon.

"I-It can't be..." Hualong panicked. "The Fang... He was our strongest..."

Her subordinates were shocked, too.

"N-No way... wait... but the Dancing Princess wasn't a vanguard..."

"She was this powerful? She wasn't at the top just because of her looks...?"

No one could blame them for being surprised.

As famous as Huili was, she wasn't known for her battle prowess.

It was widely believed that she was at the top of her clan only due to her supreme beauty, and that she only had a Superior special reward because her clan had played a big part in the battle against the SUBM.

That was the consensus among Huang He's tians. The fact that Dancing Princess was neither a vanguard nor a rear guard job played a part in that perception, too.

The belief about the Superior special reward was ridiculous, though, for the MVP had to be someone who'd contributed to the UBM battle directly, not through someone else.

But even then, no one could blame them, for it was hard to believe that someone this beautiful could be such a monster.

"The Fang, huh?" Huili muttered as she looked down at The Fang's corpse. "Hmm... do we have anyone who could take that job among my fools? It's a 'The One' job, though, so it'll probably be hard. Will I free up any more Superior Jobs after I take care of you all?"

She looked at the remaining officers as if evaluating them.

◆

On this day, Huili's Army of Fools and Huang He's military focused on completely destroying Mirage.

The info provided by the DIN was very clear, so they were able to eliminate all the Mirage bases in Huang He and the people working there.

They were all either killed or arrested.

The same applied to those in the main branch.

The two hundred fighters were either killed or captured, while out of the eight officials that'd gathered, three died, two committed suicide, and three gave themselves in.

And most importantly, Hualong was arrested.

After losing everything her family had worked for in but a blink of an eye, the girl looked as though all emotion had left her.

Thus, centuries of a grudge that had almost sparked a new civil war was cleaned up like the most insignificant triviality.

Then again, compared to what would eventually happen on this continent, it really was a triviality.

◆◆◆

A certain clan's info transmission

Time: March 28th, 6:32AM (Global Standard Time)

Notification: From Zeta to all I.F. members.

Report: Failed to retrieve Treasurebeast Orb containing Thundershield Beast, Dangai.

Reason: Destruction of the other party, Mirage.

Details:

The Caldinian branch was suppressed by The Ace and one other (no details available).

The main branch in Huang He was destroyed by Dancing Princess.

The other branches there were destroyed by Huili's Army of Fools and the military.

Addendum:

Dancing Princess isn't the only one making notable moves in Huang He. The emperor found out that other orbs had leaked to Caldina and ordered the Commander-in-Chief to go retrieve them.

Powerful people from Legendaria and Tenchi are moving towards Caldina, too.

It is unknown whether that is related to the current main subject, but the possibility cannot be ignored.

It appears that Caldina will soon host battles over the orbs.

It is unlikely that any faction will cooperate with any other.

Conclusion:

Just as planned. By giving six of the seven orbs I'd stolen to tian organizations which then took them from Huang He to Caldina, I successfully achieved the intended goal.

The info reached many people, making widespread chaos inevitable.

Next up:

We will focus on analyzing all the forces taking part in the battles for the orbs, starting with Caldina and Huang He.

I will also report this to our leader in the gaol.

Just as scheduled, I will play a role in the upcoming war between two countries on the west side of the continent.

The orb I have with me will be a good bargaining chip when trying to persuade someone to join us.

If possible, I will also try meeting the newbie infiltrating Gideon: Gerbera.

It appears that she is planning to do something we haven't accounted for, so I intend to question her.

Human affairs:

I entrust our Caldina operations to those who aren't wanted there.

Revision:

All of us are.

Designation:

I entrust it to Murder Princess, Emily.

Remarks:

I request that The Weapon, Rascal the Bloodonyx support her.

Additionally, I have found someone of value in the desert. Entrusting him to my successor.

Caution:

Emily, keep your kill count for this case within three digits.

Episode Five: Predicament

April 5th, 2045, Prism Rider, Ray Starling

It was Wednesday. I was in a certain room in the Quartierlatin palace.

Two girls were facing each other, surrounded by crushing silence.

One was Azurite. She was staring — or more like glaring — at the other girl.

The other was B3, who was sweating profusely as she meekly sat on the floor.

These acquaintances of mine clearly weren't enjoying each other's presence.

It wasn't a nice comparison, considering the fact that they were girls, but it felt like I was watching a snake ready to swallow a frog.

Why is this happening? I wondered.

"You putting them in the same room is one of the reasons, I assume," Nemesis said telepathically.

I couldn't deny that at all.

I was partially responsible for this.

It had all begun an hour... or perhaps over a month... ago.

◇

After coming back from college, I logged in to Dendro and, just like yesterday, paid a visit to the adventurers' guild.

It was packed again, but Rising Sun secured a table and invited us over.

It was my first time talking to Blue Screen, and he apologized for shutting down Silver back in Torne.

"Sorry 'bout that," he said. "Gremlin's effects should be temporary, though. Did it work fine after that?"

"Yeah. It didn't change one bit," I told him. Silver had flown around during the Quartierlatin incident without a hitch.

Though he had done something weird when we'd fought the whale.

“Good thing it didn’t put you on another wanted list, eh, Blue?” Dum-Dum commented. “Dryfe’s is more than enough.”

“Never again on that crap,” Blue Screen replied.

He’s on Dryfe’s wanted list...? I thought.

“Umm... Can you expand on that...?” I asked.

“I don’t wanna talk about it,” said Blue Screen.

“I do,” grinned Dum-Dum. “Blue started out in Dryfe, and it happened sometime before the war, right about when his Gremlin got its ult. You know, the skill that fried your Prism Steed.”

Oh, that.

“He was in town, and he decided to try it out on one of his magic machines, but he didn’t know how to control it, and it had such a large AOE that it caused an electricity... magic(?)... whatever, power outage in the entire area. It even fried a bunch of state-owned machines. No one died, but he still got on the wanted list for terrorism.”

“Ohh...” I nodded in understanding.

“That does sound like something that can happen,” Nemesis commented.

Looking back at it, my Miasmaflame Bracer and Wind Hoof tests went pretty badly, too, I reflected. I’ll make sure to do my other tests in safe environments.

As we continued to chat...

“Ray, Nemesis... Sorry for the wait.”

“Hm? Well, if it isn’t B3,” said Nemesis.

“Eh? She’s here?” I said as I turned around and saw her.

She had told me that she would be heading to Quartierlatin, but man, was she fast.

“Egh?! Barbaroy...”

“Whoa!”

The two Rising Sun members — especially Blue Screen — seemed to be afraid of her.

“Oh? Well, if it isn’t the leader of Sol Crisis and the High Engineer I crushed first,” B3 said. “Why are you with Ray?”

Oh, so Blue Screen was the first Sol Crisis guy she killed? I can see why he’s afraid.

B3 started equipping a shield like it was no big deal. She was fully ready to crush them again.

To avoid standing out too much, she wasn't wearing her Magnum Colossus right now, but she wouldn't hesitate to use Instant Wear if it came down to it.

Blue Screen looked at me as if to say, "Dude, you said you'll back us, right?! C'mon!"

"I ran into them here in Quartierlatin," I said. "They apologized and we made up."

"I see," said B3. "It's all fine, then. I have nothing against that."

She quickly accepted the situation and put her shield away, and thus any unnecessary bloodshed was prevented.

B3 then told them she forgave them for using her name. According to her, she didn't mind that part at all, but as the ex-leader of Mad Castle, she couldn't stand the fact that the faker hadn't been at the top of Sol Crisis.

That clan had disbanded, and they were now Rising Sun, so B3 no longer had anything against forgiving them.

The two then went out on quests, leaving just B3, Nemesis, and me.

"You sure got here fast," I said. "I don't remember Altea being this close."

"My afternoon lectures for today were canceled," B3 replied. "And I had a good ride."

"You did?"

"Remember the car Embryo that Kashimiya and Rosa rode after Rosa attacked us while we were on our way to Torne? Its Master had nothing better to do, so she drove me here."

Oh, yeah, there was that armored car Embryo, I remembered. If I recall correctly, its Master was "Tomika," similar to the line of toy cars. How fitting.

"I had to pay her like she was some sort of taxi service. So I just took some from the money Rosa gave me," B3 added.

"I see."

Apparently, as self-punishment for what Rosa had done while Kashimiya was away, K&R wouldn't be doing any PKing for a while.

"Anyway, who did you want to introduce me to?" B3 asked.

"Oh, yeah." I'd already mentioned that there was someone I wanted her to meet. "Looking at the time... she should be in the Quartierlatin mansion."

“The mansion?” B3 asked. “Is it the countess?”

“You’ll know when you see her.”

B3 tilted her head in curiosity, but didn’t have anything against coming along.

So the three of us went to the countess’s mansion, creating the strange kind of hell before me.

◇

The silence continued to be crushing.

Once we’d entered the office Azurite was borrowing, I had introduced them to one another.

A moment after I’d given their names, B3 had sat on the floor, with Azurite glaring at her.

...Seriously, what’s going on here?

“Ray...” they said as they looked at me in unison.

“Why did you bring this person here?” Azurite demanded.

“What kind of place did you drag me to?” B3 finished.

“Umm... did I do something bad?” I asked hesitantly.

They looked at me with eyes that asked, “He doesn’t know?”

Well, I knew that Azurite didn’t get along with Miss Eldritch, but B3 should’ve been fine... right? They were in the same club, but B3 was nothing compared to the aberration.

As I wondered what was going on here, Nemesis said, “Hey, I just realized something.”

“...What is it?”

“Something you could’ve realized before you even brought B3 here. Unfortunately, you’re only sharp when it matters the most...”

Come on, don’t stall like that! Just answer, please!

“Last month. PKers. Newbie hunt. Capital blockade.”

“...Ah.” That was enough for me to connect the dots and understand the situation.

B3 was a PKer.

That wasn’t a problem, since issues between Masters were outside of the law here.

The only crimes that could have you sent to the infamous “gaol” were those that involved tian victims.

However, that was exactly it — one time, B3 had indirectly harmed tians.

It had been during the blockade at the capital... the time Marie had given me my first death penalty.

Though it had been primarily a PK incident with the only cases of tian assaults happening in the west of Altea, the act of terrorism had made it hard for tians to travel to and from the city.

Many of them had been merchants, and the blocking of the southern trade route leading to Gideon — Altar’s second largest city — had caused great damage to the economy.

The biggest problem here was the fact that the ones in charge of that side had been Mad Castle... Barbaroy Bad Burn’s clan.

Thus, to Azurite, the acting ruler of Altar, B3 was someone who had caused great losses for her, while to B3, Azurite was someone she had deeply troubled.

Thus, B3's sitting position and Azurite's glare.

"So you finally figured it out," Azurite snapped.

"Ray," B3 looked back at me.

Uh huh. Yeah. I know how I messed up now, I thought.

"Umm... I didn't bring her here as a criminal. And it's not like she caused any loss of life or property," I argued.

"That is true," said Azurite. "All the damage she caused was indirect. Though I can still put her on the wanted list for this."

"Eh?" I asked.

Azurite elaborated that B3 could be judged for forcible obstruction of business and that, as royalty, she had the power to put her on the wanted list.

That was probably the reason for B3's meekness.

An awkward silence filled the room.

Azurite suddenly reached into her inventory and took out a bunch of papers.

"Umm... Azurite? What's that?" I asked.

"I carry copies of my documents in case I need to work away from the capital. These contain the economic data for the month the blockade took place."

Those words made B3 twitch.

"The blockade lasted for four days, didn't it? There was a loss of several hundred million lir's worth of distribution flow per day... and there's also been an increase in people leaving... though that might have been due to Noz Forest burning to the ground."

Now it was my turn to twitch.

That fire had been caused by none other than my own brother.

Looking back at it now, things were really bad for Azurite... no, the whole kingdom.

B3 and Marie had joined the likes of Rosa in creating a blockade around Altea. Shu had gone and burned down Noz Forest, an important source of wood. And Franklin and Hugo had terrorized Gideon.

The kingdom was in such a bad state that I could totally understand why Azurite didn't trust us Masters.

"And many of those causing trouble are your acquaintances," added Nemesis telepathically.

Damn, I feel so bad now!

“...Ngh.” The next moment, I found myself sitting next to B3.

Gouz-Maise’s spikes were poking my thighs, and that wasn’t pleasant, but...

Azurite spent a few moments looking down on us before heaving a deep sigh and saying, “I’ll ignore it for now.”

“...Really?” I asked hopefully.

“It’s the sage’s pilgrimage... or a ‘twist of fate,’ as you Masters would say it. There might be a better future that can only be reached because the blockade incident took place,” she said as she stared at us. “There is no lawful basis for binding you to any role, but if you feel bad about what happened, I want you to help me. I will be relying on Masters’ powers and knowledge more and more in the future.”

“Okay,” B3 said, still tense.

“No need to worry,” Azurite answered. “I shall not have you work to make up for the economic losses. You will even be rewarded, just like with normal quests.”

Those words made B3 relax a bit, and then she looked like she was pondering whether she should refuse the reward.

“Let us start right away,” Azurite continued. “I have a question for you.”

“Yes?” she asked.

“Are you familiar with any Masters knowledgeable in machines?”

That was the question she’d given me yesterday.

“Could you elaborate?” B3 asked.

“We don’t have anyone who can operate the computers in the plant within the ruins here. I was told they are protected by security that none of the kingdom’s current technicians can break.”

A whole three days had passed here, but it looked like they still hadn’t found or grown a person fit for the job.

Hm...? Hold on a second, I thought as a certain someone flashed to mind.

“There could be a decent few Masters who can operate them here in the kingdom, but some could very well be Dryfean spies,” Azurite went on. “That is why I was hoping that you would introduce me to someone trustworthy.”

B3 pondered. “I would like to consult Ray about this...”

“Very well.” Azurite nodded.

So B3 had thought of him, too.

It was the ex-Dryfean Master we’d just met — Rising Sun’s Blue Screen.

B3 and I left the room and talked about getting him this job, while Nemesis stayed behind to talk to Azurite about something.

“What do you think?” B3 asked.

“Well...” I said.

He was an ex-PKer, but the fact that he was wanted in Dryfe made him an even safer choice than most.

From the little I’d talked to him, he did seem trustworthy enough to at least give a chance.

“I think he’ll do all right,” I said at last. “You?”

“I wouldn’t have thought so when they were still Sol Crisis, but Rising Sun is just him and the leader. They desperately need sponsors and funds, so if they make it a Contract-bound quest, I’m sure there won’t be any problems.”

“True.” I nodded.

“There’s also the fact that Blue Screen might be able to easily take care of any other incidents in the ruins. He was able to stop Silver — an original Prism Steed — so he would surely be able to deactivate any machines causing trouble there. In a way, he might be the best man for the job.”

“Good point.”

He was more than qualified on that front.

It made me wonder why a guy from Dryfe had ended up being a machine-killer.

Anyway, with that decided, we returned to Azurite’s office.

“We know someone fit for the job in the ruins,” said B3.

And so, we told her about Rising Sun and Blue Screen.

◇

We then went on to find the two questing out nearby and introduced them to Countess Quartierlatin.

It was her rather than Azurite because the countess would be the one in charge of the operations here once Azurite returned to Altea, and the first princess's visit here wasn't official.

The two gladly accepted the high-reward, continuous quest, and thanked us for mediating.

It was a win for everyone: the kingdom, Rising Sun, and B3, who had now somewhat made up for what she'd done a month ago.

"I thought I was about to be sent to the gaol," B3 sighed as we headed out on our own quest.

Her voice made it clear just how hard the encounter had been on her mind.

"Sorry, B3," I apologized.

"No need for that. Despite all I said, I'm aware that I brought this upon myself with what I did back then. Also, thanks to you mediating, it's now less likely that I'll get put on the wanted list in the future."

Oh, that's one way to look at it, I thought.

"I'll also have to be careful to not get on her bad side from now on," Nemesis put in. "She was in a pretty foul mood during the consultation."

"Hm...?"

She was? Why? I wondered.

"By the way, Nemesis, what did you talk to her about?" I asked.

"Ray, it's rude to pry into secret chats between women."

So that's the kind of chat it was, huh? You two seem to be on a similar wavelength, so I imagine you have lots to talk about.

"Well, we mostly chatted about your fashion sense and human relations," Nemesis went on.

"Hm?"

You're saying there's a lot to talk about there? I thought, puzzled.

"You ordered something dreadful recently, didn't you?" Nemesis asked darkly.

"You mean Storm Visage?" I'd picked up the completed accessory before entering the adventurers' guild today.

The stats and abilities were exactly as advertised, and the design matched my gear perfectly — a pro's work if I'd ever seen one.

"Why would you make them create something so terrifying?!" Nemesis exclaimed.

"Hey, we needed it for what it does, right?" I argued. "The dark-ish design is pretty damn cool, too, isn't it?"

“Is that all you think of it?! Seeing you wear it gave me chills! What kind of cursed set have you developed?! I’m supposed to be a part of that?!”

“Well... yeah. My gear isn’t complete without you.”

“...Ugh! Why are you so...?!”

Why are your cheeks all red, and why are you hitting me? Why is B3 looking at me like I’m complicated? Did I do something wrong?

“You might go to the gaol for illegal levels of all-nizing,” B3 put in.

“That’s not a crime that exists.”

Silence.

“...Is it?”

It’d be pretty damn scary if she wasn’t kidding.

I didn’t doubt that there were crimes that were unknown to me, but getting a criminal record for “all-nizing” would be a whole new level of absurd.

Wait... Gaol... Unknown... That reminds me of something. But what? Pretty sure it’s something Shu told me about...

I couldn’t quite seem to remember.

Side Story: Nightmare at the Gaol

April 6th, 2045, Bow Hunter, Gerbera

Hello, I'm Gerbera! My real name is Kikuko Belmont, and I'm a seventeen-year-old domestic helper so charming, I put flowers to shame!

"Gerbera" is a very clever name that comes from my real one — "kiku" is how they call the flower in my dad's country!

Right now, I'm here in Dendro, having a very good time—

"...Like hell I am. Screw it. It's not working," I sighed as I rested my head on the counter of the café on the first floor of my gaol residence.

I'd tried to distract myself from the heavy mood by starting a cheery monologue, but it was just making me feel worse.

"You've just logged in, and you're already so down... What's wrong?" asked Sechs Würfel, who was my clan leader, landlord here in the gaol, and the owner of this café. He actually sounded worried.

No matter how many times I interacted with him, he seemed like a really good guy. How had he, of all people, ended up as the King of Crime?

"Give me some iced coffee, please," I said. "Pour it in the usual dolphin glass."

"Mm-hm. Very well," he replied before preparing my drink like a true professional.

I watched as the black liquid filled every part of the intricate dolphin-shaped glass. It was my favorite among the many interesting glasses we had in this café.

Even the customers knew that by now. Recently I'd overheard a conversation that went:

"That dolphin glass is Lady Gerbera's favorite."

"Guess we can't use it, then."

"...Isn't that all the more reason to pick it and lick it?"

The Legendarian-sounding perv had received a taste of my Alhazred's attacks.

"Here you go," said the leader as he gave me my coffee, bringing me back to the present.

“Thank you,” I replied as I took a sip. It was as good as ever.

The CLOSED sign was up on the door, so there were no customers inside, which made the place very quiet.

April the Prism Person — the only employee besides our leader — was just sitting on a chair with her eyes closed.

What’s she doing, anyway? Why is a robot sleeping? I wondered. Well, whatever. Let her rest while the café’s closed. I relaxed and took another sip. Ahhh, it’s so refreshing.

Noticing that I was feeling a bit better, the leader asked again, “So, what’s wrong?”

It made me remember the reason why I’d been in a bad mood in the first place.

“My death penalty just ended,” I revealed.

“Ohh, now that you mentioned it, I haven’t seen you recently,” the leader said. “So who got you this time?”

“I... think it was the ‘Fu’uta’ guy. I entered the dungeon that I think was his territory, my vision started to glitch, and I died before I could even make sense of what was going on.”

“Ohh... Well, that certainly sounds like a battle against him,” he said, implying that he knew what the deal was with Fu’uta’s Embryo.

Personally, I still couldn’t make any sense of what he’d done to me.

“So now you’ve fought all the Superiors here in the gaol, haven’t you?” our leader asked.

“Yeah... but it wasn’t even a fight against half of them,” I whined. “I’m probably one of the weakest gaol Masters...”

A whole three weeks of Dendro time had passed since my arrival here.

It didn’t seem like a lot, but it had dramatically changed my mentality.

The Chinese saying “The frog in the well knows not the sea” seemed to describe me perfectly.

I was a sheltered little froggy before, but now I’m out in the salty sea, and it’s basically killing me...

I was training to regain confidence that I was the strongest, but the more I trained, the more distant that goal seemed to become.

I did think that the leader’s guidance had made me stronger, but it felt like I had no chance against the other Superiors.

The leader never died even if he was killed, while Hannya had just completely curbstomped me.

That had already been a heavy blow to my confidence, so I'd decided to check on how strong the other two Superiors were, and now I regretted that immensely.

Jumping into a battle between Candy and one of the gaol's UBMs, I'd just crumbled to bits, and I still didn't have the slightest clue what had happened when I'd tried to go against that "Fu'uta" guy.

I'd just walked into the dungeon he was rumored to stay in, and the next thing I knew, my vision and stats had started to glitch and I'd just died.

So now I'd lost a whole four times in a row. Thankfully, I'd only gotten the death penalty the latter two times — when I'd fought Superiors of my own accord — but losing still kinda hurt.

Honestly, it felt like nothing I did by myself ever came out right.

Back in Caldina, when I'd tried to use Alhazred to steal a national treasure, I'd been found out almost instantly, put on the wanted list, and even dropped the item.

Back in Gideon, when I'd tried to win against the King of Destruction, he'd sent me here to the gaol, and that had been in addition to Rook destroying my mentality.

Nothing ever seemed to go my way.

I want to believe that my Alhazred and I were the strongest, but the world, and especially this gaol, was full of weirdos that felt like they existed to deny that.

"Is the gaol just a hive of people with broken Embryos?" I muttered.

"I believe many would call yours broken, as well," the leader commented. "And you should bear in mind that the three besides me are focused on wide-scale attacks... or conditional indiscriminate attacks... so you have bad compatibility with them."

"I guess you're right..."

Hannya was someone you couldn't let have the high ground.

Candy was someone you shouldn't — or couldn't — come close to.

And Fu'uta... I just didn't know what to think of his powers.

"You're usually a solo battle-type, aren't you?" I asked him. "Have they ever killed you?"

"No. So far, Shu is the only one who's ever given me a death penalty."

...How many times?

And how the hell had the KoD pulled it off? The leader was basically immortal.

"Ohh... the days when I can once again call myself the strongest feel sooo distant..." I moaned.

"You may start getting to them by maxing-out your new jobs."

"Mgrr..."

One of the first things the leader had made me do as part of my training was to remove my old jobs — including Dead Hand — and take new ones.

I'd whined about how much time I'd spent leveling them, to which he'd replied, "They have next to no synergy with your Alhazred, so there's no point in keeping them."

That actually kinda hurt.

Anyway, back to the present...

"Your Alhazred is a Guardian, so it's not hard for you to level, is it?" he asked. "The created dungeon here in gaol has good XP efficiency."

"Yes, but... straightforward work is so hard. Why can't there just be a way to grab a Superior Job like it's nothing?"

Right now, I was leveling jobs from the hunter grouping.

I had started with Hunter, then the low-rank offshoots of Trap Hunter and Poison Hunter, and now I was working on Bow Hunter.

Once I was done with this, I'd go for the high-rank Great Hunter.

Good thing that the gaol had job crystals from all the countries.

But as far as I knew, all the hunter grouping SJs, offshoots included, were already taken.

The fact that I couldn't get one no matter how hard I worked was a real downer.

"Even a Master with a Superior Job can be a third-rate if he isn't thorough," said our leader. "Even I supplement my build with sub-jobs."

Oh, yeah. I always thought that you just had to get a Superior Job and just level that, but I guess that's not how it works... !?

"Speaking of which, what are your most-used sub-jobs?" I asked him.

"Recently, I've been using Glass Meister a lot."

"How does that supplement your build?!"

There's no way it could be useful in battle! He just has it as a hobby!

"It's very dear to me," he continued. "The café's glasses are all made by yours truly."

"You made this?!" I shouted as I looked at the dolphin glass in shock.

It was very impressive, even if you took the effects of the job into consideration.

"Upon coming here, I realized that I like making glasses... or more like, pouring coffee into them."

"That's a weird thing to like," I told him.

"I hear that a lot. But... you know how it fills every edge, no matter how complicated the glass is? I'm fond of watching that happen."

"Hmm..." I half-understood what he meant, half didn't.

But I did know that he had many complicated-looking glasses here, and I'd always wondered if it was hard to clean them.

(It turned out he used The Saint's purification magic.)

"I believe I like it because it feels... familiar," he added.

"...Familiar?" What, exactly, could coffee poured into a glass remind him of?

Also, it hit me that this was the first time he'd said that he liked something.

"Would you like some more coffee?" he asked.

"Yes, please. And be generous with the milk."

As he began pouring the coffee, I asked him something that had been bothering me for a while.

"Why did you become the King of Crime?"

He really wasn't the type of person to act like a criminal.

Honestly, it never even seemed to me like he had any desires that would motivate him to commit crime.

He had a gentle demeanor, and I hadn't heard him say that he liked anything until just a moment ago.

That was why I kept wondering why such a person would become the King of Crimes, much less the leader of Illegal Frontier.

"Well... I can't say I have any reason worth naming," he replied.

"Eeehh? I don't believe you. I mean, King of Crime is a high-risk job that could have you sent to the gaol... and actually did!"

As far as I knew, that was the reason why, despite not being a lost job, it was a job that no one before him had ever managed to take.

If they'd tried, they'd been captured by Masters or killed by tians during the process.

"You misunderstand. Becoming the King of Crime was merely a side effect," he explained. "I committed crimes day in and day out, and one day, I got a message saying that I'd unlocked a job change quest."

"You weren't going for it?" I asked.

"Yes. It happened by chance."

Now I was even more confused about his reasons for committing crimes.

"By the way, which control AI were you handled by when you started out?" he asked.

"Two children," I said. "Twins. You can get different ones?"

"Yes. I got a cat."

Ohh? That's nice. I like cats. They're as cute as me.

"During the introduction, I asked him, 'What should I do?'" he asked.

"Eh?" You were starting a game so... just game, right?

"As embarrassing as this might seem, I started this game because I had nothing to do on the other side, but because I was like that, there was nothing I really wanted to do here, either. That was why I asked the cat to help me with that."

He'd had nothing to do on the other side?

That reminded me that he was online more often than me, and I was a NEE— uhh... a domestic helper.

Did he have no job?

"He answered my question by saying, 'You can become a hero or the demon king, a king or a slave, a good person or an evil person. You can do something, or you can do nothing. It's all up to you.'"

"Interesting..." It was kinda fun to imagine a cat saying something like that.

The twins had said something similar to me, actually.

"And that is why I am the King of Crime, Sechs Würfel."

"Umm... I'm not sure I get it." Had I blacked out and missed part of the conversation?

"It's nothing complicated. He gave me six options: hero, demon king, king, slave, good person, evil person," he said as he took something from the counter.

It was a die, just like the ones decorating this café.

"I assigned the six options on each of the sides and rolled to decide which one I would be."

"...Eh?"

He rolled the die on the counter. Unlike the one out on front, it had normal values instead of all sixes, but he still rolled a six.

That wasn't important right now, though.

What was important was the fact that...

"...You decided by rolling a die?!"

"The room was a bit disorderly, and there were things such as chess boards and dice, so I borrowed a die, rolled a six, and decided to become an evil person."

So he had... rolled to become a criminal?

"Is... Is that it?" I asked.

"Yes. There's nothing more to it. That's why I am Sechs Würfel — I rolled a six on a die," he said as if it was nothing, then picked up the die and rolled it in his hand.

"...Ahaha." I laughed with no energy or glee.

I was pretty sure that if he'd rolled a five, he would've been a really good person who went around helping people.

And if it was a four, he would've willingly become a slave.

He'd be completely faithful to those roles, just as he was faithful to being evil now.

I'd known him for almost a month now, so I knew him well enough to know that that was just how he was.

I'd even known him when he was The Saint, when he'd truly behaved like and had an aura of a perfect holy maiden.

Ohh... I suddenly understood what he found so familiar about coffee being poured into a glass.

He himself is exactly like that.

No matter how complex the role — the container — he could change himself accordingly and fit it perfectly.

I'd fought all the Superiors here, and they all had powers that were scary in their own ways, but no one... no one had a mind as terrifying as this Master here.

"But I guess you need someone like that to take charge of a criminal clan," I thought out loud.

The two sub-leaders had probably thought the same thing — that no one was more fitting to lead us than this person here, who changed himself in order to fit the mold.

No one could do a better job at being the king of us criminals.

“Is anything the matter?” he asked.

“Nothing at all. By the way, about today’s training—”

I was about to ask him what we’d do today—

“KING OF CRIME! I KNOW YOU’RE IN THERE! COME OUT, DAMN IT!” A thick voice resounded from the outside.

What’s this about? I wondered.

◆◆◆

April 4th, 2045, gaol

“Shit!” Upon logging in and realizing that they were in the gaol, Gakido and his Sixth Realm Chaos couldn’t hide their frustration.

Gakido had climbed up to the tenth in Tenchi’s duel rankings and fifteenth in their clan rankings, but now that they were here in the gaol, it was completely meaningless.

“It’s all their fault!” he cursed.

There were two people Gakido blamed and hated for this.

First was, of course, the person who had directly sent them to the gaol: the King of Brigands, Bigman.

And the second was the slave dealer who’d caused them to attack that village: La Crima.

During their death penalty period, they’d gotten online and discovered that La Crima was actually a very infamous character known for pulling such schemes.

He specialized in modifying tians using his parasitic Embryo and selling them on the black market as either battle or pleasure slaves, which led to him developing vast amounts of wealth.

His deeds had earned him lots of enemies, and back in Caldina, he had even been targeted by two Superiors: the King of Termination and the King of Revelry.

The enigmatic man had somehow survived the encounter and soon gone on to Caldina.

"That goddamn parasite fucking used us to test the strength of Hokugen'in forces!" I shouted.

And even if Hokugen'in hadn't interfered with Gakido's work, La Crima would've just gotten some new slaves, meaning that he hadn't stood to lose anything in this debacle.

"That goddamn slaver asshole played us like a fuckin' fiddle!" I screamed.

"Yeah!" another member of his clan agreed vehemently.

They had cooperated with La Crima on their own free will, but they conveniently forgot that part.

As a side note, the member who'd negotiated with La Crima wasn't online. He probably felt he couldn't show his face after what he'd led them into. No doubt he was afraid of being the target of the clan's ire.

"What now, boss?" asked one of the members.

"Looks like there're dungeons and shops here in the gaol, too," added another.

They were worried about what would become of their Dendro life, now that they were here.

Gakido, however, just grinned like a ravenous beast and said, "We'll start by settlin' the score."

"Eh? But they're outside..."

"No... we're puttin' the blame on La Crima's boss."

"Boss...?! Y-You mean, the King of Crimes... Sechs Würfel?!"

From their investigations, they'd found out that La Crima was in a clan called "Illegal Frontier," which was led by the King of Crimes, who was now in the gaol.

Someone had bought this info from the DIN and spread it everywhere as a way of getting back at the clan.

Despite that, there was only info on four of the members: La Crima, Emily, Rascal — whose activities really stood out — and Sechs, their leader.

There was nothing on Zeta, who always disappeared from her crime scenes before getting spotted, or Gerbera, who was new to the clan and had gone to the gaol before doing anything significant.

"You lost against a Superior, and you're gonna pick a fight with another?" asked one of Gakido's boys. "That's a bit..."

“Think about it — even if he’s a Superior, he’s a loser just by bein’ here in the fuckin’ gaol. There’s no way he’s as much of a beast as Bigman.”

Any Master who’d been here long enough would call Gakido an idiot for thinking that, but unfortunately, the only ones on the scene were the members of Sixth Realm Chaos.

Most Masters from the three western countries would’ve said the same, but this clan was from the far-east land of Tenchi, and didn’t know much about the King of Crime beyond the name of his job.

“We’ll kick his ass and take his wealth as reparations,” Gakido said confidently. “I mean, he has a clan, sure, but he’s all alone here. I heard that even Al Capone was really pathetic after they locked him up.”

A cool-headed Master would’ve pointed out that Al Capone hadn’t had an Embryo, but everyone in Sixth Realm chaos was too angry to think that much.

“Let’s start by gatherin’ info,” said Gakido. “We’ll find out what he does, where he hangs, and attack him when there’s no one to get in the way.”

“Hell yeah!”

They went around the gaol and found out lots of things about him.

Strange as it was, all the prisoners talked about Sechs like he was above them, but no one said that he was strong.

They mentioned that he was a model prisoner, had a café, enjoyed reading, made good coffee, that he had a soft demeanor, had nice glasses, and cute employees, making the Sixth Realm Chaos members conclude that he was absolutely harmless.

“Kheheheh. That dumbass,” Gakido spat and grinned. “This is gonna be so easy. It hasn’t even happened, and I’m already cheering up.”

After finding out all they needed, they decided to attack him in two days, when the café would be closed and there would be no customer Masters to get in the way.

Imagining the attack and their victory, they began the preparations for the assault.

However, none of them had noticed the soft, sympathetic gazes the other Masters were giving them.

They were looking at the clan like they were just another in a long line of poor sacrifices, but none of the clan members were in the state of mind to realize it.

And they hadn't noticed that each and every single fellow prisoner hadn't said a single word about how dangerous the KoC really was.

Thus, two real life days passed, and Sixth Realm Chaos attacked the café, Dice.

◆◆◆

April 6th, 2045, Bow Hunter, Gerbera

"COME OUT OR WE'RE BURNING YOU DOWN WITH YOUR CAFÉ!"

The suicidal idiots barking outside were a bunch of filthy-looking men in clothes that made them look like stereotypical criminals.

The one at the front was extra weird. He wore animal skins and flashy clothing that looked kinda like the "kabuki" style from my dad's country, while at the same time not even close to it.

The cherry on the cake was the cringy gloves, though.

His clothing aside... what was up with that face? He could choose anything he wanted during character creation, and he'd gone with something that brutish?

...Speaking of which, I was beautiful in real life, too.

Yeah, I had spent some time making my character, but the overall beauty rating was the same.

That reminds me that I forgot to change my breast size, I thought. I hope the leader doesn't realize that I have pads on...

"Yes, yes, who is it?" the leader asked as he opened the door with a face like he was being visited by children selling cookies.

Does he ever feel any danger? I thought one moment before he bent his upper half forward, probably due to a punch in his stomach.

The people passing by instantly ran away, because of course they would.

"YOU TOOK TOO FUCKIN' LONG!" the boss-looking guy shouted.

"My apologies. So, who might you be?" said our leader, clearly not caring about the stomach blow.

Why would he?

After all... physical attacks did nothing to his HP.

"I'm the King of Grind, Gigamaru Gakido! I'm the man who was tenth on Tenchi's duel rankings!"

Gigamaru Gakido... what a weird name. Also, this was the first time I'd ever seen someone from Tenchi.

Our clan didn't have a single member from there, come to think of it. I wouldn't mind if some cool-looking samurai guy joined. I'd talk to the leader about that later.

For now, the main matter was Gakido, and uhhh...

"Tenth? Isn't that kinda lame?" I asked.

I lived in Gideon, the Mecca of duels, but even I knew only the first eight. Wait, no. I'd forgotten the seventh... what was his name, again? It was the burning, smothering guy, right?

B... B... Bijmal?

"What the hell'd you just say?!" Gakido snapped.

"Oh no no, Miss Gerbera," said the leader. "That's certainly not true. Tenchi's dueling scene is particularly strong. It has about twice as many participants as the others, so the tenth there is about as strong as the kingdom's fifth."

I nodded in understanding. Well, I did hear that Tenchi was "the land of strife" or something.

"And, uh... the King of Grind?" I asked. That job name seemed to have a familiar aura...

"The King of Grind is more or less the Eastern version of King of Destruction," the leader explained. "Both jobs excel at object destruction. But while the KoD is focused on STR, the King of Grind is more balanced and thus is easier to use in combat."

"You really know everything, don't you?" I commented.

Anyway, if going by job alone, this weirdo here was on the same level as the King of Destruction.

...It really didn't feel that way, though.

"Ohh, 'Gakido'?" the leader said casually. "Now I remember. You lead a bandit clan called 'Sixth Realm Chaos,' which was destroyed by the King of Brigands, Bigman the Mountain-Splitter, about five days ago. So that sent you here to the gaol. From what I recall, your crimes are burglary, murder, and sexual assault, among many others. Oh yes, that is certainly enough to put you on the wanted list."

It felt like our dear Sechs Würfel was a bit too knowledgeable. At least, for someone stuck in the gaol.

Wait. It suddenly hit me that one of our people, La Crima, was currently operating in Tenchi, so he'd probably gotten that info from him.

"Well, you sure know a damn lot about us," sneered Gakido. "Then I guess you know why we're here, don't ya?"

"I cannot even begin to imagine," our leader replied. "Coffee, perhaps?"

"NO! YOU'RE LA CRIMA'S BOSS! SO WE'LL KILL YOU AND TAKE YOUR SHIT AS REPARATIONS!"

"Is that it?"

"LIKE HELL! WEAK-ASS OR NOT, KILLING A SUPERIOR WILL MAKE US FAMOUS! IT'LL SEND A MESSAGE TO THE ENTIRE GAOL, AND WE'LL SOON BE THE TOP OF THIS SHITTY PLACE!"

Hearing his words made me choke.

I had no idea why, but it felt like my old wounds were opening up — like I was watching a detailed replay of a very dark, very cringy period in my life.

"But there is no rule that says that defeating me would make you the top of the gaol," the leader said calmly.

"But tons of prisoners treat you like you're above them, don't they? If I beat you, that means I'm above you and them!"

I choked again. Oh, how I wished for him to stop talking. He sounded exactly like I had when I was going after the KoD. It was making me cringe.

Gakido, please. I really don't want or need this kind of familiarity. Shut up, or I'll kill you.

"Oh... very well," said the leader. "Are we having a duel?"

"Nope. It's already over. Look at your stomach," said Gakido.

From where I was, I could only see the leader's back, so I made Alhazred move in front of him and checked.

On his stomach, there was a circle-stamp with a large "B A N" written on it.

"What would this be?" he asked.

"That's a seal made by my Embryo, Banten'in. Better not touch it, my guy. You'll be torn to shreds."

I looked and noticed that the same stamp was on the knuckle parts of Gakido's gloves.

That is so lame.

"I see," said the leader. "So it's an Embryo that inserts a bomb through touch... or more like, changes the parts of the body touched into bombs."

"You got that right! And just so you know, no one who's had it on them has ever come out alive!"

Oh, so that was the purpose of the stomach blow from before.

Would our leader actually die from being torn to shreds, though?

He probably wouldn't...

"If you admit defeat, I wouldn't mind removi—"

"Excuse me for a moment," the leader said, cutting off Gakido and then walking past him to stand in the middle of the street.

"Where the hell do you think you're goin—"

"Like this?"

Before anyone could stop him, Sechs Würfel touched the seal on his stomach and, like advertised, exploded into little bits.

Dark red pieces of flesh and blood rained down on the surroundings, dirtying the unpaved road and Gakido's clan.

Ew.

"Whoa?!" Gakido shouted.

"H-He went and killed himself...!" cried a man behind him.

The leader had probably gone away from the café to avoid making a mess inside.

I really didn't see why he'd bothered. He could easily use The Saint's purification magic to clean up.

"Wh-Whatever," said Gakido. "This still counts as a win against him. It just ended in one hit."

"Oh, yeah. Suuure," I said with all the sarcasm in the world.

They finally noticed my presence, and Gakido asked, "Who the hell are you?"

"A freeloader."

"Oh, I get it. You're the KoC's bitch."

"...Huh?"

I feel like he just said something staggering.

"You have a good face, but your tits look fake as hell. Man, the guy has shit taste in women."

"Huhhhhh?" I yelled. "Who the hell are you calling fake? You better not mess with me!”

Did this idiot actually just call me flat— I mean, the KoC’s bitch? What is he, a porn-crazed brat from a 2000s MMO? This is the first time anyone in Dendro*’s talked to me with the lower half of their body!*

Wait, there was also La Crima... but the circumstances and implications there were different.

I considered just beating them right here and now. Alhazred was outside with them, and none of them had a clue.

That made me think it was possible, but Gakido had a Superior Job, and I didn’t have a good track record with them here in the gaol. What to do, what to do...?

“Argh, forget this fake-ass hoe,” said Gakido. “Let’s just take everything in the café. Get to it, boys!”

“Roger!” his bootlickers replied almost mechanically.

You could tell they were used to this and that it was no surprise that they’d gotten on a wanted list.

As they tried to enter the café, something called out to them and stopped them.

“Please-wait-a-mo-ment.”

“Wh-What? Who’s talkin’... Huh?” Gakido’s people looked around and quickly found the source of the voice.

The entity was sitting on a chair, looking at them with inorganic eyes that had been closed until just a moment ago.

It was none other than the Prism Person, April.

She hadn’t moved an inch even when her owner had blown up, but now... she stood up.

“Are-you-en-ter-ing-this-es-tab-lish-ment-with-the-in-ten-tion-to-rob-it?” She hadn’t participated in the conversation at all, but she seemed to have listened.

“What’s this? It’s like a human, but it’s got spherical joints. Is it a Marionetter’s doll?”

“Well, damn,” Gakido grinned. “Score. It looks like it costs a whole lot. Let’s take it, and—”

Gakido entered the café with the intention to take April, but the moment one of them stepped in...

“Rec-og-nized-as-a-threat. Initiating battle mode — eliminating.”

April stopped speaking in monotone. Words just flowed out of her mouth...

"Eh?"

"Eh?"

And the man who tried to touch her was split in half, making him speak through two mouths.

Before either of his halves could even fall to the ground, he was cut into little pieces and became bits of light before a single drop of blood touched the floor.

"Ah?!"

"H-He had a Brooch, right?! How did he die in one hit?!"

A Brooch, eh?

April attacked with both hands, so it had broken with the first, I'd guess.

I mean, they were all really susceptible to damage right now.

"Starting elimination of enemies within the café's perimeter," she said smoothly before stepping outside.

I'd thought this back during training, but it was staggering how well-spoken April was in battle compared to how she was usually. Did the café employee work she was assigned to put some sort of load on her AI?

"Tch...! Don't let her scare you! There's just one of her!"

"It's just a robot! We took out dozens of guard robots in ruins back in Tenchi!"

Ruins, huh? I'd never been to one.

Even so, I was pretty sure that there wasn't a single robot stronger than April.

...Oh?

Some guy who was probably in the nobushi grouping came out of his hiding spot and attacked April from behind. "Got you now...! Huh?"

His aim was true, and his spear was heading straight into her. But...

"I-It's not piercing?! How?! Why isn't my surprise attack working?!"

The nobushi grouping was focused on surprise attacks, but this one couldn't even break through April's clothes.

"Eliminating," April said as she responded with a swing of her arms.

Her arms didn't reach the guy due to the spear's range, but that didn't matter.

"GHUAH?!"

The man was decapitated, exposing the flesh and bone of his neck.

Gross.

"W-Wires?!" The onlooking bandits finally realized what her weapon was — they were metal wires extending from inside April's wrists.

They were thicker than the steel threads used by some assassins — enough to be called wires.

It didn't seem like they were strong enough to cut people apart, but that was exactly what they did.

"Khh...! Protect your weak spots! Those wires won't do shit if they don't touch your body!" Gakido screamed.

He wasn't wrong. There was nothing to those wires besides their toughness.

But I would really recommend against focusing on defense.

"GHUAH?!" a man in heavy armor screamed as he was torn into shreds and became bits of light.

"Th-The armor's in pieces...?!" someone shouted.

"What?! What's going on?!"

Looking at them reminded me of tofu, a food my dad liked. Tofu could be cut using threads, and these wires broke their bodies apart just as easily.

There was no point in just watching out for them, though.

The reason why they were so easy to tear apart... was the fact that they were simply really fragile right now.

"Huhh?!"

"Wh-What's wrong?!"

"M-My END's supposed to be 4,050... b-but it's 50 now!"

"Just minus 4,000?" I commented. "That's... pretty tame, April."

"There are no endurance-type Superior Jobs or Guardians," she said. "This is more than enough."

Oh, so she's just conserving energy, I thought.

"A... a skill that lowers defense!" one of them screamed.

"Heh! Then I'll just run circles around it with my speed and—GHAAHH?!"

An AGI build did nothing more than stomp on the ground, but that was enough to give him a compound fracture.

Actually, it seemed like the leg was just gone.

It was the expected result, though.

His END was probably so low now that it was actually in the negatives.

So yeah. April the Prism Person had the ability to reduce the toughness of surrounding material.

It was extra lethal on AGI builds, which had low END to begin with. Just like now, it could easily bring that stat to below zero.

Simply running too hard could make an AGI build's bones shatter and flesh crumble, while an END build's toughness would do as much good as a sheet of paper.

AGI builds would be driven to self-destruction, END builds would lose their one selling point, and all would be slain.

That was the power of the Diamond Slayer's transformation weapon, Material Slider.

When I'd first heard about it, I had reflected that the one who'd made it didn't care one bit about game balance.

Though, honestly, that kinda applied to Dendro as a whole.

"U-Use ranged attacks! Beat it from a distance!"

"I-It's not working! Arrows and bullets don't do anything!"

April's Material Slider not only lowered the toughness of surrounding material — it could also raise her own.

Their attacks were all negated by a defense which, from what I could tell, easily exceeded 100,000.

"April's easily Superior-level," I commented to myself. I hadn't won against her once during training.

I just made myself sad again...

"Shit! I beat the King of Crime, and now I've gotta deal with this fuckin' monster?! Outta my way, boys! No matter how tough, my Banten'in's gonna turn it into scrap!" Gakido clenched his fists, covered in Banten'in, and struck a boxing pose.

Well, if Banten'in could blow up any material it placed a seal on, then maybe it had a chance against April.

However, to pull it off, Gakido would have to get close to April while being conscious of his severely lowered defense, which didn't even allow him to run as fast as he wanted.

It was a battle that would be over in one hit from either side, but due to her range, April had the upper hand.

However, before such a battle could begin, April tilted her head at Gakido's words. "Did you just say that you defeated my owner?"

"Heh! Hell yeah! My Banten'in made short work of your master, the King of Crime, Sechs Würfel!" Gakido claimed proudly.

"But he is right there." April pointed behind Gakido.

"Huh?!" He turned around so fast you could hear it, but all he saw was three of his clan members. "You little...!"

For a moment, he seemed to think that April was just toying with him, but the robot just continued pointing in the same direction.

Gakido turned around again and saw only two of his clan members.

"...Huh?"

Oh, so he'd realized that one had just gotten the death penalty.

"Hey! You two! What happened to Fapel? He was there just a second ago!"

The other two didn't say a word in response — they just eerily stood in place with faces full of suffering and fear.

They didn't even make a sound, as if their throats... bodies... were full of something.

Their bodies then began to change.

Their eyes popped out, blood poured out of their mouths, and their bodies throbbed like hoses about to release large amounts of water.

But before anything like that could happen, their bodies suddenly vanished and became bits of light.

They must've used the suicide function to save themselves from the extended suffering of suffocation.

When they vanished, they left only their drops... and a red liquid.

"...Ah?" Gakido said dumbly.

It was the same liquid as the one that was scattered all over the surroundings.

The same liquid that had gotten on all of Gakido's clan members, all of whom were now dead.

It was the blood and flesh of Sechs Würfel.

Gakido could've noticed this earlier, but I was guessing that he'd achieved his goal so easily that he couldn't even think properly.

And so, he hadn't realized that our leader's flesh and blood hadn't become bits of light.

"This is as grotesque as it always is..." I sighed.

The flesh and blood scattered all over began to crawl and gather where the two had used the suicide function.

Once a giant pool of blood and bits was formed, larger than the volume of one person, it began to rise up.

The fluid extended, was compressed to the size of a single person, and began to receive form like heated glass being expertly shaped into a human.

Eventually, even the clothes were given shape, and finally came the color.

The result? Sechs Würfel was now standing there as if he'd never exploded.

"Hello, Mr. Gakido," he said. "I haven't seen you in six minutes and twenty-seven seconds."

"Huh? A-Aaahh...?!" Gakido was naturally surprised.

Blood and flesh had suddenly become human again right before his very eyes.

That wasn't strange in our leader's case, though. Being blown up into bits and fluids, only to return to human, meant absolutely nothing to him.

You could cut his head off, pierce his heart, crush him with a giant leg, and he would simply shrug it off.

To him... all of those states were just one of his shapes.

That was the kind of body he had... the kind of monster he was.

Sechs Würfel was the only Master who'd replaced every last part of his body with slime.

◆

Body replacement type, otherwise known as Type Body.

It was an ultra rare Embryo category separate from the usual Arms, Guardian, Chariot, Castle, Territory, and even the rarer ones like Maiden and Apostle.

I didn't know the details of it, but I was told that it was completely different from the Type Arms that replaced only certain parts of the body, like hands or eyes.

Type Body Embryos were actually the rarest of all, and examples of them were few.

Even our leader only knew a single one besides himself — Caldina's

King of Termination, who'd replaced his whole body with machinery.

There was a reason for their rarity, of course.

Embryos hatched and evolved based on their Master's personalities.

Embryos were always influenced by who or what their Masters were, though it happened to different extents.

That left us with a question: what kind of personality would a person who would replace his entire body with slime have?

Personally, I couldn't begin to understand it.

I couldn't even comprehend why he had this kind of Embryo or how he saw the world.

He could become a slimy monster, be split into little pieces, mimic another person's body, yet accept it all as if it were him.

I didn't want to imagine the mentality of a person like that. I felt like it was off-limits for someone like me.

Today, I'd found out and understood that he was the type to fulfill the role he was given, but even so, I knew that I didn't even come close to truly understanding him.

After all... Type Body could only be given to people who could turn themselves into something entirely different and see absolutely nothing wrong with it.

◆

"K-King of Crime?! Shit!" Gakido looked shocked by the sight of the person he'd just blown up standing before him completely unscathed.

Of course he was shocked.

If Banten'in couldn't kill the man, it meant that Gakido had no means to do it.

"The King of Grind doesn't have the Right of Destruction skill, after all," said our leader. "You can only turn me into little pieces, nothing more."

See what I mean? He was completely blown up and says that, I thought.

Then again, that mentality of his was surely part of the reason why he was the way he was. To him, there was probably no difference between taking the shape of a human and taking the shape of a slime.

He acted differently whenever he switched from the King of Crime to The Saint, so maybe becoming a slime and acting the part came naturally to him, too?

Also, he was extremely good at changing shape, even by slime standards. Whenever he was in his default form or the form of The Saint he used very often, all the cells in his body were exactly like those of a normal human. But he went back to being slime whenever his shape was broken.

Also, according to him, the DNA of his The Saint form was exactly the same as that of the original person.

I'd asked him how he knew that when there was, as far as I knew, no way to check DNA in Dendro, and he'd said, "I became The Saint by fooling the The Saint's crystal, which judges viability of job inheritance by checking DNA."

I was still curious about how he'd ended up replacing the woman who had been meant to become The Saint.

Also, his Superior Embryo's name was "Primordial Shifting, Nu."

I didn't know what that was based on, so it was probably really minor. Was it an urban legend or something? It'd be pretty embarrassing if it was actually famous, but I was just thinking this, so I was safe.

Anyway, in conclusion...

"Our leader is... unbeatable," I said.

He was a full slime, so even if you cut his head off, pulled his heart out, or reduced him to bits, he'd just come back to normal like it was no big deal.

Blunt, slashing, explosive — all physical attacks were useless against him.

As for magic... I wasn't so sure, either.

He had a bunch of special rewards inside him at all times.

There were skills to consider, too, so I felt that he could even handle fire, even though it was supposed to be a slime's weakness.

He also had the KoC's passive skill, which made him have really high stats.

And finally, he had the ultimate skill which was probably the worst thing you could ever encounter.

Seriously, how did the KoD send this guy to the gaol...?

"You seem to be the only one left, Mr. Gakido," the leader said. "Would you like to fight me now?"

"Ngh... ghh..." He said nothing in response.

Gakido understood that he had no chance against him. He probably wanted to just run away.

Feeling like a mere onlooker, I watched the scene until our leader called out to me.

“Miss Gerbera!”

“What?” I asked, jumping.

“You were worried that you might be among the weaker people here in the gaol, weren’t you? Care to test just how much you’ve changed?”

“...What do you mean?” Unable to understand what he was getting at, I tilted my head and imagined a question mark popping up above my head.

He looked away from me and talked to Gakido. “Mr. Gakido, you may choose to fight Gerbera instead of me.”

“What?”

“Win against either of us, and I will let you off the hook and give you this café.”

“...Ehhhh?!” His words shocked me so much that I let out a weird sound.

Huh?! We’ll lose this café if I lose?! But it’s my home here!

“Hah! You’re damn right I’m choosin’ this woman here,” Gakido said as he looked at me, all smiles.

Oh man, that relieved look really pisses me off.

“Very well,” said the leader. “Are you okay with this, as well, miss?”

I wasn’t!

I really wasn’t, but... ah, no dice.

His eyes looked exactly the same as whenever he made me go through his hellish training. He wouldn’t take “no” for an answer.

I had to prepare myself.

And so, I reluctantly agreed to do what he wanted me to. “Fine... I’ll do it.”

I’d be up against a Superior Job in the same vein as the KoD. What if I lost?

Well... I’ll just move in with the leader again and continue living as a freeloader.

◆

We left the street we were in and arrived at a wasteland outside of the gaol's town.

This was Gakido's idea. He couldn't go all-out with the constant risk of damaging the prize: the café.

The leader told me, "Though the King of Grind doesn't have Right of Destruction, his ultimate job skill is Grinding Shockfist, which is a wide-scale area attack. He wouldn't be able to fight as he wished if we were near the prize café."

"Tch! Well, you sure know a lot," Gakido clicked his tongue.

"Yes... In a certain place, I found a list of jobs," the leader said as he looked in the café's direction.

"Oh?" I asked.

Was it in the café's safe or something? I'd constantly worry about something that important getting stolen. Though, with April there, we probably didn't have anything to worry about.

"So, are you two ready?" the leader said as he stood right between us like a referee.

We'd already signed a Contract, so if I lost this, Gakido would really get the café. There was also an extra rule preventing the use of Brooches.

Oh, dear, I sighed. I'll be a little tricky...

"You're damn right I'm ready!" Gakido roared.

"I guess you can start," I said.

Just a little bit more...

"Ah, Miss Gerbera, please don't back away any more," said the leader.

Tch. He'd noticed.

I would've liked for there to be more distance between us when the battle began.

"It seems like you both are ready, so... begin."

"Ooaagh!" Gakido charged at me like a boxer, just like when he'd faced April.

His body swayed as he rushed at me, quickly closing the distance between us.

I couldn't read the movements of his upper body.

He was preparing a decent feint — one that I probably couldn't deal with.

However, feints I saw coming were pointless against me.

"Agh?!" Gakido suddenly fell to the ground.

Why? Because I'd made Alhazred, whom he couldn't see, trip him up.

Still, due to the shin guards on his legs, it wasn't enough to cut off his leg.

Those are pretty tough, I thought. Is this the rumored Tenchi craftsmanship?

I didn't really mind that I couldn't sever his leg. It wasn't damage I needed right now.

I just needed enough time to activate my ultimate skill.

"I am Unknown... Total Eclipse of the Flesh — Alhazred."

It was best to activate it before a battle even began, but if that wasn't an option, it was important to buy enough time to do it.

"She... disappeared?!" Gakido yelled.

Following the activation, I merged with Alhazred and became imperceivable to everyone in the world.

"What's going on here?!" Gakido exclaimed.

"Well, considering that Miss Gerbera already knows about your Embryo, I think it would only be fair if I told you about hers," the leader said calmly. "She has an Embryo that's imperceptible to everyone but her."

Our leader had just gone and told him about Alhazred.

You're not helping, damn it!

"So she's still around, huh?" Gakido asked.

"Yes. Not even I know where, though."

"Then I'll end it with this one." Gakido cracked a grin, raised both his fists to the air, and threw them to the ground, shouting, "Mark of Cataclysm — Banten'in!"

That created a seal that seemed as large as one hundred meters, which then went on to cause an explosion several times larger.

◆◆◆

Gaol, outskirts of the residential area

"Mark of Cataclysm — Banten'in" was the ultimate skill of Gigamaru Gakido's Embryo: Marked Murderfists, Banten'in.

Banten'in's special characteristic was marking things and making them explode, and this ultimate skill represented it perfectly by creating a mark far bigger than the usual ones and making it cause incomparable destruction.

It allowed him to pulverize people without even marking them directly — the giant mark on the ground did the job most of the time.

It was the pre-Superior Gakido's trump card.

"Kheheheh. Thanks for choosin' this as the battleground, losers!"

Gakido himself came out of the destruction relatively unscathed. He did this by canceling out the explosion near him using a Grinding Shockfist.

Of course Sechs survived, too, but the destruction had sent him flying all over the place.

"That woman's gotta be gone for real now, heh heh. Just look at all this shit!" Gakido said as he looked around with pride.

It seemed as though everything within a diameter of one kilometel had been turned upside-down.

Gakido was confident that only a slime could survive this unscathed.

He also thought that the robot that had killed his clan, April, would've easily made it through this, but she wasn't on the scene.

"Well, with that done, I'll just wait for the KoC to fix his body and make him give me my café," Gakido smirked.

He'd already lost sight of his initial goal of beating the King of Crimes and becoming the top of the gaol.

Or more like, that was just what he was choosing to believe.

A large part of him just really didn't want to face the undefinable, immortal King of Crime.

In a way, he was much like his ex-opponent, Gerbera.

No... she wasn't an "ex-opponent."

The fight was still going on.

"Hey! KoC! Where the hell are ya?!" he called out to the broken wasteland, started walking and then just... tripped. "...Huh? Now that's weird. There're no rocks here or anything."

He tried to get up, but his legs didn't seem to listen.

"Is it a debuff?"

He looked at his status summary, but didn't see any detrimental effects or HP loss.

"Huhhh? Then why am I...?" He lay there, confused, for about ten-odd seconds. And then suddenly...

"...Huh?"

He had no idea when it had happened, but there were ten-odd bowgun arrows in the back of his knees.

It seemed as though the shooter was avoiding the shin guards and going for the unprotected area.

It was barely even a knee at this point — it was just a tendon linking the thigh and the shin.

“Ah. Eh? Aaahh?”

His stats now showed that yes, he’d suffered damage.

In addition, there was the Bleeding debuff, as well as a Knee Joint Destruction injury-based status effect for both of his knees.

“H-Healing! Gotta heal...!”

He tried to take out his inventory and heal himself using the medicine inside.

But for whatever reason, his fingers didn’t seem to even touch his inventory.

Ten-odd seconds passed.

“AAAHHH?!”

All he had in his hands was a destroyed inventory. The contents were scattered all around him.

“What the hell... WHAT THE HEEELL?!” Gakido was shaken up by the incomprehensible situation.

There was someone looking down at him.

But he couldn’t feel it — couldn’t perceive it.

It was none other than Gerbera. Merged with Alhazred, she observed him.

Though merged with her Embryo, she wasn’t limited to using Alhazred’s scythe-arms. She could use her own, too, and she was holding bowguns with an Auto-Loading Function in each.

She was the one who’d destroyed Gakido’s knees and inventory.

Gerbera had survived the cataclysm he’d caused.

The reason for that was simple: she’d been trained to distance herself the moment she saw that the enemy was about to use their ultimate skill.

Anyone would be wary if their opponent vanished before their very eyes, and many who were capable of it would launch a wide-scale attack.

No amount of hiding could help against that, so Gerbera needed to distance herself until the enemy calmed down.

During its ultimate skill, Alhazred's attacks were completely imperceptible, and they had the greatest effect when the enemy was calm.

No matter how wary they were... they just couldn't see them coming.

"Poison... Paralysis... and Intoxication?!" Gakido shrieked.

He had no idea when he'd received them, but his status summary was displaying a whole bunch of status effects.

His movements were so sluggish that he couldn't even see to hold and use his medicine.

The status effects were there because ten-odd seconds ago, Gerbera had used her Poison Hunter skills.

"My arm... MY AAAARM!"

He had no idea when it had happened, but his left hand was gone from the wrist down.

Only now did he realize that he'd lost an important part of his body.

This had happened ten-odd seconds ago, when he'd crawled over to his medicine, only to touch a mine placed there by Gerbera's Trap Hunter skill.

He'd missed each and every single attack.

He didn't perceive anything.

He couldn't perceive anything.

Everything that Gerbera did while merged with Alhazred using its ultimate skill could never be noticed the moment she did it.

The very fact that you had been attacked would reach you a whole ten-odd seconds late.

"G-Grinding Shockfist! Grinding Shockfist!"

Using his remaining hand, Gakido frenziedly used his ultimate job skill to attack his surroundings, but alas, Gerbera wasn't close enough for it to reach.

She stood at a distance, bowgun in hand, watching and waiting for her prey to grow weaker.

Once he raised his upper body, she silently shot his left eye.

He lost half of his vision instantly. It scared him, but he had no idea that it was caused by an arrow piercing his head.

He reached for the area and unknowingly touched the arrow, making the wound worse.

Gakido was already as good as dead.

Three of his limbs were gone, his HP was almost non-existent, and the many debuffs were weighing down on him.

Even so, Gerbera didn't come close to him.

She simply waited.

Not saying a word, she waited until the very last moment.

As she was now, she wouldn't make her presence known until the very last moment.

That was her greatest change since entering the gaol.

She would keep a cool head and relentlessly chip away at her opponent's life until they died.

She wouldn't let her guard down or allow anyone to perceive her.

She had become perhaps the most haunting hunter of all.

Once Gakido stopped moving, Gerbera, while keeping her distance, finished him off with a fire magic gem. Flames embraced him, but Gakido didn't even realize it until his death penalty came. However, before he went, he was able to whisper a short sentence.

"It's a nightmare..."

◆◆◆

Bow Hunter, Gerbera

After the incident with Gakido and his merry crew, we returned to the café, and I was now having some of our leader's coffee along with a simple cake.

This was nice and all, but I was still in a bad mood.

"Hey," I called out to our leader.

"Yes?"

"You called that a test, but... wasn't he just really weak? I don't feel like it was even a fight."

Gakido had been about as easy as Rook from when I'd fought him back before I was sent to the gaol.

He was nothing compared to the KoD, Hannya, Candy, and Fu'uta.

He must've been one of those third-rates who focused too much on their SJ!

"Perhaps," said the leader.

Ah. I knew it.

So basically, I was still one of the weaker people here in the gaol.

"Ugh... This is hopeless... I'm pretty sure I'm the weakest Superior..." I lay face-first on the table, as dejected as I had been when I'd first logged in today.

I had no idea why, but the leader was making a slightly different smile.

What's so funny?

"By the way, about your nickname..." he began.

"I can't call myself 'The Unknown' yet."

I had to win against the KoD first.

Hold on. If even our immortal King of Crime had lost against him, what chance did I have? What a downer of a thought...

"Perhaps, but Gakido gave you a very good one, didn't he?" the leader asked.

"Eh?"

He had? D-Did he mean "Fake-Breasts?!" If that became my nickname, I'd have to quit Dendro for good!

"The name he gave you is... Albtraum."

”Albtraum”? Umm... that means “Nightmare” in German, right? Better than what I expected, but... “Nightmare”...?

“Isn’t that common?” I asked. I felt like there’d be at least a few “Nightmares” in every country.

“I would say it’s a good start.”

Hmm... it wasn’t weird or anything, so I didn’t really mind it.

“Then I guess I’ll be Gerbera the Nightmare for now,” I said.

“Excellent. I will tell that to our regular customers.”

“That’s kinda embarrassing. Please don’t.”

“Well, these names only gain meaning when others give them to you and start using them regularly.”

I cringed.

That hurt the side of me that desperately wanted to be called “Unknown.”

I’ll just change the subject.

“By the way, do you have a nickname?” I asked him.

“I’m confident I had one... but haven’t heard it used for so long that I’ve forgotten it. If only it was as easy as Miss Hannya’s, it would never have left my memory.”

Oh yeah, hers was just “Hannya.”

Thinking of her reminded me of the time the leader and I had gone shopping and she’d mistaken us for a couple.

She’d just popped out and attacked, screaming, “COUPLES IN THE GAOL?! I CAN’T EVEN SEE MY GUY!”

It had been crazy scary. I’d used my ultimate skill, but even it had done nothing against her trampling. I’d even had pain on because of training, so it had hurt a lot, too...

If the leader hadn’t been there to become The Saint and heal me, I would’ve gotten the death penalty on the spot.

“Speaking of Hannya, I haven’t seen her in a while,” I went on.

Besides the leader, she was the Superior I met most often. Was she busy in real life or something?

“Ohh, you didn’t know?” the leader asked.

“Eh?”

“She was released yesterday. She gave us this cake as a parting gift. She made it herself, apparently.”

“Oh, I see.”

The cake was good, but I couldn’t tell that it was homemade. This reminded me that as long as she didn’t snap, Hannya was actually a very feminine lady.

Also, I’d heard of it happening, but I still had a hard time believing that anyone could be released.

Of course, we did plan to escape.

“...Hm?” I murmured.

Hannya... had been released?

Hannya, the woman who went on a murdering spree whenever she as much as saw a couple, had been released?

Hannya, the woman who’d destroyed more buildings here than any other Superior, had been released?

Hannya, the woman who was known for her low boiling point even among all the low-lives here, had been released?

“...She’ll be back in no time, won’t she?” I asked.

In response to my words, the leader broke his usual smile and cracked a wry grin — a rarity for him.

Epilogue: After the Storm, and Before the Storm

April 6th, 2045, Quartierlatin Country, ruins

“Ughh...” Rising Sun’s Blue Screen was moaning in front of the plant’s console.

He was doing official work investigating the ruins.

Thanks to Ray and Barbaroy’s help, he’d received a very lucrative quest. He was very thankful for that.

For a clan as insignificant as theirs, this was a true stroke of luck that he probably hadn’t deserved, what with the bad karma on him from the incident at Torne.

Regardless, it was a very good quest, and he’d feel indebted to Ray and Barbaroy for a while.

The only problem was that he was the only Master who’d received this quest.

There were other people who wanted it. Some had gone through introductions that didn’t involve Ray and Barbaroy.

The reward was very good, so of course there were many who would have liked to work alongside him.

However, the quest had the condition of having high-level engineer or mechanic grouping jobs, and those were rare even among Masters who’d moved from Dryfe to Altar.

No one else fit the conditions as well as Blue Screen did.

As a result, he was facing the ruins’ computers all on his own.

“Shit... I’m playing Dendro, but it feels like I’m working IRL,” he grumbled as he typed away on the console.

Despite his complaining, he did excellent work, easily unlocking many systems that had left tian scholars stumped.

“Ohh, another cyclic code security program. Dream of Electric Sheep — Gremlin.”

He used his Embryo to dull certain functions of the systems while scanning the data for anything significant.

"Heeey, how's work?! I got ya somethin' to eat!" Dum-Dum entered the plant and called out to Blue Screen. "Makin' any progress?"

"I'd say so. But man, is it just me, or is what we're doing right now really far from what a usual PK clan does?"

"Well, we lost Vermin, so now we're a clan of just us two. We don't have a lot of options, so we should be thankful for good jobs like this."

"True," Blue Screen nodded as he ate some of what Dum-Dum had brought. "Any changes in town?"

"Nope, wouldn't say so. You've still got tons of repair and search quests. Lookin' for lost items is basically all I'm doin' right now. Speakin' of which, I found a small engine in one of the hidden rooms in here."

Dum-Dum's Embryo, Mary, was specialized in tracking, and with it, looking for lost items or people.

This side of his Embryo didn't see much use back in Torne, but it was actually the Embryo's main feature.

He led a PK clan, but many would say that he was better suited for something else.

"An engine, eh...? What's the name?" Blue Screen asked.

"Identification wasn't enough for it, so all I got was 'Reactor.' I handed it over to the Altarian research group stationed here in town. We'll see what they find out. Oh! By the way! This old man in the plaza had this fancy-lookin' orchestra. They were playin' Engelberg's music, and they were so goddamn good!"

"Oh, that's the composer you like, right?"

"Hell yeah. He's not releasing anything new at the moment, though. Well, he's old, so maybe he retired?"

Blue Screen continued working even as he chatted with Dum-Dum.

"Hm?" he said suddenly, coming across an interesting set of data.

It was design data that had to be inputted into the plant's production line, and the monitor displayed some sort machine's blueprint along with the corrupted name, "Crystal ■■■■■."

"The data's corrupt?" Blue Screen muttered. "Now that's something not even Gremlin can... Wait, there's something more."

There was more data. The folder had another, completely undamaged machine blueprint.

It displayed what clearly looked like a mechanical horse and had the name "Mass-Production Prism Steed, Second Model."

It was a gift from the past.

The ruins containing a warped hope were now showing a light of hope untainted.

◇◇◇

April 6th, 2045, Prism Rider, Ray Starling

Thursday.

My few, yet long, days in Quartierlatin had come to an end, and it was time for us to leave.

Azurite was going back to the capital, and we were accompanying her.

We were planning to go all the way to Altea today, then make our way back to Gideon.

It was basically my Dendro hometown, and it felt like I hadn't been there in ages.

The entrance to Quartierlatin was growing ever more distant, and I saw all the people seeing us off.

Azurite was here unofficially, so the only ones there were the people we'd met here.

There was Shirley and all the other people from the inn we stayed in, Countess Quartierlatin, and Veldorbell.

Tom had already returned to Gideon. Veldorbell had stayed behind, but I hadn't gotten to see him much, due to differences in online times.

Still, every now and then, I could hear Veldorbell's music echoing through the town.

He claimed he would stay here a bit longer, saying that, "I have something I wish to do, but the people of this town need the consolation my music provides."

I'd also met the two Rising Sun guys here, but they hadn't been able to see us off because of all the work they had going on in the ruins.

Apparently, they'd found a way to mass-produce Prism Steed replicas and were now extremely busy producing and deploying units to the knights.

For a moment, I worried that I'd accidentally pushed too much work on them, but B3 said, “They’re getting something from this, so don’t worry about it too much.”

Anyway, with that warm goodbye, we left the town, but the inside of our carriage, drawn by Silver, was so cold that I could feel it here on the coachman’s seat.

We were in B3’s extremely luxurious, comfy carriage, and that seemed to have upset Azurite a bit.

It seemed to bother her that B3 was riding something this fancy after doing significant damage to the kingdom, and B3 seemed to be worried that Azurite would take it away as compensation.

“And I was pretty sure they’d hit it off,” I sighed.

“Their personalities may be a match, but human relations aren’t so simple,” Nemesis commented.

“That’s true...”

That also meant that there wasn’t any fundamental incompatibilities between them, so I could still hope that they’d eventually get along.

“Phew...”

Anyway, if you ignored the confrontation at the end, my time here after the incident at the ruins had been very peaceful.

I’d felt the same after Franklin’s Game. The contrast between the chaos during major incidents and the peace after them was really staggering.

I really hope we don’t get anything that could cost irreversible losses anytime soon, I thought.

“I’m not certain if you can hope for that,” said Nemesis. “The problems between Altar and Dryfe are still unsolved, and let’s not forget that this is Infinite Dendrogram. Even if nothing happens here, there could be major incidents happening in a distant land right this very moment. This world is vast, after all.”

“True...”

In that way, it was just like in real life. Something was always happening in a place you couldn’t see or reach.

“And that is why you cannot stop yourself from reaching out and preventing any tragedies you encounter, no?” Nemesis said.

“Maybe,” I admitted.

I just disliked things that could leave a bad taste in my mouth, but it felt like I’d been constantly running into such events ever since I’d started

Dendro.

Perhaps that was what made these peaceful, uneventful days so dear and precious, like the clear sky after a violent storm.

Even if another storm was inevitable, the fact that none of them continued forever was what allowed human hearts and minds to carry on without breaking.

“After the storm, and before the storm” seemed like the best way to describe these past few days.

To be Continued in the Next Episode

Afterword

Cat: “And here we are! The tenth volume! Double digits! I’m the usual afterword cat, Cheshiiire!”
Six: “I invaded the afterword last time, but now I’m here from the start. I’m Six, Sechs Würfel.”
Cat: “Oh... the number?”
Six: “I considered using ‘Evil,’ since I’m a bad slime, but I ultimately decided to go with this.”
Cat: “If it hadn’t been for Xunyu and her ‘Xun,’ we’d all have a nice animal theme going on here, and now we have another mold-breakeerrr.”
Six: “I would’ve used ‘Slime,’ but I feel like that takes too much space. Shu’s ‘Bear’ is already pushing it.”
Cat: “What would you pick if you could use an abbreviation?”
Six: “BoM. (Blob of Malice.)”
Cat: “Wow... That sounds like the nickname of a portly Mafia boss who kills anyone who says it. It suits you well, King of Criiime.”
Six: “Anyway, I’ve introduced myself, so let’s move on to the comment from the author himself.”

Dear readers, thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Kaido Sakon.

After announcing the anime recently, I’ve received lots of words of encouragement from people hopeful for the production. Director Tomoki Kobayashi and everyone else on the team are working very diligently, and I believe the end result will answer your expectations.

Also, I can’t reveal who they are yet, but the people working on the music are brilliant, as well! I am certain they will be revealed by the time volume 11 is released, so please wait for that, too.

Speaking of releases, the spin-off manga where Juliet is the main character should have begun serialization in Monthly Comic Alive. Please enjoy Juliet and company's adventures drawn in La-na's beautiful, cute, and cool art style!

I am the one writing it, by the way, and as I mention in the cover comment, this has increased my workload yet again. It's a happy kind of hardship, but I won't deny that it can be painful sometimes... I'll persevere, though.

My series is making new leaps and bounds this year, but don't forget that Kami Imai's manga adaptation of the original story is still going strong! The climax to the second volume is very fiery!

Now, let's talk about the upcoming volume 11.

It's planned to be the last volume to release before the anime starts airing, and the timing makes me feel like the hand of fate is at work here.

Ray and company will soon start their adventure once again in the anime, and the volume coming out right before the airing begins happens to be a prequel about an event that happened sometime before Ray first set foot in Altar — an attack on the country by an unfathomably dangerous creature.

It involves a face-off between the strongest monster and the kingdom's strongest Masters. It's a story from before the time when Ray and his gang had their humble beginnings.

Please look forward to one of the highest-class battles in the history of Infinite Dendrogram.

Six: "Volume 11, The Glory Selector, is coming out in October 2019. Please look forward to it... Oh? We're not emphasizing the announcement with spacing this time?"
Cat: "The amount of space we can dedicate to the afterword changes sometimes, and we got only three pages for this onnne. Your proper introduction to this corner and the author's comment took up most of iiit."
Six: (I see. I guess that is also why it's just the two of us this time.)
Cat: "Anyway, it's goodbye for now. Please continue supporting this seriiies."

Six: “May we meet again. I appear in the next volume, as well, by the way.”

Bonus Short Stories

Embryo Motifs

A certain place in Tenchi

On his first day of college, Winterbaum, AKA Alex Fuyuki, stayed home to go on a quest in Dendro. He traveled alongside two of Hokugen'in's Elite Four, checking up on a number of villages and talking about various things.

"Tenchi's Embryos are relatively simple in that they often focus on pure power," Eashtan commented.

"Really?" asked Winterbaum.

"You could say it's due to the nature of the people who pick this country. Bigman's Brocken is especially simple — it just enlarges his items. It's literally based on the childish idea that size is equal to power, but childish or not, there is truth in that."

He was describing the fellow member of the Elite Four who had just soloed Gakido and his group.

"I suppose it's based on the Brocken specter phenomenon," said Winterbaum.

"Brocken specter" was a name for the shadows dispersed and enlarged by mists or clouds. Their otherworldly appearance earned them a place in folklore all across the world.

"Speaking of Embryos and their motifs, what are your Embryos called?" Winterbaum asked. They went out on the same quest, yet he still didn't know that much.

"Try guessing," said Eashtan.

"Umm... your Embryo spawns ants, so... Myrmecoleon? Myrmidon, maybe?"

Those were the only two ant-related myths that Winterbaum could think of.

"You were close with the second one," said Eashtan. "My Embryo is 'Zeus.'"

The unexpectedly major name caught Winterbaum off-guard. “Ehhh? Oh, wait... Zeus was the one who made the Myrmidons.”

Greek myth had several theories for their origin, and one of them was that they were a warrior tribe created when Zeus transformed some ants into humans.

“That’s a very famous name,” he added.

“Your Horus is impressive, as well,” Eashtan replied. “Hm... you should keep in mind that famous motifs with many legends to their name can be used on multiple Embryos.”

“Oh, so the names aren’t exclusive?”

“Embryos are unlimited, while motifs aren’t. My Zeus is based on a smaller myth, but of course there are Zeuses that are all about just throwing lightning.”

“...I wonder if there are Zeuses with no control over their private parts,” Winterbaum said wryly.

Zeus was mainly associated with lightning or his strangely vast number of children. Even the Myrmidon myth had a version where he transformed into an ant and had many offspring.

“Perhaps there are,” said Eashtan. “Even Horus has many other forms. It’s just how it is.”

I wonder if I’ll ever meet another Horus user, Winterbaum thought before continuing the conversation. “By the way, what’s Probe’s Embryo?”

“I don’t know,” Eashtan replied without hesitation.

“Eh?” Winterbaum was confused that Eashtan wouldn’t know something so fundamental about his long-time companion.

“Think about it. Do you really believe she would say it in a way we can understand?”

“Corporate secret. Firm refusal. No questioning.” Probe made it very clear that she would not talk. You could see it as a sign that she was a careful woman who wouldn’t reveal her hand, but...

Well, I think I know what Mr. Eashtan means, Winterbaum thought.

Probe spoke in sentences of just two words, so if her Embryo’s name was one or more than two words long, she couldn’t say it even if she wasn’t secretive about it. It made him realize just how many Embryo motifs and weirdo Masters Dendro had to offer.

The End

The Triangle of Bygone Days

A certain day of a certain month

This happened back when Triangle of Wisdom was just another crafting clan among many others in Dryfe. Franklin, a Master with an Embryo in its fourth form, was sitting in a wooden shack attached to a shabby warehouse incomparable to the headquarters he would eventually have. The leader and originator of this clan, which he had started with the idea to create a humanoid robot, was silently facing the documents on his desk and reading them with a bitter expression.

"Fran, ya heeeere?" AR-I-CA, the clan member who had been with Franklin since the start, opened the creaking door and went inside... but as she did so, the door came off the hinges and became nothing more than a board with handles on it. "Whoops. Sorry."

"It's okay. You can expect that sort of thing from this cheap shack," Franklin replied. He didn't sound like the mad scientist most people knew him as — he was actually being "herself." The reason for this was because "she" was alone with AR-I-CA, one of the few people she could be completely honest with.

"Why not make this place a bit better?" AR-I-CA asked.

This place had been built by the ToW's clan members, but the material was some of the cheapest possible. There was no security here to speak of; instead, any valuables were in their inventories at all times and the clan barely had anything worth stealing, anyway, so this shack was only used for office work.

"If I had funds I could spare for our living environment, I'd fund our prototypes instead. That's what Holheim would want, too," said Franklin.

"Ahahah. Yeah, he really would." AR-I-CA laughed as she remembered the exhausted face of the clan's sub-leader who doubled as the accountant. It always made him look like an overworked-yet-skilled secretary.

Franklin cracked a wry grin, too.

"So, what's that?" AR-I-CA asked as she pointed at the documents Franklin was holding.

"Most of these are logs concerning the prototype we lost yesterday," Franklin replied with a bitter expression.

"Ohhh..."

"Prototype" could only refer to the humanoid Magingear their clan was trying to create. It didn't have a proper name yet — it wasn't even complete.

"That's a whole fifty we've lost..." Franklin sighed.

Thanks to the existence of crafting skills, creating parts and building the robots didn't take a lot of time. Even so, designing and creating fifty robots was time-consuming, and they hadn't had a single success yet.

"It's a nice number, but it looks like there're still lots of problems," said AR-I-CA.

"In the real world, the main problem behind building humanoid robots is power," Franklin explained. "Here, though, that's solved by the mystery voodoo we call 'magic,' which can be converted into all sorts of energy. But using it complicates the way the energy flows, which causes all these self-destructions."

They were using the already-existing powered suit Magingears as a reference to create prototypes that were basically bigger versions of those, but that almost always caused some circuits to overflow or become underpowered, making it impossible for the mech to even move.

"Maybe I should refer to the tanks instead?" Franklin added. "I'd whip up a simple mechanism where you just make the wheels spin and... but that would come at the cost of combat ability..."

"Hey, don't worry about it alone, okay?" AR-I-CA said as she hugged Franklin's head from behind.

"...What are you doing?"

"Breast cushion. Happy?"

"No. How many times do I have to tell you that I'm a woman in real life?"

In fact, your size kinda irritates me, Franklin added in thought.

"Oh. Well, it calmed you down, didn't it?"

"Well... I guess."

The warmth of another human being did have a calming effect.

"Aroused?"

"No."

"Oh, okay. Anyway, this clan's got lots of smarties, so I'm sure you'll solve the problem if you just talk to them!”

“That’s not a good idea.”

There was the saying “Two heads are better than one,” and this clan was built with the idea of research and development using the combined knowledge and brainpower of many individuals. However, Franklin was controlling and directing the development to prevent a “Too many cooks spoil the broth” situation. With so many hobbyists here, it was obvious that letting everyone do what they wanted would make the project lose structure and make completion that much more distant.

“There’s the risk of others trying to take charge or having disputes over minor things. I really can’t ask for their opinions,” Franklin explained.

Another problem with being a group of hobbyists was that people were likely to become upset or try to take matters into their own hands when their ideas went unused. Franklin wanted to provide them with an environment where everyone could develop what they wanted, but for that, they had to complete the very first unit, and that problem troubled him to no end.

“I get it now,” said AR-I-CA. “By the way, you said that ‘most of these’ are logs. What else is there?”

Franklin still had a wry grin on his face, but a select few would be able to tell that the question made him a bit depressed. “Letters of resignation...”

“Ohh? Again?”

“Blitz and Waterloo left. That’s another two of our fighters gone. They even called me a parasite here. Not that I can argue. I’ve wasted a lot of our money.”

It was impossible to make something from nothing. You always needed money to create something, and building robots was a costly task even here in Infinite Dendrogram.

The ToW raised funds by either selling products crafted by Holheim and the other crafters, or by trading in quest rewards or monster loot gathered by the fighters. Both sides played a part, but there was a big difference in the way they saw things. The fighters could only participate in mech development by being test pilots or mock battle targets, but the development hadn’t even progressed to that point yet. There were even cases of test pilots getting the death penalty due to the robots exploding. From the fighters’ perspective, the crafters were just burning the money they gathered, which was leading many to quit. Some crafters also left due to the lack of prospects.

Franklin silently pondered just how bleak the outlook was. Holheim was doing his best, but despite his efforts, people were leaving, and their funds were dwindling. Whether they would even achieve their goal was an open question, and it worried Franklin to no end.

She hid it with the personality she played, but her thoughts were always on the negative side.

“It’s fine! Don’t worry, Fran!” said AR-I-CA, puffing her chest.

“I can see it! It’ll go great!” she continued as she pointed at her artificial eye, which was her Embryo.

“Your Embryo can’t see that far, can it?” Franklin retorted.

AR-I-CA’s Cassandra could see the future, but it was limited to near-immediate events, and only to dangers directed at her, so there was no way she could see their clan succeeding in what they were trying to do.

“Yep! That’s why I’m seeing it with my normal eyes! I believe in you and everyone else in the clan! I can see our bright future!”

“I’m... not sure if I appreciate those words.”

Baseless confidence and optimistic observations were an enemy to all tech developers. Still...

“But if you trust me that much... it makes me want to meet your expectations,” Franklin said at last.

She felt like she could keep on trying. AR-I-CA was the only person she could show weakness to, and the only person who brought her back on her feet when she was close to breaking. With AR-I-CA supporting her mental state and Holheim supporting her environment, she was a balanced triangle. Because of this, she felt like could keep on trying — keep moving forward.

“All right. I guess I’ll go, then. Getting it all back on track once this is done is gonna be a pain in the ass, though.” Franklin stood up, log in hand, to go consult the other members about the problems with the prototype and take their ideas for the development direction.

AR-I-CA watched her best friend off with a smile on her face.

◇◆

A month of such difficult days later, the Triangle of Wisdom completed the first Marshall II.

A while after that, AR-I-CA left the clan.

Her reason for doing that was a mystery to all but Franklin and AR-I-CA herself, but the influence it had on Franklin must've been immense.

The End

The Relationship Between AAA and BBB

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

"I must say, the way you change is quite something," Azurite commented. "The impression you give off is like night and day."

"'Change'?" B3 repeated. "Whatever do you mean?"

We were on the way back to Altea. Sitting in the coachman's seat, Azurite and B3 were talking about something. Knowing the peculiar relationship between them, I was kinda worried.

"I am impressed that that armor could contract this much. Does it use an anthropomorphization spell?" asked Azurite.

"Let me to inform you that this is my default apparel. Not the armor," B3 replied.

"That was a joke. I understand that much."

So Azurite was just messing with her.

"Also, I can't say I expected you to know how I appear in my armor," B3 added.

"Oh, I do. I was investigating you to decide whether I should put you on the wanted list, after all," Azurite explained. "Honestly, though, my impression of you has changed. You are far more refined than I thought."

"Well, thank you very much, but... did you think I was brutish or something?" B3 spoke as if to argue against that point.

Azurite looked at her in confusion. "Aren't you the one who harassed a low-level Master? Does the sentence 'Kyah ha ha! Come on! Damage me for at least 1 HP and I'll let ya go!' ring a bell?"

Oh, I'm pretty sure I saw that, too, I thought. Marie showed it to me. There was no sound in what she showed me, though. Man, that's a villain-y phrase.

"Cough...!" B3 made a sound like she choked on her own blood. "H-How do you know that...?"

"I just said I investigated you. That includes getting testimonies from your victims."

This was probably like having someone else bring up something cringy you did in high school.

"I guess you could say that hiding my face makes my mind excited," B3 admitted, looking embarrassed.

B3 had mentioned something about having to be "turned on" in some way to switch. So it was all about hiding her face, huh? Going by how she'd sounded back in Torne, the helmet even had some sort of voice-modifying device to fit the change.

"I see. I wear a mask myself, so I do understand you a bit," said Azurite.

"Well, but... isn't it the other way around for you?"

"What do you mean?" Azurite asked.

B3 paused for a second before saying, "Without a mask on, sword in hand, you struck a pose and said, 'Are you prepared?'"

"Cough...!" Now I heard Azurite choke.

Oh, that's from the battle against the crab. I saw a recording of it online, and I guess B3 did, too.

"How do you know that...? An impressive counterattack, though, I will give you that much," Azurite admitted.

"I didn't intend it that way."

"My Truth Discernment just flared up a bit. But... very well. Let us not have conversations in this vein again."

"Understood."

Due to her prior offense, Azurite was treating B3 with a bit of harshness and a lot of sarcasm, while B3, though generally on the receiving end, occasionally went in for counterattacks.

Why do they insist on repeating these self-destructive exchanges? I wondered.

"I have a feeling that you are an indirect cause," said Nemesis telepathically.

Why?

"Well, it is nothing I should say. More importantly, you should stop letting them distract you and return to your coachman duties."

Nemesis had a point, so I focused on Silver's reins.

The two ladies inside continued their exchanges until we arrived at Altea.

The End

Sisters

Bow Hunter, Gerbera

A depressing rain was falling upon the gaol.

Our clan leader, Sechs, had left to get coffee beans for the café, leaving me alone with April.

To absolutely no one's surprise, you had to get coffee beans even here.

The gaol had no proper restaurants or vendor tians, but there were some vending machine-like shops. Was that where he was going?

The alternative was that he would farm coffee beans in a dungeon, but I found it hard to believe that.

Oh, speaking of dungeons...

"Hey, April, can I ask you something?" I called out to the robot.

"What-is-it?" she replied in monotone.

"The leader picked you up in a dungeon, right?" I asked, remembering him saying something about a treasure chest.

"Af-fir-ma-tive. This-u-nit-was-dis-a-bled-du-ring-a-bat-tle-at-the-end-of-the-pre-an-cient-civ-i-li-za-tion. The-ow-ner-ship-in-for-ma-tion-was-re-set, as-well. Af-ter-re-ac-ti-va-ting, I-re-gis-tered-the-cur-rent-own-er-as-my-ow-ner."

That sounded like some a baby bird's filial imprinting. But looking at how much she knew, it wasn't like she'd lost her memories, right? I didn't get it at all.

"So... do you remember what you did before you starting serving our leader?" I asked.

"I-used-to-pri-mar-i-ly-pro-tect-V-I-Ps."

"Ohh, that sounds like a perfect job for you."

She was the world's toughest bodyguard, after all. Of course, she'd have to make sure her Material Slider didn't harm those she wanted to protect.

"Af-fir-ma-tive. I-am-the-Prism-Per-son-fo-cused-on-en-dur-ance. It-is-a-good-ap-pli-ca-tion-of-my-a-bi-li-ties."

"So you're saying there are other Prism People as powerful as you?"

"Af-fir-ma-tive. There-were-a-to-tal-of-five-of-us-made. I-am-u-nit-two. Every-one-be-sides-u-nit-one, who-may-be-called-my-el-der-sister, had-ex-cep-tio-nal-bat-tle-ca-pa-bi-li-ties."

So she's one of five sisters, huh...? Wait, there are four... no, three robots... as strong as her?

"Can I ask what the strong sisters were like?" I asked.

"U-nit-three, Jet-Cha-ser, was-fo-cused-on-speed. She-was-e-quipped-with-a-mo-di-fi-ca-tion-wea-pon-that-made-her-the-fast-est-in-all-cir-cum-stan-ces."

"That's just broken."

"U-nit-four, Gar-net-De-stro-yer, was-fo-cused-on-fire-pow-er. She-was-e-quipped-with-ma-ny-tac-ti-cal-wea-pons."

"Was she the same size as you? You're sure she wasn't a giant robot?"

Also, the name reminded me of a certain bear, and remembering that bear made me kinda depressed.

"U-nit-five, Pearl-Sa-vior, was-fo-cused-on-hea-ling. She-was-e-quipped-with-me-di-cal-na-no-ma-chines-and-dil-i-gent-ly-served-hea-ling-the-hea-vi-ly-in-jured-and-se-rious-ly-sick."

"That's a bit sci-fi, but really peaceful compared to the others. I think healing magic does the job just fine, though."

Wait, from what I could recall, healing magic was weak against diseases that required surgery...

"But wait, the fifth isn't exactly a battle robot, right?" I asked.

"She-also-ex-celled-in-sen-ding-na-no-ma-chines-in-to-the-bo-dy-and-as-sas-si-na-ting-the-tar-get-from-with-in."

"I take it back..."

What a dangerous bunch of sisters. Whoever'd made them must have been a real mad scientist. The pre-ancient civilization sounded like an era of insane robots.

"Will your sisters pop out of some chest, too?" I asked.

"That-is-im-pos-si-ble." After saying nothing but "af-fir-ma-tive" to all I'd asked, she was finally denied something.

"Why?"

"The-three-are-ei-ther-de-stroyed-or-miss-ing."

"...Sorry."

I knew I was in a game, and that she was a robot, but I still felt like I asked something I shouldn't have.

April, however, didn't change her expression and said without pause, "No-need-to-a-po-lo-gize. It-is-the-past-and-no-thing-but-a-re-cord-of-the-truth."

It was as if she felt nothing about her sisters "dying."

"Don't you feel that it's... a sad memory?" I asked slowly.

"If-there-is-some-thing-I-'feel,'" April said as she looked at the devices in the café, "it-would-be-the-fact-that-I-was-far-more-for-tu-nate-than-my-sis-ters."

I looked at her in silence. She had basically just said that she was fortunate to still exist, and that that was what separated her from her sisters. It felt less robotic and more like something a philosophical person would think.

"Want some of the cake I made?" I asked at last.

I didn't know whether I wanted to thank her for telling me about her past or make it up to her for being insensitive, but I took out the cake from my inventory and handed it to her. She didn't need to eat, but she could still enjoy the taste.

"Thank-you."

She accepted my offer, and we both ate cake together.

We were the only ones here, and neither of us said a word. All we could hear was the sound of the rain outside.

"Unit five..." Suddenly, April stopped moving her fork and spoke up with vocal smoothness not present before. "She was good at making sweets. The other battle-focused units, myself included, weren't fit for such precise work."

"...I see."

April then returned to eating the cake.

Why did she say that, though?

When I'd asked whether losing her sisters was a sad memory to her, she'd said that all she'd felt was that she was more fortunate than her sisters just by the virtue of still existing, but then, after a strangely long pause, she had indirectly implied having fun memories with her sisters... which implied that she felt something for them, too.

I was dumb, though, so I wasn't sure if my interpretation was any good.

After we silently finished the cake, I began to wonder if she would ever fondly look back at the days she spent with us.

It wasn't a very "me" thought. The weather must've made me sentimental.

"I wonder when the leader's coming back," I pondered. After eating something sweet, I was up for some good coffee to help me change my mood.

I looked at the rain outside and waited for Sechs.

April joined me, and together, we both simply watched the time pass by.

The End

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters of novels like this by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 10
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2019 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2019 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2019 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2019 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: October 2019

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
11. The Glory Selecter

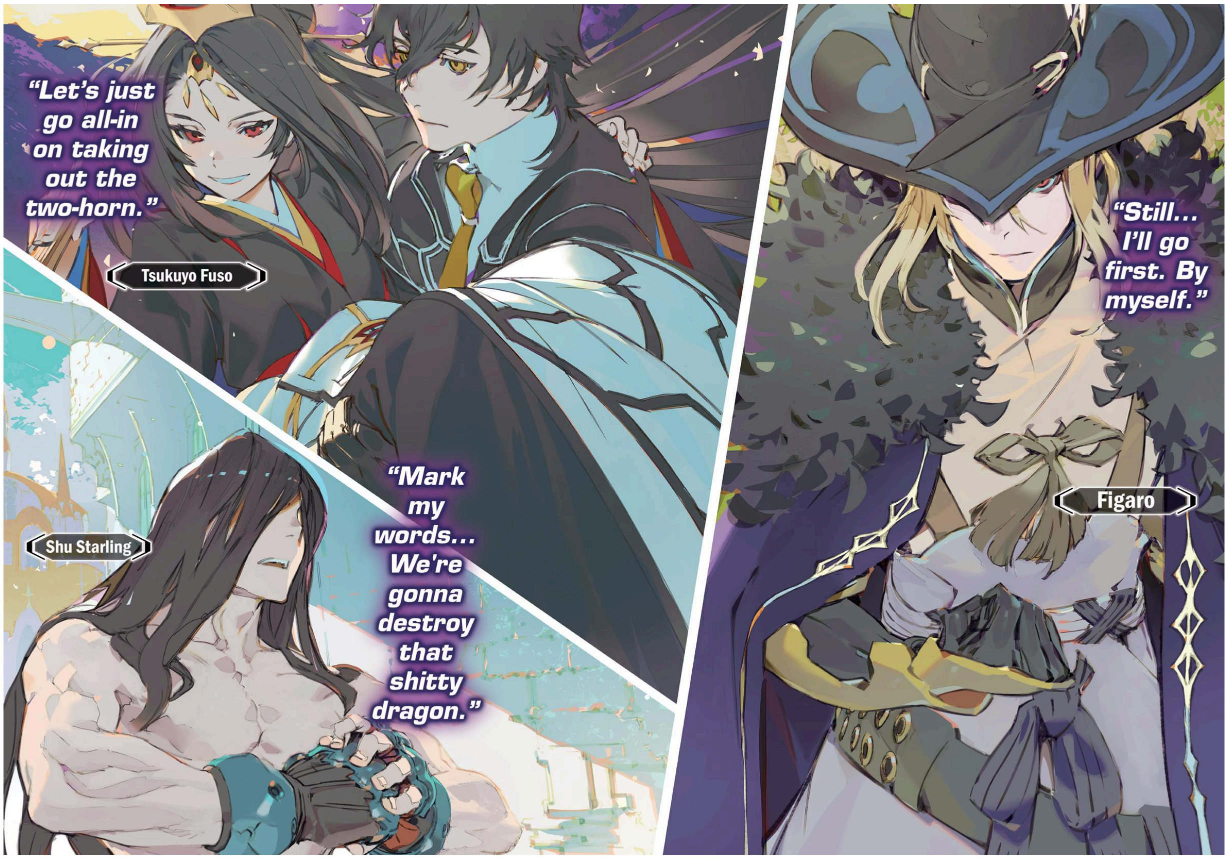
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
11. The Glory Selecter

Infinite Dendrogram

11. The Glory Selecter

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



"Let's just go all-in on taking out the two-horn."
Tsukuyo Fuso
"Still... I'll go first. By myself."
Figaro
"Mark my words... We're gonna destroy that shitty dragon."
Shu Starling

"OK, captain!"
[Type Maiden/Elder-Arms] Nægling
"Let's go, Næ."
Thus, he mustered his courage and spoke his declaration.
"This is the beginning of the REAL battle between you and us humans."
[King of Swords] Foltesla

Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Opening

Act One: The Golden Calamity

Act Two: Claymill Absolute Defense Line

Act Three: The Selection of Despair

Interlude: At the Royal Castle

Act Four: Figaro’s Choice

Act Five: The Departure of the Two Kings

Act Six: The Lion and the Dragon

Act Seven: The Gaze of the Moon and the Evil Eye

Act Eight: Unmatched God of War — Baldr

Interlude: The Worst and the Worst

Act Nine: Power and Power

Interlude: The Past Becomes the Present Becomes the Future

Afterword

Bonus Short Stories

About J-Novel Club

Copyright

Opening: The Observer Thought About Days Gone By

2045, April. The Control AI's Workspace — "The Cistern"

The space was akin to a snow dome: a transparent, ever-expanding seabed filled with a slightly blue-tinted fluid. There was not a speck of filth, a flaw, or a sign of life anywhere. Within it, small orbs appeared only to vanish moments later. None of them were any different from each other, and all of them were Embryos. Specifically, Embryos in their zeroth form — yet to be implanted, yet to read the host's heart and mind, and yet to be born.

They held endless possibilities, but right now, they were nothing. All they did was rise from the seabed, only to vanish halfway up. The scene was the very definition of transience. They were like shadows, or bubbles, or anything else that had an impending end, no matter how distant. Perhaps Infinite Dendrogram, too, was no different at its core. However, the vanishing Embryos were no dreams or illusions. These zeroth forms were being gathered from The Cistern to be implanted into Masters. The Embryo "eggs" were surfacing into the world, carrying their endless possibilities with them. They would meet their Masters, get to know who and what they were, and descend upon the world as their shadows, reflections, or other halves. These were shadows and bubbles carrying possibilities too many to count, and it would be no mistake to say that this was a sight of Infinite Transience.

At the very least, that was what the manager of The Cistern believed, and it also happened to be one of "her" names. She was watching the sight right then, not saying a word. A thin, elliptical membrane surrounded her. Though transparent and seemingly weak, the membrane wasn't crushed and did not lose its shape under the weight of all the fluid pressing down upon the seabed. She was within the "egg," and she looked much like a human girl. Some would compare her to an aristocrat hiding herself behind a facade of fine fabric, while others might see her as a bride beneath a veil. She was control AI no. 2, Humpty Dumpty, and her role among the thirteen AIs was to manage the Embryos.

However, that didn't mean that she would interfere with them in any way. Unlike Alice, who was in charge of avatars, or Caterpillar, who managed the environment, Humpty didn't interact with what she "managed." She had only two roles. First was to oversee The Cistern. She would secure the unborn Embryos in their purest form and send them to control AIs who were welcoming newly-arrived Masters. She would also protect the pure zeroth form Embryos from outside influence until the moment they were to be implanted. Though, considering the importance of this act to Embryos, some might say that there was no role more significant.

"...No problems here," Humpty said after checking the state of the seabed and protective fluid, then left The Cistern as though vanishing into thin air.

She had moved to a space akin to a study. It looked much like the one control AI 13 — Cheshire — used, but there were more bookshelves here. Every shelf was full of records. Humpty's study contained data on all the Embryos that had existed from the time Infinite Dendrogram began up to the current moment. Managing such data was her second role. She took out a particular book with a spine that read "Superiors." It contained the ordered names of Embryos that had reached their seventh form, such as Apocalypse or Grail. She silently leafed through the pages, only to stop on one of them.

It bore the Embryo name of "War God Ship, Baldr," as well as the name of its Master. "...Shu," she muttered his first name.

She had been there to greet Shu Starling when Infinite Dendrogram launched — when her job had required little processing power. Humpty had been observing him ever since. She saw him and Figaro defeat two UBMs when they had just started out. She saw his first meeting with Sechs Würfel, and their many clashes and joint struggles. She saw his encounter with Caldina's Magical Apex, as well as Tenchi's Technical Apex. She saw him become involved with the incident of the Corpse Fortress in Granvaloa's southern seas. She saw his actions during the fall of a flying fortress in the Harshwinter Mountains in the north of the continent. Humpty had been there to see him get caught up in various events — or even lead him to them — ever since he'd started. She remembered them all very well, but there was one among them that truly stood out. “Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria...”

One of her group’s goals was to create a hundred Superior Embryos. This drove them to try out various ways to spur Embryo evolution. The most notable of them, no doubt, was the deployment of the calamities known as “SUBMs.” After all, even supreme sacrifice and suffering could produce Superiors. “Heheh,” she giggled, recalling the third of these calamities — the most destructive of them all so far.

However, she wasn’t laughing at the sacrifices. “‘You aren’t gettin’ any new...’” she mouthed the first part of what Shu said as he challenged the golden calamity, but the rest was drowned out by her giggling.

Thus, the observer reminisced about days gone by.

Act One: The Golden Calamity

2044, November, Control AI No. 4's Workspace
[Selecting target from vault no. 4.]
[Initializing the time stopping cancellation process... completed.]
[Ready for activation.]
[Setting deployment area to the border of the Kingdom of Altar.]
[Set to the northern area of the Kingdom of Altar, Lightning Dragon Mountains.]
[Executing deployment.]
[Initializing the third intervention for the purpose of creating more Superiors.]

◇◆◇

An Area Near The Border Between The Kingdom and The Imperium

Altar and Dryfe. There was lots of traffic between these countries, but there were only two reasonable paths a human could take to cross the border. One was in the plains spreading out between Quartierlatin County to the kingdom's northeast and Barbaros County to the imperium's southeast. The other was the mountain pass linking Lunnings Duchy to the kingdom's northwest and Eldona March to the imperium's southwest. Between these countries, there was a steep mountain range called simply the "Border Mountain Belt," and crossing it on foot was no small task, to put it lightly. However, the true problem in crossing it wasn't the steep slopes, but the dragons inhabiting the mountains.

It was said that in the heart of the Border Mountain Belt, at the peak of the highest mountain, Mount Skycrown, lived the strongest of the skydragons — Skydragon King, Drag-Heaven — while the surrounding mountains were occupied by other kings of the skydragon kind. Mount Skycrown stood alongside Landdragon King's Harshwinter Mountains and the Outer Sea circled by the Seadragon King as a place densely populated by fearsome dragons that no sane tian ever approached. The occasional foolishly-confident martial artist or adventurous Master might actually enter the area, but with the sky dominated by Pure-Dragons, most of them were extinguished before reaching the Skydragon King; even those who made it that far were reduced to dust in a mere moment.

The Border Mountain Belt was a place that no uninvited guests could leave alive. However, if you ignored the skydragons' harshness to intruders, they were actually a very magnanimous kind. They rarely left their territory to hunt other animals, and never attacked the people traveling to the east or west of their mountains. As long as their borders were respected, they were actually a surprisingly safe neighbor to both the kingdom and the imperium. That was what separated them from the landdragons of the Harshwinter Mountains. Due to a shortage of food and an environment so harsh they'd named the whole area after it, the landdragons frequently left their mountains to hunt. That was an underlying cause of the ancient rivalry between landdragons and roc birds. Regardless, thanks to the orderly skydragons, exchanges between the two countries were going swimmingly.

"Hmm... There is more human movement than usual. Is this a sign of another major event in the world of men? Is one of the countries changing rulers? Is it the north or the south?"

Seated at the top of the Lightning Dragon Mountain to the west of the belt, a large dragon was looking down at the people passing by. Overall, he was slender, but his wingspan was vast and his horns imposing. It wasn't just for show, either — there were pale sparks running through both the wings and horns, making it obvious that he channeled immense amounts of electricity. His name was Lightning Dragon King, Drag-Volt. He was the third child of the Skydragon King, and the head of the Lightning Dragon kind living around this mountain of the same name, which was particularly close to the border between the human countries. "There is also the harvest festival. Perhaps I should use Anthropomorphization and go see the town when the day comes."

He enjoyed observing the world of men, and it wasn't unusual for him to transform into a human and go look around their settlements during special occasions.

Drag-Volt even called Duke Lunnings himself a friend. The man knew what he really was, but hid it from everyone else; they even enjoyed festivities together. The majestic dragon truly enjoyed the world of men. “I would have to have one of my younger brothers take my place, so... Hm?” Drag-Volt suddenly felt the presence of an approaching dragon over ten kilometels away. “...This one does not belong here. Does he intend to harm mankind?”

Controlling dragons that would bring harm to the area and mankind was one of his roles. Every dragon that perpetrated malicious attacks on humans increased the chances of sparking war between mankind and dragonkind. The Skydragon King and his family kept control over the local dragons in order to prevent that. And even if it hadn’t been his duty, Drag-Volt himself couldn’t tolerate any kin who would harm the world of man. “I suppose this is just another rebel from some mountain... Hm?”

At first, he guessed that it was just a dragon who had gained power at some mountain or other and let it go to his head. However, the presence he felt as the creature drew closer confirmed that this was not the case. And upon seeing the being’s body, he realized that it was not one of his kind.

“You... You are no skydragon.” Though still a dragon, this one looked wrong. Dragons usually had but one head, but this one had three, each of which sported a different number of horns. Things might’ve been different among seadragons and landdragons, but the orderly skydragons would’ve culled this creature, for it was known that malformed skydragons would not mature properly and were often malicious.

In the many years of his life, Drag-Volt had never seen a malformed dragon grow as large as this three-head, and that alone was proof that it was not from these mountains.

“Answer me! Where did you come from!?” Drag-Volt spoke in Draconic. However, the response he got...
“ShEaAwOooOooOAAAaaaHHH!” ...was just a roar — a primal scream unleashed with a force that surpassed any ability to describe its insanity.
“Mad-dragon! You know not even words!?” At that moment, Drag-Volt realized that this three-headed dragon must be annihilated, and thus released the strongest attack ability he had — a skill unique to him.

The electricity in his back and horns grew in intensity before gathering in his maw... “Lightning Vortex!” ...And released as a giant, whirling lightning storm that reached several kilometels away. That was the fastest, most powerful attack of Lightning Dragon King, Drag-Volt — a Mythical

UBM. It was literally lightning-fast and carried the energy of several nuclear warheads, burning anything in its wake. The force of the impact was such that it even melted the mountains surrounding the three-headed dragon. There was little doubt that it would boil every fluid in a living creature's body before vaporizing them entirely, granting them a swift death. "Foolish, maddened dragon," Drag-Volt said. "Why do you think me and my brother were stationed on the east and west of this border? An overconfident whelp is nothing to us."

He was in the west, while the younger of his elder brothers — Winddragon King — was in the east. If you ignored the Skydragon King, seated at The Skycrown, and his firstborn — his most trusted confidant — the strongest of the skydragon kind were placed at the mountains near the border. This was so they could easily take out any dragons as insolent as this one. The Lightning Dragon King had purged many such dragons over the five centuries since he set to this task. Thus, he didn't doubt his victory this time, either. However... the same could be said about his foe.

"SHuOoaAahHhH!" With another roar, the dragon emerged from the vaporized mountain... completely unharmed.

"...Impossible."

This can't be happening. Drag-Volt could not shake the thought.

He could perhaps understand if the creature barely survived his strongest attack, and could even accept it sustaining merely light damage. However, it was impossible for it to be completely unharmed. After all, even his father couldn't accomplish that — the Skydragon King himself. That would mean that this dragon here was actually superior to his immensely powerful father. "...No," Drag-Volt denied the comparison, but not due to any sentiment as his father's son, but because of his experience as a dragon with many battles to his name.

"It must have something that shields it from harm." A skill unknown to Drag-Volt protected it from his Lightning Vortex, and he believed that there was no point in attacking it again until he knew what it was.

Thus, he gathered his resolve. "...FATHER! BROTHERS! DO YOU SEE ME!?" he roared to the heavens.

Of course, The Skycrown where the firstborn lived was too far away to see. However, Drag-Volt was confident that they heard him and were watching this battle. "I WILL NOW GIVE MY ALL TO EXPOSE THIS

WRETCH!” he roared again, gathering power in his limbs. “AFTER I PERISH, DESTROY IT!”

The Lightning Dragon King was already prepared to die. Drag-Volt didn’t think that the creature before him was superior to the Skydragon King, but he knew for a fact that it was most certainly stronger than himself.

“COME, YOU MADDENED DRAGON! I SHALL GIVE MY LIFE TO EXPOSE THE SECRET... OF YOUR DEFENSE!” Thus, Drag-Volt dove towards the dragon...

“SHAhAHahHAhaH!”

His death was unceremonious, punctuated only by the beast’s cackling roar.

◇◆◇

Kingdom of Altar, Lunnings Duchy

Lunnings Duchy, situated in the kingdom’s northwest, was a welcoming land with a temperate climate. It was one of the country’s grain-producing regions, and it was harvest season. Looking over the fields of wheat that spread all the way to the base of the mountains, Duke Lunnings, who was here for an inspection, nodded in satisfaction. “Mhm... I see that this year’s harvest is especially abundant.”

The chief of the local village smiled as he said, “Truly. We had a fair bit of help from Masters this year. Both the amount and food value are greater than last year, and the soil is still fertile enough for more.”

“I see, I see,” nodded the duke. “I must admit, I was quite worried by the sudden growth in Master numbers three years ago, and though I’m aware there are folk as troublesome as Sechs Würfel among their number, I see that their arrival was a boon to my lands. Most excellent, indeed. Hahahah!” he laughed heartily. “This year’s festival is sure to be grand.”

Lord Drag-Volt will certainly enjoy it, he thought to himself, not saying a word — for that was a secret not even his family could know, let alone the chief.

“Mhm... With such a harvest, it will not pain me too much to not send out the gift,” the duke continued.

“Gift?” the chief asked.

“Mhm. As you know, this duchy shares a border with Dryfe, and we are on very good terms with our foreign neighbors in the Eldona March. Thus, during their auspicious events, we must send a gift separate from the one sent by the kingdom itself.”

“There’s an auspicious event in Dryfe?”

“Mhm. They have stopped mourning the imperator they lost last month, and his successor has been chosen. I’m not certain who it is, but I would guess it’s either the last imperator’s firstborn, Prince Gustav, or Gustav’s son, Hallon. The imperator’s wife and mother of Gustav is from the Eldona family, so it’s likely that it will soon be even more prosperous than before.”

And that was exactly why Duke Lunnings wanted to strengthen the ties between the two lands. He had considered funding the gift by emptying his family’s coffers, but with a harvest so great, the damage to his finances would be minimized. This greatly relieved him. Recently, Altar had been on good terms with both Dryfe to the north and Legendaria to the south. Duke Lunnings felt as though this harvest was a sign of peace and prosperity for all three western countries.

However... fate had other plans.

“...Hm?” The duke looked ahead into the distance. The color of the mountain beyond the wheat fields — the mountain whose pass linked Altar and Dryfe — had changed. It had been covered in green plant life, but now, mysteriously, the peak grew brown with decay. It didn’t stop there, either. Little by little, as though descending from the peak to the plains, the decay encroached on the wheat fields. “What is that? Poison? Is there a poisonous monster there?” The kingdom was no stranger to poisonous monsters, but those that could stain a whole mountain were few and far between.

“Don’t tell me it’s a King Basilisk! They’re some of the worst Pure-Dragons you can encounter!” Duke Lunnings named a creature so dangerous that there was a perpetual bounty on them, even though they weren’t UBMs. Even the kingdom recognized them as especially dangerous. If a monster like that reached the fields or the town, the damage would be immense. Naturally, Duke Lunnings decided they were in danger. The chief, on the other hand, was rather calm.

“A King Basilisk, eh?” he said. “Then I’m sure all will be well.”

“Why are you so confident!?” asked the duke.

“We have Masters staying in this village. We’ve been attacked by several Pure-Dragons since the crops became ripe, but they've always defeated them. Look."

The chief pointed at a party of five, speeding towards the decaying mountain. Duke Lunnings' Reveal skill told him that they were all above level 300, and he saw that one of them was riding a landdragon Pure-Dragon. "Ohh! They should have no trouble at all!" he exclaimed in relief.

"Indeed. They will surely slay the King Basilisk," nodded the chief. The Masters were probably stronger than even the duchy's knights. The chief had full confidence that they would be victorious, and Duke Lunnings expected good things as well. Alas, the party of Masters became orbs of light the moment they approached the rotting greenery.

"...What?" A group of Masters over level 300 and an earth-type Pure-Dragon vanished in but an instant. This can't be the poison of a mere King Basilisk... there's something even worse in those woods! the duke thought, now absolutely certain.

"C-Could it be... a Mythical UBM? Like Edelvalsa!?" The first thing that came to the duke's mind was Unguided Army, Edelvalsa — the Mythical UBM that had appeared at the border of the Quartierlatin County in the northeast of the kingdom nearly thirty years ago.

Back then, the disaster had felt like somebody else's problem. Mythicals were astronomically rare, and the Border Mountain Belt was occupied by the orderly skydragons who never harmed humans outside of their territory. "Is it an evil dragon from the mountains?" the duke wondered. "But then Lord Drag-Volt should've put it in its place... Ohh, what is going on?"

He closed his eyes, not certain how to feel about this sudden incident. "Still, we must act right away! First, we evacuate our people! Then I will return to the town — no, I will use the communication magic devices here in this village to contact the capital!" The duke quickly put together a plan. He wanted to contact the capital or the adventurer's guild to call forth high-ranking Masters that could take care of this emergency. The wheat fields might be left in ruins, but the duke believed that as long as the people were alive, they would eventually recover. There were no holes in his plan, except perhaps his lack of awareness of just how menacing this monster was. The strongest monsters that had ever appeared in the kingdom were Mythical UBMs. With such a limited scale, it was impossible to gauge the power of this being.

“D-Duke... DUKE LUNNINGS!” The chief had recovered from the shock of seeing the party of Masters in which he’d placed such confidence vanish in an instant, and now was staring at something with his eyes wide.

“What!?” the duke exclaimed in frustration, before noticing what the chief was looking at and muttering a meek “...What?”

They were staring in the direction of the decayed woods, but not into them. The cause of the decay and the monster that destroyed the Masters wasn’t something that could hide behind a few trees. It was still behind the mountain. Slowly, as though walking, it showed itself from behind the mountain. The thing they saw first was a head. A golden head with three horns slowly crossed the ridge and showed itself. Then, the duke saw a single-horned head show up from the left, and a two-horned head from the right. All three heads had long necks, covered in the same golden scales as the head. Finally, once it placed its front claw on the mountain top, the duke realized what he was looking at. “A golden... three-headed... dragon...” A monster as large as half the mountain — at least two hundred metels in height. Perhaps it was just a hundred, but even so, it was far larger than any monster the duke had ever seen. More importantly, his instincts told him that he could not stand in this thing’s way and that he should abandon all and run for his life.

“Th-That’s...!” Despite being struck by terror, the duke somehow noticed that one head — the two-horned one — was biting into something.

“L-Lord Drag-Volt...!?” Indeed, those were the remains of the Lightning Dragon King. Though, for all the duke knew, he wasn’t dead yet. There were no scratches on the lifeless body. It was in oddly pristine condition, and hadn’t vanished because the resurrection period hadn’t yet expired. Sadly, that didn’t mean that there was hope.

“SHyeAhwOWahwOWHahWoO!” With a feral scream akin to a human cackle, the two-horned head crunched its fangs into Drag-Volt’s neck, transforming his corpse into particles of light. “Th-This is... This can’t be happening...” As the count’s mind failed to process the sudden trauma of losing his dragon friend, the three-headed nightmare crossed the peak, revealing its full, terrifying glory.

“SHEeEAHHhwOooOoO!” Then, the two-horned head let out a cry akin to a whistle. There was a giant oblong eye buried in the center of its face, and it was shedding a purplish, hazy light.

It filled the duke with immense fear. He didn't know why. He didn't know what made him believe what he did. But he somehow understood that that single eye was the cause of the decay and the thing that killed the Master party... as well as Drag-Volt.

"...EVACUATE! GET AS FAR AWAY FROM THAT DRAGON AS POSSIBLE! IT WILL KILL YOU!" The duke used the voice amplification item he'd brought to address his people to order them to run for their lives. The awestruck, dazed crowd was jolted back to their senses, screamed in panic, and ran as fast as their legs allowed. The duke jumped on his horse and fled along with them. Well-trained as it was, the horse stayed calm and obeyed its owner well despite the situation.

The chief also began running. "Hoo... hoo..." His breathing ragged from the fear and tension overwhelming his heart, the duke spurred his horse into the fastest gallop it could manage. After a minute of this, he turned around to see the three-headed dragon still clinging to the peak. It walked slowly, and though its area of decay now reached the wheat fields, the villagers were only running faster. It's too large to move any faster...! the duke thought in relief. It was surely a sentiment shared among all the people fleeing from it. Thus, only a few of them realized that the dragon was spreading its wings.

In fact, if they hadn't been panicking, they would've realized the obvious detail they'd all missed: The fact that dragons could fly.

The three-headed abomination spread out its wings, which were each as large as its torso, and took its massive body to the sky. It flew at a leisurely pace, ending the lives of all living creatures it drew close to. The duke, the chief, the thousand or so villagers, the non-humanoids, and monsters... Their lives were taken from them in the blink of an eye. They fell to the ground like lifeless dolls.

Thus came the end of the northwest region of the kingdom... The Lightning Dragon Mountain and the Lunnings Duchy.

◆◇◆

"And so, the SUBM, Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, has been successfully deployed in the northwest of the kingdom. It looks like the Lightning Dragon King died, though. What a shame. He was quite promising."

“Nooo helping it, is theeere? Aaaanywaaay, if aaall goes accooording to hoow we set it, it should slooowly moooove to the sooouteeeaast, and the Fatal Field’s effects will reeeeach the capital in a weeeek!”

“All that’s left for us is to watch. Let us hope that this will be a good test for the kingdom’s Masters, and that the one to conquer her will be a new Superior.

“...”

“You look like you want to say something, Cheshire. Is it because the kingdom is your homeground?”

“We’re releasing a powerful enemy that can’t be defeated in normal ways... an SUBM. This will spur those slacking Masters into action and maybe even force an evolution. I understand that much, and I know it went well last time, but there’s still something I feel I must say.”

“What is it?”

“Gloria is... too strong. She’s above both Greatest One and Twin Moby Dick. She’s extremely complete as a monster, even when compared to the many other SUBMs we’ve retrieved and contained. Honestly, I think she should’ve been released at a later time.”

“That’s exactly why we’re doing it now.”

“...What?”

“Humpty has high hopes for King of Destruction, Mad Hatter has his eyes set on the Over Gladiator, Alice is fond of the High Priestess, and you give lots of your attention to the King of Crimes. A standard SUBM would not have much of an effect on a country with so many outstanding individuals.”

“...”

“Do not forget, Cheshire. This is all in the hope that the kingdom’s Masters will shatter their limits and emerge victorious. It’s for that reason that we’ve crafted the most perfect monster of all.”

Act Two: Claymill Absolute Defense Line

Days since Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria's Emergence Event: Four.

The Lunnings Duchy had been destroyed, and the head of the Lightning Dragon Mountain — Lightning Dragon King, Drag-Volt — was dead.

News of these events were both sudden and devastating to the kingdom as a whole. Those with far-sight magic confirmed that the one responsible for all of this was a creature known only as "Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria."

However, the name wasn't the only thing they'd found out about it.

First, they'd confirmed that it was the first SUBM — a rank of UBM above even Mythical — that had ever appeared in the Kingdom of Altar.

Second, they'd found out that all living beings that entered a radius of one kilometel around it instantly died.

The approach of a creature with such an ability promised a swift, inescapable death to all in its path.

The revelation of its approach struck fear into the hearts of the people, and those who lived in its predicted path had immediately begun to evacuate.

However, there were some who welcomed its appearance.

Most of them were Masters... particularly, the rankers. Their feelings could be summed up by one word — "finally."

To them, UBMs were nothing more than special monsters that dropped unique items upon defeat.

The stronger they were, the more reason the Masters had to battle them. And with SUBMs being the pinnacle of UBMs, one could only imagine what incredible loot it would drop. Many of the craftier individuals were already scheming to become MVPs, no matter the cost.

This wouldn't be the first time an SUBM was defeated. The one that'd appeared before Gloria, "Biframe White Whale, Twin Moby Dick," had been conquered by the entire Granvaloan navy, along with the Great

Admiral Antimicrobic Soy Sauce, the “Human Bomb”, and King of Thieves Zeta, the “Fatal Seal of the Four Seas.”

The two Superiors had been picked as the MVPs and received items that were above Mythical tier.

That knowledge was one of the reasons why many were enthusiastic about facing Gloria, but there was something besides the special reward that greatly attracted them — glory.

Many ludo Masters thought of SUBM fights as a major facet of Infinite Dendrogram’s late-game content. The name of an MVP in an SUBM fight would become well-known across the whole game. The glory earned from this was particularly attractive to the stronger kill rankers. They and the high-ranking clans instantly mobilized to defeat Gloria. The first to act focused more on speed than preparation.

There were a few reasons for this.

One was that if they wasted too much time, the kingdom might hatch a countermeasure of their own; if not that, the Skydragon King might leave The Skycrown to avenge his third child.

The kingdom’s Masters couldn’t have been the only ones attracted by Gloria’s promises, either. There might’ve been Dryfean or Legendarian Masters traveling there right that very moment for the sole purpose of slaying the dragon.

But perhaps the greatest threat to them were the four Superiors of their own country — King of Destruction, Over Gladiator, High Priestess, and King of Crime. If any of them were to act first, the high-ranking Masters would have no hope of becoming MVPs.

With that in mind, many rankers and clans quickly gathered to face Gloria... only for most of them to suffer the death penalty on the fourth day of Gloria’s appearance.

The famed rankers and clans were crushed like pebbles on the road, like something out of a bad slapstick routine.

More than half of them died the moment they approached the dragon, while those that somehow made it to Gloria itself were instantly pulverized by its immense stats that surpassed even Mythical tier.

The only valuable result of their hasty actions was two pieces of vague information picked up by DIN agents watching from a distance: “some didn’t die instantly” and “it’s likely that Gloria has some sort of defensive ability."

Perhaps the rankers that had survived the encounter long enough to actually fight Gloria itself had more information, but they all kept that to themselves. As Masters, they could challenge the dragon again after their death penalty timer expired, so it was only natural to guard and treasure whatever valuable information they had. Though, it was questionable if a rematch would've been enough for any of them to best a creature this powerful.

While Masters experienced defeat after defeat, the Kingdom's tians crafted an anti-Gloria plan of their own.

Specifically, they would shower it with an obscene amount of long-range attacks.

Its insta-death field was fatal, but nothing prevented you from attacking it from outside its range.

They would simultaneously attack it with a coordinated magic attack from Arch Sage's apprentices and a rite of divine punishment from Cardinal Fau Verdin — the current head of the national church — and his many adherents.

They also borrowed some special support from a particular ally.

The kingdom finished its preparations, established a defensive formation at the fortress city of Claymill, and prepared to greet the dragon.

And, as though in perfect sync with the kingdom, a certain group of more cautious Masters also prepared to act.

◇◇◇

Kingdom of Altar, Claymill the Fortress City

The fortress city of Claymill was located right between the capital and the Altar-Dryfe border in the country's northwest. It had started out as a fortress for war between neighboring countries —though, in this case, that referred to neither Dryfe nor Legendaria.

The foundations for this city had been laid several centuries ago, back when the land that would become Altar was split into many smaller, warring countries. The city sported a defensive barrier that entirely covered it and even extended to some land outside of it; at the time, it was perhaps the strongest fortress in the middle-west.

However, Azurite, first of his name — Sacred King who would go on to found the Kingdom of Altar — charged the fortress all by himself, shattered the barrier, and quickly defeated the city's leader. In the world of Infinite Dendrogram, it wasn't exactly unusual for a single person of immense ability to bring down a powerful fortress all on their own... and that was exactly what Claymill was.

Since it was far from Altar's current borders, it had little value as a strategic point. Now, it was more of a tourist destination, due to its involvement in the legend of the Sacred King and the founding of Altar. However, the city's defensive functions were still active. Even now, it could create a defensive barrier around it that provided absolute protection from even high-rank ultimate job skills. And despite it being such a strong defense, the barrier didn't hinder attacks from inside it whatsoever.

It may be obvious why Claymill was chosen as the location for the kingdom's plans to defeat Gloria.

Currently, in the outskirts of the city, there were four different groups preparing to fight Gloria.

The first of them was the smallest in number. Clad in deep blue robes, they were the Arch Sage's apprentices. There were fewer than thirty of them, but not a single one was below level 400, and every one of their number was one of the most distinguished tian Sages.

They were led by the eldest among them — Sage, Frigelt.

"A monster that requires us to all join forces... It speaks volumes to the gravity of the situation."

"If only our Arch Sage was here, too."

"Our teacher stands at the last line of defense, along with Sir Grandria and his Royal Guard. He stands near the capital to stop the creature from entering, in case it takes an alternate route and doesn't pass through here."

The Arch Sage was their teacher and the pride of their country, and he was powerful enough to cast spells as strong as their unison magic all on his own. It would have been encouraging to have him here, but many of the apprentices thought that this was an excellent chance to go all-out with the magic they'd learned from him.

"Like Mr. Frigelt suggested, we will use unison binding magic, aspected to the element of earth."

"Not offensive magic?"

"With Magic Range Extension using so much of our MP, offensive magic would be less effective. There's also the rite of divine punishment from the church, as well as our other weapon. We are to focus on trapping it in place."

"I see. So we will be the 'unsung heroes.'"

"...The what?"

"It's a term I heard from a Master. It describes someone who is vital to success, but does not stand out."

"'Unsung heroes,' huh? Well, let's just keep in mind that what we do is important and give it our all."

"Of course!" Thus, the apprentices prepared, determined to use their magic to carve a path to victory.

The second group was made up of people clad in white. Unlike the Arch Sage's apprentices, they were numerous — over six hundred strong. They were diverse in jobs, with Priests, Temple Knights, Monks, and others among them, but they had one factor in common — they were all people of the cloth. Their great number served a purpose, too, for the rite of divine punishment's power increased the more people who performed it.

This was a mobilization of all the volunteers still undergoing their training as holy acolytes. They were willing participants here, but as the hour of battle drew close, some became afraid.

"...We'll die if it gets too close, right?"

"Yeah. They say that it's a dragon embodying a curse of death. That sure is scary..."

As the still-young priests talked among themselves... "And that is why it's our turn to act." ...A man in the prime of his life called out to them.

"Cardinal Verdin?!"

"Why are you here?!"

Indeed, it was Cardinal Fau Verdin.

With Tsukuyo Fuso taking the High Priestess job, the male version of it — Hierophant — was unavailable, and without a proper Hierophant, he had become the functional leader of Altar's church. His status was equivalent to that of a cardinal, but his job was actually Bishop, because a "Cardinal" job didn't exist.

"I can understand why you would be worried. However, those who have no means of fighting the approaching death curse are far more worried than you could ever be," he said, giving a strong yet peaceful smile and placing his hands on their shoulders. "We have the power to repel this death curse. Thus, you must believe that the powers granted to us by the heavens and the crystals will banish this approaching evil."

"W-We will!"

"We'll do our best!" The two regained their morale. Cardinal Verdin smiled and nodded in satisfaction before moving on to other priests who were still nervous.

The third group was stationed some distance away from the other two, and they were clad in dark green army uniforms.

They spread silver sheets over the plain and did something to make them — the Garages — open up, revealing many heavily armored, tracked Magingears known as "Geists."

They were the imperium's second armored battalion... reinforcements from Dryfe Imperium to the north.

When Gloria had appeared, they happened to be here for joint military exercises.

Of course, they could've just returned to their country, but by the will of First Prince Gustav — the one rumored to be chosen as the next imperator — they would help the kingdom defeat Gloria.

Like unison magic and the rite of divine punishment, Geists excelled at dealing damage at long range, so they were certainly capable of lending aid to this defense.

And tanks weren't the only things they had up their sleeve. While coming to Altar for joint exercises, they'd brought over a powerful secret weapon as a bargaining chip. This weapon was now being assembled by Mechanics using parts from Garages and their own inventories, and it looked like a cannon with a barrel as large as a smokestack.

However, the strangest group of all was the fourth one.

Unlike the other three, they all wore different clothing. They all dressed as they pleased, but their gear was, on average, far more rare and powerful than the robes or uniforms of the other three groups.

Some of them even had MVP special rewards — a rarity among tians — that they seemed to wear and wield like it was no big deal.

They were Masters, but not just any Masters. They were the Babylonian Battlegroup — the second in the kingdom's clan rankings.

They stood ready on the plain outside of Claymill's defense barrier.

"Leader, 256 of the 287 members were able to log in today," the clan's sub-leader, Over Enchanter, Shulka, reported to the leader. They both stood in a tent erected on the plains.

"I see," the leader said. "It's great that so many could make it."

"It's a very important quest, after all. You have a lot of people calling in sick and skipping work or school just for this, especially here in our clan."

"Heh. You've got a point." The leader's name was King of Swords, Foltesla. He was third in the kingdom's duel rankings, and many saw him as the current champion's — Over Gladiator, Figaro's — friendly rival.

While Figaro was often compared to a lion or a tiger, Foltesla had the air of a snow leopard about him.

"Also, this is not just an ordinary fight," Shulka added. "Our hometown is in danger. There's no better time to go all-out than right now."

"...Yeah." Babylonian Battlegroup was based in Claymill. The city was a major part of their lives, and they'd made many memories here. Thus, they had to protect it at all costs.

"Leader... What about your wife?" Shulka asked worriedly.

"I asked her to evacuate three times now. She said 'I work with medicine. I have to stay for the sake of those who can't leave.'"

Foltesla was one of the few Masters who'd married in Infinite Dendrogram. His wife was a tian working in a hospital in Claymill. Thus, he wanted to protect this city more than anyone else. It was the reason his expression was even more serious than that of the other Masters.

"...We can't lose this," he said. A moment later, the crest on his left hand shone and...

"We'll win for sure, captain!" ...and a girl appeared. She had red hair and seemed to be in her late teens, but she moved around with so much energy that it made her look younger.

Her name was Næġling. She was Foltesla's Embryo of the Type Maiden/Elder-Arms.

"We'll win no matter what, take its special reward as a souvenir, and return to Erica! I won't accept anything else!"

"Yeah... Of course... Næ," said Foltesla, patting her head with a smile.

"Leader, I just got some info via comms magic," said Shulka. "There are other clans and parties besides us in the surroundings."

"They probably think they can become MVPs by finishing Gloria off after we and the kingdom weaken it," said Foltesla. "Reaping the benefits of our hard work." He also assumed that some of them were those who'd fought Gloria earlier and had just returned from their death penalty.

"...Should we remove them beforehand?"

"Leave them. We won't be cooperating, but they will add to our overall power. Honestly, I have no idea how much of it we need."

The strongest UBM that Foltesla had beaten so far was Ancient Legendary. Gloria was two tiers above that, and he couldn't even imagine how dangerous it was.

"Power, eh...? If only we had The Lunar Society or the likes of Figaro and Tom Cat with us." Shulka named the country's top clan and the two duel rankers who were above Foltesla.

"It is what it is. The cult is negotiating with the kingdom, while Tom Cat is probably a dev plant, so he won't do anything about this. As for Figaro..."

"Leader?"

"Oh, it's nothing..." As his longtime rival, Foltesla knew Figaro's weakness.

Specifically, he knew that Figaro could only really fight alone. Participating in a large-scale cooperative battle such as this one would've been quite the challenge for him.

Despite that, Foltesla clearly recalled him saying "Foltesla... Should I participate, too?"

Figaro'd offered this because he knew that Gloria was approaching Claymill, which Foltesla held dear as his and his wife's home.

Foltesla had replied by saying, "No need, Figaro. You just sit tight on your throne. I'll be coming to take it after I beat Gloria."

He'd rejected Figaro's offer, because he didn't want to expose his weakness to the many others gathered there and didn't want Figaro to be aware of his own weakness either — and, as his rival, he wanted Figaro to be the best he could be.

"Do you think I did the wrong thing, Næ?" he asked Næ telepathically.

"No. I'm sure this is good! I want the lion to stay strong, too! It's one of the reasons why I wanna beat him!"

"...I know what you mean." A moment later, a Babylonian Battlegroup member opened the entrance to the tent and said, "Leader! I have a message from the scouts observing Gloria! We have only two hours left until the target arrives!"

"I see," said Foltesla. "Then we'll follow our plan and attack it outside the barrier."

"Understood!" said the member before running out and informing the start of the operation.

"It'll go well, yes?" Shulka asked, clearly worried.

"We have to make sure that it does. Right?" Foltesla responded.

Unlike the clans and rankers who'd rushed in, the Babylonian Battlegroup was cooperating with the kingdom, and was integral to their plan.

This was how it would go...

First, the Babylonian Battlegroup's ranged squad would attack Gloria from a distance. While Gloria was distracted by them, the Arch Sage's apprentices and the holy acolytes of the Altarian church would launch the large-scale magic known as the rite of divine punishment. And while the consecutive attacks kept it distracted, the imperium would use that ultimate weapon they'd brought.

If all went well, that would be the end of it.

"If Dryfe's weapon isn't enough..." Shulka mused.

"Then we will have to charge in ourselves." Their info was vague, but according to DIN, there were cases when merely drawing close to Gloria didn't result in instant death.

In the worst case scenario, the King of Swords, Foltesla, and the finest of his Babylonian Battlegroup would have to face Gloria by themselves.

Foltesla thought that that would be all they had left... and had a feeling — a certainty — that it would indeed come to that.

◇◆

The fifty-eight Geists of the imperium’s second armored battalion were stationed outside the barrier, away from the Arch Sage’s apprentices and the followers of the church.

Unlike unison magic and the rite of divine punishment, artillery was limited by firing location and trajectory, so the distance was necessary to make sure none of the other groups were caught in the bombardment. Even if none of the shells did any direct damage to their allies, anyone too close to a tank would be risking their eardrums. These Geists were loaded with powerful long-range ordnance, so they posed an even greater danger.

After Gloria’s approach was announced, the commander of the battalion and his soldiers assumed their positions and waited, but the dragon was nowhere in sight even after nearly two hours had passed.

“...Is it really on its way here?” a Geist driver asked.

“If it doesn’t change course, yeah,” said the commander, seated in the vehicle cockpit. “But we’re dealing with a living being here. There’s no telling what kind of urges it’ll get... In the worst-case scenario, it might come at us from behind.”

By that, he meant the city of Claymill.

“What would we do then?”

“We’ll do what we can to ensure the people are safe, then attack. We got permission to use the strong stuff inside the kingdom, but I’d prefer not to harm Claymill or its people.”

Though, by the time that thing was there, the death field would’ve killed every single inhabitant already, the commander added mentally, but not out loud.

“I must say... I really didn’t expect to see a real battle here in the kingdom. And against a so-called ‘SUBM,’ at that... Why must we fight a monster above even Mythical for the sake of...?”

The young driver was frightened and slightly upset by the fact that he would be risking his life outside of the imperium, but the commander offered another perspective.

“Don’t think of it like that,” he said. “In the long run, defending this country is defending Dryfe, too.”

“What do you mean?”

“It’s little more than a rumor, but... there’re plans to unite our next crown prince and the kingdom’s first princess in marriage.”

This was a rumor that sometimes spread among the imperium's elite. The idea had been considered for decades now, but due to clashes in circumstance, it had been postponed until the next generation.

But now, Prince Gustav, the prime candidate for imperator (merely "candidate" because the previous one hadn't officially named a successor) had a firstborn named Hallon, who would presumably become crown prince the moment Gustav took the throne. There was also the possibility of Gustav being passed over and Hallon becoming imperator, but that didn't matter much in this context — a crown prince and an imperator were both worthy of a first princess' hand in marriage.

"So you are saying that this land would be Dryfe, too, sir?" asked the driver.

"Or Dryfe would become Altar," nodded the commander. "I don't mind either way. The kingdom is rich in farmland. If we merge, Dryfe's food shortages would be a thing of the past."

"Well, I do hear that there have been more and more people dying of hunger in the colder regions..." Due to poor harvests with unknown causes, the imperium's self-sufficiency was dropping dramatically. They could still survive with imports from foreign lands, but Dryfe's future was looking quite bleak.

"Yeah. That's why we have to protect this country. For the sake of our future."

"Sir, yes, sir!" Keeping their morale high, they continued to wait.

Fifteen more minutes had passed when...

"WE SEE GLORIA ON THE HORIZON! IT'S APPROACHING!"

...The comms blared a message from the scouts.

"And there it is... all vehicles, prepare to fire."

"All vehicles, prepare to fire!"

"Understood! All vehicles, prepare to fire!" The commander's order spread through his battalion, and the fifty-eight Geists moved and fine-tuned the angle of their turrets...

"Begin charging the Supergravity Shell." ...And prepared to use the ultimate weapon they'd brought all this way.

◇◆

Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, appeared on the distant horizon. It walked upon the surface, its three heads swaying with every step.

The one-horned head on the right had three eyes which moved separately and with no clear pattern, as though it were scanning its surroundings randomly.

The single eye of two-horned head on the left shone brightly as it glared down towards the surface below.

However, the three-horned head in the middle had its two eyes closed, as though it was fast asleep.

Its body, completely covered in golden scales, moved its four limbs along the ground, leaving behind clawprints as it approached Claymill.

The flourishing plants around it withered and died the moment its aura touched them.

If it drew too close to a lake, the aquatic monsters there perished instantly and floated up to the surface, becoming particles of light once the resurrection period expired and leaving behind only the meat they dropped. The aquatic plants died, as well, and in such numbers that the lake changed color.

“SHuEwOoOAAagHh!” The light of the single eye on the two-horned head grew in intensity, as if this creature could not tolerate the existence of any life around it.

Gloria strode through the withered, dead land as though surveying its conquered kingdom.

“...?” Suddenly, the three disorderly eyes of the one-horned head all focused upon a single point.

A moment later, countless arrows and blades of ice rained down on Gloria.

These were the result of skills used by Masters from the Babylonian Battlegroup. These long-ranged attacks were even mixed with ultimate Embryo skills, and they all barraged the dragon.

“Aim for the eyes! Don’t think you can take it down like this! Focus on distracting it!” Listening to their leader, Foltesla, the clan continued their onslaught.

This was such an intense assault that it would make short work of the average Master’s — maybe even a standard UBM’s — HP.

However, the max-level Reveal skill possessed by one of the high-rank jobs present told a different story.

"Leader!" he cried, in a panic. "Gloria's HP isn't going down at all!" It was the truth — Gloria hadn't lost even a fraction of its HP. In fact, direct hits to its eyes — presumed weak spots — didn't even make it flinch.

"So it really does have some sort of defense skill," said Foltesla. "But it can't be all powerful."

He was certain that no creature could be invincible to all attacks. There had to be something, such as a specific level of power or a certain element, which could break through it.

And if the problem was indeed that their attacks lacked power...

"Leader! The kingdom has contacted us! They're commencing their attack!"

"All right! Back away, but don't stop attacking! And make sure you aren't caught up in the crossfire!"

...The joint attacks from Altar and Dryfe would surely make up the difference.

"Mr. Frigelt! The twenty-six apprentices are ready to cast the spell!"

"Excellent! I will take the lead! Match my chant and casting!" the aged, long-bearded Sage, Frigelt, called to the younger of the Arch Sage's apprentices.

They were preparing to use unison magic. This was a technique that increased the potency of spells by combining the magic power of casters who possessed the unison magic skill and simultaneously cast a spell using a specific chant. The need for extremely strict timing and precise control of magic power made it poorly suited for Masters, and most believed that only highly trained tians were capable of it.

And when it came to unison magic, the Arch Sage's apprentices were thought to be among the best.

"Let us join our wills as one," said Frigelt.

"LET US JOIN OUR WILLS AS ONE," the others echoed.

"We call to the earth. Spread our magic like you spread the violent rain and morning dew."

"WE CALL TO THE EARTH! SPREAD OUR MAGIC LIKE YOU SPREAD THE VIOLENT RAIN AND MORNING DEW!"

"We the students of the Arch Sage now weave our rite."

"WE THE STUDENTS OF THE ARCH SAGE NOW WEAVE OUR

RITE!” The simultaneous chanting enhanced their magic powers and merged them into one... “UNISON MAGIC — GRAND HOLDER!” ...And they spoke the magic words.

A moment later, seven stone arms over a hundred metels in size manifested around Gloria. They grasped the dragon in the blink of an eye, preventing it from moving any further.

The toughness and precise movements of those arms spoke volumes of the unison magic’s perfect execution.

“Hhaah... hhaah... NOW! HOLY MEN OF THE KINGDOM!” Breathing raggedly after such a taxing spell, Frigelt used voice amplification magic to signal that it was now the church’s turn.

By the time the voice reached them, they were already doing what they had to do.

“O, heavens. O, incarnation of divine punishment, judge of all living things.” Cardinal Verdin closed his eyes and joined his hands together. This was no chant for a magic spell, but a prayer for a ritual — one that they had been doing for nearly an hour now.

All for this very moment.

“Before us looms a wicked dragon. If it is indeed truly evil, may it suffer unrelenting retribution.” The prayer reached its peak, and white light — orbs of their HP, MP, and SP — began leaving the bodies of the assembled priests. That was the crystallization of their collective power, and upon losing that light, they Fainted, one after another.

The lights then began to merge into one in midair.

Finally, even Cardinal Verdin’s body released its white light, and the amalgam of all these shining orbs from all these holy men flew above Gloria’s head.

Then, the gathered white light itself spoke the final line of the rite of divine punishment.

“Come, Judgement Pillar!” The rite of divine punishment was a technique that drained all power from the participants and unleashed purifying holy magic upon whoever the majority of them had deemed an enemy.

Gloria was their only enemy here, and thus, a pillar of obscenely hot light engulfed the dragon and the arms binding it.

The golden body was blasted by immense heat and the stone arms around it melted, becoming magma that buried Gloria alive.

You would expect any creature to burn, boil, or suffocate to death when exposed to this, but nothing was certain with Gloria.

Thus, the imperium's second armored battalion moved in to finish it off with their strongest weapon.

"Commander! Gloria is completely bound!"

"All right... Supergravity Shell... prepare to fire!" At his command, the battery constructed in their formation by their Mechanics began to hum.

The battery — or, to be specific, the shell it would fire — was the strongest weapon in this battle.

It was a "Supergravity Shell" — one of the so-called "Four Forbidden Shells," a quartet of immensely powerful shell types meant to be fired by the symbol of Dryfe: Throne of the Imperium, Dryfe Imperstand.

What they had here was one single warhead and a replica turret designed to fire it.

Current technology wasn't able to properly replicate the Imperstand's parts. The replica's range was only one hundredth of the original's, and it was guaranteed to break after firing just once.

But even though the cannon was merely a replica, the shell was the real thing — a devastating weapon that compressed and crushed anything within a one kilometel radius, until everything was annihilated.

The unison magic and the rite of divine punishment was only meant to hold Gloria in place. This Supergravity Shell was the two countries' trump card.

"This hasn't been used in an actual battle in about a century, has it?"

"Well, we don't have many of them." The Imperstand's Four Forbidden Shells had been created during the time of the pre-ancient civilization, and no one had been able to replicate the feat since. Even counting all the types together, there were scarcely ten shells in existence.

Because of this, the imperium was extremely apprehensive about using them. They had never been used in a war — in fact, aside from the time they had to get rid of a Mythical UBM raging in their lands, they had never been used at all.

Of course, they saw enough of a reward for using a Supergravity Shell in this battle: the very defeat of Gloria itself.

The kingdom had set the stage, and the imperium would now deal the final blow. It was unknown whether it would be the commander giving the orders or the gunner manning the cannon, but either way, the imperium would receive an SUBM's special reward.

Altar would minimize the damage to their lands, while Dryfe would acquire an immensely powerful item; both sides benefited from this arrangement.

"The turret is at 80% energy!" said the Engineer managing the weapon.

"You only have one shot. Don't miss," the commander said.

"Sir, yes, sir! I'll stake my life on it!" While they talked, there was some kind of change in Gloria.

"...So it seriously didn't die, huh?" the commander gasped. The hardened magma moved, and three heads broke free of it.

Neither the searing rite of divine punishment nor being buried alive under magma seemed to threaten its life. The dragon's survivability was so great that the commander now knew for sure that only the Supergravity Shell could stop it.

He looked at Gloria with determination when the Engineer declared that the preparations were complete.

"Energy is at 120%."

"All right! Fire the Supergravity Shell!"

"Firing the Supergravity Shell!" At those words, the replica turret released a pitch-black orb.

The power of the release shattered the gun, but the black orb flew towards Gloria at full speed for a direct hit.

A moment later, the space around the dragon distorted.

Heaven and earth alike tore apart, converged on a single point, and vanished. Not even light could escape; the onlookers could only see a black, spherical space.

This was absolute destruction at the hands of extreme gravity for everything within a radius of one kilometel. All within was compressed and annihilated. Gloria, too, was caught up in this gravitational hell, unable to let out even a single roar.

Finally, after a time that felt both too short and far too long, the black sphere vanished.

Gloria was nowhere to be seen.

There seemed to be no doubt that the Supergravity Shell had destroyed it.

"We did it..."

"Yes! We won, commander!" The commander was relieved to see that the superweapon that had sat idle for a century was just as powerful as they said, while the young driver couldn't contain his pure joy.

Similar reactions could be heard from the others in this Geist, as well as those in the other Geists.

The apprentices of the Arch Sage were overjoyed, as well. The holy men of Altar were unconscious, but their expressions were peaceful, as if they had been certain of their victory and were dreaming of it now.

"Heheh... We can relax now." The more fearsome the creature, the greater the joy and relief of beating it.

Certain of their victory, of good diplomatic relations between the two countries, and the salvation of Dryfe's future, the commander smiled in satisfaction.

"This means that you should receive a Superior special reward, doesn't it?!" asked the young driver in excitement. The commander nodded, but then raised an eyebrow. "Hm...? But if you did get a special reward, you would know that right away."

He figured it would go to the one manning the weapon, and that disappointed him somewhat. Despite that, he didn't care about it too much. To him, successfully finishing this mission was the greatest reward.

...A reward he had yet to earn.

"C-Commander..." the driver, who'd been cheerful moments ago, now spoke with fear.

"What is it?" the commander asked.

"..." The young one was struck speechless, so instead he simply pointed outside the front window. Feeling a sense of foreboding, the commander opened the Geist's hatch and looked at what was happening outside.

Then, using a pair of binoculars, he scanned the large crater opened up by the extreme compression.

He stared into the hole that was supposed to have been Gloria's grave... and found the eyes of its three heads staring back at him.

"How...?" The binoculars fell from his hands. He couldn't believe the sight — or didn't want to believe it.

"Supergravity Shells compress and annihilate everything...! It couldn't possibly have survived that!" Alas, his words meant little in the face of reality: Gloria was completely unharmed.

It lifted itself into the air on its wings, which had not a single scratch on them, and rose out of the kilometel-deep hole left when the ground had vanished.

After all this, Gloria still walked the continent. The disappearance of the space around it had merely dropped it down a kilometel.

And now, it rose out of the crater as if the unbridled annihilation around it was nothing.

"Th-That was the imperium's strongest weapon! How is it unharmed?!"

"A-Aaahh..." The superweapon of legend, said to have felled even a Mythical-tier monster, did absolutely nothing against Gloria, and this fact left the second armored battalion absolutely shaken.

The Supergravity Shell was so powerful that it was hard to even imagine anything that could survive it. It was undoubtedly a formidable weapon.

However, it didn't work on Gloria whatsoever.

Even ignoring that, the combined power of the unison magic and the rite of divine punishment was also immense — but that, too, did nothing.

This was because they didn't even clear the first step in fighting Gloria.

"...All vehicles, attack! We'll destroy it using standard firepower!" The commander realized that Gloria's survival had left his battalion completely shocked.

"The Supergravity Shell damaged it internally. Our normal attacks will work now!"

That was why he voiced an optimistic assumption that even he didn't believe, just to keep his squad from collapsing.

"S-Sir, yes, sir!"

"Understood!" Following the commander's orders, they began firing at Gloria.

At the same time, the Babylonian Battlegroup resumed their ranged attacks, and the Arch Sage's apprentices joined in as well, resulting in a barrage about twice as powerful as the first one.

But then... the commander realized something he was better off not realizing.

"Do you hear it?" he asked.

"H-Hear what?!" The driver was shaking, clearly too frightened to know what the commander had in mind.

“The sounds of our shells hitting Gloria...”

“I don’t hear them, sir!” Normally, it was impossible to make out something like that out of the mess of sounds made by the explosions, but the commander had a high level in his hearing sense skill and thus perceived much more.

“Yeah! I don’t hear it, either! It’s like not a single one of our shots are landing!”

The sound of the explosions simply wasn’t there.

He heard the impact of their high-explosive projectiles, as well as bursts of magic, but never the sound of armor-piercing bullets hitting it.

That was actually a major hint towards uncovering the secret of Gloria’s defense.

However, such an observation was unnecessary now.

After all, having received all that punishment... “There’s a change in the target’s head!” ...Gloria was now switching to offensive mode.

“Is it the death field we heard about in rumors?! Check our distance from it!”

“It’s still 3,800 metels away! That’s 3.8 times farther than the range of the field, sir!”

“What...?” It had been proven that the area of the death curse didn’t extend past one kilometel.

Thus, it had no means of attacking anything outside of it.

At the very least, it hadn’t used anything like that so far. However...

“It’s not the two-horned head that’s doing something! It’s the one-horn!”

“What?!” Following the report from a different vehicle, the commander used his binoculars to look at the one-horned head to the left.

It had indeed begun to change.

All of its three eyes were now covered by a mobile shell. The horn on its head was shining bright, and it slowly began to open its maw.

It was clearly about to do something.

“...Fire into the one-horned’s mouth!” The chill that went down his spine spurred the commander to shout that order.

Dozens of shells and offensive spells from the other groups hit the head directly. Some caused immense explosions right inside its mouth.

But even that wasn’t enough to faze Gloria.

"F f r R r R r r r R r R r r R r R r r R..."

Eventually, the one-horned head began growling...

"R r r R r r S s s S s s H h E E E E e E w w W w w W w!"

...And spewed out a vast light.

"...?!" The light was enough to make the commander prepare himself for an immense amount of casualties, as well as his own death.

"Hm...?"

However, nothing happened.

There was no change in anything showered by the one-horned head's light. Nothing died, and nothing was burned. It seemed like little more than a flashlight.

"Wh-What? What's happening?" Confused, the commander pondered what to do, and quickly decided to...

"...Leave the light!"

"Eh?"

He immediately ordered the driver and other vehicles to move away.

"We're dealing with a creature that kills all living things just by walking past them! There's no way this is safe!"

"S-Sir, yes, sir!" The driver leaped into action, and the other vehicles followed. They all tried to escape the light as quickly as they could. The light that flooded the area made it hard to tell where it began and ended, but they all relied on each other's silhouettes to try and find their way out.

Eventually, they were free of the light.

"W-We made it!"

"All right! Keep making distan... Hm?" Upon leaving the light, the commander noticed something.

It was a change in the head of Gloria responsible for the light.

The single horn on its head had begun to change color.

"What? What's about to happen?" The pale horn on the dragon's head was turning redder.

And when it became completely red...

"O v E r d R i v E!"

...The thirty-seven Geists that were still within the light evaporated.

In the blink of an eye, both the metal vehicles and the people inside became smoke and scattered, leaving nothing behind.

It was an awfully silent extermination.

The scariest thing about it was that those outside didn't feel the heat at all. It released a level of heat that instantly turned metal into gas, while maintaining complete control over the energy involved that kept the heat contained within the light.

"Th-This is just... you monster!" The commander grieved the loss of the majority of his battalion, but that wasn't even the end of it. Something even more terrible was happening.

"S h A a A a a a A I i i n N E e E!" Gloria roared and began slowly moving the torrent of light.

It swung its all-evaporating heat with the ease of someone directing a flashlight.

Pandemonium.

The surviving battalion as well as the Arch Sage's apprentices were now screaming in terror.

Claymill's barrier did nothing.

Wherever the light passed or touched, it left behind nothing but a brief vapor.

Tanks were consumed mid-retreat. Apprentices vanished while hiding at the edge of their posts, in the middle of their prayers.

There were those who were caught halfway in the light, leaving their other half to crawl around in confusion, dying moments later.

All the holy men were consumed by the light before their consciousness even returned.

As this hell continued, the light approached the commander's vehicle.

"Commander! Commander! Where?! Where do we—?!"

"You can't escape light, damn it..." The driver was panicking, looking for a way out, while the commander had already given up.

He would not survive this, and had no motivation to try.

He had no family, and besides those in this vehicle, the subordinates he'd raised had been taken by the light.

He now had nothing.

Not saying a word, his only worry was that their demise would have a negative, lasting effect on the relationship between Altar and Dryfe.

"Please... at least let both countries survi—" Before he could finish his prayer-like words, the commander evaporated and dissipated into the air.

◇◆

Out of the four groups, the only one that had avoided direct contact with the light was the Babylonian Battlegroup. It was fair to say that they were the only Altarians still standing.

"Captain! This is dangerous! We need to retreat!" insisted one of the members.

Foltesla, however, shook his head, "Retreat where?"

"Where the light won't reach, of course! Oh yeah! We should log out...!"

"Well, that's definitely something we can do. But right over there, in Claymill — our home — you have lots of tians who can't."

There were still many people within the city. The light had washed away the three groups in and out of the barrier outside the city walls, but it hadn't yet reached the city itself. However, if things kept going like this, Claymill would surely fall. The fate of all its inhabitants would be sealed the moment they — the last line of defense — vanished.

Foltesla couldn't tolerate that.

"...Everyone max level or above, come with me," he said. "We'll defeat it at close range."

"But... the field...!"

"I have an idea... And I'll test it by myself."

"C-Captain!" Vanguard that he was, Foltesla charged towards Gloria at supersonic speeds.

It only took him a few seconds to reach the outside of the death barrier, marked by withered plants.

"Let's go, Næ."

"OK, captain!" Næġling instantly became a longsword. Holding her in hand, Foltesla took a step into the deathly field.

If it killed him, too, it would activate the Brooch, and he would instantly leap away.

He clearly pictured how he would have to move to accomplish that, but stepping inside did nothing to him.

"Just as I thought." He took a couple more steps forward, and it didn't look like he was about to die.

Thus, he raised his voice.

"Listen up! This death field works based on level! If yours is high, you won't die!" That was a conclusion based on the info he'd gotten from DIN. Those who were level 500, or Superior Jobs such as himself, hadn't died upon closing in on Gloria.

On the other hand, those who had great stats due to Embryo stat growth bonuses, had died regardless. It had even killed a Mythical UBM.

This insta-death field wasn't based on pure power or lack of it — it only judged whether you were the right level or not.

"Those whose Brooches activate inside the field, back out! The rest of you, come challenge it!" Watching his clan jump into the barrier, Foltesla rushed right next to Gloria.

And, as he passed it by at supersonic speeds... "Thunder Slash!" ...He cut its hind leg with an offensive skill from the swordsman grouping.

To Foltesla, it was a tense few seconds, but time eventually caught up to him, and he saw a line-like cut in the scales that soon began to bleed.

That was the first injury that Gloria had suffered in this battle.

"...I thought that's what it was." Gloria was unharmed even when exposed to crushing compression via supergravity, which meant that this defensive ability wasn't something that could be overcome by pure damage.

At the same time, all the many and varied attacks rained down on it hadn't scratched it either, which meant that this wasn't a type of defense that was keyed to some element or other.

And if it wasn't pure defensive ability or elemental shielding, Foltesla guessed that there had to be some sort of other rule to it.

This rule had defended against all the overwhelming attacks raining down upon it during this battle, and now Foltesla knew that it could only be... "This thing can only be damaged by attacks from within its insta-death field." It rejected the attacks of anyone outside its barrier — the weaklings and cowards who couldn't survive its onslaught. Only those with the power — the level — to survive the insta-death field were granted the chance to enter it and do harm to Gloria.

The role of the barrier was to select those who were worthy of fighting it.

"I know your trick now." More Babylonian Battlegroup members were entering the barrier and attacking Gloria.

As that happened, Foltesla pointed Nægling at Gloria's head — the one-horn that'd evaporated so many people — and declared, "This is the beginning of the real battle between you and us humans.”

Act Three: The Selection of Despair

Some time ago:

Foltesla the Surpassing Blade. The duel ranker who would earn that nickname had started playing Infinite Dendrogram shortly after its release.

He didn't have any special reason for starting the game. He'd only picked it up because it was a hot topic in the media, and he suddenly had a lot of free time after quitting his job recently.

Upon logging in for the first time, all five of his senses were absolutely overwhelmed.

"Realistic" doesn't even begin to describe it, he thought.

Right after arriving at the royal capital of Altea and before his Embryo hatched, he went wherever his legs took him and headed towards the north.

As Foltesla was taking a casual stroll through Noz Forest, he suddenly heard a scream.

By conditioned reflex, he ran straight to the source of the sound, where he found a young lady clutching a basket of herbs and a wolf about to attack her. The "Teal Wolf," as it was called, bared its fangs at the girl and leaped towards her.

"...!" All of a sudden, the only thing between the wolf's fangs and the girl's flesh was Foltesla's sword.

She's in terrible danger, he thought, as his body moved on its own.

The very idea that this was a game — not reality — had completely vanished from his mind. There was only his fear that this girl may die, and his actions were simply a response to that.

After that, Foltesla went on to slay the Teal Wolf, badly injuring himself in the process.

Though these wolves were among the weakest monsters one could encounter, just a single one of them was stronger than level 0, jobless Foltesla. He'd have been lucky just to chase it away.

As Foltesla, tired from the fight, sat down on the ground, the girl asked, worried, "A-Are you okay?"

“Yeah. What about—?”

Mid-sentence, Foltesla finally remembered that he was in Infinite Dendrogram — a game.

For a moment, he reminded himself that she was just an NPC...

“A-Are you okay?! I-I’ll make some medicine right now!” ...But as he watched the worry in her eyes upon seeing his wounds and the care she put into making his medicine, Foltesla simply couldn’t keep thinking of her as nothing but a character in a game.

“This might sting a bit, but it should work right away...!” she said, wrapping the medicine-soaked bandage tightly around Foltesla’s wounds.

He’d disabled the pain settings, so it didn’t sting at all, but he could feel the smell pierce his nose, and pick up the flowery scent wafting off the girl.

As she covered him in medicine and bandages, the two talked.

“I’m sorry,” the girl said. “I’m new to this, so I still can’t make medicine that would heal you right away...”

“It’s okay. Thank you.” Foltesla checked his status summary, then showed it to her.

Relieved that he was healed, she noticed the name on the summary.

“What a relief... Umm... Is your name ‘Foltesla’?”

“...? Oh. Yes.” He wasn’t used to his player name yet, so it took him a moment to remember it.

“Umm... Thank you for saving me!”

“Thank you for the medicine, uhh...” He wanted to thank her, but then he realized that he didn’t know her name.

She realized that, too, and quickly corrected the problem. “I-I’m sorry! My name is Erica. Erica Lansley. I’m a Medicine Worker.”

“I see. Thanks, Erica. I’m Sfor—... I mean, Foltesla,” he re-introduced himself, nearly saying his real name.

That was their beginning: the beginning for a Master and tian who would become husband and wife.

◇◆◇

Claymill the Fortress City, outskirts

Gloria had been completely unharmed by the ultimate attack of a Mythical UBM and countless full-power attacks from tians. Foltesla, however, had figured out the secret behind its apparent immortality and quickly rallied his Babylonian Battlegroup against it, sparking a battle that was intense from the moment it began.

“Shulka! Hold it in place!” Foltesla roared.

“Got it!” the Over Enchanter responded. “Come, Lahmu!”

Shulka’s crest glowed before a vast amount of mud spewed out of it. The overflowing mud quickly became a fifty meter tall, human-shaped giant that stood before Gloria.

Its name was “Guardian Mire, Lahmu,” and it was the Embryo of the Over Enchanter, Shulka — the sub-leader of the Babylonian Battlegroup and sixth in the kingdom’s kill rankings.

“BO-BO-BO.” Large as it was, it was still less than half the size of Gloria, but it charged forward regardless.

Gloria couldn’t miss the mud behemoth approaching it and quickly swung its tail, bristling with four spikes, to slice Lahmu in half diagonally.

“BO.” However, Lahmu was merely a flowing mass of mud, and because of its Physical Attack Negation, the tail had no effect.

Gloria might’ve been a fearsome monster superior even to Mythicals, but nothing could deal physical damage to a creature that negated it. Its Fatal Field wouldn’t work on non-animals, either.

That meant that there was only one thing Gloria had that could make Lahmu vanish.

That thing was the breath of ultimate light... The weapon that had slaughtered all the tians guarding Claymill.

However, Lahmu had been summoned precisely to prevent that.

“BO-BO-BO!” Upon approaching Gloria, Lahmu transformed its body back into mud and crawled up the dragon’s head: specifically, the one-horned one that fired the deadly light. Lahmu quickly wrapped itself around the head... “Great Guardian of Firmness — Lahmu!” ...And, with Shulka’s ultimate skill declaration, compressed and hardened itself.

Lahmu’s ultimate skill turned it into a material harder than even Mythical metal. Normally, it only hardened a part of its mud for use as a weapon, but this time, every last bit of it was instantly petrified.

“...!” Lahmu now acted as something like a dog muzzle or a prisoner’s mask. Gloria’s one-horned head could neither open its jaws or emit its deadly light. It tried to break the restraint with its immense STR ranking in the tens of thousands, but even that couldn’t easily destroy a creature that was as hard as Mythical metal.

It came at the cost of all the power of a sixth-form Embryo, but the light of the zenith was now completely sealed.

“You’ve got it!” Foltesla cried.

“Yes,” nodded Shulka. “But it seems that anything that went inside its mouth evaporated, so I can’t finish it off.”

The closed maw kept the heat inside, preventing Lahmu from going in and killing it from within.

“That’s all right. Focus on keeping it bound.”

“Very well. I’ll focus the single-target buffs on Lahmu, then cast the area buffs in order.”

The Over Enchanter’s passive skill, “One and All Enchanting,” let Shulka simultaneously use single-target and area buffs at the same time. Thus, it was possible for him to put the single-target END buffs on Lahmu to keep the binding strong, while at the same time using area stat buffs to increase the abilities of his clan members.

“All right...” Foltesla said before charging Gloria again, now buffed.

His attacks were powerful now, and not just because of Shulka’s buffs. It was also due to Næġling’s self-enhancement.

The skill that Næġling had possessed from the very beginning was called “Over Chaser,” which increased Foltesla’s stats by (skill level x 10%), provided the corresponding stat was higher on the enemy he was fighting.

In her sixth form, Næġling’s skill level was 6, which meant that all of Foltesla’s stats except AGI — in which he was already above Gloria — were increased by an impressive 60%.

The two enhancements added up, giving him impressive stats even for a Superior Job, and supreme offensive ability against Gloria.

“It has some strong defenses... But it’s nothing an active skill can’t break,” Foltesla muttered as he cut into Gloria’s tough scales.

He wasn’t the only one fighting, though. All of the Babylonian Battlegroup’s elite, also buffed by Shulka, were attacking Gloria now as well.

“We can do it... We’re damaging it!”

“Watch out for the tail! It deals more damage than its legs!”

“We know that, Riser!” There were even rankers among the Masters, and they fought against the dragon without showing the slightest intention to retreat. They were daring and resolute indeed, and little by little their damage began to add up.

However... the dragon’s HP was going down too slowly.

“We lack the numbers, don’t we?” Still fighting, Foltesla looked over the clan members within the barrier. Even with himself and Shulka included, their number didn’t exceed twelve. Two parties — only about 5% — of all the members present were even able to participate.

The players here were all level 500 or above, and Foltesla already knew that was what allowed them to stand in the field.

Attaining level 500 was actually very difficult for Masters. Besides Superior Jobs, the only ones that could reach it were those who’d maxed out all their low and high-rank jobs. However, it was extremely common for people who’d hit max level to be unsatisfied with their builds and reset unneeded jobs to get new ones. It was also a way of experimenting, in the hopes that they would discover the conditions for unlocking Superior Jobs.

This was especially true in the Babylonian Battlegroup, which was the second strongest clan in the kingdom and was fully focused on battle. Most were in the middle of leveling new jobs, and thus only the aforementioned twelve qualified to enter the field.

In addition to that, the party compositions weren’t all that good, either. There wasn’t a single person who focused on a job in the priest grouping. One might say that the only reason they were able to put up such a good fight was that Shulka — a Superior Job from the support-focused enchanter grouping — was a central figure among them.

To fully prepare to fight Gloria, you needed at least a few dozen max-level Masters. That was the reason why the rushing rankers had been defeated. And if not that, you needed people who were above maxed-out — Superior Jobs.

I see... Foltesla thought. So this is what this thing is all about.

As he fought, he finally figured out the concept behind Gloria.

As a storied fighter and leader of the Babylonian Battlegroup, Foltesla had fought many UBMs, and by now, he knew that the majority of them had some sort of theme behind them.

Some would regenerate endlessly until you dealt with their weak spot.

Some would absorb the life force of nearby animals to grow stronger.

Some would nest in an advantageous spot and simply attack from there.

Design concepts like that applied to most UBMs.

And just now, Foltesla had figured out Gloria's concept.

This thing specializes in "selection," he concluded. You could see it in the many powers it'd used so far.

The Fatal Field selected those who were of high enough level.

The negation of all damage from outside the field prevented people of lower level from joining the battle at all.

The light breath selected those who could escape before it became deadly... Basically, anyone fast and decisive enough.

All of them were powers that selected the powerful and filtered out the weak.

...It does make sense for what it is, though, Foltesla thought. If you looked at Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, as an endgame raid boss from a traditional MMORPG, it made a lot of sense. You had to fight it over and over so you could figure out its special qualities, weaknesses, and action patterns before you could fully prepare yourself and beat it to receive an immense reward.

In a way, it was a very "complete" boss monster.

"But... there's no time for repeat runs!" A vast number of tians had already died, and they would never come back.

If they lost to it over and over, the kingdom would fall, even if the Masters themselves didn't.

And considering the fact that the Babylonian Battlegroup was the last barrier standing between Gloria and their hometown of Claymill, they couldn't afford to lose even once.

"We'll finish it, here and now!" Foltesla shouted.

"YEAH!" the others cheered.

"We have a chance." To Masters that could enter the Fatal Field, the only dangerous things were Gloria's stats and light breath, but the latter had been sealed by Lahmu.

And though its stats, such as the STR that could kill in one hit, were intimidating... "We can just dodge all the attacks!" Foltesla was third in the duel rankings, and the other Masters had plenty of fights under their belts, as well. With their AGI buffed by Shulka, they used their stats and experience to avoid the storm of claws and tail.

"Gloria's STR and END are great, but its AGI isn't even supersonic," Foltesla said. "As long as we watch out for its tail and claws, it won't be hard to avoid its attacks."

A single mistake meant certain doom here, but as the rival of the Over Gladiator, he was familiar with these kinds of situations. It was dangerous, but as of yet, not a single one of the twelve Babylonian Battlegroup members had died. In fact, they were starting to gain the upper hand.

Their MP and SP was limited, of course, but the members outside the barrier could keep them charged using their support skills. They would fight with all their might, run out of MP or SP, rush to the edge of the field to fill up, rinse and repeat.

If things continued like this, victory was in their grasp. The moment they felt certain of that...

"Ah...!"

...Gloria was attacked from an unexpected direction.

It dealt damage, so it was clearly from inside the monster's field, but the ones responsible weren't part of the Babylonian Battlegroup.

"Captain! It's those parties and clans that were watching from a distance! They—"

"Found out how to beat it and decided to take advantage of our fight, huh?" It was actually a number of parties and clans, and all maxed-out, skilled players who jumped in to attack Gloria.

Some attacked Gloria with AoE attacks, not caring if they damaged other Masters. There were also some who targeted Masters specifically.

The Babylonian Battlegroup members outside the field had tried to stop them, but they were caught off-guard and did not manage to succeed.

"Build up your damage! We gotta be the MVP!"

"Crush the others, too! Keep those AoEs coming!" Their actions were, in some ways, reasonable. Everyone gathered here was after a Superior special reward. By default, it was "every team for itself" — or perhaps even "every man for himself."

"Can't expect any cooperation here," Foltesla scowled and rang out as he cut down one of his attackers.

At first glance, it looked like they now had more people on their side, but everyone was trampling over each other in their rush for the merit needed to become MVPs.

To the Babylonian Battlegroup, who fought cooperatively, this clearly made the fight more difficult.

"...Rabe, Hanzaki, tank for Shulka," said Foltesla. "If he dies, Lahmu will disappear."

"Got it!" the two responded and went to defend the key individual here.

If Shulka vanished, the one-horn would wipe out all the Masters here with its light breath.

"At least the amount of incoming damage increased," Foltesla muttered. Gloria was clearly taking more damage than it had been when only his clan were fighting it.

As things were, chances were high that it would lose all its life in this hectic battle.

"Hm...?" However, Foltesla noticed something.

It wasn't the sealed-off one-horn, or the barrier-holding two-horn.

The central head that had been dormant until now was now beginning to open its eyes.

"Ah...!" At that moment, a strange feeling ran down his spine. It was impossible to tell whether it was due to his vast experience as a fighter or his nature as a Maiden's Master who saw this world as real, but it was most definitely an ice-cold chill.

It was a sign that something terrible was about to happen.

"...Næ," he said.

"I know, captain," his blade replied, feeling what he did. "That needs to be dealt with right away."

A prolonged battle certainly wasn't the way to go with this creature.

Gloria was a being that forced its opponents to be strong through selection. There was no way that extended battle and attrition would work on it... that approach was too focused on quantity, rather than quality.

There had to be something. This monster had to have something that would render any attempts at prolonged battle useless.

Foltesla believed that they had to beat it before it could activate whatever that was.

"...We'll use the ultimate."

"Okay! I'll go all-out!"

"Yeah. I'm counting on you." Næġling in hand, Foltesla dashed forward.

Ignoring the many attacks the Masters were launching at Gloria, he closed in on it once again.

However, he was caught up in the smoke from an explosion spell. Gloria growled and swung its four-spiked tail, aiming it directly at Foltesla.

He avoided it with a quick leap, but Næġling was still within its trajectory. The tail was Gloria's greatest means of attack now that its breath had been sealed, and it could easily break an Embryo in its sixth form.

Thus, on the moment of contact, Næġling shattered.

"That's what...!"

"We've been waiting for!" Foltesla grinned like a war-demon, and Næġling giggled before...

"The One Who Overcomes — Næġling!" ...They spoke the name of the skill.

The next moment, a dazzling light extended from the broken sword, recreating the shattered blade with pure light.

He aimed the blade at Gloria's tail and activated a skill, "Over Edge!"

The next moment, the size of Næġling's light grew, becoming longer than the diameter of the dragon's giant tail.

Foltesla then matched its movements, set the blade against it... and sliced through it as easily as a knife through butter.

"...!?" Gloria's defense required the use of active skills to break through it.

What made it so easy for Næġling to overcome was her ultimate skill.

The One Who Overcomes — Næġling.

It was an ultimate skill that activated upon her destruction.

First, it would recreate the blade out of light for ten minutes.

At the same time, it added the destroyer's defense to Foltesla's attack, offense to his defense, and AGI to his AGI — a retaliatory ultimate skill.

That meant as long as the skill was active, Foltesla had an attack power that could always break through the opponent's defense, defensive power that they could never overcome, and speed that was always greater than theirs.

The skill's duration was limited, but in a one-on-one, this would always place Foltesla above his opponent.

"ShoUOooOoOEeeEAaAaaAAAAaaAHHhHh!?" The shock of losing its tail caused Gloria to roar in pain for the first time.

However, Foltesla didn't stop there.

Gripping the blade that had now returned to its original size, he ran up Gloria's back and, once at the base of its wings, unleashed the ultimate job skill of the King of Swords.

"Sword Avalanche!" It was a barrier of blades — a sword-storm slashing all around him at twice the speed of sound.

A weaker blade would have definitely shattered from the force of this relentless attack. However, as she was now, Næġling could bear it.

Thus, the sword avalanche cut down the two wings growing out of Gloria's back before tearing open a giant hole in its body, dealing immense damage.

It had destroyed Gloria's heart through its back.

"..."

Losing a critical organ made Gloria's balance waver. Neither the Babylonian Battlegroup nor any duel rankers missed this brief flash of weakness. At this moment, they would unleash everything they had.

"Disintegrating Bow of Divine Lightning — INDRAAAAA!"

"Thousand-Arm Earth-Shaking Fist — Avalokiteśvara."

"Storm-Man Who Blows Away All Evil — Hermod... RISER KIIIIIIIIIIICK!" An arrow of compressed thunderclouds, continuous blows from fists that seemed to number in the thousands, and a supersonic spinning kick all struck Gloria.

Seeing the opportunity, the surrounding Masters also focused their attacks on the dragon.

In that moment, firepower that surpassed even the rite of divine punishment overwhelmed Gloria's body.

Foltesla leapt off Gloria's back to avoid being caught up in it. And even if he wasn't forced back, using Sword Avalanche had rendered him unable to move his arm for a minute, so he couldn't keep attacking anyway.

"Captain! Are you okay!?" asked a Babylonian Battlegroup member who ran up to him.

"I'm fine," Foltesla responded. "I'll attack it again the second the side-effect wears off."

"...So it still isn't over yet?"

"Yeah. I destroyed its heart, but that just slowed it down. It's probably a core-type, and the core is probably in one of the heads, or in all three of them."

Normally, destroying the heart was enough to kill most creatures. But if the creature had a core that ruled over the other organs, the heart was little more than a piece of flesh.

And Foltesla guessed that Gloria had three cores — one for each head.

"...The side-effect's gone now," he said. "I'll go get its head."

"Be careful. Hm...?"

The clan member that was seeing him off was blinking rapidly.

It was because a light was shining into his eyes.

After a moment that was like staring at dawn or directly into a flashlight... his head vanished.

"Huh...!?" After seeing that, Foltesla looked up at Gloria. What he saw reminded him of the disco balls from the nightclubs of a few decades ago.

Gloria was releasing light from its entire body.

There was no telling when this began, but it seemed like the wounds the Masters had dealt to Gloria had transformed into toothless mouths, all of which were releasing light. The one-horn was still bound by Lahmu, but the horn peeking out was shining red, just like when it had evaporated the tians.

"...! This has gotta be it!" Foltesla became certain that this was the source of his fears.

Gloria, now covered in wounds-turned-mouths, was twisting its body, sweeping up the surrounding Masters. The range of the blasts from the wounds was shorter than the ones from the main mouth, but that didn't mean much to the Masters it caught.

They survived for a moment thanks to their Brooches before expiring in the light.

It felt like a bad joke — the Masters that were dominating the fight were now being simply swept away.

That included the non-maxed-out Babylonian Battlegroup Masters who were providing support from outside the field.

Foltesla himself was able to avoid the light with his skillful movements, but...

"Ah...! SHULKA!"

"Captain, I'm sor—" The light show evaporated Shulka, the sub-leader of the Babylonian Battlegroup and the Master of Lahmu.

"BO..." A moment later, Lahmu vanished, freeing the one-horn and unleashing the first and strongest source of deadly light.

The source that, unlike the wounds, could fire all the way to Claymill.

Most of the surrounding Masters were gone, so Gloria stopped releasing light from its entire body.

Instead, the one-horned head opened its maw and aimed straight at Claymill.

"Not yet...!" The very next moment, Foltesla charged towards the head at supersonic speeds.

He got on it right before it fired and... "Over Edge! Sword Avalanche!" ...ran in to destroy the one-horned head using his ultimate job skill, right after expanding the size of his blade.

True to its name, the attack was like an unrelenting avalanche. It shattered the face cover on its head, split the right eyelid, cut the eye, and nearly reached within the skull when Næġling's blade of light shattered.

Foltesla gasped. "H-How? This just...!" Neither he nor Næġling could believe it.

After all, there was only one opponent who could withstand Foltesla's blade after he had used his ultimate skill.

Regardless, the reality was that the blade had broken upon reaching the bone.

This couldn't be right. His offense should've been above Gloria's defense.

There was only one reasonable explanation for this...

"Its stats increased...!" Foltesla now knew.

While Næġling's ultimate skill was active, there were only two ways the target opponent could have a defense greater than her offense. Either it was some special defensive ability that had nothing to do with stats, or the target's stats had increased after the ultimate skill was executed and copied the stats onto Foltesla.

Foltesla had fought Figaro many times, and he knew that he could lose even with his ultimate skill active due to the lion's ability to grow stronger as the battle progressed.

He suddenly felt a gaze on him. He turned and wondered how long it had been like this.

The third head, the one that had been dormant since the start, now had its eyes completely open.

Seemingly bored, the three-horned head stared at Foltesla, who was still on top of the one-horn.

If Gloria was indeed specialized in selection...

The barrier selected the powerful, while the breath of radiant death selected the quick and decisive...

So wouldn't it make sense for it to have a power that would allow it to select the strongest among the strong?

"Not yet...!" Foltesla stood up and brandished his sword. Even if his Næġling had broken and the opponent had become stronger, Foltesla wouldn't stop fighting.

Maybe he wasn't a man of true strength who could make it past Gloria's third selection. But even so, he had something he wanted to protect with his blade.

Gloria would soon fire its breath of light.

If that happened, Claymill would be done for.

Erica — Foltesla's wife — would die.

As a Maiden's Master, he couldn't tolerate that. This world was real, after all. She was real.

"N-NO! I WON'T LET YOU DO THIS!" Næġling had shattered and vanished, so he used Instant Equip to take out and brandish his spare weapon — a greatsword forged from a Mythical metal.

He struck Gloria again and again, even if it meant breaking his blade. He had to shatter the core at all costs. His grip on the handle was so tight his palms began to bleed. He didn't even stop attacking when the bones in his wrist began to crack.

Gloria didn't stop, either.

The horn soon began to shine, and its mouth began to overflow with light. The all-extinguishing radiance shambled towards Claymill.

"No...! ERI—!" Suddenly, the wound Foltesla had made on the head became another mouth.

And he, too, was engulfed by the torrent of light.

Nothing could withstand that. Even the Mythical greatsword melted to liquid, dripping down on Gloria as Foltesla and all he'd tried to protect vanished within the light.

◆◇

After the battle, there was neither a fortress nor a city. The only things left were Gloria's own severed wings.

The city had evaporated, leaving only the foundations. The people had evaporated as well.

Claymill the Fortress City had fallen. There were no survivors.

The battle had simply ended in a bitter flash of light...

Interlude: At the Royal Castle

Royal Capital, Altea

Three days had passed since Claymill's destruction.

News had spread across the continent that the Arch Sage's apprentices, the holy men of Altar's church, the imperium's second armored battalion, and the Babylonian Battlegroup had all suffered a staggering defeat against Gloria.

With Claymill the Fortress City gone, nothing now stood in Gloria's way.

The evacuation of the capital's inhabitants had accelerated, the price of food and clothing skyrocketed, conflict increased, medical facilities suffered a shortage of healers due to the lack of holy men... it was equivalent to a full-scale war. Gloria itself was far from the only thing the capital's knights had to deal with.

All this chaos demanded leadership for the knights, but their commander, Celestial Knight, Langley Grandria, was simply floating above the royal castle.

He was sitting on Gold Thunder — the national treasure loaned to him — and looking not at the town below the castle, but towards the northwest... the direction Gloria was approaching from.

Gloria itself was still nowhere in sight.

Three days after Claymill's destruction meant that it was now a week after Gloria's initial appearance at Lightning Dragon Mountain.

It ought to have arrived at the capital by now.

The only reason it hadn't was all the damage inflicted by the Babylonian Battlegroup, the other Masters on the scene, and King of Swords, Foltesla.

Though Gloria wasn't killed and could still fight just as well, all the damage it sustained, especially the lost heart, forced it to spend a whole day fixing its wounds. It had also lost its wings, which didn't regenerate, so it was now a day behind schedule.

Even so, Gloria would arrive at the capital tomorrow and engulf it in its Fatal Field.

"...I must face it," Langley muttered. It had since been revealed that Fatal Field wasn't fatal to everyone. Those of level 500 and above could survive it and fight the dragon.

It was also known that Gloria couldn't be harmed by anyone outside the field. That was information that the members of the Babylonian Battlegroup fervently spread throughout Infinite Dendrogram and even outside of it. The conditions for fighting it were now known, and, for better or worse, Langley met them. He had the power to fight for and protect his kingdom.

"Let us move, Thunder."

He steeled his resolve and prepared himself to ride Gold Thunder towards the northwest, into the Nowest Canyon where Gloria could be found, but stopped when someone grabbed his shoulder and said, "Wait, Sir Grandria. There is no need to rush."

This rather surprised him, seeing as he was high up in the air, and he quickly turned to see a man standing in midair using his absurdly precise control of wind magic. There was only one person capable of that: one of Altar's Superior Jobs, which Langley named with his next words. "Mr. Arch Sage..."

He'd served the kingdom for over a century, but no one even knew his name. He only went by "Arch Sage," and that was what people called him. The old man's origins were a mystery, but he had been an Altarian court magician for generations, and always used the wisdom he'd gathered to advise and tutor its leaders, which had made him a highly trusted figure here.

"There are a few things I would like to say, but first and foremost, you will not solve the problem if you go alone. It would only waste our battle potential too early, and you could not do much besides buy a little time. If I were the one heading out, it would be exactly the same."

"Not even you can best it?"

"Oh yes. And if I summoned a meteor within the field, I would endanger myself, as well."

In an off-hand manner, the Arch Sage brought up his most powerful spell — a meteorite summon. However, he immediately changed his tone.

"It would be different if I still had my apprentices... What a grave loss."

"Mr. Arch Sage..." All of his apprentices had died in the battle at Claymill. The Arch Sage's expression was that of a teacher who had lost all his students, and Langley felt sympathy for him.

However, his feelings were a bit misplaced.

The Arch Sage did feel that their deaths were a loss... but he didn't regret them for a moment.

"That Gloria creature, though..." said the old man. "Thanks to the sacrifices that were made, we now know how it functions, and it is indeed a fearsome monster... I wonder how the remaining forces of the kingdom can even fight it."

The kingdom had already deployed and lost nearly as much as it could afford to give.

There were still the knights, but the only ones among them who could survive Gloria's Fatal Field were Langley and the vice-commander of the Royal Guard. Even with the Arch Sage joining them, it wouldn't be enough.

Besides them, the kingdom had another tian who could be an immensely powerful addition to the group, but sadly, that tian was not yet level 500.

"It is futile. At the very least, tians alone cannot win this," said the Arch Sage.

"So not even you know a way to defeat it?" Langley asked. The question made the Arch Sage fall silent.

Finding that strange, Langley called out to him, "Mr. Arch Sage?"

"...Oh, my apologies. I was simply racking this old brain to remember something, but came up with nothing. How embarrassing. And here I am, supposedly this great fountain of wisdom," he said as he returned from his trip through his own thoughts with a wry grin, then took out a pocket watch. "More importantly... Sir Grandria, it's almost time for the negotiations. Knowing who we are dealing with, I humbly believe it is best if you participate as well."

In less than an hour, the king would be negotiating with a certain someone. Langley hadn't planned to attend, but the Arch Sage was right about the other party. I should be ready to protect Eldor, he thought, before saying, "Very well. I will go and guard him. What of you?"

"I will stay here in the wind's embrace and lose myself in thought. Perhaps I shall happen upon a solution. Oh, but do not worry. I will be there for the negotiations."

After seeing off Langley, the Arch Sage looked to the northwest again.

His train of thought went as follows...

Would Superweapon No. 3... Would Acra-Vasta be able to handle it? No... it should not be complete yet. However, the base functions should be ready to go. Perhaps Acra would survive it...? No. No it would not. The monster breathes light. The distance created by Space Dilution means nothing against that, and Vasta's Mutual Repair would be quickly exhausted. And since attacks from outside the set range do nothing, their kinetic energy bombs would be useless, as well.

He was thinking about Langley's question — the means of defeating Gloria. However, there was a major problem with that.

It was the name "Acra-Vasta" itself

Acra-Vasta was a superweapon being secretly constructed within some uncovered pre-ancient civilization ruins. Even the Arch Sage shouldn't have been able to discover anything about it.

No. 5... Beldrion would have had a better chance against it, but it was destroyed by the King of Kings and The Lynx over six hundred years ago. Using No. 1 is not an option, while No. 2 and 4... are no longer under my control.

The man calling himself Arch Sage sighed, then looked up at the sky.

No matter. Gloria is just another pawn of the incarnations... Between this and the recent increase in Masters... inferior incarnations... it appears that now, after two millennia, they are approaching their endgame.

That thought made him change his expression.

This new expression was ugly, and seemed to contain both pure hatred towards a sworn enemy and the sheer joy of eventually bringing him down.

Worse comes to worst, this body of mine might wither; I will simply focus on gathering more data. It is of no consequence. We still have a spare... The "we" of the next generation... already exists.

Thinking that, the man who'd hid his name from the world and went by only his job returned to the castle he'd been nesting in for over a century.

◇◆◇

Royal Capital, Altea, Royal Audience Hall

As Gloria's arrival came ever closer, certain negotiations were reaching their end. The parties involved were the king, Eldor Zeo Altar, and... "Okiedokie. My darlings and I will fight Gloria, too."

...the leader of The Lunar Society, High Priestess, Fuso Tsukuyo.

"So The Lunar Society will help in the fight against Gloria? How reassuring," said the king.

"Yes indeed," Tsukuyo nodded. "We got lots of people who can survive Gloria's field, so you can be sure we'll be useful."

Her response calmed Eldor's nerves.

Thus far, negotiations with The Lunar Society hadn't gone well, mostly because he couldn't contact Tsukuyo. Now that he finally had, it seemed to be going smoothly.

With Gloria only one day away, they couldn't manage without the help of The Lunar Society — the kingdom's largest and strongest clan.

"Thank you," said the king. "I am in your de—"

"But only if all the royalty sign this Contract." However, it would come at a price.

"This is...? Ah...!" Tsukuyo presented him a Contract of the highest quality — the kind that instantly granted death to anyone who violated it. Knowing that full well, she had still demanded the entire royal family sign it. Eldor went on to read the conditions of the contract and...

"'A prohibition on all use of the kingdom's authority to suppress the actions of the Lunar Society?'" he read aloud.

"It's basically a written guarantee — an agreement to never suppress or harm The Lunar Society no matter how big we get."

Essentially, she wanted him to grant them complete freedom as a religious group. The Lunar Society was currently growing at staggering rates. It was far above a thousand strong, and that included both believers from reality as well as tians.

The speed of their growth would be menacing to any politician.

Even if everything seemed fine now, there was a chance that it may grow into a terrible cancer upon the kingdom. The chances of the kingdom dismantling the clan were low, but it was entirely possible that they would've begun to limit it, and Tsukuyo brought out this Contract to prevent that.

"Oh, it also says that the Contract would be null and void if The Lunar Society committed acts of terror or got involved in criminal activity. Otherwise, we would be able to do whatever we wanted. Though, in exchange for that, we will also be given the freedom to accept or refuse any other requests from the country."

"But that means that..." ...It would become impossible for the kingdom to bind this dangerously powerful entity in any way. Signing this basically meant trading the elimination of a current threat for a dangerous future.

"You wouldn't interfere with our religious activities and wouldn't force us to do something we don't want as long as we don't engage in criminal activity. That's all. Nothing big, right?"

Tsukuyo Fuso, sly fox that she was, demanded this despite knowing all of that full well.

The king wouldn't have to give anything. As long as the contract was unbroken, no one would be harmed. It came at no immediate cost, but it would enable them to deal with the imminent threat.

The conditions seemed truly fair, but it made the king feel as though his head was caught between the jaws of a fox.

"And what if we try to force you to act before signing this contract?" asked the Arch Sage.

"We'll respond with terrorism," Tsukuyo instantly replied.

The words made the audience restless, with some of them beginning to berate her.

"Before the contract is signed, we can go ahead and engage in religious terrorism if we want... And we are well prepared for that."

Those words made everyone fall silent.

"Wh-What are you saying?" asked the king.

"Right now, I have Kage's special forces hiding within every major city in Altar." Special forces led by King of Assassins, Eishiro Tsukikage.

Their specializations and goals were obvious.

"Besides that, I could cover the capital in my night, then have Kage follow it up with Erlkönig... You know what would happen, don't you?" Everyone present knew the powers of Tsukuyo Fuso and her most trusted aide.

Tsukikage was a limited wide-scale extermination specialist, while Tsukuyo was a wide-scale suppression type who greatly expanded those limits. It was easy to see that the capital would fall if they unleashed their combined power upon it.

"Please don't...!" the king pleaded.

"You don't have to ask. I'd only have them act if the kingdom tried to force us to cooperate. That's why you have three options," Tsukuyo said as she raised up three fingers. "You either sign the Contract and get our cooperation, don't sign the Contract and try to take care of it some other way, or try to force us to do what you want and face utter destruction."

After naming the three things, Tsukuyo smiled proudly and waited for an answer.

"...You are a monster," said one of the nobles in the audience. "Control yourself!" said another.

However, none of this had fouled Tsukuyo's mood whatsoever. In fact, her smile actually widened to an inhuman degree; she tilted her head slightly and said "You're asking for my help exactly because I am as dangerous as a monster, no? Anyway, what do you say, Your Majesty? Will you sign it? Or not?"

Eldor hesitated for a good moment before deciding to sign it.

Thus, the peaceful negotiations ended, and it was decided that the kingdom's largest clan would participate in the fight against Gloria.

Act Four: Figaro’s Choice

Gideon the Duel City, Central Arena

The Central Arena. A lone man sat on top of the building that looked much like the Roman Colosseum.

Not saying a word, he — the kingdom’s duel champion, Over Gladiator, Figaro — was looking towards the northwest. Caressed by the wind, he wore a sorrowful expression — one unlike those he usually displayed.

In his mind, he held the image of the powerful monster beyond the horizon, which would soon attack the capital.

But at the same time, he was looking back at the past — specifically, a certain meeting that had occurred over three years ago.

◇

The real Figaro... Vincent Myers... was born with a rare, unusual, and painful heart condition. Its most obvious symptoms were the life-threatening spasms that occurred whenever his heart rate climbed too high.

He was born to a wealthy household and received the best treatment possible from infancy onward, but the disease stayed with him all the way to adulthood. Not even a heart transplant could relieve the symptoms of his condition.

But although he was born into an unfortunate body, he was blessed with a wonderful family.

“Live your life to the fullest,” his father said once. “We’ll do whatever we can to help you with that.”

“We’re your parents, after all,” his mother added. “We love you, Vince.”

It had been years since he heard those words, but he could still remember them clearly.

His younger brother, Keith, was supportive as well. “I’ll do my best in your stead,” he resolutely said once.

Vincent appreciated his wonderful family. But at the same time, he couldn’t help but feel that he wasn’t truly happy.

He could never feel the rush of running through open fields. Excessive activity put a strain on his heart, limiting his movement to short walks. The simple act of running was life-threatening to him.

His heart would never race in satisfaction. An accelerated heartbeat could be deadly to him, so he couldn’t even allow himself to be moved.

He once couldn’t even finish watching an opera he attended with his family, as he was overcome by a sudden spasm.

Despite this, his life was comfortable. He was provided for, but had no real reason to hope for the future, either. For as long as he could remember, he would only read relaxing books, watch the scenery, eat, think, sleep, and just... coast through life.

His life was more like a plant’s than a human, and he had never truly felt the vitality within him. He never had the opportunity to go all-out. He never felt the flame of excitement or the lively throbbing of his heart.

Vincent Myers’ life was gentle, but extremely isolated.

All that changed when Keith gifted him Infinite Dendrogram.

“This is a VRMMO! The real deal!” he said, handing the hardware to Vincent. Keith explained that it transported the mind to the virtual world, leaving the flesh unaffected, which meant that Vincent wouldn’t have to worry about heart spasms due to over-excitement.

At first, Vincent doubted that such a thing could really exist. It seemed like something straight out of science fiction. He also thought that even if the game’s promises were true, it was still a game — even if he could move around freely, it would all be fake.

“Hm...” But even if it was all just a game, he believed that it might be better than the reality with his limited body. With that in mind, he began Infinite Dendrogram and found a realm that was as close to real as you could get.

It wasn’t just an extremely realistic game, but a world where he could actually live his life to the fullest. It was here that he could experience excitement for the first time in his life.

After naming himself “Figaro” — from the opera he couldn’t finish watching with his family — he descended upon Infinite Dendrogram and quickly discovered how he would spend his life in it.

What enchanted him the most were the duels.

In reality, his disease made him unable to even watch sports; but as an avatar, he had no issue with it.

The first duel he saw was shortly after Infinite Dendrogram's release, so there were no Master participants, but the scene of tian gladiators fighting still moved him greatly. The all-out clash between lives thrilled his virtual heart far beyond the capacity of his real one. He was looking at something that he couldn't even hope to have in the real world. Following the duel, he quickly went through the process to become a Gladiator.

Thus, Figaro the Gladiator was born.

His first month within Infinite Dendrogram was certainly an eventful one.

He'd encountered Shu, fought his first UBM, switched his country from Legendaria to Altar, and arrived at Gideon's Central Arena for the first time.

It was there that he was first able to participate in duels.

Maxing out Gladiator — a low-rank job — put him at level 50, giving him the right to become a duelist, and he quickly went to the Central Arena's reception to register.

The fact that he'd finally be able to actually participate in the duels that had so moved him when he'd first entered this world was immensely exciting to him. So much, in fact, that he signed up for a match on the very same day.

His goal was to join the top 30 duel rankers, among all the thousands of combatants. Figaro clenched his fist in anticipation for the many days of dueling to come.

At that moment, he noticed that the person next to him was making a similar motion.

The two looked at each other. The other person was a Swordsman with a red-haired girl at his side.

Figaro looked at the papers the receptionist was handling and realized that he, too, had just signed up. They both just went to their own waiting rooms without saying a word to each other.

But when it was their turn to go to the stage, they both realized that they would be facing the man they had just run into at reception. This wasn't quite as much of a coincidence as it seemed. They both had just registered, they both wanted their first duel, and their level was about the same. In fact, since matchmaking preferred opponents of the same level, this was an obvious outcome.

"Fight!" Following the call, their duel commenced.

Compared to duels between top rankers, theirs was surely unimpressive. Both were low level and their Embryos were still low-rank, so there was no way their duel would ever be one for the history books.

However, they both fought with intense zeal. During the entire duel, it was never once clear which one would win and how. Both of them were giving it their all and using whatever they had to achieve victory over their opponent.

But in the end, they were both scarred all over, and it still wasn't clear which one of them had emerged victorious.

However, they both felt that this had been the most fun duel they ever had.

"I'm Foltesla, and this is Næġling," the opponent introduced himself right after, extending his right hand.

"I'm Figaro... That was a good match, wasn't it?" Figaro said as he took the hand.

"Let's fight again!" they both insisted simultaneously.

It was obvious that this match made them both feel the exact same way.

Thus, the two became the closest of friends... and rivals.

Their first duel against one another was far from the last. They continued rising up the ranks, piling wins and losses against each other, and their rivalry continued after both entered the top 30 rankers.

Eventually, Figaro defeated Tom Cat — the wall to every Altarian duelist — and became the best out of thousands of duel participants... the duel champion.

Even so, he didn't believe that this was the end of his and Foltesla's rivalry.

The top three could only be fought in order, so Foltesla couldn't face Figaro in a ranked match until he defeated Tom.

However, Figaro believed that Foltesla would do it someday, and they would face each other in the arena again.

He was completely certain that the rematch was close.

But now, Figaro could no longer tell just how imminent — or distant — it really was.

◇

“Yoo. You don’t look too good todaay.”

The voice he heard cut off Figaro’s reminiscence.

“...Tom.” It was a fellow duel ranker: specifically, the previous champion and the current second in the rankings — The Lynx, Tom Cat.

“What’s wroong...? Wait, don’t tell mee. It’s obviouus...” Figaro didn’t say a word in return.

Not minding it, Tom continued, “Gloria, riight? You’re wondering how to fight it, aren’t youu?”

“...That’s not it,” said Figaro. “And... I can’t fight it even if I wanted to.”

“Hm?” Tom tilted his head.

He thought about it for a second, then found an answer by simply remembering Figaro’s nature.

It wasn’t clear whether Figaro realized this or not, but he continued. “Gloria is... very strong. I know that better than ever now that I’ve looked at the data leaked by the Babylonian Battlegroup.”

After their defeat at Claymill, the Babylonian Battlegroup revealed all that they’d learned about Gloria on their website. The members who couldn’t participate in the battle went online the very same day and gave the info to informants like DIN and other media companies. This, of course, was met with a lot of anger from the rankers who were hiding such information. The Babylonian Battlegroup could have also kept it to themselves and gone for a rematch with a greater chance of emerging victorious and becoming MVPs. However, instead, they spread the info as far as possible with the hopes that someone would defeat Gloria as quickly as possible... that might’ve been their leader’s last wish.

“No offense to you, Tom, but Gloria is immeasurably stronger than anything or anyone I’ve fought so far.”

“Hey, you’re not wrong. I know way too well that I have no chance against it as I am now. That monster is probably meant to be fought by several Superiors at once. If you wanna beat it, you need to team up with other Superiors... or people like Foltesla.”

“But...”

“Yep. That’s impossible for you.”

Figaro nodded in response.

This was another face of the disease he had been born with.

Because of his illness, he'd spent his entire life doing nothing, and with nobody. This left him without the most basic of social skills.

He had never played with other children when he was young, nor had he ever teamed up with someone for a sport in class. Until he'd entered Infinite Dendrogram, he'd never actually done anything significant with someone else.

He knew what cooperation was, but that was the extent of it.

When it came to actually cooperating with someone — to fighting as a party — his brain would instantly shut down because he was so unused to the experience. His reactions would become considerably worse, and he even once failed a quest because of it.

Figaro himself knew this too well.

He didn't have the fundamental skills necessary to actually cooperate with anyone. The nearly twenty years of stagnant, solitary life he'd lived had become shackles that bound his movements. Removing them would take a long time. Not even the few years he'd spent in Infinite Dendrogram were quite enough yet.

That was the reason why he explored the Tomb Labyrinth solo.

"Fighting alongside others makes you useless. If a Superior like yourself was defeated, the frontline would be likely to collapse, and that's probably why Foltesla refused your help. Is that what's troubling you?"

"It's not about my inability to cooperate..."

"Really? What's bothering you, then?"

Figaro fell silent for a good moment before slowly speaking up, "Foltesla... sent me a message."

"...He did, huh?" As rivals and friends, the two were in contact in real life, as well.

However, they rarely communicated in that world. Anything they wanted to say, they'd say here in Infinite Dendrogram.

But he couldn't do that this time, because Foltesla hadn't come back even after his death penalty expired.

The reason was laid out in the message he'd sent to Figaro.

"I'm not coming back," he wrote. "I don't want to see it with my own eyes. I don't want confirmation that Erica is gone... It's all my fault." His wife and everyone else in the city had vanished without a trace.

There wasn't even the faintest hope that they had escaped the calamity.

People with jobs specialized in investigation had tried to find survivors, only to conclude that everyone in the city was dead. They had all been evaporated by the breath of light.

Foltesla learned this during his death penalty. The cruel reality broke him to the point that he wasn't even able to log in and face it.

That was just how important Erica was to him.

In the message he received, Figaro couldn't find even a hint of his rival, the seasoned duel ranker and clan leader.

And one part at the end hit him harder than anything else.

"'I can't keep my promise. I'm sorry, Figaro,'" Figaro quoted it to Tom.

Those words clearly meant that he would never see his rival and friend again.

The man who claimed that he'd defeat Gloria and take Figaro's throne was now forever lost to this world. He just wasn't coming back.

Figaro had the toughest heart in all of Infinite Dendrogram, but this truth was so heavy that even that had begun to ache.

"I... I want to keep our promise," muttered Figaro, voice faltering ever so slightly. Their promised duel could simply never happen now. It was impossible to keep it, but Figaro didn't want to abandon it entirely, even if the other party was no longer in this world.

But there was one way that didn't require Foltesla's presence. "Maybe I could fulfill this promise by fighting Gloria," said Figaro.

"...A time attack, huh?" Tom nodded. A time attack was a type of duel where the duelists fought the same kind of monster, and victory was decided based on how fast they defeated theirs, or how much damage they dealt to it. Besides their standard duels, Figaro and Foltesla engaged in these, as well.

In a way, fighting Gloria, whom Foltesla couldn't beat, could be considered their last duel.

Whether he won, joined Foltesla in defeat, or even reached a stalemate, this would be Figaro's last duel against Foltesla. The promise between them would be fulfilled, and that was ultimately why Figaro wanted to fight.

"But... I can't." Gloria had to be defeated using all the kingdom's remaining power. If Figaro wanted to have his duel and fulfill the promise, he had to go to the battlefield ahead of anyone else and fight it alone.

However, Gloria had already been revealed to be a creature without compare, and it was likely that it was still hiding something. It was fair to assume that it would cause some sort of unexpected disaster during the next battle.

It had unleashed new powers at Claymill, and it was possible that another battle would uncover yet more calamities hiding within the dragon.

It would be too much for an exclusively solo player like Figaro. While a well-coordinated group could perhaps handle it, a lone player likely had no chance. And then the newly-empowered Gloria could become an immeasurably powerful threat to those who would face it next, potentially making it impossible to avenge those Foltesla and his Babylonian Battlegroup tried to protect.

“And if that would make it impossible to put their suffering to rest, then I should just...” Figaro voiced his worries and explained why he tried to keep his desire hidden.

In response... “Hahahah. I see, I see.” ...Tom laughed and slapped Figaro’s shoulder before continuing. “Don’t be stupid, Altar’s strongest. I mean...” He rejected Figaro’s words...

“...YOU’RE NOT THE KIND OF GUY WHO FIGHTS WHILE THINKING ABOUT NONSENSE LIKE THAT!” ...Then topped it off with an all-out punch to the face.

“...Tom?” Figaro mouthed, feeling pain on his cheek and looking back at the ex-champion.

There was anger on his face, along with some other intense emotion.

“You’re the one who beat me,” Tom said. “You’re the one who beat Tom Cat, the biggest barrier the kingdom’s Masters had to overcome. And you did it before you were a Superior, or called the Over Gladiator! You are one who exceeded our expectations!”

Figaro couldn’t tell just how much emotion he was putting into those words, but he could feel the passion behind them.

“And now you’re even stronger than you were back then! Why would you even say something so... weak?! Act like yourself! You’re a meathead berserker! Don’t think, and just go fight the damn thing! Fight it alone and maybe even die, but lop off one of its heads on your way out! Go at it solo and destroy the head that beat your rival! Don’t just give up on that duel! On your promise!” He then fell silent for a moment before continuing.

"Does that promise mean so little to you that you're gonna give up on it after just a little bit of thinking?!" Those were the most important words Tom wanted to say.

Figaro opened his eyes wide, as though he was done hesitating, and found his answer.

"...Thanks, Tom," he said as he looked up. "I'll go and fulfill our promise."

The very next moment, Figaro vanished. Tom Cat shifted his gaze and saw him rush towards the capital at supersonic speeds.

"Go get 'em, champion." Tom watched him disappear in satisfaction.

And now that he was all alone, he muttered something to himself.

"Jabberwock, Mad Hatter... This will probably undermine your plans, but I choose to respect their freedom... And their feelings. To me, that's more important than creating more Superior Embryos."

He cracked a smile... "That's the kind of person my Master was, after all." ...And spoke those words with nothing but nostalgia and heart.

Act Five: The Departure of the Two Kings

The Skycrown

In the Border Mountain Belt, there was a mountain where no human was allowed to tread.

The entire belt was a skydragon hive, but there were only two dragons atop the Skycrown itself, for the other skydragons never ventured near the area.

Despite being home to only two dragons, for hundreds of years the western tians had made a point of avoiding the area. The Kingdom of Altar even passed a law that made entry into The Skycrown a capital offense.

The reason for this was clear — the dragons nesting atop this mountain were more frightening than any ordinary monsters.

One of them was the Skydragon King, Drag-Heaven. He was the strongest of the skydragon kind, having existed since before the time of the pre-ancient civilization: living, dying, and being reborn over and over. No records of this remained in the current era, but he had annihilated countless countries in his time before coming face-to-face with the so-called “incarnations,” dying, then coming back to life in this manner.

The Skydragon King was a fearsome entity that had surpassed life and death, making him superior to countless other beings, living or dead.

“...I have recalled something,” he said, perched atop his throne on the mountain, the majesty of his pale, gargantuan frame plain to see.

Besides him stood two humanoid figures.

“What did you recall, father?” one of them asked. Though his form was human, he certainly wasn’t of mankind. He was an Anthropomorphized skydragon — and one of the greatest among them, at that.

His name was Shinedragon King, Drag-Flare, and he was Drag-Heaven’s firstborn, as well as the second strongest after him. He was only in human form because his dragon form would make the throne area a bit crowded.

“Gloria. I have witnessed it before,” Drag-Heaven said.

“Are you certain?”

“Indeed I am. It is the offspring of Deathdragon King and Lightdragon King. They were a couple that existed long before you were born. I murdered them when they tried to leave the mountain belt.”

“Why...? Oh. I see.”

“Indeed. As you saw, their child was an abomination, and it seems they tried to let it escape before it was culled. Heheheh. Three heads, golden scales... there is no mistaking it. Apparently, their struggle allowed their offspring to escape, but I never thought I would lay eyes on it again... Oh, I see...”

Drag-Heaven realized something and paused before continuing.

“This must be the work of the incarnations. I was wondering why it seems to have powers beyond those of its parents, but if they are involved, then it makes sense. It must have been sealed away until now in exchange for this power. And it is approaching the cities of men instead of The Skycrown... Heheheh... This all must be a result of some sort of contract between it and the incarnations.”

Drag-Flare silently listened to his father, but didn’t understand all of his words.

As a creature that had existed since before the time of the pre-ancient civilization, Drag-Heaven knew far more than any dragon, or any other living being for that matter, and he hadn’t passed on most of his knowledge to his children.

From another point of view, one could say that Drag-Heaven was about the only creature that could still be alive despite his immense knowledge. Most anyone who knew too much was neutralized by the incarnations, but since neither death nor binding had any power over the indestructible Drag-Heaven, he was simply left alone according to a deal they struck.

“Hmm... but this is quite troublesome,” Drag-Heaven said. “I am bound by my contract with the incarnations, so I cannot leave The Skycrown unless the conditions are fulfilled. I heard Arcal’s dying wish clearly, but unfortunately, I cannot move from my place.”

“Arcal” was the Lightning Dragon King’s original name. When dragon kings became UBMs, their names would assume the model of “X Dragon King, Drag-Y," where X and Y referred to their nature, but intelligent dragons would oftentimes call each other by their original names.

"Father, I will go slay the dragon in your stead," said Drag-Flare.

"You will fail," said Drag-Heaven without a moment of hesitation. "Its field will not kill level 100s such as yourself. However, you have not exceeded the level 100 barrier. Gloria has, and furthermore, it has acquired Arcal's Resources as a UBM, making it a foe beyond your ability."

UBMs were treated differently when they were defeated by other UBMs. Instead of becoming special rewards, like they did with people, they became pure energy that empowered the victor. In game terms, they basically became enormous amounts of EXP. Defeating UBMs greater than yourself also came with an added bonus of increasing your level cap, but that didn't matter to an SUBM like Gloria. There were also a number of individuals who mimicked the MVP special reward function by taking in the powers of those they defeated, but this too was not relevant in this case.

What did matter was that Gloria — an SUBM to begin with — had become even stronger by defeating Drag-Volt, an upper-Mythical UBM.

"Even if I could face it myself, the battle would never end," added Drag-Heaven. "My offense is incompatible with Gloria's, and it cannot defeat me, for I am immortal. Even if one of us did eventually best the other, the continent would be a very silent place by then. It would be true foolishness."

Imagining the outcome, the Skydragon King chuckled.

"Or perhaps the incarnations would come out to settle the matter? That could be entertaining in its own right, but escalating things so far would make the end rather anticlimactic... Heheheh... What a shame. Truly."

Drag-Flare said nothing in response. To his father, the fate of the continent was nothing more than part of an entertaining board game or a theater performance.

Or, more accurately, he enjoyed watching the rise and fall of all kinds of life, his own included. No one could comprehend the scale of the thoughts of the most transcendental being on the continent — not even his own son.

"But I also cannot merely play the spectator. I still have to fulfill Arcal's dying wish."

The Lightning Dragon King had asked his family to defeat Gloria in order to protect the Border Mountain Range they inhabited, as well as the world of men. The Skydragon King loved his third child enough to honor this wish.

"I cannot leave, and my son cannot best it. That means that I must rely on a third party."

"I see." The second humanoid creature there finally broke his silence. "You wish to give me a request to defeat Gloria, yes?"

His name was the King of Crime, Sechs Würfel.

He was a Superior from Altar, and a criminal wanted by not just the Kingdom, but every other country as well. Besides that, he was one of the few who knew The Skydragon King personally.

The reason behind their acquaintance was simple — it was the fact that entering The Skycrown was a crime so grave it was punishable by death. Sechs' only goal was to sin and become an evil-doer. In Altar, invading The Skycrown was a crime matched by few others, and that alone was a good enough reason for him to do just that.

Thus, he went to The Skycrown all on his own and fought Drag-Flare when he came out to defend it.

The Skydragon King's firstborn was troubled by the amount of invaders they had these past few years — especially the kind they called "Masters." He was fed up with the people flooding in hoping to defeat him or his father for their MVP special rewards, and worked hard to defeat them all.

Sechs, however, was greater than any that had come before. He was already a Superior, and his power matched that of Drag-Flare — a Mythical UBM.

Because Sechs excelled at defense and Drag-Flare was focused on offense, they were more or less evenly matched, and it seemed as though their battle would go on forever.

It only ended once Drag-Heaven, who had been simply enjoying their battle, called out, "By the way, why did you come here in the first place?"

Initially, both The Skydragon King and his son thought that he was here for the same reason as the others — to acquire glory and a Mythical MVP special reward. However, Sechs' eyes as he fought Drag-Flare were strangely pure. They held no greed, nor any hunger for glory.

Sechs' reply to the dragon's question was simple: "Because invading The Skycrown is a great offense here in the kingdom."

"I see," Drag-Heaven nodded. "That is indeed a sin, but there is no crime in defeating us."

"Then I will stop," Sechs said, assuming a neutral stance.

The battle ended in a way that left Sechs' opponent, Drag-Flare, completely speechless. Drag-Heaven, however, laughed out loud and immediately took a liking to Sechs.

Ever since then, he had regularly invited the criminal to The Skycrown.

The kingdom didn't know the circumstances surrounding his visits and assumed Sechs was merely committing that grave crime over and over again, piling sin upon sin. Sechs never turned down the invitations and gladly visited Drag-Heaven. "What a nice place. I'm committing a crime just by coming here," he'd once mused.

At first, Drag-Flare wasn't sure if this was acceptable, but he acquiesced to his father's will, and soon, he and Sechs even became friends. He might've been yearning for a conversation partner besides his father.

And now, a week after Gloria's appearance, Drag-Heaven had summoned Sechs again.

"I promise to reward you if you agree to slay Gloria. I have not yet decided what it shall be, but as The Skydragon King, I assure that it will be worth your while."

"It's been a long time since I received a quest," said Sechs.

"...You told me once that even criminal organizations want nothing to do with you."

"Sad as it seems, yes." Just as there were official adventurer's guilds, there were also organizations that gave out quests for outlaws. However, as a Superior criminal, Sechs was feared even by the outlaw guilds. After finding out about them, Sechs had excitedly made his way to them, only to find out that they had caught wind of his coming and fled the kingdom practically overnight.

"Also, if the kingdom fell, it would be bad for you as well," Drag-Heaven continued.

"What do you mean by that?"

"If Altar perished, all the sins you had committed against the country would be null and void. That would be troubling for you, no?"

"...It would," Sechs said, his expression serious. Most criminals would be glad about that, but to this man, committing crime and being evil was the end goal. Thus, being pardoned was a negative to him.

“But father, Sechs is my equal. If I am unable to defeat it, would he not fail against it, as well?”

“Perhaps. However, there is a Gloria that you cannot best, but Sechs can.”

“Hm...?” Drag-Flare made a confused expression.

Drag-Heaven had just implied that there was more than one Gloria.

However, Sechs seemed to understand. “I see,” he said. “So that’s how it is.”

“Heheh. You understand, then?”

“Yes. I also saw the video of the Babylonian Battlegroup’s fight and read the papers that accompanied the photos.”

Drag-Flare didn’t know what his father saw and didn’t read any newspapers from the world of man, but he could tell that there was something they both knew that he did not. His father and friend were both extremely enigmatic, and he was fully aware that he had to ignore certain things about them to hold a proper conversation.

“Then I will go search for it,” said Sechs. “You can’t see it, can you?”

“In a way, that tells us exactly where it is,” said Drag-Heaven.

“Indeed. Anyway, time is short, so I’ll be heading out immediately.”

“Very well... But before that, I have some encouraging words for you.”

“Hm?”

“Gloria was sent by the entities managing this world for the purpose of creating new Superiors. Therefore...” Drag-Heaven cracked a grin before continuing. “...Defeating it before any new Superiors are born might be considered a truly mortal sin — an offense against the heavens themselves.”

“Ohh... that is indeed motivating.” The relentless sinner broke into a wide smile before leaving The Skycrown.

◆

“Now, what should I reward him with? A daughter’s hand in marriage, perhaps?”

“Father, none of my sisters are fit to marry. The eldest fell at the hand of King of Kings, Rockfell and was sealed alongside him; the older of my younger sisters now serves the Master known as Catherine Kongou. The youngest is still far too young.”

“Heheheh. That is true.” After Sechs left, Drag-Heaven and his son engaged in idle chatter. At the same time, the skydragon king eagerly awaited the final act of the battle against Gloria.

“I must say, the world of man is certainly exciting these days. Things grew a bit dull after the eras of Rockfell and Azurite ended... Events like this are what make life worth living.”

“Father...”

“Heheheh. You will come to understand as you grow older.” He spoke with a slightly disinterested look in his eyes. “However, I imagine that even a mere few hundred years won’t be enough for you... or for Arcal.”

“...Father?”

Drag-Heaven then got up before saying, “Now, then... I guess I should bring him back.”

He followed this statement with a wave of incomprehensible words.

This was not the humanoid language, non-humanoid language, dragon language, or the ancient civilization’s language. He was speaking words from a past long forgotten, before he finished the chant with the perfectly understandable phrase “Heaven’s Resurrection.”

Suddenly, his body released a massive torrent of energy and a pillar of light.

The energy gathered before him and assumed a form. It had four limbs, a long neck, a tail, and a pair of giant wings — it was a dragon.

Clad in lightning running along its scales, it was none other than the Lightning Dragon King, Drag-Volt... the very same who had fallen at Gloria’s hands.

“Huh?! Arcal?! How?! He’s dead...!” The sight of his revived little brother astounded Drag-Flare. This was far outside the limits of the resurrection timer. Drag-Volt had dissolved into specks of light days ago, and a long distance away from here, too — but now, he had been brought back to life right before his brother’s eyes. It was resurrection from nothing — something that would be impossible even for the greatest Necromancers.

Only two beings in the entire world were capable of this, and one of them was Drag-Heaven.

“Oh. I just realized I’d never showed you this before,” he said. “Heheheh. Well, I have not used it for at least a millennium... And it still seems to come at a cost.”

The resurrection was impressive, but the Lightning Dragon King wasn't the same as before. His body had shrunk by about two or three times, and the lightning he released seemed far weaker. The most notable change, however, was the fact that the name above his head was no longer "Lightning Dragon King, Drag-Volt," but "High-End Lightning Dragon" — a kind of pure-dragon.

"Wh-What? Have I not died...?" The dragon regained consciousness and spoke those words in his confusion.

"You were lucky, Arcal. If you had been defeated by mankind, your soul and concept would have been transformed into a piece of equipment. I was able to bring you back because only your Resources were gone."

"Father..." Arcal said, realizing that his father was the one who had resurrected him.

"However, you have lost your title of Lightning Dragon King, and the vast Resources supporting you have been taken by Gloria. You are also weakened as a result of your return. You are now merely a skydragon. You will have to train and work diligently to regain your former power."

"...I will, father. But... what became of the mad-dragon that killed me?!"

"It still lives. It destroyed the duchy, erased the ancient fortress, and will soon arrive at the capital."

"Gh...!" Arcal's eyes were full of rage. He couldn't stomach the idea that Gloria had taken the life of his friend. Power gathered in his newly-revived limbs, but...

"Do not."

...His father stopped him with those few words and a serious gaze. "As you are now, you cannot even stand upon the same stage." Arcal clenched his teeth. He knew what his father meant better than anyone. He could feel how meager his power was, compared to what it had once been.

"Father... I...! I curse my weakness...!" Arcal lamented his lack of power. If only he'd been stronger, he might've prevented this tragedy.

"Khahahah. Yes. Lament. Your lamentations will fuel your training. I have lost count of how many times I have been defeated, lamented, died, returned, and grew ever stronger."

"Father..."

"But you will have to entrust the mad-dragon's... Gloria's demise to the hands of men." The Skydragon king looked into the distance... at the three-headed dragon ravaging the kingdom's lands and the people preparing to fight it.

"Let us watch the battle that will decide the fate of the kingdom... and the world of man."

His smile grew wider...

"And let us not ignore the skirmish that shall precede the upcoming fight." ...And he muttered this with excitement.

◇◇◇

Royal Capital, Altea, deep inside the royal castle

While most of the attention in the castle was directed at the negotiations between the kingdom and its begrudgingly welcome guest, a particular girl was sitting on a bed closer to the heart of the castle.

Her name was Theresia C. Altar. She was the third princess of the kingdom of Altar who, owing to her sickly constitution, lived within a room surrounded by a field of sterilization and healing. Unlike her eldest sister, who'd been chosen by The Primeval Blade itself, or the second oldest, who was almost too energetic and naïve, Theresia spent most of her time in her room.

Even while the whole castle was buzzing over the deadly Contract Tsukuyo Fuso had presented during the negotiations, she was just sitting in her room. Though, that was also due to the fact that she and the younger of her sisters weren't required to sign the Contract.

Theresia absentmindedly stared at a point in the air before shifting her gaze to the door.

"I haven't seen you in a while, Mr. Costume," she said.

"...Yeah," replied the man in a raccoon costume.

"Not a chameleon today?"

"This one has the Presence Block skill. It's not as good as the Optical Camouflage from the chameleon suit, but the security isn't as tight as usual, so I just came wearing this."

The man wearing the Ultimate Costume Series, Orphan Roa was none other than one of Altar's Superiors: King of Destruction, Shu Starling. He stepped closer to her and stopped at a distance where conversation was easy.

Theresia sniffed the air a few times, catching some sort of scent.

"I don't know this smell," she said. "Did you go really far away?"

"All the way to Caldina. Fought a magic dumbass who likes playing in the sand too much," Shu said before putting on a regretful air. "...It took me a whole week to come back here."

A week was exactly the amount of days that Gloria had spent terrorizing the kingdom. The moment he heard about the dragon, Shu had immediately prepared to return, but the road was long, and even a Superior like him needed some time to cross the Caldinian desert.

"I don't think you should let it bother you," said Theresia. She wasn't even consoling him — she merely stated the truth.

"It's not like you have to beat Gloria. Masters are free. That's how it is, right?"

"...Yeah. But from what I heard from DIN and on the other side, the situation is about as bad as it could be, right?"

"They say that Altea might be destroyed. The maids were talking about it."

"But it didn't look like the staff had decreased any."

"Everyone working here is loyal to a fault. I think they should all just run away, though." Theresia was young, and her manner of speech reflected that, but the topics she discussed were disconcertingly mature. She wasn't even elementary school age by Earth standards, so this would normally be a very strange sight.

However, very few had ever heard her speak this way. Three, to be exact — two people and an animal. The animal was the gigantic hamster she kept as a pet, while the people were Shu and the irredeemable criminal who had once kidnapped her. The kidnapping was actually what had led to Shu's regular visits, but that was a story for another time.

"...What would you do if everyone ran away?"

"Nothing. My condition... I mean, it is stable here inside the barrier around the castle, so I'd just end up waiting for Gloria here."

She would wait for a creature with a passive field skill that caused death to all those below level 100. That obviously meant certain death for her, but she didn't seem to care and simply continued speaking.

"I would love to take it out with me... Ohh, but Altea would be completely useless at that point. Though, I guess that's better than letting the damage spread all over the kingdom."

"...Where's your pet? Where's Dormouse?"

"Dor isn't here. He's probably busy with work. He said something about the deployment being too early. Maybe something didn't go as planned?"

In response to her words, Shu began to think to himself, but then she continued.

"You should probably hurry up and get ready, Mr. Costume. No matter what you choose."

Theresia meant that he should hurry up and pick an option, regardless of whether it was fighting, running, or something else. However, she didn't urge him towards any one option.

"...Theresia," Shu said as he removed the head of the raccoon costume and looked directly into her eyes with his own. "Are you really okay with all of this?"

That wasn't enough to make her waver, though.

"Altimia bears the burden of the power she was born with and her responsibilities as the first princess. I'm just here resting, bearing only one burden. It would be unfair if I didn't try to balance that out." Theresia then smiled like the child she was. "And I want Elizabeth to live freely, without any responsibility at all. That's why I'll use the power laid on my shoulders to protect my dear family."

These weren't words of reassurance, and she wasn't talking childish nonsense — she was merely prioritizing what was important to her. They were the words of a girl who'd chosen her beloved family over her own life.

In response, Shu was silent for a good few moments before putting the costume head on again, turning around, and saying, "...I remembered some business I gotta take care of."

"Oh? What is it?"

"A walk." Just like that, the man in the raccoon costume left Theresia's room.

◇

After sneaking out of the castle using Presence Block, Shu went out to the capital's noble district and arrived at a back-alley. The main street was full of evacuees, but the back-alleys were surprisingly empty.

As he walked down the alley, he suddenly spoke to himself. “She... didn’t once ask me to fight.”

If Shu fought and emerged victorious, he would prevent Gloria’s arrival at the capital. That would save Altea’s tians, and Theresia wouldn’t have to die.

Despite that, and despite knowing Shu’s identity as the King of Destruction, she never once asked him to fight.

The current situation was one of the worst possible scenarios, but still she thought of nothing but her duty and those she wanted to protect.

It was as though she believed that her entire life’s purpose was that single moment.

“That kind of thinking... she’s too young for it.” Letting his irritation take over, he punched the brick wall of a nearby abandoned building, collapsing it instantly. Since there was no one around to see it, this didn’t cause any commotion.

The hand of the special reward costume he was wearing couldn’t take the force and shattered into tiny pieces. Paying it no mind, Shu tried to walk away, but...

“You seem quite frustrated, Shu.”

...Someone called out to him from behind.

“...I’ve felt like I was being watched since I was in Caldina,” Shu said. “I knew it had to be you, Humpty.”

He turned around and saw a bizarre entity in the middle of the back-alley.

It was a creature wrapped within an oval, egg-like cocoon.

She was the control AI no. 2, tasked with managing Embryos. Her name was Humpty Dumpty.

She had also been in charge of handling Shu's arrival and character creation, and she was an entity he had met many times since then.

"Yeah... 'since I was in Caldina,'" Shu repeated himself. "...You're not about to tell me that you timed that shitty dragon's release with me being outta the country, are ya?"

"I won't deny that," Humpty replied. "I mean, unlike the Over Gladiator, High Priestess, or King of Crime, you would actively try to solve the problem, right? I mean, you're a very good boy at heart."

She didn't seem to feel the least bit guilty about it. In fact, she was smiling.

"Even if you couldn't defeat it alone, with a Master of your caliber fighting against it, all of Gloria's skills would be exposed in no time. That would make it easy for Altar to come up with countermeasures, and impossible for us to gauge the limits of the other Masters... making it harder to create new Superiors."

With a full smile on her face, Humpty revealed their goal. "We had hopes for the King of Swords, but they're gone now. He's broken. Oh, but he might've become a Superior if his Embryo didn't shatter. Maidens' ■■■ is easier to initiate in desperate situ—"

"I'll tell you one thing," Shu cut her off. Humpty was talking about who had the greatest chance of becoming a Superior, but Shu didn't care one bit about all of that. In fact, if that was what this girl before him hoped to gain from this calamity, he was completely against it.

"You aren't gettin' any new Superiors outta any battle against that shitty dragon." He dismissed her goal, determined to prevent it. Thus, all that was left...

"We will destroy Gloria."

...Was to make a final declaration as the King of Destruction.

His words — no, the will behind them — left Humpty speechless.

Shu turned around and resumed walking, heading towards the Nowest Canyon in the northwest of the capital, where he would find the dragon terrorizing the country.

With Shu gone, Humpty was left all alone.

There was not a single person or creature in sight. In fact, it was very strange that no guards arrived after the abandoned building collapsed. The back-alley was only empty because Humpty had some sort of ability that made it so.

However, that wasn't important to her now.

"Heheheh, ahahahahahahah!" she burst out. The girl-like control AI shielded by a thin veil — a transparent shell — was actually laughing out loud. She wasn't laughing because the Master she'd favored was turning out exactly like she wanted him to be, but because the will he'd displayed was far stronger than she'd ever imagined.

"Shu, this is why I like you. Back when I was alive, there were no synchronizers... Masters as engaging to watch as you."

Thus, Humpty, the Infinite Embryo of the Type Infinite Body, imagined what would happen next and laughed with supreme joy.

Act Six: The Lion and the Dragon

???

“The kingdom’s Superiors are approaching Gloria.”

“Weeell, it ceeertainly toook them a whiiiile.”

“I have no intention of stopping her, but if she really does reach the capital, we shall have to rethink our schedules going forward. Though, I imagine that the disappearance of a whole country would act as a powerful dose of smelling salts.”

“So you don’t care either way, Jabberwock?”

“Indeed I don’t, No. 3... Queen... whichever you prefer. Though, I would be troubled if we don’t produce a single new Superior.”

“‘Troubled,’ huh? Hmph. I’d say that whether or not it happens is up to the Superiors. Let’s observe the true power of the ones they favor.”

“Very well.”

“Though, no matter how strong they are, Gloria... ‘The Glory SelectE.R.’ cannot be stopped.”

◇◆◇

Kingdom of Altar, Nowest Canyon

The Nowest Canyon to the northwest of the royal capital was a place where few dared to tread. Even those who traveled from the now-destroyed city of Claymill to the capital would detour directly south to reach the Wez Sea Route and follow it eastwards.

The reason for taking this roundabout path was simple: the Nowest Canyon was a land of giant fissures as wide as one kilometel, as long as several kilometels, and as deep as several hundred metels.

It was said that this place was unnatural. Many believed that these cracks were the scars of a fierce battle that happened at the sunset of the pre-ancient civilization. Regardless of its origins, though, Nowest Canyon was an unwelcoming landscape rife with creatures of a higher level than the surrounding areas, making it difficult to traverse and even more difficult to build on. That made it a roadless, empty land inhabited only by monsters.

Of course, there were beings that had no trouble passing through the scarred terrain.

After destroying Claymill, Gloria headed for the capital directly through the Nowest Canyon.

The dragon was moving through a fissure large enough to hide its gargantuan frame. Its steps were confident and full of vigor — it had closed its wounds and restored its heart during the day it had dedicated to healing itself. Its wings and tail were still gone, but that didn't affect its walking speed or the lethality of its Fatal Field, which killed all the creatures around it.

Gloria had surpassed the limits of the animal kingdom, and neither the land itself nor the other monsters could stop it now. Any creature that could stand up to it would have to have similarly transcended those limits.

"...It's here," he — Over Gladiator, Figaro — said, sensing Gloria's oppressively majestic approach. "Yeah... It looks really strong."

As someone who regularly raided the Tomb Labyrinth solo, Figaro had reached its lower levels many times and encountered a decent number of UBMs there. He'd even come across and defeated several Mythicals, including the most powerful foe he had faced so far — the creature that erratically wandered the dragon area: Extinction Dragon King, Drag-Fin.

Figaro was no doubt accustomed to powerful UBMs, but the pressure emitted by the SUBM approaching him was in a class of its own.

Drag-Fin had been a massive creature fully worthy of the title "enemy of all life," but it paled in comparison to this ominous golden dragon. The videos didn't do it justice. Now, seeing it with his own eyes, he understood just how immense it was.

The gap in their power was obvious. Even a berserker like Figaro knew that facing it alone would be sheer stupidity.

Despite that...

"Still... I'll go first. By myself."

...He'd resolved to fight on his own. His fatal flaw was one of the reasons for this, but even without that, he would've made the same decision.

Figaro had also sealed away one of his specialties.

Dance of Anima — one of the skills of his Superior Embryo — improved his equipment the longer the fight dragged on. Because of this, he had the option of engaging in a warm-up battle to power up and close the gap between them before fighting Gloria head-on.

However, he didn’t want to do that. So, he chose not to. He would fight alone, without any head start.

After all — to him, this was a duel against Foltesla.

Figaro and Foltesla had begun dueling and rising up through the rankings at the same time. They’d piled on victories and losses, coming out ahead or falling behind each other like the rivals they truly were.

They’d become good friends through their dueling. Theirs was the kind of friendship that could only exist between equal, competing rivals, and it was quite unlike what Figaro had with Shu.

But when Figaro defeated the previous champion, Tom Cat, Foltesla became unable to challenge him in a ranked duel. Only the second-ranked duelist could challenge the duel champion, and Foltesla couldn’t get the position due to his incompatibility with Tom Cat.

Despite that, Figaro was sure that Foltesla would eventually take his position.

Many believed that the gap between them had become insurmountable the moment Figaro evolved into a Superior, but Figaro himself didn’t believe that to be the case.

He continued to view Foltesla as an equal.

Figaro believed that while he kept his title and improved himself, Foltesla would also experience immense growth.

His rival would eventually surpass Tom Cat and fight Figaro for the title of champion. Figaro believed that with complete confidence, and the two even swore that they would one day face each other in that battle.

However, now it was clear that the day of their showdown would never come, for everything that Foltesla held dear to his heart had vanished along with the fortress city.

Figaro was sure that his rival would never return to this world. Thus, he knew that this would be their final battle.

“Let’s do it, Foltesla,” he said, as Gloria came into view.

Despite its powerful presence, Figaro actually didn’t see Gloria as his true foe. To him, it was just a target... a tool in his duel with Foltesla. The dragon was nothing but a means through which he would battle his rival in a time attack.

“Let’s begin. You were defeated, so you have no time attack record. Your notable acts include taking its wings, tail, heart, and right eye. To win against you, I will go beyond that.”

Time attacks tracked how well the duelists did against a monster of the same type, and they received a score even if they were defeated. To surpass Foltesla, who went as far as destroying a heart, Figaro had only one possible target.

“...I’ll take a core,” he declared, deciding that he would aim for the part that gave the most points on monsters that possessed it.

And Figaro already had his eyes set on a single head out of the three.

He’d chosen the one-horn. It released the devastating breath of light that had destroyed all those defending Claymill, clearly making it the head with the greatest offensive power. As long as that head existed, Gloria would have the ability to instantly kill anything in the path of its light breath, and every wound dealt to it would potentially be fatal to its attackers.

Logically speaking, if you wanted to defeat this dragon, the one-horn had to go first.

However, Figaro’s reasons for targeting the one-horn weren’t strategic. He was looking directly at the head’s right eye.

There was a deep wound there, along with a scab-like covering of mythical metal — the molten remains of a greatsword. It was all the proof Figaro needed that this was the head Foltesla had fought until the bitter end.

It was the head the King of Swords had tried to conquer, and the head that had finally defeated him.

That was the only reason Figaro needed to target it, and the reason he would give everything he had to tear it off.

“Let’s do this,” the champion said as he brandished a spear in his right hand.

“FfrRrrRrrrRrRrrRr,” Gloria rumbled, acknowledging its enemy and rearing up on its hind legs.

“Fight.” Figaro declared the start of the duel.

“FRHSssSSsSsHeeEAAHhhHH!” The dragon unleashed its breath of light as the champion charged towards it.

◇◆

Gloria’s breath melted a part of the canyon, causing a cliff to crumble. The sound of it could be heard even outside of the Nowest Canyon.

“...It’s started,” said the man standing atop a giant battleship — King of Destruction, Shu Starling.

He had it parked outside the canyon and waited in it, silently.

“Sure ya shouldn’t help the prince?” There were 34 people gathered around Baldr. They were all members of the kingdom’s top clan, The Lunar Society. All the clan-cult’s level 500s and above had gathered to fight and defeat Gloria. Naturally, the leader and sub-leader — Fuso Tsukuyo and Eishiro Tsukikage — were among them.

“I’m pawsitive. In fact, I don’t want you getting anywhere near them until his battle ends,” said Shu.

“But going against it alone is suicide. Solo-only players are so annoying.”

Shu, Tsukuyo, and Figaro. Albeit for different reasons, the three top rankers of the kingdom had all gathered in a single place.

Figaro had been the first to arrive, and he’d immediately jumped into a crack in the canyon to face Gloria alone.

Shu was close behind him. As Figaro’s good friend, he had an idea why the champion would challenge and fight the dragon alone, so he knew it was best not get in his way.

Tsukuyo and her clan were the last to arrive, and Shu also took it upon himself to keep them from interfering with Figaro’s fight. They had no real reason to listen to him, so at first they had tried to follow Figaro, but Shu struck a deal with them to keep them out.

“So, trash panda, we can go right after that sickly noble takes out the one-horn, right?”

“Fur sure.” Indeed — they’d agreed on an order. Thanks to the data gathered by the Babylonian Battlegroup, they had a fairly good grasp of Gloria’s nature. The one-horned head released an evaporating breath, the two-horn spread out a deadly field, and the three-horn increased its stats as its HP went down.

The one-horn had to go first, as it made Gloria more dangerous the more wounds it received.

The second one that had to be destroyed was obviously the three-horn, as it increased the dragon’s power as it came closer to death. There was no good reason to leave it until the end and allow Gloria to become as powerful as possible.

Finally, with the one-horn and three-horn gone, only the two-horn would be left, and that had no effect on those who were max level or above. Without the one-horn and three-horn, the two-horn would be easy pickings, for without the head that enhanced its power, Gloria could only become weaker.

Also, it was likely that Gloria had a core in each head, and with standard UBMs, the core’s destruction was a major factor in MVP selection. After the recent incident with Twin Moby Dick in Granvaloa, it had become widely known that SUBMs gave out several MVP special rewards. Gloria was presumed to have a core for each head, meaning it may give a special reward for each core.

That meant that you could become MVP multiple times. This was just a theory based on very few examples in the past, but even the chance of it being true convinced Tsukuyo to aim for the destruction of both the two-horned and three-horned heads.

However, the one-horn stood in the way of that goal. Its deadly breath of light made fighting it extremely risky, especially for group fighters like The Lunar Society.

Because of this, Shu and Tsukuyo had agreed that after the one-horn fell, he would let The Lunar Society take both the two-horn and the three-horn.

If Figaro was defeated after taking out the one-horn, Tsukuyo would go next.

If Figaro failed, Shu would give his all to finish off the one-horn, then leave the rest to Tsukuyo.

Thinking that two battle-focused Superiors had a good chance of taking out a single head, she had gladly accepted this deal.

“But what if Prince Meathead attacks one of the other heads?” Tsukuyo asked.

“Ain’t happening. He’ll fight the one-horn,” Shu replied.

As his friend, Shu knew Figaro well; he was fully aware of Figaro’s relationship with Foltesla. Thus, he didn’t doubt his own judgment here one bit.

“Hell, you should be worried about him taking out all three of the heads.”

“There’s no waaay. That’d be inhuman.”

“It would be, fur sure. But...” Shu acknowledged Tsukuyo’s words before continuing. “...You know he’s the kingdom’s strongest, right?”

His words were brimming with confidence in his friend’s ability.

◇◆

The battle between Figaro and Gloria began with the dragon instantly releasing its breath of light.

The monster’s Fatal Field came with the ability to gauge the levels of its targets, which told it that Figaro was the most powerful creature it had encountered thus far. In addition to that, it could feel the immense Resources he carried in the form of MVP special rewards — the remains of other UBMs.

Gloria had no reason to hold back against a foe like that.

“OVERDRIVE!” Its single horn glowed red as the head beneath it released the breath that had extinguished the tian elite and the entire city of Claymill.

The neck danced, and the fatal light moved along with it.

“I know this,” Figaro said, narrowly evading the lightshow of certain death as he closed in on Gloria at beyond supersonic speed.

Figaro’s thoughts — no, his battle instinct — told him that, while the breath moved at the speed of light and was thus undodgeable, the head releasing moved far slower than the speed of sound. As long as he watched the creature’s movements and kept running at supersonic speeds, the head would never hit him. He simply had to focus on taking advantage of the slowing of experienced time caused by supersonic movement to avoid the subsonic beam of light moving towards him.

The slightest touch and it would be all over for him. But by putting that thought out of his mind, he was able to approach Gloria without any hesitation.

It was a manifestation of the battle sense and instinct that he was born with, but could never use in his real life.

“I’ll start with this. ■■■■, ■■ ■■■■ — ■■■ ■■■■■■!”

Figaro muttered something and threw the spear in his hand at Gloria.

It was a Legendary item with fantastic stats, but it didn't scare Gloria in the slightest. No matter what skills it had, the dragon knew that something like that would never kill it.

It wasn't an incorrect assumption. Dragonhowl Spear, Drag-Song had the ability to destroy matter using shockwaves, but it wasn't powerful enough to be effective against Gloria.

The one-horn head was so confident that it almost smiled as the spear approached its long neck... and it took a moment for it to realize that the spear had torn a good half of the flesh away from its neck.

"Ggha... ah...?" With half of its mass gone, the neck folded forward so far it nearly crashed into the ground.

But when the one-horn's third eye noticed Figaro's approach, it quickly recovered, supported its head, and released its breath on him.

Figaro evaded the attack before using Instant Wield to equip a new weapon — an Epic throwing ax called "Whirlwind Ax, Fulgore."

As he avoided the storms of light, he swung and threw it, just like he'd done with the previous weapon. It spun at immense speeds as it flew towards Gloria's neck, drawing an elliptical trajectory and gathering wind that soon became a storm.

This also didn't seem capable of dealing any significant damage to the dragon, but the one-horn had learned the hard way that appearances could be misleading.

"FRHhSshhEeeEAAhHhhhHHhh!" The one-horn showered the ax in light, evaporating it and instantly eliminating it from the world. However, before it vanished, it created a disturbance in the air strong enough to shake even Gloria's massive body.

It forced the dragon to totter straight towards...

"Gouging Draconic Spinfang: Drag-Spiral."

...Figaro himself, who'd used Gloria's momentary focus on his ax to close in on the dragon.

He shoved the lance in his hand into the dragon's left heel.

The name of this weapon was "Drilldragon Lance, Drag-Spiral," and it was an MVP special reward he'd gotten from an Ancient Legendary "Drilldragon King" of the same name.

"Gouging Draconic Spinfang: Drag-Spiral" was its only skill, and all it did was penetrate matter. The drill-like tip easily pierced Gloria's tough scales and spun around rapidly, scattering flesh, shattering bone, and rupturing the entire hindlimb.

"FHRrruuUUuAaaAAaaAArRrgGHHHhhHhH!" The sudden, unexpected loss of an entire limb made Gloria collapse.

If it was capable of words, the only thing that would've gone through its mind would be "Impossible!"

Knowledge of UBMs and special rewards had been etched into its instincts. Therefore, considering the ranks of the UBMs that had become the rewards, there was no way they could have done this much damage to it, even when used by someone as powerful as this particular wielder. This could only mean that he had some mysterious other ability that was capable of closing the gap.

Its instincts were exactly correct.

Figaro had already used an ace up his sleeve that brought him closer to Gloria's level — an ability that was a double-edged sword.

As it collapsed, Gloria noticed that the lance that had destroyed its limb had shattered. As an SUBM, Gloria understood what the lance was, and concluded that it was looking at an empty shell.

The concept, the soul, the Resources that made up every special reward — none of it was there anymore.

The remains of the lance left no hope for its recovery.

It was as though the entire special reward had been used up for one single attack.

"Gh..." Figaro staggered in pain right where he stood.

"It... It really does hurt." Gloria hadn't actually hit him once so far. Despite that, his body was criss-crossed with wounds, as though it had been burned all over.

Gloria's breath of light didn't allow any heat to escape, making this kind of burning impossible; upon closer inspection, one might notice that he had no external wounds at all.

All these burns had been caused by something within him. It was as though the blood running through his veins had become pure fire.

This was the price he paid for the ace up his sleeve — lost special rewards and countless burns.

"The thirty seconds are up. Judging by my max HP... I have two more uses."

Figaro had pain set to on, so to him, he really was being burned alive from the inside.

Even so, he showed no fear. Bearing the injuries, fighting the pain, and losing his weapons, Figaro glared at the one-horn with fighting spirit in his eyes.

"This is the second one." He wielded his double-edged sword once more, speaking the name of his life in this world...

"Burn, My Soul — Cor Leonis!"

...And the name of the Superior Embryo based on the star known as "the heart of the lion."

◇◇◇

Sometime In the Past

On a particular day a few weeks after defeating Tom Cat and becoming the duel champion, Figaro woke up in Infinite Dendrogram, as usual, and noticed he had changed.

The body he woke up with was completely unlike the body he'd gone to sleep with.

He realized that the difference was in the blood running through his veins.

His avatar's heart was his Embryo, Cor Leonis, so any change to his Embryo changed his blood, as well.

Figaro checked the relevant windows and realized that Cor Leonis had reached its seventh form... that it evolved into a Superior Embryo.

He also noticed that it gained a third skill — the ultimate one, to be exact. Upon reading its details, Figaro instantly understood why it was the way it was.

"Considering my personality and what I've been through, it makes sense that it'd come out like this."

Embryos evolved based on what their Masters were like and their experiences. Thus, even if some of their abilities seemed dangerous to others, the Masters themselves generally found them fitting.

Figaro's "Burn, My Soul — Cor Leonis" was in this vein. It was so powerful that his previous self paled in comparison, and it was extremely compatible with duels. He couldn't ask for a better ace up his sleeve.

"...I know when I'll use it in duels, then," Figaro said, deciding that he would only unleash it when Foltesla became second in the duel rankings and challenged him for the throne.

He hoped that he could release his full potential — his entire soul — against his good friend and rival.

He was certain that Foltesla would eventually challenge him, so he never used it in any of his other duels. Even when fighting monsters, he only used it once — during his battle against Drag-Fin.

Figaro waited for Foltesla, ready to give his all and then some. But the arrival of Gloria meant that their promised duel would never happen.

Thus... he used it now.

This was the moment... the duel that would unlock his full potential.

◇◆◇

Kingdom of Altar, Nowest Canyon

"Burn, My Soul — Cor Leonis!" The skill turned his heart searing hot, as though it smouldered like its namesake star in the Leo constellation. It burned his flesh, made his blood boil, and lowered his HP; it scorched his Max HP away as well. Through his torn skin rose a smoke that seemed to be a mix of white steam and blood.

Figaro always had his pain settings turned on, so he felt the full intensity of the agony, but even that wasn't enough to stop his power.

Intent on making every moment of the thirty second effective time count, he swung into action immediately.

"FNGH!" First, Figaro used Instant Wield to equip a shadow-colored Legendary rapier called "Shadowbind Pin, Bolbara." He thrust it into the shadow of the dragon, still collapsed to the ground. Then, he used Bolbara's skill, Anchoring Shadowpin, which applied Bind to the target whose shadow it pierced.

For a UBM skill, it wasn't too special — you could even find some like it among skills of certain jobs.

Standard shadow-based bindings could be easily undone, and even those from special rewards could be overwhelmed and broken by sheer force.

However, this one actually pinned this immense dragon in place.

Gloria was actually held fast by an impossibly powerful shadow-based binding — but in exchange, Bolbara shattered.

This was the ultimate skill of Cor Leonis.

By burning Figaro's flesh and blood, it lowered his max HP by 1% every second, and this damage could not be restored until he received a death penalty. Additionally, using the active skills of any items during this time destroyed them beyond repair. In exchange for these two heavy drawbacks, it empowered those skills beyond all limits.

"Burn, My Soul — Cor Leonis" burned up the life of Figaro and his equipment, making them shine as bright as possible before they fell dark.

That was the shape of life lived by the sickly youth known as Vincent Myers.

His entire life, the 28 special rewards he'd acquired, and the very soul challenging the foe before him were all focused into a single instant, going up in flames like a firework. It was a manifestation of the way he lived, and it was so intense that even an SUBM like Gloria couldn't brush it off.

"FhuUuRRrraaAAAaAaaAaAAaHhhHhH" Upon realizing that this foe had the power to defeat it, Gloria focused all its power into the one-horn. It tried to release light from its wounds, but Figaro was expecting this, for it was the ability that devastated the Babylonian Battlegroup and many other Masters.

It was the reason that trying to overwhelm it with numbers or attacking it without careful consideration was a fatal mistake.

Accounting for this, Figaro had picked his targets carefully, focusing on only certain parts to limit the area its light could cover.

The first wound had been dealt to the throat of the one-horn that breathed light. Extra light coming from this area changed little.

The second wound went to one of the hindlegs. Since it had lost its wings, they had become important in supporting its immense weight.

Both of these were places that made it hard for Gloria to effectively utilize its ability to overwhelm the enemy by turning its own wounds into fountains of killing light.

Figaro was able to evade the light coming from there almost instinctively.

Gloria's abilities were already known, so it couldn't outwit the very best of Figaro's instincts.

At the very least, the breath of light as it was now couldn't defeat Figaro on its own.

"■■!"

With Gloria out of moves to make, Figaro moved to put it in check.

He activated Physical Berserk and equipped a gauntlet on his left and a short spear in his right before charging at the still-bound one-horn head.

A Bind that lasted several dozen seconds. One-shot attacks, each one potentially fatal. The 23 special rewards Figaro still had left. Combined, that was more than enough to take out the one-horn. In fact, even the other two were in danger.

At this moment, Gloria acknowledged that the tables had turned — that it was likely that the battle would end in its defeat.

At that moment, certain shackles within the dragon shattered.

Gloria did away with one of the limits put on it by the control AIs and unleashed a power that it had kept hidden, even from them.

"RRrrRrruaAaAaaaAaAggGhHhHhhHHhhhHH!" The one-horn let out a roar beyond any that had come before, and suddenly all the golden scales covering its body began to shine.

"Ah...!" Figaro instantly took evasive action.

It wasn't exactly that he'd sacrificed his perfect moment to land the killing blow in favor of saving himself. It was more that his instincts told him that if he kept going, he was the only one who would die.

The next moment, Gloria's shining claw cut through the air just behind him at supersonic speeds. The speed was incomparably faster than it had been earlier.

This meant that it had broken the speed limits set on it by the control AIs. And more importantly, the shining scales released the same light as its breath, making it menacing beyond measure.

"So that's the ace up your sleeve..." Indeed — this was the ultimate weapon of Gloria's first head.

Its name was "Zenith Dragon's Shining Field: Fang of Gloria." It was unbreakable armor that protected it utterly, as well as a blade that extinguished all.

"I knew that its breath didn't work on itself... but I didn't think it could use it this way." During the battle at Claymill, Gloria had showered itself in its light many times, but it had never damaged itself in the slightest.

Most people, Figaro included, assumed that it was because the golden scales covering its body had full resistance to the breath, but that wasn't entirely correct.

In fact, Gloria's scales were the best conductor for its breath of light. It channeled light through them like they were optical fiber.

"FruUooOooaAAaaAagHHhhHhhH!" This full-body radiance was Gloria's ultimate offensive and defensive ability. Not even the control AI were aware of it.

Gloria was wielding a power that made its defeat virtually impossible, and it had broken the limitations placed on it, bringing its stats back up to their previous Mythical-tier.

Thanks to it spending a day to heal itself, the wounds left by the loss of its wings and tail were also closed over with scales.

The damage Figaro had inflicted on it was also still releasing its deadly breath. It had even closed all its eyes to reduce the amount of weak points and chased after its enemy using only the senses given to it by the Fatal Field.

Thus, there was no opening.

Gloria as it was now was no doubt the strongest it could possibly be. The result was so powerful that even the control AIs would have hesitated to release it if they'd known of this ability.

Faced with such a creature, Figaro...

"Its body isn't touching the ground. It can float a bit even without its wings?"

...Just calmly analyzed it.

He avoided the supersonic claws, all the while observing the monster and looking for his chance to conquer it. Even though the already-insurmountable gap between them became even wider, Figaro's eyes showed no fear, and his heart was nowhere near broken. A normal person would've given up already, but he continued to calmly ponder how he could still win this.

He was certain that he could still defeat this dragon.

Figaro had seen the reason for his confidence the moment Gloria began to move.

Until its body began gleaming and it attacked Figaro, Gloria had clearly been Bound. The Anchoring Shadowpin had been undone merely because the dragon became a source of light that banished the shadow binding it. It wasn't because it had powered up, or because it ignored some special reward's effect.

It broke out in a way that still conformed to cause and effect, which was proof that Gloria was still bound by the laws of this world.

It was an unreasonably powerful monster, but not an unbeatable one. And that was why Figaro knew he could defeat it.

I... don't have a special reward that can break through the light and damage it. This would be a lot easier if I had something that could warp through space and attack its inside directly, he thought.

He had already removed most of his equipment, even the Lifesaving Brooch. It did little against Gloria and the light radiating from it. He'd focused on improving his evasion by channeling the power of his Arms Selector — the skill that made his equipment more powerful the less he had on — to improve the items that passively enhanced his AGI. Additionally, a few minutes of actual — not experienced — time had passed, improving the effect of his Dance of Anima.

Even though Gloria now moved at supersonic speeds, Figaro was still faster.

My ultimate skill expired, and I can only use it once more. Looking at how much HP I have left, I'll get the death penalty before it ends... I guess I should be glad that the light doesn't heat up its surroundings.

Gloria's light could only heat up things it shone directly on. If that hadn't been the case, Figaro would have already died due to the damage from the residual heat.

But even if he never once touched the light, the price for his ultimate skill was significant.

In addition to the 60% of his HP he'd lost due to its direct effects, the injury-type status effects caused by the wounds the skill inflicted were eating away at his remaining life. Normally, he'd wear accessories that healed him and gave him resistance to such debuffs, but he had to focus only on his stats now.

It was clear that Figaro's death penalty was only a matter of time, and he didn't have many chances left.

I need to take out the one-horn in the next few moves, he thought. That would have been possible in the absence of the Fang of Gloria, but now, its defense was unbreakable.

There wasn't a single opening on the dragon, it seemed...

"Ah..."

...Until he noticed one.

It was just a single point, but it was still a crack in the impenetrable, deadly armor of light.

"Foltesla..." he spoke his friends name before gathering the resolve for one final attack and fixing his eyes on the point.

"FRuuoooOoAAaaAggGhhhHHhhHH!" Gloria roared, as though sensing Figaro's determination through its fatal field. Both of them already knew that the next supersonic exchange would be the end of the battle between lion and dragon.

As the struggle reached its peak... "Let's go." ...Figaro equipped a new item — a blue cloak.

Its name was "Rendshield Cloak, Closer," and it was the first UBM special reward he'd ever acquired. Its defense was impenetrable, but he hadn't taken it out to protect himself against the light.

He had no intention of using it to protect himself at all.

What he'd chosen for this battle was...

"Liferend Shield Formation."

...Another form of the skill that created an impenetrable space.

It was an offensive ability that attacked using countless floating barriers as weapons. But instead of using them for offense, Figaro turned them into stepping stones for him to run on top of.

The next moment, Figaro dashed along the path of blades, speeding straight down it as though that was the only way he would ever reach the head of the monster bathed in light. The speed at which he approached it, defying the laws of gravity, was so great that even Gloria at its most powerful couldn't follow his movement.

However, it did know that the enemy was getting closer.

"...GHHaaaAAaAaAaAAAAggGhHHhhhhhHHH!" Its response was quick — at supersonic speeds, it focused the one-horn's power to strengthen the light its body emitted to its utmost maximum, becoming a luminous storm that evaporated the shield-blades it touched.

"FRUuuSsssSsSHheEeEEEAAAAaaaAarRrRgGggGHHHH!" If Gloria's thoughts were human, they might have looked like this: He runs, but has no destination. My body has no weak points, and no one can break through my defense, so if I continue destroying his path, he will eventually lose his way down and fall to my breath.

This conclusion was not a wrong one. Gloria knew its own powers and already had a grasp of what the enemy could do.

From its perspective, there was no flaw in this assessment. There was simply no opening for the enemy to take advantage of.

Figaro had no chance of emerging victorious here.

However, that was only true if Gloria and Figaro were the only ones fighting.

"Now," Figaro said as he leaped towards Gloria's shining form like a moth seeking a flame.

His evaporation was unavoidable.

The battle's end approached... and Figaro landed on the one-horn's head.

"...?" Gloria couldn't understand.

It simply couldn't comprehend why this was happening. After all, all three of its heads had their eyes closed, so it couldn't see or understand that there was in fact a single opening in the Fang of Gloria — a part of the head that wasn't covered in the conducting scales.

The place where Figaro was standing had no scales to release the light.

It was a place where the one-horn's right eye used to be.

The part that Foltesla had given his all to attack, and the part where his melted Hihi'irokane greatsword had landed.

Even Gloria's breath wasn't enough to evaporate the Mythical metal — it had only melted it. The metal had already cooled, hardened, and closed the wound, forming a scab that made it impossible for the scales to regenerate.

Hot as it was, Gloria's light didn't let heat leak out. Because of this, it couldn't melt the scab, for its light couldn't touch it.

Indeed — the proof that Foltesla had been fighting to protect what was dear to him until the bitter end was the one opening in this armor of deadly light.

If it was truly one against one, Gloria would have won the day — but it was never like that from the start. This was a duel between Figaro and Foltesla.

“Burn, My Soul — Cor Leonis!” For the third and final time, Figaro activated his ultimate skill.

He followed it with Instant Wield, which he used to equip the Ancient Legendary gauntlet called “Seismic Fist, Bull-Lament” on his left hand, and the Mythical short spear as dark as the void called “Extinction Dragon Spear, Drag-Fin” in his right.

Figaro had equipped the strongest weapons he had.

“FHR—” Gloria tried to throw him off, but it was already too late.

“Lament Crash!” Figaro let out a cry as he pulverized the Mythical metal below him and the head along with it using the hyper-vibrating fist.

The Mythical metal shattered, and the head and most of the upper jaw were blown away.

Despite that, the one-horn was still alive, and its entire body was still clad in light.

“Tears of the End: Drag-Fin.”

Figaro wasted no time, didn’t hold back, and didn’t hesitate to sacrifice his Mythical weapon.

The Extinction Dragon Spear went straight into the one-horn's forcefully-opened throat, infecting all of the one-horn's cells.

The concept of Drag-Fin's power was forcefully initiating apoptosis — the self-destruction of cells. In exchange for the spear's obliteration, the power of this skill was amplified such that it spread faster than you could blink.

"GHH." The three-horn was quick to act.

It went and tore off the one-horned head before the infection spread any further.

All things considered, it was too late to save that head, anyway.

It crumbled, turned into light, and vanished, not leaving a single word or sound behind.

◇◆

This was the conclusion to the battle with the one-horned head. Gloria had lost one of its heads, as well as its greatest weapons — Overdrive and Fang of Gloria.

However, Figaro was fading fast because of his own ability, too.

The one-horn and Figaro had effectively defeated each other.

"Foltesla..." he muttered. This was also the conclusion to their duel. However...

"...Which one of us won?"

Figaro was the one who'd defeated the one-horn. However, Foltesla had given him the necessary data, as well as his final chance at victory. That meant that this time attack was invalid.

"I can't say that I won this on my own..."

And...

"Let's... Let's have another duel." ...Figaro was certain that this wasn't their promised fight, after all.

"One day... when you return to this world... let's have a real duel." As he hoped for the day to come sooner than later, Figaro's body dissolved into particles of light.

The ultimate skill had burned off all of his HP. All that was left was for him to vanish, and as he did, he looked out of the canyon — at the person who was watching over his duel.

“This is it for me. I leave the rest to you, Shu.”

Entrusting the battle to his other good friend, the Over Gladiator, Figaro, took his leave from the battle against the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria.

Act Seven: The Gaze of the Moon and the Evil Eye

Kingdom of Altar, Nowest Canyon

"Looks like it's over," said Tsukuyo. The roar of the battle between Figaro and Gloria faded, and there had been nothing but silence for a whole three minutes now.

"Kage, check things out for me," she continued.

"I have," Eishiro replied. "The battle is indeed over. Figaro received the death penalty, and Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria is missing the one-horned head."

"Wow, he works fast. And it went about as we thought it would."

The most troublesome head had vanished, and Figaro — a man they couldn't hope to compete with for the MVP title — had gotten the death penalty.

They'd also signed a contract with Shu, so there was no chance that he would interfere.

Tsukuyo concluded that now was the time to charge.

"We're up next, darlings. My ultimate skill won't work on this one, so let's take it down with our numbers. Are we ready?"

That wasn't even a question to them. The group who bore the mark of the crescent moon and closed eye had been waiting for this.

All told, the Lunar Society had gathered thirty-four max level Masters here.

One might expect them to be in five parties of six and one party of four; they were actually in seventeen parties of two, which was slightly unorthodox.

Fifteen of the parties were pairs of casters and speed-based vanguards. One of the two remaining parties consisted of the High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso and King of Assassins, Eishiro Tsukikage.

The last one was made up of a member who would buff everyone alongside Tsukuyo, and...

“It’s been a while, Shijima. Think you’re good to go?” Tsukuyo asked.

“Of course,” replied the other half of the final party — Myth Rider, Ichiro Shijima.

He was the ex-captain of the battle corps and effectively The Lunar Society’s third in command. In his hands he held a spear and an elliptical shield: both of them were halves of his Embryo, Juno of the Type Maiden/Elder-Arms.

He was also mounted, but not on his trusted Aries Leo. Instead he was riding a replica Prism Steed.

“Where’s your sheep-lion?” asked Tsukuyo. “You work best with him, no?”

“I gave Gringham to my wife,” Ichiro replied. “This foe is unlike any other. I’m afraid it would harm him even beyond the Jewel’s auto-retrieve safety mechanism. Also, Gringham simply cannot enter the dreaded field.”

Monsters below level 100 were instantly killed by the Fatal Field. No one who knew that would consider bringing their tamed monsters to this fight.

“Most importantly, my son would be upset if Gringham died. It’s best to let him protect my family.”

“Hmm. You’re such a dad,” Tsukuyo said, noting that he seemed to be enjoying his life in this world.

She then faced her group and said, “We’re all level 500s or Superior Jobs. Gloria’s field won’t affect us, and that meathead took out the annoying head that spat light everywhere.”

All it had left was the ability to enhance its stats. This meant that its lethal abilities were now completely nullified.

“All we have left to beat is a big lizard with nothing left but sheer strength. We should take it easy,” Tsukuyo said, as she headed towards the Nowest Canyon followed by her thirty-three adherents. As she did, she looked at the nearby battleship — Shu’s Embryo, Baldr.

“Just like we agreed, don’t step in until we’re done with it,” Tsukuyo said.

“Yeah, yeah. Are you sure, though?” Shu asked.

“You won’t even get a turn. Just sit there and wait until we get both special rewards,” she asserted with the look of a smug, crafty fox before her expression changed. “Also... I don’t think that bag of trouble is out of tricks. If we both go and get wiped out by some new, ridiculous power, it’d all be over.”

Shu listened silently as Tsukuyo continued.

“I do wanna get something for myself out of this, but... if we don’t beat it, everything we’ve built here in this kingdom would come to nothing.”

“Should I go first?”

“I don’t need your consideration. But yeah, I’m counting on you if something happens.”

“...I’ll clean up your mess.”

“We won’t leave one.” Grinning like a malicious spirit, Tsukuyo leaped into the fray.

◇◆

Following its battle against Figaro and the loss of its one-horned head, Gloria was lying at the bottom of the canyon.

One of its most important body parts was now gone. The loss of its head presented a far greater problem than the recent loss of its heart. That organ regenerated in a day, but the head showed absolutely no sign of returning; it seemed like it had lost the title of “three-headed dragon” forever.

However, all of its other injuries had already started regenerating, and its skeletal frame was reshaping itself to maintain a balanced structure.

The three-horn silently examined the place where the one-horn used to be.

The wound was now completely shut.

After the restructuring of its skeleton, Gloria looked like it had always been a two-headed dragon.

It had lost a part of itself — both a function and a sibling that had been with it for over a millennium — but the three-horn’s eyes held not even a hint of sadness.

“Ghroah...” Gloria let out a growl which, if translated into a human tongue, may have been something like “Go and wait for us.”

Gloria then stood up. Its left hindleg had regenerated enough to support its immense weight once again.

Despite all the regeneration and the reshaping of its skeleton, its HP hadn’t returned — both because it was simply how Gloria functioned, and because this was advantageous for it.

The name of the three-horn’s skill was “Resurgence,” and it empowered the dragon as its HP went down. Losing a third of itself had damaged it immensely, making the skill significantly more powerful than it had been when it fought Figaro.

Suddenly, Gloria felt the presence of someone entering its Fatal Field, announcing that the next enemy had arrived.

A moment later, countless offensive spells rained down on it from every direction.

All of them were of the lightning element, which was notable for its ability to ignore physical defenses.

This was a choice based on Gloria’s high END, and the ones responsible for it were none other than The Lunar Society.

“SHHeEEeeEAAAaaAaaArRghhhHh!” the two-horn — the one responsible for the Fatal Field — roared as it sensed all thirty-four of its enemies surrounding it.

When Gloria’s one-horned head was alive, the most difficult thing to do was fight it with a large group. Now that it was gone, all that had been reversed. — the dragon could be easily overwhelmed.

It no longer possessed the breath that could evaporate countless people at once. Its wounds no longer released light and the Fatal Field had no effect on levels 500 and above, meaning that the dragon had to lower the numbers using its claws.

As it was now, Gloria had incredible stats, but no special means of attack. Its stats still grew as its HP decreased, but its offense remained lacking in variety. UBMs were often defined by their unique abilities, so it could be said that Gloria as it was now — with nothing but pure power — was at its weakest point.

Still, its stats were no laughing matter. Though they outnumbered it, Gloria’s attackers right now were far weaker than the dragon. Its current attack power was more than enough to tear through even metal armor like paper and kill the wearer easily.

Thanks to its Fatal Field, Gloria already knew where its enemies were and what they were doing, as well.

With the sole exception of the King of Assassins, they all moved at subsonic speeds — so Gloria, which could now break the sound barrier, could easily catch up to them and kill them.

As it prepared to do just that...

“Lunar Divider Field: Faint Light.”

...The day transformed into a night with a cloudy sky, and a single ray of moonlight peeking through those clouds shone down on Gloria.

Suddenly, the dragon felt its body become as heavy as lead.

“SHhEWhrRoAahh...!” Its supersonic speed had dropped to subsonic level.

“Well, what a relief. It actually works,” Tsukuyo said.

This was a variation of Kaguya’s Lunar Divider Field. It focused the moonlight through a hole in the clouds, narrowing its targets and effect.

Normally, Lunar Divider Field divided any numerical statistics hostile to Tsukuyo by six, but Faint Light focused the effect on just one. In exchange, the effect became extremely hard to resist the effect with levels, stats, or skills. The result was so difficult that not even an SUBM like Gloria could resist it.

The number Tsukuyo focused on this time was the enemy’s AGI.

During the battle with Figaro, Gloria had broken its shackles and reached supersonic speeds, but Faint Light reduced it back to subsonic. Gloria’s stats were still powerful, and a single one of its attacks was equal to a high-rank Embryo’s ultimate skill, but that meant little if it couldn’t land a single hit.

“Keep those spells coming, casters. Vanguards, do as we planned and carry the casters while attacking it with Gems.”

The group of thirty followed Tsukuyo’s orders. They were still in the same caster and speed-focused vanguard pairs as before, with the latter carrying the former at subsonic speeds. Gloria now was no faster than them, and the casters attacked it with lightning magic, which was relatively unaffected by defense. The vanguards assisted them with magic Gems containing spells which dealt fixed damage — 800, to be exact.

That may have seemed like an absurdly small amount in a high-level battle such as this, but with Gloria’s high defense and The Lunar Society’s immense numbers, it had quite a noticeable effect.

They were rather expensive, however. During their preparation, Tsukuyo had gathered every Gem she could find and made non-max level adherents who could create them produce as many as they could. As a result, each of the vanguard fighters in the battle had 1,000 Gems each.

However, little strokes fell great oaks. The combined lightning attacks from the casters and vanguards' Gem spells slowly but surely whittled away Gloria's HP.

It was approximately 70,000,000 at the start, but now Figaro and The Lunar Society had dropped it below 50,000,000. It would take over 60,000 Gems or spells dealing 800 damage each to defeat it now — but to achieve that, each of the thirty members would have to have 2,000 Gems.

The number might be lowered by the additional power of lightning spells, but the casters were limited by their MP, and there was always the risk that some of them would fail to dodge and suffer the death penalty.

However, all that mattered right now was bringing down Gloria's HP below half.

The Lunar Society already knew that Gloria was only as strong as it was because of the three-horn's skill, so if they were to get rid of that head, its defense should return to its original state, when even the Babylonian Battlegroup could hurt it with no trouble.

At that point, Gloria would be completely out of special abilities, making it a relatively easy kill.

"ShOoooOaArRghh..." Gloria let out a roar that seemed full of irritation. It was under attack by near-constant flashes of magic, unable to catch up to any of the insects swarming it. This was surely the most humiliating thing it had ever experienced. It was made even worse by the single human that, instead of using any magic, was just lunging in close and poking it with the butt end of his spear. The bald man switched between doing that and bashing the canyon or the ground with the shield in his other hand.

That served to make Gloria even more irritated.

Tsukuyo, their leader, was being carried by Tsukikage, grinning as she said, "We've got the pattern down." If Gloria could see her, its anger would reach even greater heights.

"It sure got a lot faster, though," she added. Kaguya's Faint Light was still actively dividing Gloria's speed, but as its HP decreased, its stats increased. It wasn't out of the question that it would break the sound barrier once it reached 60% HP.

"Bind it for me, will you?" Tsukuyo said.

“As you command,” Eishiro replied. As before, the crux of the offensive here was the spells and fixed damage Gems from the thirty casters and vanguards. This strategy relied on Gloria being unable to hit them, and that was why Tsukuyo had reduced Gloria’s AGI to a sixth of its maximum.

However, she wasn’t the only one meant to keep the dragon from reaching supersonic speeds again.

“The Shades and Death, They Beckon — Erlkönig.” The shadows created by the Lunar Divider Field’s night became countless hands that wrapped around Gloria. They both hampered its movements and sunk through its scales, damaging it from underneath them. If the one-horned head was still present, shadows that wounded the dragon’s entire body would have been completely off the table, but the power of the light was lost to Gloria forever.

It didn’t end at just the shadows, however.

The same bald man that had been poking Gloria’s scales from the back of a replica Prism Steed — Myth Rider, Ichiro Shijima — unleashed his ultimate skill.

“Binding Vows, Sought and Linked — Juno!” A moment later, seals manifested all over Gloria — specifically, the parts Ichiro had poked with the butt-end of his spear.

Simultaneously, similar seals appeared on the various points of the canyon that he’d touched with his shield.

Suddenly, Gloria completely stopped in place, as though it was being dragged by something from every direction.

These were attracting seals — the power of Ichiro’s Embryo, Juno.

The seals created by the butt-end of the spear were “male,” while the ones made by the shield were “female.” Upon activating the skill, a powerful attractive force would be created between them.

Though a single pair of seals could be shaken off with just 2,000 STR, Ichiro could produce many pairs, limited only by his SP, and by binding the target from many directions he could significantly increase the bind’s power. Eventually, it would become so strong that the target would become unable to move an inch. Applying seals was particularly easy against larger enemies, and with enough of them, even UBMs would be rendered completely immobile.

He rode around and planted seals to bind the enemy in place, making it an easy target for the rest of the group.

This was the fighting style of the ex-captain of The Lunar Society's battle corps, Ichiro Shijima.

"Sh-ShrRooOaaArghHhhHh!" The two-horn roared as Gloria tried to move, but it couldn't shake off the force of the attraction. The number of seals set on the dragon easily exceeded a hundred, and even this super-Mythical creature had trouble escaping the binding.

Due to the SP cost, Ichiro could never place this many seals by himself, but the group buffer riding the Prism Steed with him was also using items to restore his SP, and this allowed him to create far more seals than he usually could.

Once Gloria stopped, the remaining members became even more aggressive.

Eishiro's shadow hands burned and strangled the three-horn as Ichiro placed more and more seals. Gloria's STR grew as its HP decreased, so the extra seals were necessary to keep it bound. Additionally, Tsukuyo had switched the target of her division from AGI to STR.

The dragon couldn't move an inch, and The Lunar Society had taken complete control of the situation.

This could never have happened if the one-horn was still alive, but... there was no point in imagining such a scenario now.

Gloria was completely cornered.

A few minutes passed after this battle had become completely one-sided.

"Its HP is about to fall below 50%," said Eishiro, using his Reveal skill.

"Really? Wow, we're fast," replied Tsukuyo.

So far, Gloria had been unable to fight back directly, and even most of the rocks it was somehow able to shatter and scatter were blocked by Eishiro's shadows. Any injured party members were quickly healed by Tsukuyo.

Gloria's stats continued to grow, but the situation didn't change. If this continued, Gloria would surely fall.

The moment Eishiro thought that, Gloria's HP finally fell below 50%... and all the members besides Tsukuyo and Tsukikage instantly died.

The level 500 elites suddenly and unexpectedly became bits of light.

"Hm...? Faint Light," said Tsukuyo, as she recovered from her moment of shock and instantly switched the target of her division skill from STR back to AGI.

That was exactly the right move, as proven by the slowed, but still-subsonic claw that cut the air right where Eishiro had just been.

“...Is this a joke?” Tsukuyo said, as she was carried around by Eishiro to re-evaluate the situation.

The fifteen offensive pairs were all dead.

The one extra support-buffer was dead.

Ichiro had also died, undoing all his attraction seals.

The situation they had constructed had been completely undone.

“We lost thirty-two, and the only survivors are Kage and I... the Superior Jobs.” She re-examined the situation. “A barrier that kills everyone based on level... and enhancement based on lost HP...” Then she re-examined Gloria’s powers. “...That’s just not faaiir.” This information was enough for Tsukuyo to fully understand what the dragon had done.

Basically...

“Enhancing the stats is fine and all, but you just can’t do that with the death field...” Tsukuyo now knew that Gloria had an ace up its sleeve far worse than she could ever imagine.

◆◆◆

???

The dragon that went on to become the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria was a true rarity, in that it was a child of two UBMs and inherited powers from both.

However, neither of its parents possessed powers even close to Gloria’s.

Its father, Lightdragon King, Drag-Shine could only breathe light from his mouth, while its mother, Deathdragon King, Drag-Death could only instakill people up to level 250 and monsters up to level 50, and there was a limit to how well she could negate damage coming from outside the field.

There were two reasons why Gloria had become a true monstrosity with similar, but far more fearsome, powers.

The first was bodily modification by an external agent.

The enhancement of its Overdrive and Fatal Field, as well as Resurgence and ■■■■■■■■■■■■■■ didn’t come from within — they were all part of the UBM control AI’s, Jabberwock’s, design.

Jabberwock designed UBMs and used ■■■■■ to transform standard monsters into them... but on rare occasions, he used ■■■■■ on a single monster several times.

Theoretically, each use of ■■■■■ could empower an UBM more and more, but this came with disadvantages.

For example, too many uses could cause a data collapse and subsequent destruction, even in monsters with great potential.

In fact, a monster could only become a designer UBM after it was of an appropriate level to survive a single one, and the ones that followed were harder and harder to survive.

Jabberwock generally avoided doing this, since he didn't want to risk losing a perfectly good UBM.

He had attempted this less than a hundred times during the past two millennia, and his successes didn't even add up to ten, even if you included the irregular future case where he would give one for both a mother and her fetus.

However, Gloria was a special case.

It had survived not one, not two, but several uses of ■■■■■. It had the makings of a creature that could prevail against fatal odds and defeat countless monsters and UBMs to finally become an SUBM.

That was all according to Jabberwock's predictions. However, there was one factor that he hadn't accounted for.

The second reason why Gloria had ended up this way was its ability to create skills.

Such an ability wasn't unique in this world. Certain high-rank and Superior Jobs — most notably the "The One" series — could create their own skills, as well. Even standard UBMs could develop new abilities as their powers grew.

Gloria had simply done the same thing.

The skill it'd used against Figaro — Zenith Dragon's Shining Field: Fang of Gloria — was one of them. Ever since creating it, the dragon had kept this ability a secret from even Jabberwock, the one who'd given it power.

However, there was another skill it had woven, and it was one it simply couldn't hide.

This was a skill that applied its stat enhancement to the Fatal Field, raising the level bar that had to be surpassed. Its name was simply “True Fatal Field.”

It was a truly fearsome ability, born from mixing the powers inherited from its parents and the ones given to it by Jabberwock.

Over a thousand years ago, before Jabberwock retrieved Gloria, it had fought an Irregularity, was badly hurt, and used it.

The True Fatal Field instantly killed the Irregularity, and the Resources it had received let it break past level 100.

Jabberwock had been observing this battle and learned of this ability, but as fearsome as it was, he found it appropriate. This was one of the reasons why he’d considered Gloria to be the most complete boss monster, and he’d thought that it was a fitting power for a creature with that title to have.

Allowed to retain this ability, Gloria waited for over a millennium for its deployment, and had now once more used the fearsome True Fatal Field that had extinguished even an Irregularity.

◇◆◇

Kingdom of Altar, Nowest Canyon

The single eye of the two-horn released a sinister shine as it spread the True Fatal Field. Looking up at the evil eye, Tsukuyo muttered, “Ohh, it’s so over...”

Still carried by Eishiro at supersonic speeds, she let out a sigh.

Gloria now had stats that surpassed Mythical-level, nearly all of her group was dead, her plan had collapsed, and there was an overwhelming gap between the dragon and the two survivors. Though Eishiro was a battle-focused Superior Job, he didn’t have much offensive ability, and his job skills were focused on fights against other players, while his Embryo was anti-group, making it inefficient against powerful single enemies such as Gloria.

With Tsukuyo, the reasons were even more obvious. Her job was focused on healing and support, while her Embryo was all about debuffs. Also, Kaguya’s ultimate skill could only be used against Masters, which rendered it completely useless against the dragon.

To make matters worse, even if they somehow fought and damaged Gloria, they would only increase the limit of the Fatal Field, and it would eventually catch up even to Superior Jobs such as them.

“I dunno the max level limit on it, but I guess we can’t leave the two-horn be...” If it was left alive, in the worst case scenario it could develop a Fatal Field that killed all those below level 1,000 or even 2,000, and negated all damage coming to it from anywhere outside the field, becoming effectively immortal.

A Gloria like that would become a deadly calamity in its purest sense.

The two-horn had to die. Like with the one-horn, letting it live could potentially erase all chances of ever killing it. However, doing so would leave the three-horn, and it was easy to imagine how high its stats would grow.

Needless to say, it would be too much for just the two of them.

“Yep. This is all we’ve got. We can’t beat the three-head, and the plan we had is in shambles now” Tsukuyo shook her head, as though giving up. “So let’s just go all-in on taking out the two-horn.”

With a wicked smile, she declared that she would end the head with the most fearsome skill.

She’d only given up on getting both of the remaining special rewards — but not on victory.

“We’ll retreat once the two-horn’s gone. Then, we’ll just leave the rest to the trash panda. I’ve got no clue how a STR idiot like him will even fight it once it moves several times faster than the speed of sound, though.”

Tsukuyo had handed the conclusion of the battle over to Shu, but that also meant that she’d decided that taking out the two-horn was her role in all of this.

“Kage, I’m using that. Be a dear and buy me about three minutes. Oh, and get ready to help me with rehab after we’re back.”

“As you command, Lady Tsukuyo,” Eishiro nodded before activating a skill. “Shadow Cradle.”

He then sank her into his own shadow.

Eishiro’s shadow was a separate realm that he often used for movement or covert operations. However, the shadow he’d sunk Tsukuyo into was different from his usual shadows, in that it was meant chiefly to protect the one inside. It was a shadow shelter he couldn’t use on himself, or on any unwilling target.

No external forces could affect it as long as Eishiro was alive and the one inside it didn't wish to leave. This made the shadow the safest place against Gloria — the menace before them.

Alas, it would only last until Gloria killed him.

"Three minutes," he said to himself. "Heheh, Lady Tsukuyo's requests are as absurd as ever."

With Tsukuyo in hiding, Kaguya's Lunar Divider Field: Faint Light was undone, and Gloria could now move at several times the speed of sound.

It was now even faster than Eishiro — a speed-focused Superior Job.

In fact, one of Gloria's claws was approaching him at immense speeds right this very moment.

"But fulfilling her absurd requests is my duty," he sighed, as he took control of his shadows to create a brief wall, then took evasive action.

This let him avoid a direct hit from the claw, but the shockwave alone blew away his left arm.

Paying it no mind, he used his legs and shadows to evade the attacks that followed.

In a supersonic battle, one's experienced time was drawn-out, so three minutes was actually a long time for Eishiro. Regardless, he would fulfill his mistress' request.

"If I am unable to buy a mere three minutes... I am unworthy of standing at her side."

His leg was blown away, and he simply replaced it with a leg of shadow.

His arteries were torn, and he wrapped them up in shadows to stop the bleeding.

Replacing more and more of his body with shadow, he kept moving, buying the time he needed.

"If the lady ordered it, even seven days and nights would be nothing to me." The King of Assassins who served the High Priestess continued to buy time with his unyielding will.

◇◆

Within the world of shadow, a poem-like voice rang out.

The holy one walks the endless path. The path of the seeker and the path of the savior. The path on which she seeks her conviction. And at the end of the path, she will grant salvation.

Tsukuyo was reciting something in a language completely unlike her native tongue. It was a chant, but it was fundamentally different from the common magic skill.

The users were free to pick the words used in standard Chants. All that mattered was that they said something out loud and expended MP.

This moment is the end of life. This moment is the end of the path. The conclusion of the holy one's journey. The point from which the holy one shall return.

However, the chant Tsukuyo now spoke was quite different.

It was one of the world's few Ancient Spells — a kind of magic that had their own specific chants.

As she spoke it, light appeared from within her and gathered into an orb in her palm.

It was the same kind of light as the one created by the church's holy men at Claymill — same as the rite of divine punishment, Judgement Pillar.

The holy one now lays down her burden. She puts away that which she had sought. And, she embraces instead a new desire.

But as the chant continued, the ball's light changed in nature.

While Judgement Pillar's light was Sun-like, this one was dimmer... like the light of a full moon in the night sky.

All that she gained in her life. All that she gained on her path. All this shall be sacrificed for this single light she so desires. This light carries her wish for the salvation of others. Otherwise, it cannot be released.

She finally concluded the chant...

"The Return of the Holy One: Ulfaria Eltram."

...And spoke the name of a miracle older than even the pre-ancient civilization — the name of the ultimate job skill of the entire priest grouping.

◇◆

Three minutes. The short time that felt far too long was finally over, and a particular part of the shadow rose up to reveal Tsukuyo, carrying an orb of what seemed like pure moonlight.

She solemnly glanced at it once before looking up to see a shadow standing before her.

"..." It was a man who'd lost all his limbs, replaced them with shadow, and whose torso bore several fatal wounds.

For a hefty price, Eishiro Tsukikage had bought the three minutes.

"Good work, Kage," said Tsukuyo. Not saying a word back — he couldn't, due to the hole in his throat — he gave her a faint smile... and dissolved into bits of light.

Tsukuyo saw her confidant off with a smile of her own.

"Anyway, two-horn, our turn is almost done." A moment later, the orb of light in her hands pulsated as though it had found its target.

Gloria didn't just sit and watch, however.

The dragon moved and split Tsukuyo in half with a horizontal claw strike.

Indeed, it was more like it obliterated her entire lower half.

The wound was obviously fatal. As the High Priestess, Tsukuyo had the potential to quickly patch herself up using Mercy of the Holy, but Gloria would crush her head before she could.

Though... Tsukuyo herself would soon be unable to use that skill.

"SHUuuOoOeEeeeAaaAAaRrGhhHhh! Nh...?" Before Gloria finished Tsukuyo off, the two-horn's single eye noticed the orb of light approaching it.

Slowly but surely, it floated towards the two-horn.

Gloria's instincts took over, urging it to avoid the tiny orb. It could feel it was dangerous and distanced itself from it at the speed of sound.

However, the orb of light moved along with it, catching up to the dragon and continuing its steady approach.

Never letting Gloria gain any distance on it, the orb of light came closer and closer to it.

"This is my first time using it... so that's what it's like." Tsukuyo grinned, lying on the ground as nothing but a severed top half.

That light was Ulfaria Eltram — the double-edged sword wielded by Hierophants and High Priestesses that poured everything they'd built and, indeed, their entire lives into a single attack.

An ultimate spell that came at the cost of all the user's job levels.

Even to the immortal Masters, this was the equivalent of sacrificing a huge part of your own life and time. The reward for this was an inescapable spell that dealt a fixed amount of damage.

It would land no matter how fast the target was, and though the idea of fixed damage might recall the Gems employed earlier, this was quite different in that it dealt quite a bit more damage — 3,000 for every level sacrificed.

With Tsukuyo's total level being 1,026... it would deal an astounding 3,000,000 damage.

"SHheEeeEEAaAaaAAaaaRrgGhhHHhhH!" Gloria also realized how potent and abnormal the orb was, but it was unable to do anything about it.

Even killing Tsukuyo herself couldn't stop it now, for it had already been released.

However, Tsukuyo's death penalty was already set in stone.

The moment Ulfaria Eltram reached its target, Tsukuyo's level would drop to 0.

She'd become susceptible to the Fatal Field again, and even if that didn't kill her, the resulting HP drop and her fatal injury would.

Tsukuyo's death was certain, but the fate of Gloria's two-horned head still hung in the balance.

"...It won't be enough, will it?" she mused. Though Ulfaria Eltram dealt immense damage, Gloria's HP was simply on a different level. Fighting Figaro and The Lunar Society took it below half, but it was still about 35,000,000.

This meant that this spell would be far from fatal. "Well, then, you know what to do."

"Indeed we do. Lunar Divider Field: Faint Light."

Of course, neither Tsukuyo nor her Embryo, Kaguya, would allow her spell to fail.

The Maiden cast Faint Light one last time, switching from AGI to HP.

Indeed — not even HP was immune to Faint Light.

Tsukuyo avoided using this while the entire group was still around to prevent Gloria becoming too powerful; she didn't use it after they died because dividing AGI was the only way she could stay alive, and because enhancing the Fatal Field too much could kill her.

However, speed didn't matter to Ulfaria Eltram, and there was no point in worrying about the limits of the Fatal Field after she'd cast a spell that already made her as good as dead.

Gloria's HP had been reduced from 35,000,000 to a little under 6,000,000.

"You measured human life by level, killed thousands by level..."

Ulfaria Eltram landed, dealing 3,000,000 damage — half of Gloria's remaining HP.

"...So it's only right that you die by level."

Needless to say, the two-horned head vanished without a trace.

◇◆

The two-horn vanished, and the True Fatal Field was undone.

At the same time, Tsukuyo, who was now level 0, was fading due to her now-meager HP. Her body was quickly turning into bits of light, but she displayed no concern as she checked her status windows.

"Ah. I'm level 0, but I've still got my jobs," she said. "I thought I'd have to get them all again. This means that the only rehab I'll need will be powerleveling."

Tsukuyo grinned, highly satisfied with the outcome.

She'd expected to have to get the High Priestess job again. Though, that wouldn't have been difficult, considering that most of the country's holy men died at Claymill and she was the only viable candidate in the entire kingdom.

"My work here is done. I'm leaving the rest to the trash panda!" Entrusting the fight against the three-horn at its most troublesome to Shu, she vanished in satisfaction.

But right before she did...

"...You better protect the capital. I'll be really mad if you don't clean up my mess."

Saying that with a hint of prayer in her voice, Tsukuyo Fuso returned to reality.

Act Eight: Unmatched God of War — Baldr

???

“Twin Quintuple Cannons linked to ammo storage. Loading all gunports with DD Shells. Equipping Stardust Genocider with F Warheads. Firing preparations complete.”

“Fire while it’s still recovering.”

“Roger. War God Ship, Baldr is engaging the enemy.”

◇◆◇

Kingdom of Altar, Nowest Canyon

After Tsukuyo took out the two-horn head, Gloria collapsed and fell motionless.

It was taking time to restore the part of its body that Ulfaria Eltram had blown away along with its head, as well as to process what had just happened. In silence, Gloria pondered the fact that it had lost both the one-horned and the two-horned heads, leaving only the three-horn.

This was the first time in its long life that it had felt true solitude.

Its senses had been greatly affected, as well. With the loss of the two-horn came the loss of its passive Fatal Field, along with its abilities to sense things within that field and to block attacks coming from outside it.

The millennia-old SUBM had never felt like this, and it was greatly perplexed.

That was why he saw this moment as his opportunity.

Cutting the air, countless missiles flew towards Gloria — but alas, they were too slow.

The dragon had about 17,000,000 HP left, which was less than a fourth of its maximum, but in exchange its stats had grown over four-fold. Its STR, for example, was over 160,000, and its other stats were just as ludicrously high. Its AGI let it move at four times the speed of sound, so the incoming missiles were far too slow to be a threat. And even if they did hit it, its END, which exceeded 120,000, would not let any damage pass.

Knowing that, Gloria casually brushed the missiles aside, only for them to burst and release a light that blinded it.

The missiles weren't standard high-explosives, but F Warheads — flash bombs which exploded in a light so intense it could permanently destroy a human being's eyesight. As a creature that breathed light, Gloria had high resistance to the element; it was caught off-guard, however, so its eyes were still burned. It shut its eyelids as quickly as it could, but the flash bombs continued to rain down with only brief pauses in between volleys. Every time Gloria tried to open its eyes, all it could see was white.

This was a clear opening in its defenses, and it wasn't missed — a rain of shells fell on Gloria, actually breaking through its 120,000 END and damaging its HP.

The DD Shells, as they were called, had all been created by a single skill, and their effect was the same as that of the magic Gems used by The Lunar Society — they inflicted direct damage.

Its HP, already low after two taxing battles, was now falling even lower.

"GrrRoOoOaaAaARrRgHHhhH!" Fast as it now was, Gloria could've easily avoided all the shells... but it was now blinded. If it opened its eyes, it saw nothing but the white of the F Warheads. Up until recently, attacks from outside a certain range were useless against it, but with the loss of the two-horn, Gloria had lost its Fatal Field — its deadly ability that doubled as an impenetrable defense.

It had no choice but to bear the rain of shells.

Losing its field had also made it woefully incapable of assessing its surroundings and sensing the presence of enemies, and Gloria fully understood that its opponent was attacking now precisely because he was aware of that exact fact.

"Ghoarrh..." It could easily escape the shells. Gloria could cover a whole kilometel in a single second. It had the potential to escape the enemy's effective range, but it just couldn't do it.

Though Gloria could evade attacks, it wasn't allowed to flee from battle. It had to obey the orders of "Head straight for the royal capital" and "Fight every enemy you encounter."

These commands were etched into Gloria's existence as part of a contract with Jabberwock — the being that had saved it from the Skydragon King's servants and had given it power as a UBM.

The dragon was fundamentally incapable of running away merely for survival, but even without its orders, Gloria would have never chosen to do so. It prided itself on being the most powerful creature in existence — more powerful than either of its parents and even the Skydragon King who'd murdered them. It was convinced that it could defeat and surpass any creature that stood before it, and disregarded any other options.

Though, perhaps it would've been different if the other heads were still alive. The one-horn wanted to eradicate everyone with its light, while the two-horn was a coward who killed other creatures to protect itself.

The three-horn, however, wanted nothing but to increase its own power, exercise that power, and prove that nothing could stand in its way.

Thus, Gloria would never choose to retreat with only its three-horn head left. Without a sound, the dragon chose to just let the shells hit it.

The DD Shells raining down on it were powerful — a hundred of them were enough to reduce its HP to 15,000,000.

"...GHhHAaaAAaaAArRrrrGhhH!" In exchange for taking damage, Gloria was able to determine the direction the shells were coming from.

Still blinded, it sped towards the attacker, ignoring all the shells still falling on it.

Having lost two heads and most of its HP, Gloria had become an incarnation of pure power. Now, it charged towards its enemy.

Each step made the earth quake, and the walls of the canyon didn't even slow it down. No matter what stood in its way, it would arrive at its target in a mere handful of seconds, extinguish the annoyance, and continue on its path towards the capital.

With its stats grown so high, even Superior Jobs paled in comparison. As it was, nothing could stop Gloria.

At least... Not yet.

◇

Meanwhile, the attacker — King of Destruction, Shu Starling — sensed Gloria's approach. "Guess it's on its way, huh?"

“Hostile target, Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, is approaching this location. Calculating time until arrival based on speed and obstacles... Roughly 32 seconds until contact.”

“That’s faster than expected... I guess its stats went up by that much, huh?”

Re-evaluating his opponent, Shu removed his raccoon costume, leaving him in only his innerwear; now clearly visible was a handsome man with long hair and a well-proportioned body of toned, tough muscle.

“We got any more DD Shells?” Shu asked.

“Fifteen DD Shells remaining,” Baldr replied.

“I’m pretty sure those are the only shells that’ll do anything to it at this point. Damn thing is probably tougher than Fatoum’s Mountain Puppet and Ultrahard Regalia.”

Baldr could produce its own ammo, and though the materials required could be costly, the destructive potential was immense. Despite that, the only ones that were of any use against Gloria’s current form were the blinding F Warheads and the fixed damage DD Shells. Incendiary? Armor-piercing? Those weren’t even worth bothering with.

And if shells weren’t an option...

“I guess we’ll have to duke it out.”

...He had to rely on his other weapon — the greatest STR of any master.

Though, at the moment his base STR was 80,000, and even with the 100,000 he could achieve with equipment bonuses, it wouldn’t be enough to even harm the dragon. He also had no means of actually damaging a being that was several times faster than the speed of sound.

Gloria, on the other hand, could turn him to dust with a single attack.

And this was why Shu removed his costume — he would now equip his ultimate gear, which would solve all three of those problems.

“Baldr, we’re using that.”

“Full Offense Mode can currently be activated for 60 continuous minutes.”

“That’s more than enough.” A grin spread across his face...

“Unmatched God of War — Baldr!”

...As he spoke the name of his Embryo.

◇◆

As Gloria ran, through its closed eyes it realized that the blinding light had ceased.

It then opened its eyes to see that its vision was recovering — and that it was already facing its enemy.

The silhouette before Gloria was immense. It was a battleship — or a giant tank — that had quintuple cannons lining both sides, as well as countless missile launchers on its deck.

This vessel that could rule over both land and sea was already launching an attack upon Gloria, but there was no longer even the slightest chance that any of the shells would hit.

With its vision returned, Gloria could use its supersonic movement to easily evade them all.

Then, it charged at the battleship.

“GHrRrrROoooOAAaaaAaRRGggHHHH!” It swung its right claw towards the bridge, fully intent on ending it with a single hit.

As it came closer, Gloria pictured the pulverized bridge in its mind’s eye...

“...?”

...But that was a far cry from what actually happened.

Gloria’s claw fell, but the bridge was still very much intact.

In fact, the claw that was meant to destroy it had been caught. Gloria couldn’t comprehend this.

The fact that its arm had been caught — something that had never happened before — left it bewildered; the fact that there was a being even capable of that left it shocked.

It wondered what this being could possibly be.

Looking at its claw, it saw five steel-blue fingers.

The Quintuple Cannon barrels bent like a hand and grabbed Gloria’s arm.

“...!?” As the dragon was overcome with surprise, the metal battleship stood up.

The front part of the hull became legs... The Quintuple Cannon turrets on both sides became arms... A face appeared from inside the bridge... And ultimately, a humanoid figure was created.

It was like a man... or perhaps a god.

The latter comparison was not unwarranted.

In Norse mythology, some stories of Baldr told that he owned Hringhorni — the greatest of all ships — and possessed the strongest body of all, unsurpassed and undying.

"War God Ship, Full Offense Mode transformation complete," coldly spoke Baldr — the Type Guardian/Fortress/Gear/Weapon Embryo. It was a quadruple hybrid — an utter rarity — and this was its true form.

There were many words one might use to describe this mighty entity.

A walking idol. Deus ex machina. The ultimate weapon of fantasy.

Every person would have their own term for Baldr as it was now.

"Ghrr, OoOagh..." Gloria, however, couldn't even begin to describe it. Thus, the thought it had given to Baldr, when translated to human tongue, was simply "Unknown."

Amusingly, it fit perfectly, for that was his — Shu Starling's — nickname.

"That was a close call. A moment slower, and my head would've been crushed."

"Denying that notion," said Baldr. "With the current toughness, a single hit wouldn't have been a problem."

"Really? Well, I'm not gonna run any endurance tests," Shu replied. "...I am gonna test the speed, though."

The moment Gloria snapped out of it, it instantly attacked with its left claw... only for Baldr to dodge it at supersonic speeds.

Once again the dragon was left stupefied. It watched as the hundred metel-tall machine-god moved at speeds equal to its own, if not greater...

"Kodachi."

...Before it spun around and launched a roundhouse kick — its Master's specialty — towards the head of the strongest dragon in existence.

"...Ghrh?!" The hit made Gloria stagger, which was all the proof needed to know that Baldr's — Shu's —attack worked.

This was the Unmatched God of War — Baldr. It was an ultimate skill that turned Baldr into armor that greatly increased HP, STR, END, and AGI based on Shu's already immense STR.

And like any armor, this machine god was worn by and moved with none other than Shu himself.

"Hoo...!" From within Baldr — from the bridge that had become a cockpit — you could hear Shu stabilize his breathing.

As he fixed his posture, Baldr moved along with him at essentially the same speed. The hundred metel-tall machine god perfectly replicated its Master's martial movements.

This was all exactly as expected. Baldr was Shu's Embryo, and there were few greater unions of man and machine than this.

Gloria silently watched its opponent and soon became certain that this one was unlike any it had ever faced. He wasn't like the weaklings it had crushed earlier, those who'd tried to swarm it, the UBMs that had challenged it with their unique powers, or the man who'd taken its heart, wings, and the right eye of the one-horn.

Even those who'd actually removed its two other heads were far below it, overall — they'd only achieved what they had because they excelled in a few very specific things. However, this one was unlike them — for he was its equal.

This was an entity that could fight it head-on, now that it had lost its offensive and defensive skills and had nothing but pure physical ability.

Gloria had never encountered an opponent or a battle quite like this.

"GhAhhHAhAhHAH...!" The thought actually made the dragon laugh. Feeling the joy of true conflict, it laughed as though to express that it had never had this much fun.

"Hahah...!" Shu laughed along with it. He was fully aware that this was a battle he couldn't lose, and that his defeat would mean the end of the kingdom.

But even so, he found it a bit... exciting.

It reminded him of his school days as a martial artist.

"GHhAHhaHhAhaAhhaaHHaAHHahaHAHAhAh!"

"HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH!" Laughing uproariously, the two rivals rushed to face each other.

The King of Destruction, Shu Starling, Full Offense Mode.

The Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, Max Battle Mode.

The greatest STR among mankind versus the greatest STR among monsterkind.

They laughed for a good while before going for each other's heads, fully intending to pulverize them.

Overwhelming their surroundings with crushing shockwaves, the machine god and the strongest dragon clashed, sounding the gong for the true start of the final battle between Superior and SUBM... power against power.

Interlude: The Worst and the Worst

???

This space existed in a place unreachable from the Nowest Canyon where that fierce battle was raging... or any other place on the continent.

Several people were gathered in this separate dimension-like place, in an area that looked much like a spaceship.

Though, perhaps “people” wasn’t an apt term, for some among them looked truly inhuman. However, their appearance mattered little compared to features they did share.

They were all control AIs, otherwise known as Infinite Embryos.

They were the observers of the world of Infinite Dendrogram.

Not all of them were here, but those who were gazed at a screen hanging in the air, showing the clash between the machine god and the most powerful dragon.

“Strangely enough, it turned out exactly like you expected, Jabberwock,” said the entity that looked like a carnivorous beastwoman. She was control AI no. 3 — otherwise known as simply “Queen.” Her voice made it clear that she was truly enjoying the battle.

“What do you mean, No. 3?” Jabberwock asked, with curiosity in his expression.

“Ha! Isn’t it obvious? You said that nothing would happen if we released a standard SUBM into a country with so many outstanding individuals. And it looks like not even unleashing Gloria changed that. They sure are something,” Queen said before pausing for a moment. “We didn’t get any new Superiors or Superior Embryos, but hey, it happens. Also, a country with this much potential is bound to produce a few more Superiors with or without SUBMs. Don’t let this failure get to you.”

She spoke as if to cheer up her colleague.

“Indeed. I failed this time,” Jabberwock nodded in response...

“The next Gloria will do better.”

...before saying something that would make any man despair, or at least tilt their head in confusion.

"...The next Gloria?" Queen asked, clearly puzzled. "You say that like you actually managed to mass-produce this monster that's almost as powerful as us."

"Oh, nothing of the sort. Gloria is a once-in-a-millennium miracle. Even creating new Superiors is easier than mass-producing this dragon," he shook his head in denial before clearing up the misunderstanding. "I'm simply saying that Gloria will fully regenerate from its backup."

The words made Queen gasp. "...Fully regenerate? With the cores and all?"

"Of course," said Jabberwock. "As long as the backup is safe, it will begin regenerating once any of the cores are destroyed, eventually becoming whole again. It isn't exactly flawless, though. I thought that this function could be used to create more Glorias, but it turned out that the cores couldn't be duplicated as long as the original still existed. Apparently, none of the cores can be multiplied as long as any of the three cores of the original are still active. Since the abilities themselves can only be restored to the backup the moment the corresponding cores are destroyed, there's a bit of a lag until full regene—"

"Wait... Wait just a second!" Queen cut off Jabberwock's excessively long explanation of Gloria's functions.

From her perspective, there was a fundamental issue more important than any detail he could discuss.

"You mean to tell me that the head the Over Gladiator sacrificed a Mythical special reward to beat and the head the High Priestess gave all her levels to destroy... will just keep coming back?"

"Indeed."

"Jabberwock... I didn't hear anything about this."

"Because I didn't tell you. Well, don't worry. Gloria will come back and test the Masters over and over... until we have all the Superiors."

Jabberwock's plainly-spoken words made a chill go down Queen's spine.

She realized that his stance regarding Gloria's deployment was unlike any other control AI's. While they approved the release of such a powerful SUBM because the kingdom was full of outstanding individuals, Jabberwock intended to continue using Gloria to test the Masters in perpetuity.

"...Is there a way to stop it?" she asked.

"Of course," Jabberwock replied. "I have the exclusive right to stop the backup's functions at any time. The backup can be destroyed by standard means, too."

"What is this 'backup' you're talking about, anyway?"

"This." Jabberwock changed what the screen displayed.

It now showed a dark cave.

It was clearly created naturally. You couldn't tell it from just looking at it, but the data displayed on the screen said that it was at an extreme depth of 3,000 metels. The cave was over a hundred metels tall and extended for several kilometels in each direction. Needless to say, it was gigantic.

In the center of it, there was a giant object.

"Is that... its tail?" It was a long tail with four protrusions and golden scales — the same one that Foltesla had cut off during the battle at Claymill.

"To be more precise, it's Gloria's fourth head... If we go by the naming scheme Altar's Masters gave it, it's the 'four-horn.'"

Gloria's tail... the four-horn... had seemed to vanish after the battle at Claymill. Some had wondered why the tail disappeared while the wings stayed behind, but they simply concluded that it had merely been lost during the chaotic battle.

However, it had actually moved on its own and hid within a nearby lake, and from there it had dug down to hide in this cave.

"Hm. We're just in time. The four-horn's Revitalization is about to begin."

The moment Jabberwock said that, the severed end of the tail began to grow into two heads.

There were short horns on them — one had one, while the other had two — and they were obviously the heads Gloria had lost.

The tail now looked something like a two-headed snake, slithering on the surface of the cave.

"They regenerated already...?" Queen asked.

"Not yet," said Jabberwock. "It might look like they have, but there's no core inside them. Like I said before, the cores will come back once the main Gloria is defeated. For now, it will just reconstruct the body alone.

Assuming the main Gloria fell right at this moment, it would completely regenerate by... tomorrow, I'd say."

Queen was speechless. That was far too fast. Even if Shu defeated the three-horn, the kingdom wouldn't even have time to celebrate their victory and its survival.

As long as the backup was alive, Gloria's march wouldn't stop.

"'The Glory SelectE.R... Endless Routine.'" Jabberwock spoke the codename he'd given to Gloria.

"Gloria is a creature that will sort and select Masters without end, spurring Superior Embryo evolution. If it can be stopped, that will only happen once there are enough Superiors to actually accomplish it."

"...Won't the kingdom fall?"

"If it falls, it falls. Perhaps the destruction of a country is what we need to speed up the process. I'm even thinking of having Gloria attack the whole continent until we have the hundred Superiors we need."

That would be a true calamity — a catastrophe that wouldn't end until all the Superiors had gathered. It would obviously throw the balance they had set up completely out of order.

The other control AIs listening in on this exchange were already wondering if they should go destroy the four-horn before it regenerated. However, they knew that Jabberwock would stop them if they tried. That meant having to fight one of the strongest control AIs — a match even for no. 10, Bandersnatch, who was in charge of security.

In fact, in the worst case scenario, Bandersnatch would also try to prevent Gloria's defeat. It was a simple machine that didn't even have the thought patterns necessary to limit itself when trying to achieve objectives, so it was likely to side with Jabberwock.

As they racked their brains about what to do next...

"Jabberwock..."

...Cheshire, control AI no. 13 and the one in charge of miscellaneous jobs, called out to him.

Upon hearing his voice, the other control AIs thought that he was about to try to bargain with Jabberwock and try to get him to use his exclusive right to stop the backup.

However, they were all wrong.

"Let me give you a warniing."

He only wanted to impart a small piece of advice.

"I interact with Masters a lot more than youu. With that in mind, let me tell you something I know from experience."

"What is it?"

In response, Cheshire put on a feline grin and said, "They're completely free, so very few of them act exactly as we want them tooo."

A moment later...

"A Master is approaching Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria's backup."

...A voice informed of a change in the situation.

"A Master? All the way down there? Who?" asked Jabberwock.

In response, the voice...

"King of Crime, Sechs Würfel."

...Spoke the name of the offender.

◆◆◆

Kingdom of Altar, underground cavern

Several minutes ago...

There was a gigantic tail.

It was the same one that Foltesla had severed during the battle at Claymill.

It had four protrusions — horns — and it was fair to call it Gloria's four-horned head. Some would argue against that, though, for it didn't even have a face, let alone a mouth.

But that soon changed as a pair of vocal entities peeked out from its wound.

"FFfrrRRsSsHhhh..."

"ShhoOoAarrrghh..." They were the one-horn and the two-horn — the heads destroyed by Figaro and Tsukuyo Fuso.

The tail now looked like a two-headed snake, or the letter Y. Though, compared to the original one-horn and two-horn, these were more like the heads of lizard hatchlings, and their powers matched their relatively pitiful appearance.

However, they kept growing larger and tougher, and it wasn't hard to imagine that they would eventually become what they once were.

This was the power of the four-horn — Revitalization.

It had the ability to, if necessary, separate itself from Gloria. Even if Foltesla hadn't cut it off, it would've detached itself if the dragon encountered a powerful foe. It would then hide, ready to regenerate in case the original was destroyed.

Gloria would never die as long as the four-horn wasn't found and defeated. It would be reborn again and again, and wage an endless battle.

That was the final trick Gloria — the most perfect monster — had up its sleeve.

It was an SUBM that would never stop executing the unworthy and selecting the few who exceeded its exacting standards, making it perhaps the most dangerous creature imaginable.

As it was now, the four-horn was far from active. Currently the original, having become immensely powerful, was fighting a battle which could be its last. The four-horn didn't know how the battle would end, but if the original managed to survive, it would simply continue sleeping until it died, in which case it would finish its regeneration. That was all there was to it.

However, the regenerated Gloria would be weaker than the Gloria currently fighting on the surface, because tail-Gloria had stopped gaining battle experience the moment it had been severed. This regenerative ability it had actually gave it the option of shedding its tail and hiding before it even entered battle, but it had decided not to so that the four-horn could gain experience as well.

In simple terms, this was like saving game progress on an external memory drive. The Gloria that would revive here would have the experience of killing Drag-Volt and the kingdom's tians, but it wouldn't know about anything after it had been severed — specifically, the battles against the Masters. In both level and battle technique, it would be far weaker than the original Gloria fighting on the surface.

But that was no problem for Gloria. It could easily gather the experience again. Regardless, it would regenerate, and the second Gloria that would come after the first would destroy the kingd—

"Would you look at that! It really is here." Mixing with the echoes of water droplets trickling down, a man's voice resounded throughout the cave.

The darkness was complete, but thanks to the regenerated two-horn and its Fatal Field, the four-horn could sense the presence and realized that the source of the voice was the liquid dripping down from a crack above.

It soon gathered in a single place and formed a humanoid figure — a plain-looking man with black-rimmed glasses as his only notable feature.

Despite appearances, the four-horn instantly understood that this being was as fearsome as those who'd felled the original's heads... if not more.

"I see that the one-horn and two-horn are on the verge of coming back," he — King of Crime, Sechs Würfel — said in understanding, adjusting the glasses made out of his own flesh. "So you truly do have regenerative powers."

Sechs had known of this function the moment Drag-Heaven had given him the request. There were three reasons for this.

First was the discrepancy in the battle logs and results. In the battle at Claymill, Foltesla had cut off Gloria's wings and tail, yet only the wings remained.

Secondly, he compared it to himself. Being a slime, Sechs had the ability to fully regenerate himself from any remains of sufficient size, and if a slime was capable of that, there was no reason to believe that an SUBM couldn't do the same with the tail it had lost.

The third reason was Drag-Heaven's implications to that effect. The Skydragon King released undead parts of himself — spiritual dragons — all over the continent and used their eyes as his own. A creature with so much information at his disposal had implied that there were multiple Glorias, which was as good as outright stating that as fact.

Having become certain of the tail-Gloria's existence, Sechs went on to look for it in places where Drag-Heaven's eyes couldn't reach — the caverns, rivers, and lakes around Claymill.

And now, he'd found it.

"Here it is," he muttered to no one in sight.

"Heheheh... Just as I thought," Drag-Heaven replied.

Of course, the Skydragon King himself was nowhere near, but Sechs had one of his scales in hand.

This, too, was an undead created by Drag-Heaven's unique ability to split his soul. It was what he usually used to invite Sechs to The Skycrown, and as an undead, the scale was immune to the effects of Fatal Field.

"As expected, it was underground. Flare definitely couldn't fight here," said Sechs.

“Indeed,” replied Drag-Heaven. “In the worst case scenario, he would melt the very crust beneath the kingdom. And even that might not be enough to kill it. This is certainly no laughing matter. Khehehehehehe.”

“But you are laughing.” Shinedragon King, Drag-Flare wielded heat that reached tens of thousands of degrees and was even nicknamed “Stardragon.” If he were to fight in a place like this, it would no doubt change the very ground beneath Altar.

Sechs, on the other hand, was capable of adjusting his power with great precision, and that was exactly why Drag-Heaven had given him this request.

“It seems it only has the one-horned and the two-horned heads. Only the ones that were defeated, yes?”

“It appears so.” Through Drag-Heaven, Sechs was already aware that Gloria’s one-horned and two-horned heads were gone.

“It would be very troubling if I didn’t defeat it before Shu was done,” said Sechs as he cracked a smile. “So let’s begin our deadly battle in the dark, shall we?”

A moment later, he approached the four-horn at supersonic speeds.

“Shapeshift: Schwert.” Sechs turned his right hand into a sword as hard as Mythical metal before transforming his upper arm back into slime and swinging it like a bladed whip.

There was no hesitation in his attack. He moved as though the pitch-black darkness didn’t impede his sight at all.

Sechs’ attack easily broke through the 30,000 or so END’s worth of defense on the four-horn’s scales and damaged it.

“...!” The fact that it was injured naturally made it panic. With the three-horn still with the original, the four-horn didn’t have Resurgence or its boon of increasing stats with the decrease of HP. Additionally, the lack of a core in either of the two heads it had made it incapable of transforming its wounds into weapons or using the True Fatal Field.

What it could do, however...

“OoOoVveEeRrrDdrrRriiiiIiIiVeeEEeE!”

...Was release an Overdrive as powerful as the original’s through its regenerated one-horn.

Sechs instantly evaded it, and the light shining where he’d just stood brought daylight to the cave and melted the very bedrock.

"Now this is terrifying," he said with a composed expression before attacking again.

The four-horn continued using the one-horn's breath, but it simply couldn't hit him.

Though the light's power was the same, it covered a far smaller area than the original, making it harder to damage its enemy.

And although Sechs couldn't have known this, the Fatal Field had become weaker, as well — it could only instakill people below level 250, and only within a range of 100 metels. Since their UBM cores had yet to be restored, both the one-horn and the two-horn were now only as powerful as their parents.

Despite that, the four-horn was still a Mythical-tier creature that had the powers of two Ancient Legendaries. And yet, it couldn't hurt Sechs at all. In fact, he was actually thinking that he must be having the easiest time out of all of them.

He had it easier than Figaro, who'd faced Gloria's supreme battle potential; Tsukuyo, who'd fought Gloria's perfected power of certain death; and Shu, who was currently fighting the Gloria that had become an incarnation of pure power.

Thus, he knew that he couldn't lose.

"Shapeshift: Maschinen Kanone." Sechs transformed his left hand into a gatling gun.

Though there were limiting conditions, Sechs could transform himself even into complex objects such as machines.

The bullets he fired didn't have as much power as the sword and were repelled by the scales. They couldn't break through the four-horn's defenses, but that didn't matter.

"...!?" The four-horn noticed that something strange was happening on its body.

The bullets it was supposed to have repelled had clung to it instead, slowly damaging the scales.

They had transformed into a black liquid — a slime.

Sechs' gatling gun was made out of his own flesh, and the same applied to the bullets.

They turned back to slime mid-flight and clung to the four-horn, continually damaging it.

“...!” The mouthless four-horn writhed as the two regenerated heads screeched in pain.

Sechs used this as an opening to approach Gloria, coming close enough to use something other than the whip-sword.

“Shapeshift: Richtig Arm of the King of Destruction.” With the third Shapeshift, Sechs right arm became someone else’s.

It was far more muscly than his own, and he used it to punch Gloria’s body.

A moment later, Gloria bent as it received the greatest damage yet... while Sechs’ right arm simply burst.

“Shu has so much STR that even my weak copy is enough to take out my arm when I use it,” he said calmly, retrieving his splattered arm and restoring it to its full state.

Sword, gatling gun, and Shu Starling’s right arm.

These were all created by a single skill — Shapeshift.

It was an active skill of his Superior Embryo, Nu.

With Shapeshift, the passive skill of “Liquid Lifeform,” the ultimate skill, and one other, Nu only had four skills.

As its name suggested, Shapeshift let him transform his body. He mostly used it to alter his appearance, like he usually did with his human form, but its true power was far beyond that. It allowed him to gain the powers of people and even Embryos he’d transformed into.

Currently, Sechs’ left arm was assuming the shape of Shu Starling’s Embryo in its second form. Actual equipment and skills that came with them were off-limits for Shapeshift, but he could copy equipment-like Embryos.

“...!” Gloria attacked Sechs with a sideways sweep. Sechs countered it using the King of Destruction’s right arm again, only for the dragon’s attack to hit and shatter him whole.

However, he instantly reformed and became whole again.

This was the effect of the Liquid Lifeform passive skill, which granted him unparalleled powers of regeneration and almost totally negated physical attacks.

Shapeshift allowed him to freely transform and gain new abilities, Liquid Lifeform gave him supreme regeneration and physical attack negation, and then there was the King of Crime’s ultimate — and only — job skill, World Record.

These three abilities combined gave him supreme defense as well as offense.

This was his basic fighting style.

As well-rounded as it was, however, Nu didn't come without disadvantages. It had a total of three.

The first was that Shapeshift's precision was connected to the level of whatever he was transforming into. He could only mimic something of the same level at about half the original's power; to make a perfect copy, he had to have at least double the target's level. The same was true with Embryos. He could only create perfect copies of Embryos in forms half as great as seven — forms three and below.

The second was that he couldn't use skills he didn't know the details of, even if he transformed. He simply could not incorporate those functions without the corresponding knowledge.

The third was the lack of Resources.

Both the well-rounded Shapeshift as well as the potent defensive ability that was Liquid Lifeform were powerful enough to be the sole abilities of an Embryo.

Thus, as an Embryo that had both, Nu was far weaker than other Embryos in a different way — the stat growth bonus it gave to its Master.

Nu was a true rarity in that it was an Embryo that actually gave a negative growth bonus, halving all of Sechs' stats.

Since Shapeshift cost SP, this also effectively limited how long he could transform.

In exchange for being able to become anyone, Sechs Würfel had received a great handicap in the form of a limit on his basic stats.

Though one of the reasons why the King of Crime was so feared was that he'd already solved those three problems.

"Kheheheh," Drag-Heaven chuckled.

"Oh? I heard laughter just now. What's so amusing?" Sechs asked.

"Oh, I am merely delighted by your friend's battle. I have not seen a fight like this since the time of the King of Kings and that era's Draconic Emperor."

"That makes me want to see it as well. Hm...?"

The battle against the reviving Gloria was still easy enough for Sechs to have a conversation with The Skydragon King, but then his expression changed.

Suddenly, he split his body into little pieces, and a moment later, countless threads of light filled the cave.

The limited-area Overdrive that had been released by the one-horn here was now split into hundreds of thin rays of light that danced throughout the cave.

The power and killing potential hadn't dropped one bit, but the number became greater than ever as it now melted everything in sight.

"This is..." Gloria was a monster capable of creating new skills, and that applied to the reviving four-horn, as well.

Faced with the powerful opponent that was Sechs, it created a skill that split its already smaller breath of light into smaller rays, greatly increasing its coverage.

It would be fitting to call it an "Area Overdrive," and it lapped at every corner of the cave, evaporating one-fifth of the scattered pieces of Sechs.

He lost HP and body mass, but once the Area Overdrive stopped, he gathered himself up into one place and restored himself before turning his arm into a gatling gun again and firing bits of himself at Gloria.

However, none of them reached it this time.

The pieces became particles of light that vanished before they could touch it.

This was due to the field around it, which was so dense you could actually see it.

It was the very same Fatal Field it had since the start, but it had been compressed to a radius of merely 50 centimetels.

Unlike its earlier form, this wasn't a power that could exterminate all life in a vast area, but a power that protected it by killing all creatures that came close.

This "Compressed Fatal Field" could easily kill even people above level 1,000, which was proven true by the fact that Sechs' bullets — parts of himself — could no longer reach it.

Additionally, the compression had made its defensive ability impenetrable. The standard Fatal Field couldn't have been compressed like this. Gloria's weakness during its revival process had made it possible.

Area Overdrive and Compressed Fatal Field.

It was safe to say that this Gloria had, in an amazingly brief time, developed skills that matched the ultimate abilities of the original one-horn and two-horn.

Normally, this would've been impossible, but there was a reason why it had happened.

The situation was just that dire for Gloria.

The cores of the three heads had yet to reform, and compared to what it could be, it was in a truly pitiful state. Additionally, it was facing the enigmatic and immeasurable King of Crime, with full understanding that it was merely backup and its destruction would be its ultimate end.

It had never experienced adversity like this, and in response to the threat against its life, Gloria's survival instincts had woven these two skills.

This version of Gloria had the weakest power output of all, but it excelled in innovation and had created a new fighting style.

"I can only assume you spread out the already-thin light into even thinner rays and expanded the range of creatures the field kills by lowering its area of effect." Sechs adjusted his glasses as instantly figured out and described Gloria's abilities.

This was an exceedingly bad situation for Sechs.

He had no means of fighting that didn't involve his own body, so the Compressed Fatal Field was his natural enemy, while the Area Overdrive would eventually evaporate his entire volume.

"I see. You certainly thought this through. Creativity and imagination truly are wonderful things. I'm particularly impressed with the change in the field — it's akin to an imposing fortress that few can bring down."

Sechs spoke as though impressed, seemingly not bothered that the tides had turned.

A smile then crossed his face...

"I can only assume that you want me to destroy you along with the field itself."

...And asked that out loud, as if to get a confirmation.

"If that is the case, I'm happy to oblige. A friend of mine specializes in that style of fighting, you see."

"...!?" The four-horn writhed, sensing an air of intimidation it couldn't fully understand.

Sechs was certainly impressed and surprised by its new abilities, but he didn’t see them as any kind of a threat. It was as if he already had a way to counter it.

“Do you hear me, Sechs?” asked Drag-Heaven through the scale.

“Oh? Yes. What is it?” he asked in response.

“The conclusion to the battle is near.”

“I see. That is a problem,” said Sechs, fully confident that Shu was the one who would emerge victorious.

That was how much he trusted Shu’s power.

And once the original Gloria fell, this Gloria would grow the three-horn head, completing it and granting it the ability to grow stronger as its HP fell.

Thus, Sechs couldn’t let this battle drag on any longer.

“Well, I have a means of dealing with the field, so I will end this with that me. Let me borrow a couple things from you, Shu.”

Sechs’ presence underwent another drastic change.

The four-horn felt as though the incomprehensible being before it was being replaced by something entirely different, without shedding its fearsome aura.

It was a presence of overwhelming power... comparable to an inland sea becoming as vast as an ocean.

“Heheheh...” Sechs lost his human form and returned to liquid.

Then, he grew in volume to the point that even this cave, which was over a hundred metels tall, seemed cramped.

Gloria continued to attack him with its Area Overdrive, but the speed at which he grew exceeded the speed at which it evaporated him, like he was transforming into something with immense amounts of HP.

Growing larger, Sechs changed not only his appearance, but also what he was on the inside...

“I Take Countless Forms — Nu: ■■■■■■■ ■■■■■.”

...And the dark liquid took on a very particular shape.

Act Nine: Power and Power

Kingdom of Altar, Nowest Canyon

Everything, eventually, must end.

The battle between Gloria and the people of the kingdom was no exception.

Whether that end would come in the far future or in mere moments depended upon two particular kings.

While Sechs was beneath the kingdom, fighting to stop Gloria's revival loop before it even began, Shu was giving his all battling the original Gloria here in this very canyon.

The battle had begun at the edge of the canyon, but it had now migrated closer to the center. This was because Shu, who was currently controlling machine god Baldr, wanted to hinder Gloria's supersonic approach towards the capital. Thus, just as with Figaro and Tsukuyo, the battle between the kingdom's Superiors and Gloria was still confined to that canyon.

But if anyone was watching this battle, they would all certainly think that by the time it ended, Nowest Canyon would be no more.

◇◆

"Hyper Blow, set," Baldr's inhuman voice announced as the machine god prepared to swing his right arm.

In response to this blatant preparation for an attack, Gloria went on the offensive with both of its front limbs.

However, Shu controlled Baldr as if it was his own body, turning the dragon's strikes aside and directing the attack harmlessly away.

Gloria's forelimbs slammed directly into the canyon's cliff face, leaving a crater with a radius of over a hundred metels and collapsing the canyon's wall.

The miss left Gloria wide open, so Baldr...

"Battering Ram!"

...Launched an active skill from the Crasher grouping straight into the monster's side.

Battering Ram required a charge time, but in return it multiplied blunt damage by six. The immense amount of damage dealt knocked the giant dragon to the opposite cliff face.

The impact caused even more damage to their surroundings.

Despite receiving nearly one million HP's worth of damage, however, Gloria recovered immediately, broke out of the rubble, and sped towards Baldr.

"Tch!" The machine god sidestepped the charge and as Gloria passed him, the fingers of his left hand — all gunports — fired his few remaining DD Shells into the dragon.

At the same time, he began charging a skill attack with his right leg.

Most of the active skills from the Crasher grouping, like Battering Ram, had to be charged, and this one was no exception. This made them impossible to use consecutively, and often left the user wide open in battle. That was one of the reasons why the Crasher grouping was thought to be an anti-object job series, unsuitable for fighting.

However, Shu — and thus Baldr — was capable of controlling the flow of battle in a way that let him avoid enemy attacks and buy himself the necessary time for these skills.

"Crag Scraper... SHINEN!" Using a skill that increased both standard and penetrative power, the machine god launched his left ankle into Gloria's neck.

His strike broke through scales, tore through flesh, and shattered bone. Gloria staggered so much it seemed like it might collapse, and — in a show of relentlessness — Shu then began charging yet another skill.

"GHOoOoAaaAAaRrghHH!" But before Shu could do that, Gloria jumped using one hind limb to launch into a charge that combined its weight and physical power. It was so fast that the machine god wasn't able to react in time, and the force even he couldn't withstand opened a large crack in his armor.

"I knew it... Its highest stat is its attack," Shu said. "It's sped up, too... But it looks like the thing's stats are too much even for it to deal with."

Despite the desperate situation, he calmly analyzed his opponent. He had been making optimal moves thus far, but that would soon stop being an option.

Under normal circumstances, he would've prioritized the faster, weaker normal attacks over the slow but powerful skill attacks. For this battle, however, he abandoned that strategy shortly after the battle began and now focused solely on avoiding Gloria's attacks, retaliating only with skills.

The reason for this was simple — Gloria's END had already surpassed the machine god's STR by a whole 30,000.

Only his skills could deal any kind of damage to it.

This outcome was inevitable. While Baldr's stats were at their maximum the moment the battle began, Gloria was still growing stronger. As its HP dropped, its Resurgence skill increased its stats, meaning that its limit wasn't in the past or present, but in the future.

Thus, it was only a matter of time until Baldr's attacks would no longer work on it at all.

Even Gloria's speed, which was equal to the machine god's at first, had now increased to the point that it was nearly twice as fast. Considering that, the actual outstanding thing here was Shu's battle prowess, which let him fight it as an equal despite the widening gap.

That, however, would not last.

This latest exchange of blows had already exposed Baldr's... the machine's weakness.

Machines couldn't recover HP via magic or items. That was the common flaw of Dryfe's Magingears, and it applied to this weapon-like Embryo as well. Thus, Shu had no means of fixing Baldr's armor or preventing the deterioration of the engines mid-battle.

Gloria's HP didn't return, either, of course, but its wounds had all been closed. Even its destroyed neck had completely regrown.

"Hah. Man, this regeneration is broken," said Shu. "Though, I guess it's allowed because the HP itself doesn't come back. It's basically just for structural integrity."

The ultimate dragon was always at its best and only became better, while the machine god had nowhere to go but down.

The gap would only grow wider as the battle went on.

Despite that, Shu's eyes held not a hint of despair as he took up a stance within Baldr's head.

"...Grrh," Gloria growled, glaring at Baldr with eyes that said, "You've still got an ace up your sleeve, don't you?"

In a canyon that hardly deserved the name anymore, the machine god and the greatest of dragons faced one another. They both understood that their next exchange of blows would decide the course of this battle.

"Baldr, how many shells we got in the cannons?"

"Three in the right, zero in the left."

"Connect the left one to the ammo storage."

"Roger." As he gave the order to Baldr, Shu took up his stance.

It was strange — he was pulling both his arms back in such a way that both his elbows ended up at his sides.

With both him and Baldr in that position, he wouldn't be able to reliably block any enemy attacks, nor put enough torque into his own. It was a highly unreasonable stance for a martial artist to take.

However, Gloria knew nothing of martial arts, so it was only able to sense that it was a sign of something terrifying.

It knew that its enemy's most powerful attack yet would be launched from that stance.

At the same time, it could see exactly how the attack would go. Even if it was in the path of that assault, it could easily avoid it.

Shu himself was aware of that, as well.

And for that exact reason...

"Stardust Genocider... Fire!"

"Roger." The armor on the machine god's shoulders slid open and launched countless missiles.

Gloria was so close that even Baldr was affected by them. However, these weren't damaging missiles, but the F Warheads employed earlier — the blinding flash bombs.

A moment later, their surroundings were drowned in light, and Gloria couldn't see anything — including the machine god that was ready to launch his final attack.

It was clear that he was intending to finish Gloria off while it was blinded.

"Ghrrhh..." the dragon growled in disappointment, as if saying, "How foolish."

After all, Gloria had already closed its eyes and dashed behind the machine god.

The dragon had expected this from the moment the missiles were launched. Thus, Shu's final attack would miss, and Gloria would finish him off.

Certain of that outcome, it swung its front claws at the machine.

"...GHHR!?" But then, although unable to see, Gloria nonetheless sensed that the machine god had turned around and was now facing it.

Shu had expected that the dragon would move behind him if it was blinded.

"Final Blow..." He undid the seal on this skill.

The King of Destruction had no equal when it came to sheer destructive force, and this was the ultimate attack that could only be used by a few of those who'd acquired the job.

It was a supreme power that could only be achieved by KoDs that had 70,000 or more STR.

Bear witness to the strike that shatters realms.

"World Breaker."

He punched with both arms simultaneously, aiming straight for Gloria's abdomen, and when the pure carnage of both punches met, a calamity was born.

The machine god's fists broke space itself.

The Right of Destruction skill, which allowed him to destroy indestructible targets with endurance lower than his attack power, wasn't limited to solid targets with resistances and damage negation — it also worked on liquids, gasses, and even barrier abilities.

Combined with World Breaker, it allowed the King of Destruction to destroy even the very space supporting this world.

However, it didn't stop there. To fill the void created when the very universe was broken along with Gloria's body, the surrounding space began to contort.

The distortions caused by the world trying to patch up the hole in itself tore any object to shreds, regardless of how tough they were.

Gloria — the living being with the greatest END of all — was no exception.

Even the machine god that had initiated this distortion was being broken apart by it.

It was a "final" blow, after all — it was only natural that it would destroy the user, as well.

The other Kings of Destruction who had used it in the past had all died from it, after all.

Space bent as it healed itself, tearing up the strongest dragon and the machine god alike.

And by the time space had completely restored itself, only one of the two was left standing...

“Ghr, oargh...”

...And it was Gloria.

There was a large hole in its torso, cracks all over its body, and its HP had fallen below a measly 100,000.

Even so, it was alive, while the machine god was gone.

The machine god had seemingly shattered and vanished without a trace in the wake of its spatial destruction. But even though it came at the cost of its own annihilation, the machine god’s final attack wasn’t enough to defeat Gloria.

“...” Even if it was able to speak, Gloria wouldn’t know what to say. It had realized that a single mistake, or just one more attack, would now be enough to banish it from the earth.

This was a pyrrhic victory, and the end of a battle it would never be able to forget.

Even this memory would eventually vanish once it died. Gloria’s backup would not possess the memories of the battles this Gloria had experienced today.

The dragon also realized that it wouldn’t last long as it was.

It had taken too much damage. Even a large group using fixed damage attacks would be able to overwhelm it now.

“Ghroaahh...” But... there was still something it had to do.

It had to obey the two missions carved into its very being and destroy the royal capital.

Now that it was so close to death, Gloria’s stats had grown so much that it was foolish to even measure them.

In less than a minute, it could reach the capital and level it to the ground with a single blow.

Once that was done, it would be free.

The first thing it would do then was go to The Skycrown and destroy

The Skydragon King.

Letting its wounds close, Gloria imagined that future, when suddenly...

“Bit too early to start fantasizing about retirement, ya overgrown lizard.”

...It heard a voice that shook it to the core.

It could recognize that voice anywhere by now. This was the same voice it had heard from the machine god — the voice of King of Destruction, Shu Starling.

However, the machine god was nowhere in sight, so where could it be coming fr—?

“...!” Gloria suddenly made a profound realization. It began to come to a realization that it would have rather not ever contemplated.

The enemy was...

“No matter how damn fast you are... There’s no way in hell I can miss you from here.”

...Inside the wound that had just closed.

Gloria didn’t know when, exactly, he had been able to get there.

It couldn’t know that it had been right after he’d used World Breaker.

It couldn’t know that right after using it, he’d left the cockpit, used the ammo storage to enter an empty cannon barrel — or rather, finger — on the left arm, and gotten inside the dragon using that.

And it couldn’t possibly know that he’d acted as he did because he’d anticipated that everything would play out exactly like this before he had even activated World Breaker.

“Cough...” Of course, Shu wasn’t exactly unscathed. Passing through the shattering space left him covered in heavy wounds.

Despite that, he had arrived at his destination — the inside of the dragon. And though the machine god had vanished, his Embryo hadn’t — it had become a cannon fixed on his left arm.

That was the first form of the War God Ship, Baldr, and the only weapon that could defeat Gloria as it was now.

Baldr was an Embryo that had “power” and “weapons” as its core characteristics, and the power of its first form was simply called “Strength Cannon.”

It was a deadly, once-a-day ability that released a destructive ball of light which dealt multiples of Shu’s STR’s worth in damage.

Specifically, it multiplied his STR by 5... back when it had first hatched, anyway.

Now that it was a Superior Embryo, it actually did 35 times Shu's STR's worth of damage, and his STR was currently over 100,000.

An attack that dealt an obscene 3,500,000 damage was too much even for Gloria's current END.

There was a reason why Shu hadn't used a skill this powerful right away — it was simply far too slow.

So slow, in fact, that even someone moving at subsonic speeds could easily avoid it. It could never hit a being that had surpassed the speed of sound several times over.

However, the current circumstances made that impossible, for nothing could evade an attack from within.

Baldr was covered in cracks — the effects of the damage it had sustained as the machine god — but it was still able to launch this one final attack.

It would end this once and for all.

"GyYyYYGhHhhhHAAaAAAaaARrgghHHhh!" Feeling the waves of power gathering within its body, Gloria swung its claw towards itself to crush Shu... only to stop midway.

The reason why should be obvious.

Gloria's HP was so low it was truly on the verge of death, so attacking Shu within itself would be fatal.

Shu had anticipated what would happen if World Breaker wasn't enough to defeat Gloria. He knew how high its stats would climb and just how much the gap between his offense and Gloria's defense would widen.

Gloria could recover from any injury, but that only applied to its physical form. Its lifeforce — its HP — stayed low, and it was still technically on the verge of death. Gloria was now so fragile that its own power, having grown as it had, could easily kill it. And if it wanted to kill Shu, Gloria had to attack with enough force to break through its own defense. It had to somehow shatter its own defense and kill Shu without accidentally killing itself, and Shu knew that it had grown far too powerful in far too short a time to have the precision necessary.

Basically... Gloria had become too strong, too quickly. That was why Shu chose to end their battle like this — by either his Strength Cannon, or Gloria's own hand.

Regardless of which it would be, Gloria was done for.

If you were to identify the one factor that had most influenced this outcome, it would have to have been Gloria's awareness of this turn of events — or lack of it.

The dragon had only realized its predicament moments before ending itself.

Knowing that its fate was sealed, it wanted to at least take Shu with it, but its brief pause had already made that impossible.

"Let's... end this." A split-second before the claw crushed Shu, he fired the ball of light.

The deadly orb hit its target the moment it was fired, and instantly wiped out Gloria’s remaining HP.

The three-horned head, the upper body it was connected to... its entire structure vanished as if it was never there.

The claw that was about to crush Shu was gone, as well.

A moment after the dragon vanished, the particles of light left behind almost seemed to be a giant pillar reaching towards the sky.

Thus concluded the sequence of battles against a living calamity... and the demise of the SUBM known as “Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria.”

Interlude: The Past Becomes the Present Becomes the Future

Remnants of Nowest Canyon

[SUBM, Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, has been defeated.]

[Selecting MVPs...]

[Figaro, Tsukuyo Fuso, Shu Starling...]

The message rang out immediately when Shu defeated Gloria, but those who actually heard it were few, for it was exclusive to those MVP candidates and their party members.

Figaro and Tsukuyo were already gone. Shu, meanwhile...

“...” He had Fainted and was now falling from the sky.

There was nothing surprising about him being unconscious. In fact, it was incredible that he had stayed awake for as long as he had. Fighting against a dragon with such absurd stats was draining both physically and mentally. Furthermore, he’d been badly damaged while running through the space-destruction near the end of the battle.

He might have had the will to stay awake, but his body was inflicted with Unconscious due to Blood Loss and other injuries.

The moment Gloria vanished, Shu’s body began to fall through the air.

Injured as he was and unable to make a proper landing, he was in danger of actually dying upon hitting the ground.

However, that did not occur.

A moment before impact, Shu’s body began to slow and landed softly on the ground, as if it was a bed.

The person — no, being — responsible for this silently looked down on Shu. This entity had the appearance of a woman covered by a thin, egg-like shell.

It was none other than control AI no. 2, Humpty Dumpty.

She examined Shu’s face with an expression that was impossible to read.

“This makes us even after purposely leaving you out earlier.”

She was referring to the fact that they'd specifically chosen to deploy Gloria while Shu was away from the kingdom. Shu himself had pointed this out, and Humpty did feel that it was a little unfair. Thus, she had chosen to make things even by saving Shu from a death penalty. She knew that she would be the only one aware of this gesture, but that didn't bother her much.

"...Oh?" she said, noticing something nearby. "You came, too, Dormouse?"

A giant hamster was lumbering towards her with its eyes closed. This was Dor, the third princess' — Theresia's — pet. Though, his status as Theresia's pet was more like a disguise than anything else.

He was actually control AI no. 8.

"Theresia ordered me to," Dor replied to Humpty in a deep voice you'd never expect from a creature who looked like he did. "If Shu is alive and unable to move, I'm to bring him to the castle before anyone else finds him."

"That has nothing to do with what you're in charge of, does it?"

"Hey now — as avatars, Alice and just about everyone else more or less does whatever they want. I'm merely enjoying the simple life of a pet, myself. It's a kind of freedom. Though, I don't think I like what Rabbit does."

"What can you do? He has an awful personality. You might as well think of him as no different than that ill-natured Jabberwock or that unsociable Bandersnatch."

"Hahahah. You're one to talk, you big meanie. I've always thought that you were like a little girl who bullies the boy she lik—"

"I will crush you," Humpty cut Dor off, glaring at him.

"Sorry, sorry. Please spare me," the hamster apologized with a wry grin on his face.

"...All right," Humpty calmed down. "So I can leave him to you?"

"Mhm. You can. I'm actually used to carrying people around."

"It really does look like you're enjoying your life as a pet." Humpty appreciated this. The kingdom and its Masters should've realized that the battle was over, so they would soon be heading here to investigate. Humpty had been wondering what to do with Shu when that happened, so this was actually a great help to her.

“Do what you have to, then,” she said.

“Mhm,” Dor nodded before putting Shu on his back and running off.

After watching him disappear in the distance, Humpty vanished.

With that, the shattered canyon was left absolutely vacant — to the immense confusion of those who came to investigate.

◇

For a brief while, the question of who, exactly, had defeated Gloria dominated people’s minds, but all that ended once Figaro and Tsukuyo returned from their death penalties with special rewards bearing the dragon’s name.

They testified that the King of Destruction had been on the battlefield, as well, making it well known that Gloria had been slain by Altar’s three Superiors.

Since then, as the three top ranking players and the ones who’d conquered the three heads of Gloria, they became known as “Altar’s Big Three.”

◇◆◇

Kingdom of Altar, underground cave

[SUBM, Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, has been defeated.]

[Selecting MVPs...]

[Figaro, Tsukuyo Fuso, Shu Starling, Sechs Würfel have been selected as MVPs.]

[Sechs Würfel is presented with “Organ of Rebirth, Gloria δ.”

“...Oh, it looks like Shu also won,” Sechs spoke, his voice echoing throughout the cave. He had just finished his fight against the four-horn, which was now completely gone from this place.

However, Sechs wasn’t anywhere in sight, either.

He could be heard, but his preferred shape was nowhere to be seen, nor was any of his slime.

“Even I was in extreme danger of dying, yet Shu was able to defeat the third head with all its amazing stats. I would expect no less of you, Shu.”

A gigantic, black humanoid figure stood in the underground cavern.

The entity seemed entirely made of some dark metal and, as though just now realizing that the battle was over, it began to shrink until it once again took on the appearance of a plain young man — Sechs.

"So, Skydragon King... I completed the task," he said.

"Kheheheh. Well done, Sechs," said Drag-Heaven. "I will prepare your reward. Is there anything you want? If it is the head of a dragon king that you wish, I can find one for you among those serving me."

"No. I'll leave the decision up to you. There's nothing I really want right now."

"I see. Then I shall think of something myself."

"Oh, and this has nothing to do with the reward, but may I ask you something?"

"What is it?"

"Did Shu get the death penalty after defeating Gloria?"

"No. He survived. However, he seems to have Fainted."

"I see. Thank you."

"Oh, I should be the one thanking you. It was quite a spectacle to behold."

"I can imagine."

"Looking forward to your reward." Thus, The Skydragon King cut off their conversation through the undead scale.

Left alone, Sechs considered what he just learned.

"Perhaps Shu doesn't know that I helped defeat Gloria. And if he stays Unconscious long enough for the message log to vanish... Oh, speaking of which, what kind of reward did I get?"

Sechs finally decided to take a look at his Gloria δ. It was an egg-shaped accessory, and its effect...

"Hm? But... What am I supposed to do with this?"

...Was something that left Sechs perplexed, which was quite a rare occurrence.

"What it does is wonderful, yes, but it doesn't mean much to me... I'll have to discuss it with Rascal."

Puzzled by the treasure's effect, Sechs decided he ought to talk it over with a fellow wanted Superior: The Weapon, Rascal the Bloodonyx. Known as the "Ruin-Killer," Rascal had a wealth of knowledge about many kinds of items and could likely think of a way to use this special reward.

“Time to flee the scene,” Sechs said, returning Gloria δ to his inventory and transforming back into a slime. He then entered a crack in the cave and made his way to the surface.

Nothing was left in this cavern underneath the Kingdom of Altar. Few would ever know that Gloria had a backup, or that the new menace had been consigned to the darkness by an even greater menace.

It would take more than a year for the world to learn that this battle even happened. Around that time, the world would also finally learn just how terrible Sechs Würfel’s reward truly was.

◇◇◇

Gideon the City of Duels, Central Arena

The location was on the Central Arena — a building that looked much like the Colosseum in Rome.

Few people could even access this place. Figaro, having returned from his death penalty, was lying there and looking up at the sky. There were a few clouds above, and he followed them with his eyes as though searching for something.

“Yo, Figaro. You’re here agaaiin?”

Just like he did on that day some time ago, Tom Cat called out to him. With his Embryo, Grimalkin, sitting on his head, Tom crouched down and looked into Figaro’s eyes.

“What’s wrong?” Tom asked. “It looks like something’s troubling you again.”

“Shulka came by,” Figaro replied.

“Shulka... Oh, the guy from the Babylonian Battlegroup.”

“He said he’s giving up being the sub-leader and going on a journey.” Shulka, the sub-leader of the Babylonian Battlegroup, had come to Gideon to thank Figaro for defeating Gloria and say his goodbyes.

According to him, the Babylonian Battlegroup would cease their activities. With the leader — Foltesla — having retired, and Claymill — their hometown — in ruins, the clan was having a hard time carrying on as normal.

“He said he wouldn’t be a good leader, and that it was hard for him to even stay in the Babylonian Battlegroup. That’s why he left the sub-leader’s seat up to the other members, so they could at least keep the clan alive."

Shulka himself had decided to leave the kingdom and go visit the other countries. He'd told Figaro that he simply had too many memories here. It was up to the other members to make sure the clan continued to exist, and the main man behind that was Masked Riser — a fellow ranker.

Riser insisted that he would only be holding down the fort and waiting for Foltesla and Shulka's return, all the while protecting Gideon the way he couldn't protect Claymill.

Upon hearing all that, Figaro asked Shulka, "If Foltesla returns someday, will you come back, too?"

To which Figaro had replied, "I hope that happens."

"Oh, so thaat's the reason..." Tom said. "I was wondering why a bunch of other rankers from the Babylonian Battlegroup were gone... It's gonna be lonelyy."

"Yeah." They looked at the ranking board in front of the arena and thought about the ones who were now gone. Because he hadn't officially withdrawn, Foltesla's name was still there, but it would soon disappear from the rankings as he kept failing to appear and forfeited all his duels.

"But I'll stay. Always," Figaro spoke what he'd decided. "I'll remain champion until the day Foltesla returns."

"Yeah. I think that's what you should do, too."

The champion and the second in the ranks didn't say anything more. Under the flowing, amorphous clouds, Figaro looked at the names on the ranking and resolved to wait.

◇◇◇

Tomb Labyrinth

"I thought leveling would be easier, but it's unexpectedly haaaard."

High Priestess... no... the mere Priest, Tsukuyo Fuso was leveling alongside her secretary, Eishiro.

They'd chosen the Tomb Labyrinth because regaining the sheer number of levels — over a thousand — that Tsukuyo had lost required killing so many monsters that it would affect the ecosystem. Tsukuyo's Kaguya and Eishiro's Erlkönig were a combo that made the hunt easy, but doing it outside could potentially lead to several extinctions.

That problem didn't exist inside created dungeons like the Tomb Labyrinth, since there was no ecosystem and the monsters simply respawned.

There were, however, other problems.

"And using Kaguya's skills takes so much of my MP and SP. I can't keep them uuup."

Tsukuyo's level was low, and so were her stats.

As an Embryo, Kaguya was both a Maiden and a Type Invasion World from the Territory series. Unlike Guardians and the like, Kaguya used Tsukuyo's MP and SP for skills. Of course, being a Maiden, Kaguya also had her own stats, but her low MP only allowed her to use skills briefly — as she had demonstrated in the final battle against the two-horn.

And with Tsukuyo's current stats, she could barely use any of her Superior Embryo's skills right now.

If she could use her Lunar Divider Field and have Tsukikage finish them off, she would receive huge amounts of XP from her contributions to the battle, but even that was difficult right now.

"At this rate, it might take me more than a year to level back up," Tsukuyo sighed.

She didn't regret using the skill, but she wasn't prepared for the rehabilitation to be this long. "If only this could also be used on monsters..." she said, taking out a wand decorated with an eye.

It was the Superior special reward from the two-horn: Fatal Eye, Gloria β.

"It only works on humanoids level 100 and below... That's super weak compared to Gloria's head... But at least it completely protects me from attacks outside the field." It was worth noting that if the wand worked on monsters, she could use it in conjunction with Faint Light to instakill even UBMs. "What a hard nerf," she complained.

It was also possible that, due to the power limits of the special reward, its Resources went into recreating the defense effect first, and the instakill effect with whatever was left.

"Ah. But with this, I'm really safe now. You're unbeatable at mid-range, so no one gets close when you're protecting me; between Kaguya's night and Erlkönig's shadows, my defense is now perfect."

"Indeed," Eishiro agreed. "You are safe as long as no one faster than me closes in on you and uses something like... I don't know, maybe a breath of light that banishes all night and shadow, or something like that."

"That example is disturbingly specific..." Chatting about this and that, the two continued Tsukuyo's rehabilitative grinding for quite a while.

Side note: a little over a year later, Tsukuyo Fuso would be defeated by Figaro in the exact same manner Eishiro described.

◆◆◆

The outskirts of the imperial capital, Triangle of Wisdom headquarters

"Yeah, you can't read its stats at all. I really hate that all the scout monsters I sent out died within one kilometel of it. And even if you ignore that..."

In the headquarters of Dryfe Imperium's largest clan — Triangle of Wisdom — the leader, Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin, was watching recordings and pondering.

The recordings were of the battle against Gloria at Claymill.

"I had some scout monsters accompany the armored battalion to figure out how powerful the kingdom was, and I did get some data out of it, but it's, well..." Most of the recordings were cut off after a wave of white light. The monsters, just like the battalion, were evaporated by Gloria's Overdrive.

The other recordings were those taken by the Babylonian Battlegroup and presented to DIN to ensure their spread and assist anyone trying to defeat Gloria.

"Hmm... Well, there's still a few things I managed to deduce from those recordings." Tapping his notes and desk with the pen in his hand, Franklin continued talking to himself as if to properly arrange his analysis.

"That thing doesn't have high base stats. I think even His Excellency's unbuffed Zero Exceed has higher everything, except HP. What makes it such a problem is all the powerful skills it has, one of which does increase its stats."

Writing something down, he continued to consider the dragon.

"Looking at how much the abilities vary and how great their output is, I'm guessing it has several sources of power as a UBM. I haven't seen one like it myself, but there's records of such a UBM appearing in The Era of the Peerless Three, so it shouldn't be impossible."

Six hundred years ago in Infinite Dendrogram time was The Era of the Peerless Three, when King of Kings, Draconic Emperor, and The Lynx battled for dominance. Records spoke of an absurdly powerful UBM with various abilities appearing in this era, and Franklin believed it to be the same kind of creature as Gloria.

"Could... Could I do something similar? Maybe not something quite that insane, but as I add more and more parts... I could give it as much as possible... In that case, I should give up on using a pure animal base and instead make a hybrid with machine attachments and the like right from the start... Yeah, that sounds good. Let's go with this plan. For that, I'm going to need..."

Muttering to himself, Franklin left a memo on his note.

Suddenly...

"Heya Fran, whacha doin'? Rubby-rub!."

"Hyahn?!"

...Someone called out to him and began fondling his chest, making him yelp.

Of course, Franklin's avatar was male, so there wasn't much to fondle.

"AR-I-CA..." Franklin wrung out each syllable as he glared at the person responsible.

It was a woman with heterochromia... specifically, one artificial eye... Ace, AR-I-CA. She was a member of The Triangle of Wisdom and a good friend of Franklin.

"I did knock, y'know?" she said. "You didn't reply and just kept muttering to yourself, so I just up and did that!"

"You don't just just 'up and do' that! Ugh..." Now that he was alone with a close friend, Franklin's tone changed. He was talking more like his player, Francesca.

"So, whuzzat? Somethin' to do with the unit for the singing engine ya made?"

"It's something different. The unit will be done in about a month."

"Oh, okay. I guess I'll save it for after I see it."

"Hm?" Franklin tilted his head. He didn't understand what AR-I-CA meant by that.

"So, what idea're ya writing down now?" she asked.

Leaving his own question aside, he just answered, “That over there is a recording of the SUBM that attacked the kingdom. I was wondering if I could use it as a reference for my own monsters.”

“Oh yeah. Your Embryo feels like it comes from a different game.”

“...I can’t deny that. And yeah, I might have to use Pandemonium for this. But...”

“But what?”

“It probably doesn’t have enough output yet. I can’t get the abilities I want while it’s still in its sixth form.”

At this point in time, Franklin’s Embryo was still just a high-rank. A non-Superior Embryo was unlikely to create a monster that would meet his standards.

“Then why not just make it once you’re a Superior?”

“You say it like that’s easy... But yeah, I suppose I don’t have a choice.”

“For now, just put it on your list of monsters you’ll make someday and think of a name for it.”

“A name, huh? It would involve machines... Add a powerful-sounding word to that... Yeah, and also...” Franklin spent a few moments thinking before saying, “How about... ‘Mechanical God Dylan?’” It was a mix of term for its main trait, a word for the extent of its power, and the name of a pet Francesca had once had.

“That’s cool! By the way, Fran — you’re from France, aren’t you? Why do you always make English names?”

“...Because you said that you don’t understand them at all when I make them French.”

“Ahahah? I did?” AR-I-CA laughed awkwardly as Franklin stared at her. His eyes were annoyed, but his mouth was curled into a smile.

This all happened half a year before the war between Altar and Dryfe, and a little while before AR-I-CA left Franklin’s side.

◆◆◆

Royal Capital, Altea, noble district

An old residence stood in Altea’s noble district.

An ordinary passerby would only see a building that could be perhaps centuries old, but those skilled in magic would notice that it was covered by layer upon layer of spells that prevented any intrusion.

It was the residence of perhaps the kingdom's most distinguished person, the Arch Sage.

At the moment, the place was completely sealed. The windows were shut tight and covered by thick curtains. Once the matter of Gloria was solved, the Arch Sage vowed that he would mourn his lost apprentices and locked himself in his residence. He'd stopped visiting the castle, but those who knew the circumstances figured that even the Archsage had to rest sometimes and thought little of it.

However, right now the Arch Sage was neither mourning nor resting. In fact, he was probably working harder than he had in a long while.

"Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria... It was a terrifying creature, but to the incarnations, it was nothing but another pawn. Those monsters..."

In the basement of his manor, the Arch Sage muttered this to himself before resuming his work.

One might think that, as a powerful caster, he was working on something magical, but that assumption would be wrong. He was actually working on machines — something that was more typical of the neighboring country's engineers. Even though he was doing something that didn't suit the image of "Arch Sage" whatsoever, he did it with a proficiency that rivaled even the greatest masters of the craft.

"There's also the few Superiors who slew the dragon," he spoke to himself again. "Superiors and incarnations... not even a fully complete No. 1 could win if it had to fight them all."

He input some data into a device, which went through the process of sending it off somewhere.

"...But thanks to this incident, I discovered that, even though the incarnations observe the Superiors, they don't control them." Masters were free to do what they wanted, and not even the incarnations — control AIs — that the Arch Sage viewed as his enemies could restrain them.

"Things would be different if I could get a Superior on my side," he muttered. "I wonder if there are any skilled Superiors who are hostile to the incarnations..."

After thinking on it for a moment, the Arch Sage chuckled wryly.

"...Heh. As if things would ever be that convenient."

Resigned, he resumed his work. The device he was working on displayed the code “Anti-Incarnation Superweapon, Argus Magna.”

“No matter. I will achieve my goal... Fulfill my dying wish.”

His words were wrung out through his teeth, carried with the heat of boiling blood.

“We... The Arch Sage... We, the Flagman, will surely... destroy the incarnations and those who side with them.” The man who’d built the prosperous pre-ancient civilization, destroyed by the incarnations two millennia ago, voiced his resolve once more.

◆◆◆

Gaol

News of Gloria’s defeat became a hot topic even in the gaol.

Though they were stuck in their cells, many were curious about what was going on outside. It was especially hard to miss these news due to the fact that the local celebrity, King of Berserk, Hannya, was walking around all smiles and broadcasting the involvement of her beloved Figaro to all who heard.

“But man, that’s huge. I wonder what kinda rewards The Big Three got.”

“Aw, man... I was from the kingdom, too. If I was still outside, I could’ve become an MVP...”

“...You’re barely over level 200. You couldn’t have done shit.”

The gaol’s Masters chatted as they watched a recording of the battle against Gloria. It was something like watching a fire on a far-off island, and they were treating it as a kind of festive occasion.

The mood was upbeat, but then...

“Help! Help...!”

...A Master ran down the main road, shouting.

Those around him understood the problem the moment they saw him.

They couldn’t see his right arm.

Infinite Dendrogram players could choose between realistic, CG, and anime graphics; all three options always worked perfectly in all circumstances.

However, the man’s right arm looked like sequenced ones and zeroes mixed with static. It wasn’t limited to his arm, either. The noise was spreading further, breaking up his avatar as it did.

Upon seeing that, the other Masters instantly understood what happened.

"Help! What the hell's this?! My avatar and stats are a mess! Even my name looks wrong!" the man panicked

"You're new here, right?" an onlooker asked. "Didn't anyone tell ya not to go to that dungeon when ya first came here?"

"I-I thought they were hiding some juicy XP fodder..."

"You dumbass. 'Don't enter that dungeon,' 'don't talk shit about Figaro,' and 'don't flirt in public' are actual warnings ya gotta listen to!"

"H-How was I supposed to...?! C-Can anyone do something about this?" the man cried, displaying his deteriorating right arm.

The one he was talking to shook his head, "Give up. You get hit by his skill, you're basically done for. Hell, you should go try and get the death penalty before it's too late."

"Eh? What do you—?" A moment later, someone behind the man cut off his head, killing him instantly. The Master responsible didn't do it just for enjoyment. In fact, he felt like he had helped or even saved his target.

"...Did I make it in time?"

"It'll be fine. The area isn't glitching yet, so it probably wasn't bad enough to leave any after-effects. The newcomer's level and Embryo's form must've been pretty high."

"Last time, we managed 'cause Hannya crushed the whole block along with the guy, but that can be pretty hard without her around."

"If we don't get more Superiors like Hannya, who are reasonable at least most of the time, we might be unable to hold them back."

"...Fu'uta, huh? How can a Master like that even exist...?"

The gathered Masters frowned bitterly and looked outside the residential area... in the direction of a certain dungeon.

Or, to be more precise, to the direction of a Master who was simply a walking disaster.

◆

Currently, there were two Superiors in the gaol.

One was King of Berserk, Hannya. As long as you adhered to certain taboos, she was a reasonable person, and most of the gaol's inhabitants liked her a lot.

The other Superior was always in a certain dungeon.

At the moment, two people were standing next to each other.

One was a young boy, approximately ten years of age. He was wearing ragged starting equipment and sitting on the cave floor with his head resting on his knees.

The other person, standing next to the boy, was a man wearing a hood and a completely featureless mask, lacking even eye holes. He was standing there as though protecting the boy, not saying a single word.

“Another player arrived...” The boy silently muttered while remembering what just happened. “He was smiling, enjoying himself as he walked...” As he thought of that, he bit his lip so hard he drew blood.

“What the hell is so fun to him...?!” Unable to hold himself back, the boy punched a wall.

His frail arm did nothing besides shake off some dust.

But then, the wall changed. Ones and zeroes danced across it and static spread through the stone; finally, it transformed into a monster that was essentially nothing more than a wall with eyes and a mouth.

It was a strange monster, though. Its graphics were quite crude, didn’t really fit in with the appearance of Infinite Dendrogram’s creatures. Perhaps it was a strange thing to think about something within this world, but it looked like a monster out of a game.

“I’ll break this game, no matter what...” Not minding the fact that his attack had turned the wall into a monster, the boy continued spitting out his curses.

“I’ll destroy this world if it’s the last thing I do...” With all the hatred he could muster, he spoke to the empty space... to the very world itself.

“No matter what...” There was murderous intent in his eyes.

He glared at the world with the kind of hatred one might normally reserve for the man who murdered one’s parents.

He was Fu’uta, the Astray Glitch.

At the edge of the gaol, the level 0 Superior without a single job, continued to sharpen his fangs. His Apostle Embryo — The Encroaching Demise, Apocalypse — stood by his side.

◆◆◆

Control AI no. 4's workspace, vault no. 4

Jabberwock wordlessly walked through a hallway of a strange material.

This was vault no. 4 — the UBM storage vault managed by control AI no. 4, Jabberwock.

Just recently, he'd watched the demise of Gloria — which was perhaps his greatest masterpiece. The original had achieved the highest recorded stats, while its vessel for rebirth had almost opened up entirely new horizons. And yet, they had both been defeated by Superiors.

At that moment, the control AIs felt nothing but relief.

Queen did give Jabberwock a considerate look, but he didn't seem to pay attention to it. He'd released Gloria with the goal of creating more Superiors, and the fact that it had been defeated before it could do that even once meant several things to him. First, that the current Superiors were more powerful than he had expected, and second, that he had effectively wasted his trump card, and what was more, he'd lost his teaching material.

Considering the various drawbacks, Jabberwock continued to walk through the vault.

On each side of the hallway, there were several giant objects that looked much like battleship docks. They were labeled in various ways, but with one key similarity.

Tetra-Beast of Creation, Suling.

Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru.

Hexa-Portal Unsealed, Gate of Six.

Seven-Star Command, Elemental Order.

They were the SUBMs that would eventually descend upon the continent and cause immense destruction.

Jabberwock, however, didn't stop in front of any of them. He only kept moving forward until he came to a particularly well-sealed... coffin.

"Gloria lost." Jabberwock's words made the coffin slightly shake.

Suddenly, a part of it — the window through which one might see the deceased's face — opened up to reveal a giant eye looking down at Jabberwock.

"What a shame," Jabberwock continued. "If the timing was right, this all would've ended with Gloria."

In response to those words, the eye frantically darted to and fro. It was hard to tell what that meant. It could be interpreted as an expression of surprise, sadness, anger, or maybe nothing at all.

"The kingdom's... no... Planet Earth's Masters are truly exceptional. I guess I shouldn't have expected any less of them. Limited progress on the plan notwithstanding, I'm actually somewhat enjoying this."

The word "enjoying" made the eye glare at Jabberwock in clear protest.

"Don't be upset. This also means that there's still a window of opportunity to strive for even greater heights. Be glad... my other half."

Calling the thing inside the coffin a part of him, Jabberwock smiled.

"For now, just wait. Eventually, there will be a chance to become stronger than even before the reset. Your time isn't far off. It won't be more than ten years, I'm sure — which is nothing compared to how long you've already waited."

Jabberwock closed his eyes, as if to remember something.

He might've been looking back at the staggering amount of years that had led to this.

"..."

"In the worst case scenario, we can undergo an enhancement using the data of another Infinite. Though, our enhancement is mostly orthogonal to the overall plan — the crux of the matter is something else. It's okay. This was a painful failure, but not a real setback. We will gather them all, no matter what."

Jabberwock opened his eyes.

"I'll get back to work, then. You keep sleeping for now... Evolution."

He then turned around and walked away from the coffin. The creature within... Evolution... saw him leave, then closed its eye.

The coffin's window followed suit, and the entity inside went back to sleep.

Infinite Progression, Evolution.

This was Jabberwock's other half, and the original UBM.

And at least for now, it silently slumbered...

◇◇◇

Royal Capital, Altea, deep inside the castle

"I'm... here?" Shu opened his eyes to see a familiar ceiling.

It was the room of the third princess — the place he'd visited just before fighting Gloria.

He quickly understood that he was lying on the bed.

After Fainting, he wasn't able to discern what was happening, because while Unconscious, Masters had their minds locked into an empty space and couldn't even log out. If he absolutely had to return to reality, he would've been forced to use the Suicide system. However, since Shu hadn't died or received a message that would make it necessary for him to log out, he simply waited it out.

Though, the fact that he found himself in the third princess' room puzzled even him.

He looked around and saw the little owner of this room using Dormouse as a makeshift bed. The hamster had natural fur all over, and his body was as warm as a hot water bottle, making him a truly pleasant surface to lay on.

Dor himself was awake, though, and he was looking right at Shu.

"Hm?" Shu suddenly felt strange and looked down to find out why.

While he'd been unconscious, someone put an animal costume on him. It was the bear costume sold at the capital — the same one he'd bought right after starting Infinite Dendrogram.

Shu didn't know whether they'd prepared it ahead of time or if Dor acquired it while carrying him back to the castle, but he was wearing it right now.

This reminds me that, for a bunch of reasons, I was also in a bear costume back when I first met Theresia, Shu thought.

As he pondered whether that might've been the very reason they'd put this particular outfit on him, Dor shook Theresia awake.

Shu and the girl stared at each other for a good few moments before he broke the silence. "I won."

"I know," she replied. What a simple exchange.

"The castle is so loud and lively right now," Theresia continued. "Father and Altimia must be really busy."

"I see." With that, Shu understood why there were no other people in the room.

"Did you get Dor to look fur me and bring me all the way back here?"

"Yeah." Theresia understood that Shu would go to face Gloria the moment he walked out of her room, so when Dor returned, she asked him to bring Shu back after his victory so that his identity was not revealed.

"Thanks to you, we're not over yet — not me, and not what I'm harboring... Though, I'm not sure if that's a good thing."

"...Did you want to be over?"

"Who knows?" Theresia tilted her head in curiosity, as if she herself didn't know the answer to that question.

"But... well..." She remembered something and strung a sentence together. "Up until a few moments ago, Altimia was protecting us." The eldest sister, Altimia, was with Theresia and Elizabeth, protecting them both.

Though, perhaps she was merely preparing to help her sisters escape in case the capital was in imminent danger. Altimia herself was strong, but she was powerless against Gloria's Fatal Field. Gloria was channeling it passively, so even The Primeval Sword could only split it open for a single moment. Even if Altimia did intend to let her sisters escape, Theresia couldn't leave this castle.

That was why she was wondering what her sister was planning to do when push came to shove.

Had Altimia been considering ways to let Theresia escape, or had she intended to stay by her side and fight with her blade until the bitter end?

Given that Altimia had entrusted Elizabeth to her childhood friend, Liliana, it might've been the latter.

"And when she found out that Altea was safe, Altimia actually hugged me." When it had become clear that the menace of Gloria was no more, the first princess embraced Theresia, wept , and said, "I'm so glad you're safe now."

As for what Theresia felt within her sister's warmth...

"I did think that it was nice that I wasn't over."

"All's well, then."

Then we really did seize the opportunity, Shu thought.

He was certain that he couldn't have reached this point on his own, even if he had given it his all.

Foltesla and his Babylonian Battlegroup had exposed Gloria's powers, Figaro had defeated the all-destroying one-horned head, and Tsukuyo Fuso had finally destroyed the annihilating two-horned head.

All of this was why Shu had been able to emerge victorious in the final battle. If even one element had been missing, he would never have won.

For all he knew, there might have also been those who played a part in achieving this outcome in ways he couldn't see.

This moment was only possible because everyone had given their all to seize this opportunity. They had all contributed to this moment, where this girl was able to say she was glad it didn't have to be over.

"You're thirsty, right?" Theresia asked. "I'll make some tea. The castle's water is very good."

With small hands, but plenty of skill, the girl began handling the tea set.

"Fur sure it is," said Shu. "Yeah, I'll have some."

Shu got out of bed, sat in a chair and waited for Theresia to finish.

Dor also lumbered into a chair and waited for the tea.

While waiting, these two... the Superior and the control AI began to talk.

"Dormouse. The kingdom won't be getting any more SUBMs, right?" Shu asked.

"If the general rule still applies, yes," the hamster replied. "But thanks to this incident, I discovered that Jabberwock is truly ruthless. If he thinks it's necessary, he might do something excessive."

"Can't you control your colleagues?"

"Hm... We're programmed in a way that makes us unable to say much about what the others are doing with their areas of influence. We can give advice or argue, but in the end, they themselves have the final say. Though it's a little different when we have some overlap between us. Cheshire is a good example. He's in charge of miscellaneous jobs, so he's involved in a great many areas."

"You sound like you're all arranged like a government office."

"That's more or less how it was originally. Though, even aside from that, the kingdom has a lot of problems piling up. The issues Gloria caused will greatly affect the fate of Altar. There are a lot of incidents on the horizon. And that's just with the actions of tians and Masters... Without us doing anything at all."

"...That so?" That meant that there would be events... tragedies, rather, that could potentially decide the fate of the kingdom. Shu pondered what he would do then and considered his little brother, who would join him in Infinite Dendrogram in a year here... or four months in reality.

"I wonder what he would do." Shu got lost in thought...

Knowing how he is, I'm sure he won't be able to ignore all the suffering.

That's why, if I told him all that I know, I would basically be like making him run a mile after piling a heavy weight on his shoulders, and one that he can't put down.

That's why, when he comes here, I won't tell him anything that I'm privy to.

I'll let him start out free and choose what to feel, think, and do all by himself.

I'm sure that that's the only way he can find the possibility he's supposed to seize.

◇

"Oh my. It's like a page out of a picture book." Theresia returned with a pot of black tea to a fairytale-like scene, where a bear and a giant hamster sat politely at a table, waiting to be served.

It made her giggle.

"Ohh, I'm pawsitively parched. Theresia, give me teaaa," Shu playfully requested.

"Just a second," she kept giggling as she filled his cup.

"Thank you very much." Even if what had just happened was an event that would change everything for the kingdom and the continent, this moment was nothing if not peaceful.

Thus, Shu decided to sit back, smile, and enjoy a nice cup of tea.

Episode Gloria: End

Afterword

Dearest readers,

Thank you very much for your purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

Due to the composition of this volume, I only have one page allotted for the afterword, so I have to refrain from incorporating the usual gimmick.

Those of you who are disappointed by the lack of Cheshire and friends, please take a look at the currently-running “The What and Why of Dendrogram” YouTube series. They’re similar to the usual afterwords in tone, and they’re also fully voiced!

Though, I believe Cheshire and the rest will return here with volume 12, set for Japanese release in February 2020.

Besides that, I would greatly appreciate it if you considered checking out the manga adaptation by Kami Imai, as well as volume 1 of the Crow Record side story by La-na, both of which are already out in Japan.

January marks the start of Infinite Dendrogram’s anime adaptation. It has been about a year since the announcement, and I thank you all for your patience. I give my sincerest gratitude to the staff, cast, and everyone else involved in its production, as well as all of you who support my work.

Please look forward to more Infinite Dendrogram!

—Sakon Kaidou

Bonus Short Stories

Powerleveling

December, 2044

A few days had passed since the battle against the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria.

"Leveling is soo boring..." grumbled Tsukuyo Fuso, one of the kingdom's Superiors and the leader of its largest clan, The Lunar Society.

She was currently wand-bashing monsters in the Tomb Labyrinth.

Her secretary both in game and out, King of Assassins, Eishiro Tsukikage, was binding said monsters with his shadows. He would prevent them from moving, and she would beat them — a highly orthodox way to raise a newbie's level.

The reason why she, who was far from a newbie, was doing something like this was because her level had been reset as a result of using a potent skill that had that as the price. She was now working to recover her lost levels.

Some would question why she was bashing them instead of using skills, and the answer to that was because she'd ran out of MP and SP needed for spells and the like. She'd drunk so many MP and SP potions that they barely had an effect anymore, so she had to resort to this newbie-like method of leveling.

Being a Superior Embryo, Tsukuyo's Kaguya was very demanding in terms of MP and SP, and at her now-low level, she didn't have nearly enough of either, so she ended up doing this quite often. Any new levels gained did little to fix the problem.

"They say time is money, and I'm here doing this..."

As contradictory as that may have seemed, she thought about how effectively she could've leveled up before her level was reset.

In Infinite Dendrogram, there were two basic ways of leveling up — killing other creatures or completing job quests. Both methods provided the person with shapeless data energy called simply “Resources,” and crossing a certain threshold of it gave them a level.

Levels gained through fighting were easy to understand for all those familiar with video games — you received Resources from enemies in the form of XP. Some of the loser’s Resources went to the victor, and some returned back to nature. With monsters, Resources could also become items. This was especially obvious with UBMs.

The distribution of XP in group battles was directly related to performance. Attacking, defending, supporting... everything you did in battle influenced the amount of XP you would receive. This distribution was why Eishiro was only doing the binding and Tsukuyo was doing the attacking. Though, whenever Tsukuyo had the MP and SP for it, she would contribute to the battles by debuffing or supporting instead. In parties, it was actually possible to turn on a setting that made the distribution equal, but it was unusable due to the immense gap in levels between Eishiro and Tsukuyo.

Now, as for job quests, the other leveling method... the way they made people level-up was actually unknown.

Job quests were arranged by the guilds for the respective jobs and offered to those who had them. While the source of physical rewards for completing these jobs was very clear, it was still a mystery where the Resources that caused level-ups came from.

It definitely wasn’t the guilds distributing these Resources. Completing job quests just seemed to imbue the achiever with Resources from the natural world itself. In fact, some guessed that that was actually the case — that it was part of natural law to give Resources to those who completed job quests.

This was actually one of the foundations for the many job-based religions on the continent, including the kingdom’s state religion. “Those who fulfilled their duty today will be given the power to live better tomorrow” was quite a popular idea among them.

“My case is pretty troublesome...” Tsukuyo grumbled again.

Many would reset their levels to improve their builds, and they would generally have an easier time leveling than before. After all, level resets were often focused. Losing a single job would mean losing only a small amount of stats, meaning that fighting to regain the levels would be fairly simple.

Tsukuyo, however, dropped down straight to level 0. Even if she tried to make up for it with the equipment she had, items that increased by percentage weren't that effective at low levels, while items that gave fixed bonuses weren't that potent. Naturally, she couldn't be all that effective at powerleveling.

Job quests were another option, but that was difficult, as well.

In fact, it was impossible for her.

Tsukuyo was, after all, the High Priestess and the leader of The Lunar Society, and the kingdom's job guilds for the priest grouping were owned by the state religion. It would be bad for her reputation if people heard that she, the leader of The Lunar Society, was working for a rival religion. Even if the magnanimous state religion wouldn't care, the onlookers would.

Another thing that would be bad for her reputation was the very fact that she was now low level and desperately trying to climb back up.

"Lady Tsukuyo," Eishiro tapped Tsukuyo on her shoulder.

"Ah. Gotta hiide," she replied as she sunk into his shadow.

Eishiro did the same right after finishing off the bound monsters.

They'd done this to hide from an incoming party of Masters.

About a minute later, Tsukuyo and Eishiro rose from the shadows.

"Let us go elsewhere."

"Okay."

Tsukuyo was the leader of the top-ranking clan, one of the country's Superiors, and thanks to her role in defeating Gloria, one of Altar's Big Three. She enjoyed that reputation, but it made it all the more difficult to show herself in the state she was now. That was why she always hid when people came, then moved elsewhere.

It was a chore, but she had to maintain her majesty as one of the kingdom's greatest. She wanted to hide herself as she was not just from the general public, but also her own Lunar Society. The only ones she trusted enough to help her level were Eishiro and maybe Ichiro Shijima.

Though, Ichiro couldn't leave Torne right now, so he couldn't be here to assist her. Not even Tsukuyo was cruel enough to take away the family time of a man who was said to have not long left to live.

Eishiro, on the other hand, had to put up with her business in and out of Dendro. He'd actually been helping with her inefficient leveling for several dozen hours now, all while making time for college work and chores in real life. His loyalty was equal to steel.

"...I know this is all we have, but just how long will it take for me to get back my levels at this rate?" Tsukuyo sighed as she thought about how many hours of this she would have to go through.

"Let us progress patiently. We have time," said Eishiro, standing next to her with a gentle smile on his face.

Eishiro collapsed in real life just three days later.

The End

The Overworked Control AI

A Certain Day of a Certain Month

The term "control AI" had a different meaning in Infinite Dendrogram than it had in real life. The control AIs outside were artificial intellects using the processing power of supercomputers to their full capacity. The control AIs inside, on the other hand, were actually Infinite Embryos — Embryos above even Superior.

However, due to their immense calculating power and unique abilities, they were able to manage Infinite Dendrogram well enough to be considered control AIs. They had their own set roles and managed various phenomena. One managed the Embryos before they were implanted in Masters, one created the UBMs that would act as barriers spurring Master evolution... they each had their own field and played a part in keeping things running smoothly. All the jobs were necessary.

Since what they were responsible for differed so greatly, there were natural differences in difficulty, as well. The most notable example was control AI no. 7.

"Ph...ew..."

A gloomy-looking woman with profound bags under her eyes. This was the avatar of the Duchess.

